A meeting of the East India proprietors was held in London, on the 25th March, for the purpose of receiving from the directors, communications relative to the correspondence and negotiations which have taken place between the government and the East India company, on the subject of the renewal of their charter. The attendance was very numerous, and some of the documents laid before them were of the very highest importance; involving, as they do, the commercial concerns of the British empire, and the interests of so many millions of her subjects. From these proceedings we now learn the nature of the terms which the government has proposed for settling the great question relative to the trade and political administration of India. After various interviews between Earl Grey and Mr. C. Grant, a plan has been agreed to, of which the following are stated to be the principal heads. At the same time it was stated to the proprietors that although the arrangements, on the whole, appeared to be eligible, the subject was left open to discussion, and government would be ready to weigh the merits of any other scheme that might be suggested—

1. The China monopoly to cease.
2. The East India company to retain its political functions.
3. The company's assets, commercial and territorial, to be assigned to the crown, on behalf of the territorial government to India.
4. An annuity of £630,000 to be granted to the company, payable in England half yearly, to be charged on the territorial revenue of England, not to be redeemable before the 25th of April—, and then to be redeemable at the option of parliament on the payment of £100 for every £5 5s. of annuity.
5. The revenue of India to be chargeable with all the expenses incurred on account of that country either at home or abroad.
6. The new annuitants to retain their character of a joint stock company, the qualification and right of voting to remain as at present.
7. The number of court of directors to be one-fourth going out in rotation every year.
8. The patronage, civil and military, to remain with the directors as at present.
9. The civil servants of the company to be educated at Haileybury. The number of students always to be greater than the probable number of vacancies. To remain in the college for
10. The directors to fill-up the vacancies each year. Each director to appoint in his turn.
11. The 47th section of the 53d of Geo. III. to remain in force, but to be made applicable to removals as well as to appointments.
12. Every British subject to have the right of going to, settling at, either of the presidencies without license; but the right of going into, trading or settling in the interior, to be subject to such restraints and regulations as the local government might require.
13. The board of control to have right of altering despatches; and, on the refusal of the court of directors to send them out, to have the power of sending out such despatches themselves.
14. The appointment of governors to remain, as at present, with the king. The veto still to continue with the court of directors.

Before breaking up, the meeting agreed that the consideration of the question should be adjourned to the 14th of April.

IRELAND.

Mr. O'CONNELL's speech in the house of commons, on the third reading and final passage of the "coercion bill."

Mr. O'Connell said that he did not rise to implore—to entreat—much less to eringe—on behalf of the nation to which he belonged, which, though subject to this, was yet a distinct one ["no, no"]; he called upon the house not to pass this atrocious, this audacious bill, which, though it had received some improvements since it left the other house, where it had been supported by the lord chancellor; though the press had been left safe, and many of its original horrors had been mitigated, yet was still atrocious enough to justify him in calling upon the house not to insult the Irish nation by putting down their right of petition, and by treating crime, not by the ordinary process of law, but by opposing crime to crime, and revenge against revenge. The honorable member for St. Alban's had said, that there had been few petitions from England—not fifty—against this bill; he [Mr. O'Connell] asserted that there had been at least seventy. But when it was considered that the leading press of London had either been silent on behalf of them (the opponents of the bill), or had taken part against them, was it surprising that the feelings of the people of England should not be expressed loudly in their behalf? The bill had two parts, one unfounded altogether, the other founded on some melancholy facts, to which an unconstitutional remedy was applied. He still contended that no case had been made out for a measure which enabled a lord lieutenant to prohibit any meeting however peaceable. What became then of their offers of generosity; give him justice; he laughed to scorn their offers of generosity. Were there any grievances in Ireland? When he was asked why he regretted the loss of meetings, he asked in return, were there no grievances in Ireland? No one had been hardy enough to deny there were grievances in Ireland. If there ever was a country in which agitation was necessary, where it became a sacred duty, it was Ireland at this moment. Shew him, in their agitation, that they had ever stated as a grievance what was no grievance. [Hear.] He challenged any one to point out an instance in which a grievance had been exaggerated or imaginary. The common law and the magistracy were sufficient to put down the evils complained of without recourse to this measure. If you put down agitation, you put down the principles which recently renovated your constitution, which were carried too far when they brought one monarch to the scaffold, and were not carried far enough when they only banished another from the throne. But it was said that this bill must be made a law, because it was to be accompanied by healing measures. Healing measures! he defied the present ministers to point out any healing measures which they had proposed for the benefit of Ireland. The Irish reform bill was said to be one; that bill did, indeed, follow the English reform bill, but it was a narrow, insufficient, oligarchical, and insulting bill. What other measures could the ministers point to? Not one. And yet Ireland had grievances, even the right honorable gentleman admitted that, and one of its chief grievances at present was an administration which had deceived it. [Hear.] They had made great promises to the people of Ireland, but they had done nothing for its benefit. That people labored under great grievances—what ought to be done to relieve them? To allow them to meet peaceably and to petition for their removal, and so to obtain the confidence even of their most disturbed districts. He exclaimed against the injustice; he abominated the calumny; he treated with scorn in an assembly of freemen the assertion that the language used at public meetings in Ireland was too strong and bold. This was the language which lord Castlereagh applied to the petitions of the people of England, when he sought to gag them with the six acts. This was the language which tyrants always used when they wished to vanish over the oppressions which extracted the groans and lamentations of tormented millions. If the grievance was real, the terms in which you depicted it could not be too bold,—if the suffering which it caused was past endurance, the terms in which you described the manner in which it made the iron to pierce into the soul could not be too violent. He had now done with his objections to the first part of this bill; he now came to the second part of it, which contained two frightful clauses. One of them instituted courts, which, for want of a better name, ministers had been pleased to call courts-martial. Courts-martial they were not; they were, as he had styled them, revolutionary tribunals. But what signified the name by which they were called, when the country was compelled to bear the frightful thing? The clause appointing them annihilated the trial by jury—drove from the bench the judge who had been taught by long experience to distinguish what was evidence from what was not—turned out of the box those whom the accused might challenge, even if their countenances displeased him, got rid of the forms which were established for the protection of innocence; and of those sanctions which were instituted to prevent even guilt from being unjustly convicted, and in their stead erected a new tribunal of five or six military officers, selected at the arbitrary discretion of the crown.

Such men—he spoke of them in their judicial capacity alone, for in their private capacity he did not mean to impeach their honor and integrity—such men had not either the education, the habits, the patience, or the assiduity which were required of judges. He had never yet been satisfied with the decision of any court-martial he had seen. ["Oh, Oh."] That might be his bad taste; but he would even go further, and state that he had never been satisfied with the decision of military men when acting upon other tribunals. That might be bad taste also; but it was his opinion, and therefore he was bound to state it. He therefore asked every honest Englishman who heard him, not to hand over the people of Ireland to these mongrel pseudo-military tribunals, which were called courts-martial, but were so in nothing but the name. What evidence had been submitted to their consideration to justify them in establishing these revolutionary tribunals? First, there was a red box, then, to make the evidence stronger, there were ten or eleven anonymous letters; and, last of all, to crown the climax, there was a vulgar ballad. Would they, upon such evidence, annihilate the trial by jury? This court-martial clause was accompanied by another, which gave the most unprecedented indemnity to every military man who acted upon it; for if he was guilty of outrage in the execution of it, he could only be punished by court-martial; and if he left the army before the court-martial was summoned, he could not be punished even by that. As to putting down predial agitation, he had himself suggested a clause by which it could have been put down legally, and by which your constitutional law would have been made stronger than it was at present.

But that clause they had refused, because it came from him—from him who had twice the anxiety which they had to put down disturbance and outrage. ("Hear," and a laugh.) If he had doubted before regarding the policy of repealing the union, could he entertain a doubt regarding it after the transactions of that evening, in which he had seen his honorable friend, the member from Kildare, received almost with a yell because he dared to raise his voice in behalf of his injured country? The rulers of England thought that they might oppress Ireland, because her people were divided among themselves. Separated, they indeed were; but let them once become united, as he trusted they would soon be, and they would tell those who talked to them about the generosity and kindness of England, that it was not generosity and kindness they wanted, but equality and justice. They would say to the ministers of England, "govern your own beautiful country as you please—legislate for Britain wisely and well—but we Irishmen, bearing allegiance to a common king, and living under a common constitution, will legislate for ourselves." Government might depend upon it that they were not putting down but strengthening the cry for the repeal of the union by these coercive measures; that they were not retarding but accelerating the progress of Ireland to that great act of justice of which he was the humble advocate, and that they were adding energy to the demands of the people by refusing to hear them when calmly and dispassionately urged, and by sneering at the beards of Galway and the uncouth names of Irish parishes, as if the people of Ireland were their subjects and not their coequals. He repeated that the people of Ireland were not 8,000,000 at present, because they were divided, but they would be 8,000,000 when they had done with the fears of some and the prejudices of others. He had now performed his duty to his country. He had denounced it as unjust, tyrannical, and unnecessary, as regarded predial agitation, and as mischievous and unwise as regarded political agitation. If it were passed, in heaven's name let no man talk again of the union between the two countries. Where was the union now? In that house there were 103 members from Ireland, 543 from England and Scotland, many of the latter joining in sympathy with the representatives of Ireland, but overwhelmed by a powerful majority, which did not scruple, from its confidence in ministers, to perpetrate upon Ireland a monstrous injustice. He had done, he repeated, his duty upon this occasion to his country. He had called for inquiry—that inquiry which England had never instituted before she inflicted punishment upon Ireland. He had implored the house for investigation; that investigation had been hitherto refused. It was not yet too late to afford it to the demands of Ireland. He therefore once more entreated the government to pause whilst it was yet upon the threshold, and to halt in its career whilst it was yet time. Give us inquiry, and all may yet be well; but refuse us inquiry, and then see what a conciliatory government you are.

CONGRESS OF MEXICO.

[Translated for the Penny-London.]

Disconcourse pronounced by Manuel Gomez Pedraza, president of the Mexican republic, at the opening of the general congress, on the 29th March, 1833.

CITIZEN REPRESENTATIVES:

When in 1829 I adopted the voluntary resolution of self-banishment, to save my country from the horrors of civil war, my constant prayer to heaven was, that if I ever preferred my private interests to the public welfare, the punishment to which I had thus freely subjected myself might become perpetual; but that if my life and conduct had been consecrated to the good of the nation, she might remember and restore me to her inestimable society. And, in fact, the sovereign states, the liberating army, and a vast majority of the people, proclaimed my return; and from the abject class of the proscribed, I was raised to the honorable position of supreme chief of the republic. In that extraordinary event, no secret springs—no family interest had any share; still less was it attributable to the demands of powerful relatives—the affecting supplications of a tender spouse—the piteous grief of children, or the ever repeated efforts of a brother who identified his fate with mine. Such meditations brought back to Rome Popilius, Cicero and Marius—but I was recalled to my country by the spontaneous acclamations of the army, and by the free resolves of sovereign congresses. Those renowned citizens of ancient Rome were restored from banishment by the death of their enemies; whilst I have enjoyed the same blessing, among those whose influence compelled my exile were still in the full enjoyment of power, and contributed most themselves to restore me to the bosom of my country. Whoever owed more generous return to the people than I? To the Mexicans, I owe every thing; and those who were my enemies, have overwhelmed me with honors and distinction.

On my arrival at Vera Cruz, parties were engaged in a mortal struggle. The chambers rejecting all measures of conciliation, closed the door to all accommodation. The liberals, who could expect nothing from the public power, balanced on their swords their own fate, and future destiny of their country. War raged in every quarter, and the keenest foresight could discern no limit to the bloody struggle. Such was the state of the republic, when I landed on its shores.

The belligerents, concentrating their forces, were approaching each other; those of general Bustamante moved from the states of the interior, upon the capital of the confederation: those of general Santa Anna abandoned the siege of Mexico, and advanced to meet them. All, in a word, announced a new Pharsalia, as decisive of the fate of our nation as that was of the destiny of Rome and of the world.

Under these circumstances, I directed my course to the city of Puebla. The armies were approaching that capital. The blood of the Mexicans was flowing in torrents, and the fields of Posadas, strewn with corpses, called aloud for an authoritative intervention by a peaceful reference. The nature of the affair, required it at the moment. A truce, during which the consent of the states to any treaty might be solicited, was of difficult attainment in the heat of passion, whose angry violence brooks no delay. Several legislatures, whose opinions were known, had rejected such conciliation as the case required, and at best the truce could only have produced the fatal effects which others had done—namely, to give time to the parties to repair their losses, and to embittered rage more activity and daring.

These powerful considerations, the outcry of afflicted humanity, and the most holy duties which my return to my country imposed upon me, decided me to improve the happy moment to conclude a peace. The mild and generous character of the Mexicans, and the philosophic disposition of the generals and chiefs of both armies, inspired me with the idea of initiating a fraternal reconciliation; but political opinions being various, and individual interests opposed, it was indispensable to recur to a certain, recognised, incontrovertible principle; and this principle is the national sovereignty, the fountain, and original of public power. What other principle but this could in a disturbed community, regulate contrary opinions, accommodate adverse interests, and reconcile contradictory views? Whilst a question which embraced the very existence of our civil society was discussed by force of arms, where was the august tribunal to decide it? Undoubtedly there was none other than the people, for in it alone resides that boundless power indispensable for the solution of such difficulties. The history of the ancient republics, and even of monarchies, demonstrate this truth. The most despotic kings in political crisis, have turned, as to the ark of salvation, to the convocation of states general, extraordinary congresses, diets and other representative bodies, which, under different denominations, have had no other object than to consult and revere the will of the people. Within the people, all citizens are comprehended—all private interests are there embraced, and parties and passions vanish or are neutralized in the common mass, where, of course, alone are found certain and impartial decisions.

Such were the guiding principles of my conduct in December last. Society shook to its foundations—public confidence violated—the laws contemned—the state was on the brink of a frightful crisis. The persons occupying the supreme authority, were in conflict with a majority of the nation, and instead of directing these wonderful events with skill and tact, by an inextinguishable perversity, obstinately resisted the public wish. To attain to a proper result in this general confusion, it was necessary to silence the noisy strife of arms, and then listen to the supreme will of the nation. The armistice concluded on the 9th December, accomplished the first object, and the convention of Zavaleta fulfilled the last. Were this a proper place, I might describe the memorable interview, held at that estate between the generals, chiefs and officers of the contending forces. Beneath the dusty roof of a rustic and nameless edifice, questions all important to the public welfare, were freely discussed: there good faith, republican liberty and pure patriotism shone resplendent: there private passions were repressed by sound reason: and there, in fine, the military gave a new proof of honor and civic virtue, by generously yielding up their commissions, and bowing with reverence to the supreme will of the people. The meeting at the estate of Zavaleta, presented a picture of deep interest to the philosophic observer: there shone forth in splendor all that was august and noble: the men who composed it—the very men who two short weeks before, amidst the smoke and roar of artillery, sought each others extermination, there presented in their sedate and composed countenances, the magnificent spectacle of a patriarchal assembly. Never did an insistent aristocracy in its orgies offer to the world a reunion of citizens as disinterested in their views—as noble in their conduct.

This, citizen representatives, is a passing sketch of what occurred at the estate which gave name to the convention of pacification: a convention at the time applauded by those who now load it with invectives, and which has since been sanctioned by the nation itself.

This plan—the work of philosophy and sound judgment, bitter as it may be to the enemies of democracy, will stand for us a monument of honor, and a lesson instructive to our posterity, for it records forever to Mexicans, that in the people, and in the people alone, resides the mass of sovereign power, which is all-sufficient to rescue them from the greatest perils. When the inflammatory pamphlets—now scattered in profusion, and the names of their authors shall be sunk in oblivion, this plan of pacification, the object of their present rancour, will occupy a brilliant spot in the history of the world.

But in proportion as this document affirms the important dogma of popular sovereignty, it has been a scandal to the aristocratic party, for in it men regard their privileges as an outwork to their ulterior pretensions—it is not wonderful, therefore, that they attack with rage, a plan which has forever prostrated a power they have so ferociously abused.

Invested on the 25th December, with the supreme power, I endeavored as far as human nature admits to rise superior to mean passions, and to divest myself of all party spirit—I marked out for myself the path of justice in my conduct, impartiality in my judgments and toleration towards all. The difficulties I have had to overcome, admit of no explanation. I know not whether I have succeeded in the administration, nor is it easy for me to pass judgment thereon. If I might have performed my duties better, and did not attain to that perfection, that nation which has loaded me with so many favors, as a last indulgence, will overlook my errors.

At my entrance on power, I found an exhausted treasury, loaded with an immense debt, countless arrears in payment—widows, orphans and pensioners plunged into misery. Through the proper department, I entered into arrangements with the mercantile interest, whereby, with perfect security to it, the treasury has realized receipts to satisfy its most pressing claims far beyond what could have been anticipated. Great economy has been effected, and national credit and public confidence restored. If the same system of economy shall be maintained, if the maritime custom houses shall be placed in better regulation, and if the important bank on the public credit shall be established, our income will augment, and the expenses of government, and the immense debt that weighs upon it, will be protected. The secretary of the treasury will promptly take the necessary initiative steps, the early adoption of which, I most earnestly recommend to the legislature, as upon them depends our political existence.

Nor of minor interest is the arrangement of the administration of justice. With a heart deeply penetrated with the evils of the country, and animated with the most lively desire to correct them, on the very day on which I entered upon the federal government, I devoted myself to an attentive examination of the actual state of the administration of justice. Convinced that upon it depend essentially the blessings which the constitution and the laws secure to the citizens under the name of private rights and guarantees; the fulfilment of which produces public and private morality and the solid happiness of man, I, from time to time, issued such orders as my functions authorised to invigorate this branch, which was found but too much debilitated by circumstances. I recommend most earnestly the early adoption of the reforms which will be duly presented to the congress of the union, by the secretary of that branch.

The departments of war and the marine, will also, in proper time, initiate the measures which I stipulated for in the plan of Zavaleta and others, which may lead to the indispensable reform of the active and permanent army. That army, the mark of obloquy to the ungrateful, has successively resolved the two important problems of independence and liberty; and although it has fallen into the disorganization attendant upon revolutions, the time has arrived to re-organize it in a manner suited to our republic. The elements of which it is composed present fine materials for a useful reform. The generals and chiefs in command of it, wish to see its discipline restored. To the general congress it appertains to prescribe organic laws, adequate for the purpose.

In the development of the past revolution, more than fourteen thousand men of all arms were assembled in the capital, from the most remote points of the republic. The troops of the line withdrew, and have already reached their respective states—those of the militia have marched to their several districts, and it being the constitution of these useful corps, formed from the industrious and laboring citizens, to withdraw from active service when the emergency is past which calls them forth, the greatest part of them have retired—producing an annual saving to the public treasury of three millions seven hundred and odd dollars.

In regard to our foreign relations, they remain in a favorable state, and nothing has occurred recently but the notice (although unofficial) of a political change in Spain. The government has not neglected the national interests in this particular, nor forgotten the legislation therewith connected. I have reason to believe that the government at Washington appreciates our political regeneration, and will shortly give us proofs of it. The enlightened people of the United States of the north, cherishes our social felicity, and applauds the triumph of liberty.

Here terminates this very rapid expose of the state of the nation. Actual witnesses of the events, the Mexicans require no details to judge of the condition of the republic. The civilized world is regarding us, and desires to be more intimately informed of our situation—we are bound to satisfy this desire, and it will be complied with by the reports which the four secretaries of the republic will present, within a few days, to this august assembly, and which accompanied by a brief manifesto, will be printed. These documents, written with republican sincerity, will narrate our dissensions and errors; but they will show at the same time, that if the Mexican people has defects and vices, as every nation has, it is also endowed with skill to avoid the precipice, with energy to reclaim its outraged rights, and to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

Having concluded the historical part of our occurrences, may I be permitted to say a word on the political course of my administration. It has been magnanimous, frank, and liberal; and be the sarcasms of the opposition what they may, it is manifest, that from the 26th of December, when I received the reins of government, a gun has not been fired, a tear has not been shed, none have been arrested, none persecuted—in a word, the action of the government has been energetic and constant, but unperceived. Who can argue against facts? Legislators! may Almighty God grant that Mexicans may for ever enjoy the peace and liberty which the plan of Zavaleta obtained for them.

Some generals and a few officers alone, through error or caprice, incurred the pain of deprivation of their rank, imposed by the 11th article of that compact on those who did not adhere to it. I, as the supreme magistrate and guarantor of the convention, found myself under the painful necessity of declaring them within the terms of the said penalty, until the decision of the general congress could be had. I protest most solemnly that such an order cost me an effort to rise above the sentiments of my heart. The idea of an abuse of power never occurred to me, but as a man in public station, I was compelled to execute a painful duty—it was performed; but when I this day render account of my proceedings to the representatives of the people—this day, when I am on the eve of retiring for ever to oblivion, allow me to present my earnest supplication as a simple individual to every one of the members of this dignified assembly in favor of those citizens. The representatives of a generous people ought to be magnanimous. I flatter myself that my entreaties will be heard, and I already anticipate the high gratification of knowing that those generals, chiefs, and officers are restored to their rank, emoluments, and full enjoyment of all their privileges. It is but just that I should at the close of my public career, recommend that concord which I invoked when I arrived at Vera Cruz to fulfil the orders of the sovereign people.

If our actual political condition be compared with the sad state of the republic in the preceding November, we shall find abundant grounds to congratulate ourselves. Then the genius of evil presided over our destinies—then desolation and death menaced the young and the aged. Now peace reigns throughout the republic, and our citizens repose in freedom and security. The very malcontents who assail the government with senseless carping, enjoy every privilege and security, and live free from all molestation. At that unhappy period, Mexico suffered from its government an internal hostility far more ominous than the attacks of a foreign enemy. The estates of those in easy circumstances were daily frittered away by forced contributions—it was no longer lawful to speak, far less to write—the prisons were full, and none could count on the security of the domestic asylum. Mexicans who hear me, is not what I assert true?

But since the people recovered their rights, who has aught to complain of? Men speak and write freely what they think—property is respected—the prisons are devoted to actual criminals, and the house of the citizen is sacred and inviolable. Then—but why recur to scenes which should be forgotten for ever. Suffice it to say, that society was then fast hastening to dissolution—now it is re-organized and reformed. The nation now reposes upon a congress elected by the people, composed of men well known in an eventful course of ten years, reared in a revolution, and schooled by misfortune. Now is nominated to the executive power an illustrious general, who well knows how to direct the glory and influence with which victory has encircled his brows, to the practical good of the people who honor him. This general has brought to a close, enterprises of the most extraordinary daring, of admitted utility originating in his own capacious mind, and conducted with courage and perseverance. The hero of such exploits is doubtless a master spirit who will close the wounds of which his country is already convalescent. I rejoice at the prospect of such a successor, and I rejoice to behold the legislative power confided to the hands of upright citizens and federal republicans.

Mexico, March 29, 1833.

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT SANTANDER.

President Santander's message at the opening of the congress of New Granada, March 1st, is nearly as long as the last message of president Jackson. We translate a few paragraphs. The foreign relations of the republic are represented as generally satisfactory.

[Journal of Com.]

The central republic of Colombia having been separated into three independent states, that of New Granada has respected the public treaties celebrated with the United States, Great Britain and Holland, doing justice to the claims founded upon those treaties, and although the respective diplomatic agents of the nations with which the Colombian government established relations have remained in this capital, recognizing de facto the new political form which New Granada has adopted, France alone has, as yet, formally appointed a charge d'affaires near the government of New Granada.

With the new American republics, among which an identity of principles has formed a strict and natural alliance, the amicable relations which before existed have not been changed.

It is a satisfaction to the executive to announce, that throughout the vast extent of the state, peace and tranquillity are enjoyed, as the immediate effect of the adhesion of the great majority of the people to the existing institutions, and the care with which the executive and its agents cause the laws to be strictly obeyed. * * * The nation ought to make such provision that every citizen may learn to read, write, and calculate accounts—by applying, for the present, a certain portion of the national funds for the encouragement of parish schools.

The receipts into the treasury during the year ending 30th June, 1832, were $2,327,310 75, and the estimated expenditures of the present year amount to $2,171,621 47, exclusive of $346,080 for the purchase, freight and transportation of tobacco.

The foreign debt is one of the gravest matters which engage the attention of the government. We are debtors, and ought to pay. The constituent convention has recognised the foreign debt in the proportion which belongs to New Granada, and it belongs to yourselves to dictate some means by which its payment may be gradually effected. Whatever may be the result of the meeting of commissioners from the three states, New Granada is already pledged to satisfy a part of the debt which the republic of Colombia contracted. It will be honorable to the country and the representative body, to adopt some means at the present time, going to show that we desire to fulfil our solemn promises. Fortunately there are now in this capital, representatives of the stockholders, duly authorised to make certain propositions relative to securing the interest of the debt in future, and to a definitive arrangement of this affair. I entreat you to turn your attention to this delicate matter—to provide for hearing, by means of a committee of both houses, the inquiries and proposals of the representatives of our creditors—and to base the arrangement upon a prudent calculation of the share which falls to New Granada, be it more or less.

LAW OF NEW YORK.

An act to subject certain debts owing to non-residents, to taxation, passed April 27, 1833.

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

§ 1. All debts owing by inhabitants of this state, to persons not residing therein, for the purchase of any real estate, or secured by a mortgage on real estate, shall be deemed personal property within the town and county where the debtor resides; and as such, shall be liable to taxation in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the personal estate of citizens of this state.

§ 2. The assessors in each town and ward, while engaged in ascertaining the taxable property therein, and before the first day of June in each year, shall, by diligent inquiry, ascertain the debts of the description mentioned in the first section of this act, owing by the inhabitants of their several towns and wards, to non-residents of this state, and in a preparatory assessment roll to be made by them for that purpose, shall state and designate the said property, according to their best information, in four separate columns, as follows:

1. In the first column, the names of the creditors respectively, to whom such debts are owing;

2. In the second column, the names of any known agents of such of the said creditors, with the places of residence of such agents respectively;

3. In the third column, the amount of every debt owing to such creditor, of the description mentioned in this section, stating separately the amount owing by each debtor;

4. In the fourth column, the names of the persons by whom such debts are respectively owing, and the town and county of their residence.

§ 3. For the purpose of making such statement, and for the purpose of making an assessment required by law, the assessors of any town or ward, shall be permitted, without being required to pay any fee or charge whatever, to inspect the books kept by the clerks of their county, or in the city of New York, by the register thereof, in which mortgages are registered or recorded, or in which any contracts for the sale of land are recorded, and to inspect all unrecorded mortgages and contracts left with such clerk or register, and to take such extracts therefrom as they shall deem necessary.

§ 4. The assessors of any town or ward, or any of them, may administer an oath to any person whom they may think proper to examine, to make true answers to such questions as shall be put by such assessors, touching the subjects of inquiry directed by this act; but this section shall not extend to those cases where a list of debts shall have been furnished by the agent of any non-resident creditor, according to the provisions of this act.

§ 5. As soon as the assessors shall have completed their preparatory assessment rolls, and on or before the first day of July in each year, they shall cause a fair copy of the same to be made out, which shall be certified by them, or a majority of them, to be correct according to the best information they can obtain, and shall deliver the same to the county treasurer, of their county.

§ 6. If there shall reside in any county of this state, an agent of any non-resident creditor having debts owing to him of the description mentioned in the first section of this act, he shall, on or before the first day of June in each year, furnish to the county treasurer of his county, a true and accurate list of debts of the description mentioned in the first section of this act, which were owing on the first day of January preceding, to the principal of such agent by any inhabitant of this state, arranging such list according to the town and county of the residence of the debtors, specifying therein the name of each debtor, the town and county in which he resides, and the amount owing by him; which list shall be verified by the oath of such agent, to be taken before any commissioner of deeds, or justice of the peace.

§ 7. Any such agent who shall refuse or neglect to furnish such list, shall forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars to the use of the county in which he resides, to be sued for by the treasurer of such county in his name of office, and to be recovered upon proof that the principal of such agent had debts owing to him by inhabitants of this state, of the description mentioned in the first section of this act, and that the existence of such debts was known to such agent.

§ 8. The county treasurer who shall receive the certified statements of the assessors of his county, shall immediately make out from the said statements so furnished to him by the assessors, and from the lists received by him from the agents of non-residents a list of the debts appearing on such statements and lists, to be owing to persons not residing in this state, by inhabitants of any other county than that of such treasurer, for each county in which any such debtor resides; the said list shall be a transcript of so much of the original statements and lists furnished as above provided, as relates to the debts herein required to be stated, and the particulars thereof shall be arranged in the said lists, in the same manner as herein directed in respect to the preparatory assessment rolls of the assessors. In case it shall appear that the same debt has been returned by any assessors in their preparatory assessment rolls, and also in any list furnished by an agent of any non-resident, the county treasurer shall transcribe only one of such entries in the list herein directed to be made by him. The lists thus made shall be certified by such county treasurer to be correct abstracts from the statements and lists furnished to him according to the provisions of this act. The list made for each county shall be transmitted by or before the fifteenth day of July in each year, by mail, to the county treasurer of such county.

§ 9. Every county treasurer shall, as soon as he shall have received such abstracts from the other county treasurers, prepare from the said abstracts, and from the preparatory assessment rolls furnished to him by the assessors of his county, and the lists furnished him by the agents of non-residents, a list of all the debts appearing from the documents aforesaid to be owing to persons not residing in this state, by inhabitants of any town of his county, for each town in which such debtors reside; the said list shall be a transcript of so much of the said documents as relates to the debts herein required to be stated, and the particulars thereof shall be arranged in the said lists in the same manner as herein directed in respect to the preparatory assessment rolls of the assessors. If it shall appear that the same debt has been returned by any assessors in their preparatory assessment rolls, and also in any list furnished by an agent of any non-resident, or in any abstract furnished by another county treasurer, the county treasurer shall transcribe only one of such entries in the abstracts herein directed to be made. Such lists shall be certified by such county treasurer to be correct abstracts from the documents furnished to him according to the provisions of this act. The list for each town shall be transmitted by or before the tenth day of August in each year, to the assessors of such town or one of them.

§ 10. From the list thus furnished them by their county treasurer, the assessors of every town and ward shall correct and complete their assessment rolls, by entering in the same the debts appearing by such list to be owing to persons not residing within the state, by any inhabitants of their town or ward; which entries shall be made under the names of the respective non-resident creditors, and the amount owing by each debtor shall be entered in a separate line, and the particulars of such entries shall be arranged in the same manner as herein before directed in respect to the preparatory assessment rolls of the assessors.

§ 11. The time prescribed by law for completing assessment rolls in the several towns and wards in this state, is hereby extended from the first day of August to the first day of September in each year, and upon the assessment roll being completed, the assessors shall proceed in the manner now required by law, in respect to giving notice thereof, the leaving the rolls with one of the assessors, and their meeting together to correct such rolls; and the time prescribed by law for delivering such certified rolls to the supervisors, is hereby extended to the first day of October in each year.

§ 12. At the meeting of the assessors to correct their rolls, pursuant to the notice given by them, any creditor whose name shall be inserted in such rolls, or his agent may, by his own affidavit or other proof, adduce testimony to the said assessors to show that any error exists in the said rolls, or that any part of any debt therein stated is desperate and not collectable; and the said assessors shall review and alter the said rolls according to the facts so established; but no reduction of the amount of any debt shall be made at the instance of any non-resident creditor, whose agent shall have refused or neglected to furnish the list herein required of him.

§ 13. The assessment rolls thus completed shall be laid before the board of supervisors, who shall proceed as prescribed by law to assess the taxes to be raised for town and county purposes; and debts of the description mentioned in the first section of this act, shall be deemed to be personal estate within the town where the debtor resides, and shall be liable to taxation for town and county charges, in the same manner and to the same extent as any personal estate of the inhabitants of such town.

§ 14. In case any treasurer or assessors shall fail to receive in due season any list or statement required by this act to be transmitted to him, such officer may apply to the treasurer or assessors whose duty it was to furnish such list or statement, for a duplicate list or statement, as the case may require, which the officer to whom such application shall be made is hereby required to make out and certify in the manner herein before prescribed, and the same shall be equally valid with the original statement or list herein directed to be made; and if such duplicate lists or statements are obtained after the assessment rolls are completed by any assessors and delivered to the supervisors, the supervisors may notwithstanding correct any such rolls according to the facts contained in such duplicate; but such correction shall be made before the taxes are assessed.

§ 15. Every collector to whom any assessment roll shall be delivered, containing any tax upon any debt owing to persons residing out of this state, may receive from any inhabitant of his town the amount of the tax assessed upon the debt owing by any such inhabitant, and shall thereupon give a receipt for the amount so paid, to such debtor, which shall be presumptive evidence of the fact of such payment; and the sum so paid shall be deemed to be a payment by such debtor on the debt so owing by him to such non-resident creditor, and may be set off against the claim of such creditor, or of any assignee of such claim.

§ 16. If such tax shall not be paid by such debtor, the collector shall levy the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the non-resident creditor within his town, in the same manner as if such creditor was an inhabitant of the town.

§ 17. When it shall appear by the return of any collector, made according to law to a county treasurer, that any tax imposed on a debt owing to a person not residing in this state, remains unpaid, such county treasurer shall issue his warrant to the sheriff of any county in this state, where any real or personal estate of such non-resident creditor may be found, commanding him to make of the goods and chattels and real estate of such non-resident, the amount of such tax as specified in a schedule to be annexed to the said warrant, together with the sum of one dollar for the expense of issuing such warrant, and to return the said warrant to the treasurer issuing the same, and to pay to him the money which shall be collected by virtue thereof, except the said sheriff's fees, by a certain day therein to be specified, not less than sixty days from the date of such warrant.

§ 18. The taxes upon several debts to the same non-residents, shall be included in one warrant; and the taxes upon several debts owing to different non-residents, may be included in the same warrant; and the sheriff shall be directed to levy the sums specified in the schedule thereto annexed, upon the personal and real property of the non-residents respectively, opposite to whose names respectively such sums shall be written, together with the sum of fifty cents upon each non-resident, for the expense of such warrant.

§ 19. The schedules annexed to such warrant, shall be transcripts of so much of the assessment rolls returned to the county treasurer by the collectors, as relates to the tax directed to be collected, and the particulars thereof shall be arranged in the same manner as they appear on such assessment rolls.

§ 20. Such warrant shall be a lien upon, and shall bind the real and personal estate of the non-residents against whom the same shall be issued, from the time an actual levy shall be made upon any property by virtue thereof; and the sheriff to whom such warrant shall be directed, shall proceed upon the same in all respects, with the like effect and in the same manner as prescribed by law in respect to executions against property issued by a county clerk upon judgments rendered by a justice of the peace, and shall be entitled to the same fees for his services in executing the same, to be collected in the same manner.

§ 21. In case of the neglect of any sheriff to return such warrant according to the directions therein; or to pay over the money collected by him in pursuance thereof, he shall be proceeded against in the supreme court by attachment, in the same manner and with the like effect as for similar neglects in reference to an execution issued out of the supreme court in a civil suit, and the proceedings thereon shall be the same in all respects.

§ 22. If any such warrant shall be returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, in respect to any non-resident, the county treasurer, under the directions of the board of supervisors of his county, may file a bill in his name of office, in the court of chancery, whatever may be the amount so remaining unsatisfied, against such non-resident and his agents, and any other person having the care or possession of any property of such non-resident, for the discovery and sequestration of such property.

§ 23. On the filing of such bill, or on the coming in of the answer thereto, or upon such bill being taken as confessed, or the allegations therein being established, the court of chancery shall order such part of the property of such non-resident to be sequestered, as shall be necessary for the purpose of satisfying the taxes in arrear imposed as aforesaid upon the debts owing to such non-resident, with the costs of prosecution, and may order and direct such other proceedings as may be necessary to compel the payment of such tax and costs.

§ 24. The county treasurers of several counties may, under the direction of their respective boards of supervisors, unite in one bill against the same party, for the collection of taxes imposed on debts owing to non-residents, although such taxes may be payable to different county treasurers.

§ 25. Where non-residents who are parties to any bill filed according to the provisions of this act, shall have any known agent residing in this state, for the sale of their lands, or for receiving the purchase money on such sales, the court of chancery may, in its discretion, make an order that the service of the subpoena issued on the filing such bill, upon such agent, shall be deemed sufficient to entitle the complainant to an order for the principal of such agent to appear and answer such bill.

§ 26. The expenses of county treasurers, and such compensation as their board of supervisors shall allow them for their services, in executing this act, shall be county charges, and the expenses and charges for the services of assessors under this act, shall be town charges, and audited and paid as such.

§ 27. Whenever it shall satisfactorily appear to the assessors of any town or ward, by the oath of any inhabitant of this state, or by other proofs, that any debts due to such inhabitant, by residents in any other state, are by the laws of such state subject to taxation, and have been actually taxed in such state within twelve months preceding, it shall be the duty of such assessors to deduct the amount of such debts from the personal estate of such inhabitant.

§ 28. The controller shall prepare instructions and forms for the execution of this act, and shall cause a sufficient number of copies thereof and of this act to be printed and distributed to the assessors, county treasurers and clerks of the board of supervisors, in the state.

§ 29. This act shall take effect immediately after its passage. State of New York, } This bill having been approved and signed secretary's office, } by the governor of this state on the 27th day of April, 1833, I do hereby certify that the same became a law on that day.

JOHN A. DIX, secretary.

REMARKS ON THE PRECEDING LAW. From the Albany Argus of May 2.

We omitted to notice in our summary of the more important public acts passed at the late session of the legislature, the bill

"to subject to taxation certain debts due to non-residents." It is a bill which must affect (whether favorably or unfavorably remains yet to be seen) the interests of those sections of the state in which the lands of the Holland land company; the Putney and other estates are situated; and which are now under mortgages, probably to an immense amount, for the original purchase money; all of which are intended to be reached by the bill. We shall publish it to-morrow.

From the New York American of May 6.

The law to tax debts due to non-residents, is published in our columns to-day. It is of this law that the Argus, the official paper, says, with "bated breath, and in most cautious phrase, 'that it remains to be seen' whether its effects will be for good or evil; just as was well put by a Baltimore paper, it remains to be seen whether the sun will rise to-morrow, but with no other uncertainty as to the result. A more iniquitous law never was passed; and certainly no one which should be more resolutely questioned and opposed through all the courts, by the parties, or the agents of the parties, whom it is meant to despoil.

The city of New York has looked quietly on the perpetration of this injustice, as though it were an act by which her immediate interests would not be affected, and reasoning apparently upon the periphrastic fallacy, that others' property may be struck at with impunity, so her's be untouched. But there are classes in this act, if we mistake not, which are intended to reach every debt due upon real estate in this city; and every dollar loaned by the residents of any other state in this union, as well as by those of foreign countries, is now made liable to pay for watching, lighting and paying our streets, and even for the turtle feasts of its aldermen. How far the enterprising mechanics, who, upon this borrowed capital, have constructed, and are constructing, very many houses, will resist this law—which, if pronounced just and constitutional, must have the effect of driving away the foreigner with his wealth, and leave the resident borrower to the mercy of resident lenders in legal possession of a monopoly of the money market—we will not undertake to say: but it can hardly be doubtful, that when they are made aware of the truth, they will not see any cause to thank their "Solomon's in council" for such an act.

MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.

Fredericksburg, May 8.

The president of the U. States, gov. Cass, secretary of war, Mr. Taney, attorney general, major Barry, postmaster general, and major Donelson, the president's private secretary, arrived in town on Monday evening. They were accompanied by a number of citizens from the District, captain Moore's company of national cadets, from Washington, captain Kinsey's company of riflemen, and captain Brockett's light infantry, of Alexandria, the marine band from the navy yard, as well as many strangers from the eastern towns. They were met a short distance beyond Falmouth by the marshals of the day, the Fredericksburg guards, the rifle company, and Fredericksburg blues junior, by whom the president and suite were accompanied to their lodgings.

A troop of light horse from the county of Fauquier, under the command of captain Tho's T. Fountleroy, also arrived the same evening.

LAYING THE CORNER STONE. This ceremony took place on Tuesday, with very imposing effect. About 9 o'clock the president was escorted from his lodgings to the town hall, where he was introduced to a number of citizens and strangers, who called to pay their respects to the chief magistrate of the nation. The day was fine, and the occasion attracted a large concourse of persons from the adjoining counties. The procession set out from the town hall at half past ten o'clock, and moved according to the arrangement of the committee, in the order and through the several streets previously designated, to the site of the monument.

As the procession moved up Main street, the extended line, the various uniforms of the military, the glittering arms, the music, the dense mass that thronged the side walks, the crowded windows, overlooking the whole scene, altogether presented a view grand and imposing.

Arrived at the spot, after an appropriate prayer by the reverend E. C. McGuire, an address was delivered by the president, and also by Mr. Bassett, the place with the inscription deposited, and the other usual ceremonies were performed. The procession then returned to the town hall, where the proceedings were concluded, and the companies separated.

The Fredericksburg Arena furnishes some further particulars of the ceremony above referred to, and of cir-circumstances connected with it. Among them we find the following—

A barbecue, in the old fashioned Virginia style, was prepared under an ample awning, in the beautiful grounds of Hazle Hill, which was partaken of by about five hundred persons. Among the invited guests present were the president and heads of departments, the military companies from a distance, and all strangers of distinction. About 4 o'clock dancing commenced and was kept up with considerable spirit until near sunset. The arrangements were excellent, and the entertainment did great credit to the contractors, Messrs. Blackburn & Curtis. There were, of course, neither toasts nor speeches, but every one seemed to enjoy himself, and the most perfect order and harmony prevailed throughout the evening.

Much credit is due to the monumental committee, and to the marshal-in-chief, colonel Bankhead, and his assistants, for the judicious arrangements made on the occasion.

We must not omit to mention the liberality of the steamboat and stage proprietors of the line between this and Washington, as well as the assistance rendered to them by the proprietors of other lines diverging hence. The gratuitous use of the boat and coaches was tendered to the use of the committee, for the president and suite, and the marine band, and but a very trifling charge made for the transportation of one of the military companies hither, and nothing for taking them back.

THE MONUMENTAL CEREMONY.

Address of the chairman of the monumental committee to the president of the United States, at the laying of the corner stone of the monument to the mother of Washington.

In the name of the monumental committee, I present you, general, the plate which is intended to distinguish that stone just adjusted by the master of the lodge as the corner stone of this pile. I am happy, sir, that he who has defended his country's rights when perilled in the cause of freedom, her cities when the haughty foe, confident of success, pressed eagerly to seize their beauty and booty, has bled for her, risked life, fortune and honor in her cause, is here to add to the honors of this occasion. Who so meet to make a pilgrimage to this shrine of hallowed relics? Who so fit to seal the stone which crowns the corner of a monument to the mother of Washington, as he who now occupies that exalted station first filled by the son of that mother? Let the occasion, general, and its circumstances, excuse this, while we turn to remark more immediately on the object of our present regard. If we look to the page of history, or survey the earth, we see monuments have in every age and every clime, marked those spots distinguished by the happening of some great event, or risen as memorials of the once active virtues of departed worth. Frail man is ever apt to forget the past, and seek new hope of pleasure in the future. He seldom learns from the experience of others the means of attaining what he aims at, and too often stumbles over a new, unbroken tract, unmindful of the brightest objects by which he might trace his road to those distinctions after which natural desire so ardently toils. Hence, enlightened posterity canonize the fame of their ancestors by emblems the most unfading their minds can devise or their powers execute.

Such is our constitution, that the strongest appeals to our better feelings is through the medium of our grosser faculties. Thus monuments are lasting incentives to those who view them, to imitate the virtues they commemorate, and attain by their life and spirit, glory and honor. Nations share in the common sympathies of nature, and participate in all the honors heaped upon their mighty dead. In looking upon this monument, (raised chiefly by the munificence of a patriotic individual), the citizens of these states will remember that they are brothers. They will remember that here lie the ashes of the mother of the "Father of his country." They will acknowledge, too, this just tribute to the merits of her who, early deprived of the support of her consort, encouraged and fostered, by precept and example, the dawning virtues of her illustrious son, and nurtured into maturity those nobler faculties which were the ornament and glory of her waning years. They will acknowledge the hallowed character of this romantic spot, ever to be remembered as the place chosen for her private devotions—the spot to which she often led her offspring, and pointing to the order and beauty of the works of nature, here so eminently displayed, she guided their youthful minds to contemplate the power and benevolence of the great Author of their being. Here she taught the attributes of God—that to him, as their Creator, all praise belonged—that to glorify Him was the object of their creation, and to this end their every energy should be devoted. Here she asked, as a dying request, that her mortal remains might rest. Hallowed be this wish—sacred this spot—lasting as time this monument. Let us cherish the remembrance of this hour. Let us carry with us hence, engraved on our hearts, the memory of her who is here interred. Her fortune—her piety—her every grace of life—her sweet peace in death—through her sure hope of a blessed immortality.

To which the president of the United States replied as follows:
SIR—To you, and to your colleagues of the monumental committee, I return my acknowledgments for the kind sentiments you have expressed towards me, and for the flattering terms in which they have been conveyed. I cannot but feel that I am indebted to your partiality, and not to any services of my own, for the warm hearted reception you have given me. On this occasion, as well as on many others, in the course of a life now drawing towards its close, I have found the confidence and attachment of my countrymen as far beyond my merits as my expectations.

We are assembled, fellow citizens, to witness and assist in an interesting ceremony. More than a century has passed, away since she to whom this tribute of respect is about to be paid, entered upon the active scenes of life—a century fertile in wonderful events, and in distinguished men who have participated in them. Of these events our country has furnished her full share; and of these distinguished men, she has produced a Washington. If he was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," we may say without the imputation of national vanity, that, if not the first, he was in the very front rank of those, too few indeed, upon whose career mankind can look back without regret, and whose memory and example will furnish themes of eulogy for the patriot, wherever free institutions are honored and maintained. His was no false glory, deriving its lustre from the glare of splendid and destructive actions, commencing in professions of attachment to his country, and terminating in the subversion of her freedom. Far different is the radiance which surrounds his name and fame. It shines mildly and equally, and guides the philanthropist and citizen in the path of duty—and it will guide them long after those false lights which have attracted too much attention, shall have been extinguished in darkness.

In the grave before us lie the remains of his mother. Long has it been unmarked by any monumental tablet, but not unhonored. You have undertaken the pious duty of erecting a column to her memory, and of inscribing upon it the simple but affecting words, "MARY, THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON." No eulogy could be higher, and it appeals to the heart of every American.

These memorials of affection and gratitude are consecrated by the practice of all ages and nations. They are tributes of respect to the dead, but they convey practical lessons of virtue and wisdom to the living. The mother and son are beyond the reach of human applause. But the bright example of parental and filial excellence, which their conduct furnishes, cannot but produce the most salutary effects upon our countrymen. Let their example be before us, from the first lesson which is taught the child, till the mother's duties yield to the course of preparation and action which nature prescribes for him.

The address which we have heard, portrays in just colors this most estimable woman. Tradition says, that the character of Washington was aided and strengthened, if not formed, by the care and precepts of his mother. She was remarkable for the vigor of her intellect, and the firmness of her resolution. Left in early life, the sole parent of a young and numerous family, she devoted herself with exemplary fidelity to the task of guiding and educating them. With limited resources she was able, by care and economy, to provide for them, and to ensure them a respectable entrance upon the duties of life. A firm believer in the sacred truths of religion, she taught its principles to her children, and inculcated an early obedience to its injunctions. It is said by those who knew her intimately that she acquired and maintained a wonderful ascendancy over those around her. This true characteristic of genius attended her through life, and even in its decline, after her son had led his country to independence, and had been called to preside over her councils, he approached her with the same reverence she had taught him to exhibit in early youth. This course of maternal discipline, no doubt, restrained the natural ardor of his temperament, and conferred upon him that power of self command, which was one of the most remarkable traits of his character.

In tracing the few recollections which can be gathered of her principles and conduct, it is impossible to avoid the conviction that these were closely interwoven with the destiny of her son. The great points of his character are before the world. He who runs may read them in his whole career, as a citizen, a soldier, a magistrate. He possessed an unerring judgment, if that term can be applied to human nature; great probity of purpose, high moral principles, perfect self-possession, untiring application, an inquiring mind, seeking information from every quarter, and arriving at its conclusions with a full knowledge of the subject; and he added to these an inflexibility of resolution which nothing could change but a conviction of error. Look back at the life and conduct of his mother, and at her domestic government, as they have been this day delineated by the chairman of the monumental committee, and as they were known to her contemporaries and have been described by them, and they will be found admirably adapted to form and develop the elements of such a character. The power of greatness was there, but had it not been guided and directed by maternal solicitude and judgment, its possessor, instead of presenting to the world examples of virtue, patriotism and wisdom, which will be precious in all succeeding ages, might have added to the number of those master spirits, whose fame rests upon the faculties they have abused, and the injuries they have committed.

How important to the females of our country are these reminiscences of the early life of Washington, and of the maternal care of her upon whom its future course depended. Affection less regulated by discretion, might have changed the character of the son, and with it the destinies of the nation. We have reason to be proud of the virtue and intelligence of our females. As mothers and sisters, and wives and daughters, their duties are performed with exemplary fidelity. They, no doubt, realize the great importance of the maternal character, and the powerful influence it must exert upon the American youth. Happy is it for them and our country that they have before them this illustrious example of maternal devotion, and this bright reward of filial success. The mother, of a family who lives to witness the virtues of her children, and their advancement in life, and who are known and honored, should have no other wish on this side the grave, to gratify. The seeds of virtue and of vice are early sown, and we may often anticipate the harvest that will be gathered. Changes no doubt occur, but let no one place his hope upon these. Impressions made in infancy, if not indelible, are effaced with difficulty, and renewed with facility; and upon the mother therefore, must frequently, if not generally, depend the fate of the son.

Fellow citizens, this district of country gave birth to Washington. The ancient commonwealth within whose borders we are assembled from every portion of this happy and flourishing union, renowned as she is for her institutions, for her devotion to the cause of freedom and for her services and sacrifices to promote it, and for the eminent men she has sent forth to aid our country with heart and hand, in peace and war, presents a claim still stronger than those upon the gratitude of her sister states in the birth and life of Washington. Most of you, my friends, must speak of him from report. It is to me a source of high gratification that I can speak of him from personal knowledge and observation. Called by the partiality of my countrymen to the high station once so ably filled by him, and feeling, that in all but a desire to serve you, I am unworthy to occupy his seat; but sensible that to this position I owe the honor of an invitation to unite with you in this work of affection and gratitude, I am unwilling the opportunity should pass away without bearing my testimony to his virtues and services. I do this in justice to my own feelings, being well aware, that his fame needs no feeble aid from me.

The living witnesses of his public and private life will soon follow him to the tomb. Already a second and a third generation are upon the theatre of action, and the men and the events of the revolution, and of the interesting period between it and the firm establishment of the present constitution, must ere long live only in the pages of history. I witnessed the public conduct and the private virtues of Washington, and I saw and participated in the confidence which he inspired, when probably the stability of our institutions depended upon his personal influence. Many years have passed over me since, but they have increased instead of diminishing my reverence for his character, and my confidence in his principles. His Farewell Address, that powerful and affecting appeal to his countrymen, that manual of wisdom for the American citizen, embodies his sentiments and feelings. May He who holds in his hands the fate of nations, impress us all with the conviction of its truth and importance, and teach us to regard its lessons as the precious legacy he has bequeathed us. And if, in the instability of human affairs, our beloved country should ever be exposed to the disasters which have overwhelmed the other republics that have preceded us in the world, may Providence, when it suffers the hour of trial to come, raise up a Washington to guide us in averting the danger.

Fellow citizens: At your request, and in your name, I now deposit this plate in the spot destined for it—and when the American pilgrim shall, in after ages, come up to this high and holy place, and lay his hand upon this sacred column, may he recall the virtues of her who sleeps beneath, and depart with his affections purified and his piety strengthened, while he invokes blessings upon the memory of the mother of Washington.

Resolved, That the president and directors be and they are hereby authorised to subscribe to all such portions of stock necessary to complete the said road from Baltimore to the city of Washington as may remain unsubscribed by corporations or individuals; and to borrow from time to time any sum or sums of money which may be necessary to enable them to pay the instalments that may become due on the stock so subscribed by them for the construction of the said road from Baltimore to the city of Washington, and that the said president and directors be, and they are also hereby, authorised to pledge the property and funds of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, as a security for the payment of any and every sum so borrowed, and the interest thereon for the construction of the road aforesaid.

Which resolutions were adopted by a vote of 25,454 shares in the affirmative, 820 shares in the negative.

The hon. Jas. H. McCulloch, offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the thanks of the meeting be explicitly given to the president and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, for their resolute and persevering efforts in the prosecution of that work in the midst of difficulties and discouragement; and that they have exhibited as much skill and judgment as in so new and great an undertaking could be required of men earnestly seeking to promote the interests committed to them, and deserve the countenance and support of the stockholders and their fellow citizens.

Which resolution was seconded by gen. William McDonald, and unanimously adopted.

On motion, it was then resolved that the thanks of the meeting be presented to the chairman and secretary, and the meeting adjourned, sine die.

MEETING OF THE CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL COMPANY.

From the National Intelligencer of May 10.

On the 7th inst. at our City Hall, a general meeting was opened of the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, according to legal notice; when the following important report was presented by the president of the company:

To the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company in general meeting.

The president and directors beg leave respectfully to submit, along with a copy of the act of the general assembly of Maryland, in pursuance of which the present general meeting has been convened, a report, approved by them, of a committee of their board, appointed to confer with a committee of the board of directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company.

By order, and on behalf of the president and directors.

C. F. MERCER, president of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company.
Canal office, Washington, May 7, 1833.

The committee appointed, by the order of the board of the 6th of April last, to confer with a committee of the board of directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, have performed that duty; and after several conferences with that committee, as well in Washington, as on the line of the canal, and in the city of Baltimore, beg leave to recommend to the president and directors the annexed terms of compromise, in lieu of the 1st section of the act of the general assembly of Maryland, entitled "an act to provide for the continuation of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road to Harper's Ferry, and for other purposes," and of sundry conditions contained in the said act; which, in all other respects, except the modifications thereof, contained in the annexed terms, is left unchanged.

The committee deem it unnecessary, if not inexpedient, to enter into a narrative of the various opinions expressed by themselves or the committee of the rail road company in the progress of their negotiation; but avail themselves of this occasion, to do justice to the candor which marked the course of the committee of the rail road company, and to express a hope, which the assurances of those gentlemen, composing that committee, tended to confirm, that if the proposed arrangement shall meet the approbation of both companies, the harmony, which it is so desirable to establish and preserve in their future progress, will be restored to their mutual benefit.

C. F. MERCER,
W. GUNTON,
W. SMITH.

The Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, by their respective committees, covenant and agree to the following terms of compromise, subject to confirmation or rejection by their respect committees:

1st. To accept the act of the general assembly of Maryland, entitled "an act to provide for the continuation of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road to Harper's Ferry, and for other purposes," within the time limited by the said act for the acceptance thereof by both companies, so as to secure to each its intended benefits. And as the purpose which the legislature of Maryland had in view in passing the same, will be more effectually attained by a modification of some of its conditions, the said companies mutually and reciprocally covenant and agree, in the event of such acceptance by both faithfully to fulfil the conditions hereinafter inserted for their common benefit, and so far to modify those stipulated in their behalf by the act aforesaid, viz:

The Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, in consideration of the damage that may be done to the canal, and of the interruption or hazard to which its navigation will be unavoidably exposed, in the construction of the rail road along the margin thereof, bind themselves to pay to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, for grading the four miles and one-tenth of the road between Harper's Ferry and the Point of Rocks, hereinafter described, the sum of two hundred and sixty-six thousand dollars. The said four miles and one-tenth of the road shall consist of a space to be laid off between the entrance of the bridge at Harper's Ferry and a point two miles therefrom, according to the location of the said road, which point will be below Millar's Narrows: of one mile and one-twentieth, extending from a point opposite to the door of the chief public house, at the Point of Rocks, up the valley of the Potomac, comprehending the lower Point of Rocks; and of one other mile and one-twentieth, extending above and below the upper Point of Rocks, so as to comprehend the same; embracing all that part of the canal border at those places in which an interference exists between the location of a canal and rail road. In making as well as locating the said road, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company shall act in conformity with their own judgment, subject to the conditions, as to the curvature, inclination of surface, and the breadth of the said road, which the act of the general assembly of Maryland prescribes, except that so much of the said road as is expected to be hereafter common to the Frederick and Harper's Ferry turnpike company and the rail road company, shall be of the breadth at the surface, of not less than thirty feet, instead of twenty, for the better accommodation of both these companies.

Should the canal company prefer it, they may begin the lowest section of the said road at any elevation opposite the tavern at the Point of Rocks, not exceeding four feet above that of the road now constructed at that place; and, in case of a change of the present elevation, the expense of raising the present road and its appurtenant fixtures, so as to adjust the same to the road below and to its extension above, shall be at the cost of the rail road company; and shall be done at such time as they may please to direct: provided, however, that at the lower termination of the pass by the upper Point of Rocks, and at the upper termination of the pass by the lower Point of Rocks, the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company may, if they please, in fixing the elevation of these points, or termini, unite an engineer of their own appointment, with the engineer of the canal company, charged by the same to make the location thereof, so as to adjust those points to the intermediate rail road, according to the terms of the said act of the general assembly of Maryland; and the canal company may, in like manner, unite their engineer with the engineer of the rail road company, in fixing the intermediate location of the rail road, according to the said terms.

In the construction of the graduated road aforesaid, for the four miles and one-tenth, before mentioned and in satisfaction of all injuries that may be done the canal in the construction of the said road, and as indemnity for any injuries that may be done the navigation thereof, during the construction of the said road, payments of the $266,000 shall be made monthly by the said rail road company, in the following proportions, viz: one-twelfth part thereof on the 1st day of June next, and one-twelfth part on the first day of each of the following months, until the said graduation shall be completed; but if the same be completed earlier than the twelve months, allowed thereof, the residue unpaid, at the time of such completion, shall be paid on the first day of the month next ensuing the same.

The passage to the Harper's Ferry bridge, across the canal, from the rail road, shall be by a pivot, or drawbridge; the expense of attending which shall be equally divided between the two companies; and the elevation of which, above the bottom of the canal, shall remain; as at present adjusted, at three feet above the bridge across the Potomac, unless it be, hereafter the pleasure of the rail road company to elevate it still higher. And the curves of the road, at the entrance of the defile or pass at the Point of Rocks, and at the crossing at the same point or drawbridge, being not provided for by the act of the general assembly of Maryland, shall be adjusted to the residue of the road, as conveniently as can be done, in the graduation of the rail road by the canal company.

All expenses to be incurred, in condemning, or purchasing ground, or materials, for the location and graduation of the rail road, through the four and one-tenth miles aforesaid, shall be, as, at all other places, where the land required, is not now, the property of the canal company, at the proper cost of the rail road company; and where the said road shall occupy ground, now the property of the canal company, the rail road company shall obtain, and convey to the canal company, an equivalent breadth of ground, along the northern side of the rail road, for the future supply of materials to the canal.

It is already, herein provided, that the portion of the rail road, at Harper's Ferry Narrows, shall be thirty feet in width, for the common use of the Harper's Ferry and Frederick turnpike, and the rail road companies. The canal company will allow the use by the rail road company, of any authority which they possess, to obtain permission from the turnpike company, to the rail road company, to lay their rails on the part of the said road common to both, the canal company being bound by their articles of agreement, only for the graduation of the said road, from the Harper's Ferry bridge, down to the point at which the said turnpike will diverge from the rail road, to ascend the hill above Millar's Narrows; and the rail road company shall, also, adjust the surface of that bridge to the elevation of the pivot bridge across the canal, at their own cost.

The rail road company agrees not to continue the rail road further up the valley of the Potomac than Harper's Ferry, until the Chesapeake and Ohio canal shall be completed as far as Cumberland, provided that the canal be completed thereto, within the term allowed by the charter of the said canal company.

The period of twelve months from the date of the acceptance of these articles of compromise, shall be allowed the canal company, to complete the graduation of the four miles and one-tenth of rail road before described; but the president and directors of the canal company, shall urge the contractors who may undertake the same, to proceed with diligence, and to complete the graduation in the shortest time practicable, consistently with the health of the country.

In case of any possible difference of opinion, or disagreement between the two companies, in relation to the construction of these articles of compromise, such difference, or disagreement, shall be settled in the mode provided by the act aforesaid, for the settlement of the construction thereof, by the same parties.

This report of the president and directors was, after debate, referred to a committee, consisting of Richard S. Cox, John Mason, Archibald Lee, Thomson F. Mason and Henry Hunt; and the general meeting was adjourned to the 9th instant.

Yesterday, accordingly, the general meeting re-assembled. Mr. Cox, under the instructions of the committee, reported against concurrence in the proposed arrangement, at the same time expressing his dissent from the conclusions of the committee.

A debate of considerable length ensued; after which, the question being finally taken on agreeing to the arrangement proposed by the president and directors it was decided in the affirmative. The aggregate vote being, in favor of the compromise, 6,904; against it, 1,300.

A compromise is therefore at last effected of this long-standing controversy, the Baltimore company having (as will be seen by the proceedings in a subsequent column) given full authority to the president and directors of the company to ratify what they have already in fact agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT. Some who ought to know, have thrown it out that president Jackson will be too much indisposed to proceed on his eastern tour, as was intended—others, however, say, that he will start next week. The "New York Courier" gives it to be understood that the president will more probably retire to Tennessee, and prepare for resigning his office; but the "National Intelligencer" thinks that such a retirement "is about the last thing in gen. Jackson's mind"—adding, it is "more likely that he is looking forward to a re-election for a third time." The latest accounts say that the president will start on his journey about the first of next month.

The present, it seems probable, will be a great season for travel, unless we shall be revisited by the cholera, or some other alarming disease. The secretary of the navy is now on a tour, and the "Pennsylvanian" informs us that Mr. Secretary McLane and Mr. Secretary Cass will accompany the president, being joined at New York by the vice president; and that Mr. Secretary Woodbury having returned, he, with Mr. Duane, to be appointed secretary of the treasury, (in place of Mr. McLane who is to be transferred to the department of state), will remain at the seat of government, and have charge of the public affairs; for it is stated that the postmaster-general will make a tour through the west. It is added, that Mr. Clay will pay a visit to the eastern states, and reported that Mr. Webster will make a journey through the western.* Mr. Randolph is about to make another voyage to England—but, this time, at his own cost! Many other journeys are assigned to other distinguished individuals, with what truth we know not; but it seems certain that we are to have a "travelling cabinet."

TIME AND SPACE. A project is started, and, we hope, will be consummated, of making a rail road from Philadelphia to Baltimore, by the way of Oxford and Port Deposit. The distance will only be one hundred and eighteen miles—the transportation of commodities exceedingly large, and the time of travel, for passengers and the mail, not more than seven hours, at the rate of going now established on the New Castle and Freetown rail road—without any transhipment of goods, or transfer of baggage—unless desired on the way. Such a road would make a vast change in the existing condition of things—and especially in the winter season; when passengers and the mails have to be dragged through the mud—hub-deep, in many places.

A large part of this contemplated road is really completed—45½ miles at the Philadelphia extremity; and the stock has been subscribed for a rail road from Baltimore to Port Deposit. The middle section, then, of between 30 and 40 miles, only, remains undetermined.

When this road shall be made, and that from Baltimore to Washington is completed, as it pretty soon will be—Philadelphia will be nine hours distant from the capital of the United States!

* Mr. Webster, with his lady and daughters, arrived at Albany on Monday last.

VOL. XLIV—SIG. 13.

We see, also, that a project is going on to make a continuous rail road from Philadelphia to the west shore of the Hudson, opposite New York, via Trenton, New Brunswick, Rahway, Elizabeth Town, and Newark. We much desire that this may soon be accomplished—and it appears that it will be. The stock must be among the most profitable in the United States. It is stated that 600 persons, even now, daily pass between New York and Newark, over the toll-bridges, besides those carried in steamboats, and the transport of merchandise is equal to 82,445 tons a year! The stock of the turnpike road between these places is 800 dollars for 200 paid—that of the bridges, 150 for 100 paid. It seems that the unwise monopoly, which was thought to have been granted to the Camden and Amboy rail road company, by the legislature of New Jersey, will not hold—for the new company has purchased an old turnpike road, and cannot be prevented from laying rails on the sides of it! This is pleasant. We would encourage home competition; aye, and might be reconciled even to "free trade" with foreigners; but not so far as to admit English tapes and bobbins, while England forbids payment for them in bread and meat!

With these roads made (and they must be made), New York will be fifteen hours distant from Washington.

The prophecy of Oliver Evans (made in the presence of the editor of the REGISTER, and in the house of his father), many years ago—is near its fulfilment. Oliver Evans said, that the "child was then born who would travel from Philadelphia to Boston in one day." Oliver allowed, then, 80 or 90 years—but it will be done in half the time. Already the journey between New York and Boston is being made in 17 hours 41 minutes, and the time on the rail road to be made between Philadelphia and New York (less than six hours), will perfect the prophecy—however it seemed to partake of insanity when first proclaimed.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. Since the compromise with the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, the prospects concerning this road are much brightened—and by the time when it shall reach Harper's Ferry, the Winchester rail road will be ready to join it—thus opening the rich valley of Virginia to the commerce of Baltimore, and placing the land-holders, as it were, close to a sea-port. Winchester will be only from nine to twelve hours distant from Baltimore; and less, when steam power is used—as it will be. The value of the lands in the valley will be increased by millions. Even its fine and fat cattle, instead of being wasted, or exhausted, by driving, will be carried to market on the rail road.

The Frederick Examiner states that a machine has been erected at the rail road depot in that city, which supersedes the necessity of unloading wagons. On Thursday, of last week, by its aid, the body and contents of a wagon, weighing, in all, about 5,600 lbs. were lifted from the running gear, and placed upon a rail road car, and sent to Baltimore.

SOUTH CAROLINA RAIL ROAD. We have pleasing accounts of the progress and prospects of this interesting improvement—and entertain no doubt that it will, when completed, "nullify" many Jeremiahs in that state; and, perchance, teach some the importance of looking at home, and of relying on themselves, for prosperity. During the last month, $3,617 03 were received for the transportation of passengers and goods. It will soon reach the fertile upper country, and then will work—miracles, in public opinion, and teach men to put their own shoulders to the wheel. This is all that is wanting, even in "distressed" South Carolina. We should never have heard of the "oppressions of the tariff" had the people been willing to work—and to expend upon their lands the profits of their crops.

Sixty-two miles of this road (to Branchville) were opened for public travelling on the 17th Nov. 1832, in less than two years from the commencement of the work, and on the 7th February last the road was opened to Midway, 72 miles. The entire line of the road seems to be only 136 miles, on which all the excavations, embankments, ditches, bridges, &c. have been made; and the whole distance (to Haniburg) will soon be opened for public use. The stock will be a very profitable one. It is expected to yield not less than 12 per cent.

"THE GROANS OF THE SOUTH." The St. Augustine Herald informs us that one planter in Florida made, with 15 hands, last season, 50 hogsheds of sugar, 7,000 gallons syrup and molasses, and 2,000 bushels of corn—realizing more than $600 to the hand in one year.

Let us see—here we have 50,000 lbs. of sugar, on which the present duty is 24 cents, and 7,000 gallons of molasses at 5 cents—and the amount of protection on both is 1,600 dollars. And, as only 15 hands were employed, the "bounty" on each person, being made up of a "tax" on consumers, for the benefit of the only real "monopolists" in the United States—if any there are, because of soil and climate, is 106 dollars and 67 cents per head—a sum considerably more than equal to the whole average wages paid to free agricultural laborers in the north—out of which they clothe themselves, paying all that "grievous tax" which is laid on imported commodities! And it must be observed, that these 15 persons, on the sugar estate, also raised 2,000 bushels of corn, or 133½ bushels for each—being three or four times the amount of their own consumption. This is more than equal to the cost of the food which is furnished by the farmers to those employed by them in the north.

We may see what will be the effect on the sugar cultivation when the "bounty" or "tax" shall be reduced to 20 per cent. ad valorem; or, on the quantities just given, about 350 dollars, instead of 1,600 dollars! Will that enable our sugar planters to withstand the competition of free labor in the East Indies, or of slave labor in Brazil, Cuba, and other places? Can they make sugar cheaper than the Jamaica planters? These last are protected by a duty of 2 cents and 4 mills per lb. less than is payable on East India sugar, though equally produced in a British possession! And yet we know that the British West Indies, apart from all considerations of the slave question, have long been rapidly descending to poverty. The average product is, perhaps, less than two per cent. on capital vested in land and slaves. Is there no instruction in these facts?

Again—there are about 2,000,000 slaves in the United States. If we average them at 200 dollars a head, their aggregate value is 400 millions. The demand for slaves, for the cultivation of sugar in Louisiana and Florida, has a most important effect on the price of slaves, and may be estimated at 25 per cent. or 100 millions of dollars; and, certainly, that amount of PROPERTY would be lost to the holders of slaves, if the persons now employed in the cultivation of sugar were transferred to the cultivation of cotton. We are speaking of mere matters of dollars and cents—after the manner of the "chivalric and generous south." Of the moral effect to result from rendering it less profitable to breed slaves, we have nothing to say—at the present time; nor shall we calculate the consequences.

MORE "GROANS OF THE SOUTH!" The Richmond Whig gives the proceeds of an entire crop of tobacco, just sold at the Shookoe warehouse, the average of which was $12 16 per hundred pounds.

*The British duties on sugar are as follows:

Foreign, brown	£3 3 0 cwt. or 15 12 cents per lb.
white or clayed	4 6 8 " 20 8 do.
British East Indies	1 17 0 " 8 cents, nearly.
West Indies	1 7 0 " 5 6 " "

The heavy duty laid upon British West India sugar is for revenue—but the extra 2 4 cents, assessed on British East India sugar, and the extra ten cents per lb. on foreign sugar, are for the protection of the West India cultivators. The last, we think, would be better protected by a duty of 7s. than of 27s. per cwt. because of the increased consumption which so reduced a duty would cause; and a considerable part of the reduced duty would go into the price received by the planters, foreign sugars being still excluded.

GLASS FACTORIES IN NEW YORK. The following has been transmitted to us as a complete list of the window glass factories in New York:

At Verona and Vernon, Oneida county—Ontario and Geneva, Ontario county—Woodstock, Ulster county—Hamilton, Albany county—Sand-Lake, Rensselaer county—Redford, —, county—and Clyde, Wayne county. Total, nine.

At the Clyde factory there is annually consumed—40 tons pot ashes, 125 tons of sand, 40 tons house-ashes, 200 barrels of salt, and 2,500 cords of wood, &c. The capital is 25,000 dollars—30 men are employed, and 150 persons subsisted at these works; and the product is about 8,000 boxes of 7 by 9, annually, at $3 per box—or 24,000 dollars.

We have no particular information of the business and extent of the other establishments—but taking this as an average, the nine will produce the following results:

Annual consumption.

360 tons house ashes
1,125 tons of sand
1,800 barrels of salt
22,500 cords of wood.

Employed and subsisted.

270 workmen, and 1,350 persons subsisted.

Capital 225,000 dollars—annual product 216,000 dollars.

Fully two-thirds of the value annually created, passes directly to land-holders and agriculturists, for fuel and transportation, &c. and the subsistence of the workmen and their families; and these nine glass factories are more beneficial to the land-holders and farmers of New York, than is the whole trade with Russia, Prussia, and Denmark to the land-holders and farmers of the U. States; so far as the trade with these countries depends on their consumption of American products, according to the treasury tables of 1830—the latest that we happen to have before us.

THE COAL TRADE. At the beginning of the last week, 1,004 boats, laden with 41,701 tons of coal, had descended the Schuylkill, in the present season. Between 7,000 and 8,000 tons a week are now shipped. The price at Pottsville is $2 30—freights 1 25.

And up to the 1st of May, there had arrived at Honesdale, from Carbondale, 1,625 rail road wagons, with 40,62½ tons of coal—besides vast quantities of lumber. The Delaware and Hudson canal is doing a great business.

"A FACTORY GIRL." A letter from Newport, R. I. speaking of the calm and unruined deportment of Avery, on his trial for the murder of a young woman, whom he is charged with having previously seduced—says:

"The same feeling which the deportment of the prisoner is calculated to produce, was evinced in the crowded audience yesterday, in the examination of a young lady, without its being repressed by any doubt as to its being fully deserved. I do not allude to it, as at all connected with the case, in point of testimony, but simply as one little green spot in that boasted profession, the law, which, after all, however noble it may be as a science, is, in the practice of the day, a mere art of preventing witnesses from telling the truth, and an exercise of the most ingenious deception upon the minds of plain, honest men, who are so unfortunate as to be caught upon a jury. Whoever most excels in these qualifications, is the best mere lawyer. In the case alluded to, however, there was an exactly opposite result. A young female (she would deserve any where the appellation of lady, both in appearance and deportment), was called upon, unavoidably, to testify to circumstances extremely unpleasant to a delicate female to detail in a public assembly. They had no relation to herself or to the prisoner.* The unaffected and lady-like manner in which this young female acquitted herself under circumstances so peculiarly trying as a public examination of this description, was exceedingly interesting. Polished society might find it not a little difficult to furnish a representative to discharge so painful a duty, with as much of the true dignity of modesty as was here evinced by a 'factory girl.' It was an honor to that valuable portion of our population thus to be represented, and would of itself repel the slander that there is necessarily in their employment any tendencies to blunt the sensibilities of females, or prevent a full cultivation of lady-like and delicate refinement. Even the overbearing sternness of the examining counsellors at the bar was laid aside from respect to female delicacy; and the rare phenomenon in legal practice was exhibited, of the mere lawyer (whose greatest merit is supposed to consist in browbeating and confusing witnesses, to prevent their telling the truth) being laid aside for the true courtesy of the gentleman—the politeness of the heart."

§3.—The people of the south, in general, have about as correct ideas of the general character and condition of the young women employed in the well-regulated factories of the north, as of the inhabitants of Capt. Symmes' inner world. This is not much to be wondered at, in those who would be "shocked to death" with the mere apprehension of being called upon to labor—to receive money, in wages, for work performed! But a better and more correct class of persons are no where to be found. They are much superior, and in almost every respect, to the classes of society from whence they are drawn, and better educated; and their lives are as blameless—indeed, less liable to injurious suspicions, for very few accidents happen among them. And there is a good reason for this—each is made a guardian, as it were, of the honor of the establishment in which she labors—and a good reputation is every thing to these poor girls. There are villages at which several hundred young women have been employed, for years, with hardly a single impeachment of their chastity. They are respectable and respected—their dresses are not so costly as those of their sisters who are independent of manual labor for support—but not less neat, and tidy, and comfortable. And we have seen many of them that would have excited as much attention in the drawing room at the president's house, because of their beauty—as any who have appeared there; aye, and, we think, would have conducted themselves quite as well. But what a horrible thing would it be to introduce an honest and well-educated and lovely "factory girl," where "patches, paint and candle light" are so important, and "small talk" is only used, because the only sort-of-talk that is understood!

There is a wicked and foul disposition to debase the character of such young women, and simply because they make an honest living for themselves! But many a man has found to his sorrow, that a dashing belle may be a wife only fitted "to suckle fools," and unable even to "chronicle small beer," being no more than a female animal, with a range of intellect bounded by the fashion of a frock or a petticoat, and as if without a soul; a mere play-thing in prosperity, or a dead-weight in adversity; oftentimes regarded with indifference in the one case, and always despised in the other; in neither a companion for an intelligent and inquiring man.

We speak of the "factory girls" as we have seen them, and are entirely assured that they are. What they may be, under reduced wages and more severe labor than is now required of them, we shall be better able to say after 1842—if so long we live. Thousands on thousands of such are now among the most valued wives and best mothers in the land, offering their "jewels" to defend their country in the peril of war, or extend its prosperity in the works of peace;—to tread the mountain's top, dive into the bowels of the earth, or march upon the ocean—every where holding up the "starry flag" of the republic, and proclaiming liberty and independence. Cases of individual hardship have happened, and we would rather that female labor should find employment home, or in less dense masses than are oftentimes met with—but such females are not yet slaves; and those that are prudent and thrifty do not generally remain many years in the factories. Some accumulate little fortunes for themselves—a few hundred dollars to "begin the world with"—and the fact that they are honest and industrious, and careful, has no effect, in the north, to exclude them from society, or degrade them in the public estimation!

"MIGHTY FLOODS." Very little rain fell during the month which ended two or three weeks ago—but since then there has been a general rain, and a vast quantity of water has fallen, as the following brief notices will shew:

The Connecticut river had risen near twenty feet—and caused much damage; but we have not many particulars.

The Hudson and its chief tributary, the Mohawk, rose to an extraordinary height, doing great injury at Troy, Albany, and many other places, and several lives were lost by the breaking up of rafts, &c. and of persons engaged in attempts to preserve property. The rise of water is called "unparalleled." The lower part of Albany was completely inundated—the streets were impassable, except in boats or carriages, for some distance above the Eagle Hotel. One of the bridges across the Mohawk was carried away. The beautiful gardens on the islands in the Hudson, below Albany, were destroyed, and many fields on the main land overflowed. The loss of property was exceedingly heavy, on the 14th, 15th and 16th inst. It was apprehended that the canals had been seriously injured. We cannot give particulars. Such a flood, was not expected at this season of the year, and hence the injury was increased.

The waters of the Delaware reached an uncommon height on the 16th and 17th instant, and much damage was sustained.

The Susquehanna was 16 feet above low water mark at Harrisburg, on the 16th, and still rising. It was the greatest flood remembered by the oldest inhabitants—much higher than the extraordinary one that happened 16 years ago. The river was exceedingly violent and "wicked," as we have heard a person call it, and the rush of waters, at certain points, awful. We have not seen any statement of the damages sustained, but they have been large. It is expected that several of the canals have been injured. Some persons were drowned, in attempting to save lumber and other property.

The Potomac has been very full, and wafted a great quantity of produce, lumber, coal, &c. towards the market on the sea board; but we have not heard of much injury being done on the shores of this river.

The Ohio was 23 feet above low water at Wheeling, on the 18th inst. The flood in this river does not appear to have been of an extraordinary height, and no particular damage is stated.

What a vast amount of water must have descended in four or five days, which, after saturating the parched earth, hurled such torrents towards the sea! The mind can hardly grasp an idea of the quantity, though the fact is presented, that rivers, from a half a mile to a mile, or more, wide, had a volume twenty feet deeper than usual, hurried forward at the rate of ten, or more, miles an hour, at particular places.

The loss of life has been considerable. Many bridges, dams, mills and other buildings have been swept away, and immense quantities of lumber and saw-logs, &c. are lost. In a good many instances, stone buildings have been cleared to their foundations. The rivers and streams of Vermont have been as violent as others. The general amount of damages sustained is exceedingly large—and the range of the rain-flood unprecedented.

THE CHOLERA. The total number of deaths by this disease in Havana, and its suburbs, from the 1st of March to the 13th April inclusive, is now given at only 6,831. On the 1st March 35; on the 13th April 22. Greatest number of deaths on the 22d March—78 white, 255 colored—333. This was not only the highest aggregate, but also the highest number of either class of persons.

A letter from Matanzas, dated April 24, says, that the cholera had nearly ceased at that place—but was ravaging the estates, some losing 40 or more slaves in 3 days. On others it is said that all had died.

The Paris papers have official returns of the mortality caused by the Asiatic cholera in France. From its commencement until the first of January, 1853, the whole number of patients was 229,534—of those who perished 94,666. It appeared in fifty of the departments; those of the south suffered much less than the northern; the western less than the eastern. The government expended nearly thirteen hundred thousand francs in providing food, medical aid and other necessities, for the relief of the poor.

A good many cases of cholera have lately happened at Vicksburg, Miss. and some at Nashville.

NATCHEZ. There has been a great excitement, and the largest meeting of the people ever had in this city, because of the finding of the bodies of several negroes, thrown into some of the gullies and slightly covered with earth; and the consequent spread of a report through the country that the cholera was killing the people so fast that the survivors had not time to bury them, &c. It appears that the bodies found were those of slaves, that had belonged to certain "negro traders"—who, to avoid the expense of interment, had thus disposed of their remains—at which the people were properly indignant, &c.

The "Natchez Courier" of the 25th April says—It is a known and indisputable fact, that the cholera has re-appeared in New Orleans, to what extent, having nothing before us from the authorities of that city, we are unable to determine; but we do know, that scarcely a boat arrives from that port, without more or less sick on board, with that disease. Among other passengers there had been, during the previous week, many negroes, some of whom have died of the cholera, perhaps eight or ten—but not a single case has originated here, nor has any one of our citizens been attacked, that we have been enabled to learn.

THE NEW TARIFF LAW. The following are the modest opinions of the Leeds [England] Mercury, concerning the new tariff law of the United States. Whenever the proceeding of a foreign government interferes with the interests of Englishmen, every genuine John Bull "opens only one eye," as our Indians say, to see the merits of the matter. The passage of this bill is called "a most arbitrary proceeding, and, indeed, a gross breach of faith"—because that the products of the woollen manufacturers of Leeds and Huddersfield may not be sent to the United States, at a duty of five per cent. Modest and liberal John Bull! "A breach of faith!" Between whom? Was Mr. Bull a party to the tariff act of 1832? Has he not, an hundred times, regulated his own tariff by simple orders in council, concocted in secret, and put into operation at the chief ports, without a moment's warning to the parties interested? Does not John assess an average duty of more than 100 per cent. on all the chief productions of the land and labor of the United States, cotton only excepted! But John grumbles because the duty on coarse woollens, reduced, by ourselves, in a spirit of compromise—have, in the same spirit, and to please ourselves, been temporarily raised to the duty which is payable on other woollen cloths! and notwithstanding a greater advantage has been given him in stuff goods, linens and silks! "A BREACH OF FAITH," John?—a breach of faith between the United States of America, and the log-wood dyers of cloth, made out of old clothes, at Leeds, which, like Peter Pindar's razors, are sent out "to sell," in America. O rare and modest, John Bull. We pray thee—open both eyes, John. Look at home; John. Reform thyself. Do "free trade," and then we'll talk with thee about it, Father John!

From the Leeds Mercury.

Mr. Clay's tariff bill has been smuggled through the American house of representatives, by one of those original and startling manoeuvres which distinguish that republican legislature. The house had been all the session discussing the tariff bill introduced by Mr. Verplanck, which went to make great reductions on imported goods; the manufacturing party struggled hard against it, and the southerners as hard in its favor: the bill had reached its third reading, when—lo! some member moved, "as an amendment," to leave out all the words after "that," and substitute for them the tariff bill which Mr. Clay had carried in the senate! The motion was carried by a vote of 120 to 85; and by this most extraordinary piece of jockeyship, Mr. Clay's bill passed in one day.

We regret to say, that this bill is not only much worse than that of Mr. Verplanck, but is decidedly less liberal than that of last July. The tariff of July, 1832, was to have come into operation on the 3d of March, but if Mr. Clay's bill should finally pass the senate, to which house it has been returned, that tariff will never take effect at all, except as modified by the new bill.

By the tariff of last year the lowest qualities of woollen goods were allowed to be introduced at a duty of five per cent. ad valorem, and great quantities of goods have gone out from the neighborhood of Leeds and Huddersfield on the faith of that arrangement; but Mr. Clay's bill raises the duty on these goods to fifty per cent. and every yard of the low woollens sent from England must either pay that duty or be sent back to this country!

This is a most arbitrary proceeding, and is indeed a gross breach of faith.

The other arrangements of Mr. Clay's bill are to let the duties fixed by the tariff of last July remain in operation till the 31st of December next, after which they are to be reduced by dribs—ad valorem—one-tenth of the excess of those duties over 20 per cent. ad valorem to be taken off at the end of the year 1833, another tenth, at the end of 1835, another tenth in 1837, another tenth in 1839, in 1841 one half of the remainder, and at the end of 1842 the duties are to be reduced to 20 per cent. at which they are to continue.

Our Bradford and Keighley friends are almost the only persons in England whom this tariff will benefit, as worsted stuff goods, which have hitherto paid 25 per cent. duty, are to be admitted duty free. Linens and silks are also to be admitted duty free, which will be an advantage to Barnsley and Manchester.

BRITISH "FREE TRADE." The Newcastle (Eng.) Chronicle, speaking of the timber trade, says—Within the last few days, several vessels have been taken up here to go to Memel to take in a cargo of timber, from thence proceed to Canada, where the cargo will be delivered, and immediately reshipped and brought to this port as American [Canadian] timber! What an absurd state of law it must be that can render such a system profitable, and yet what an outcry was raised against the ministers when they attempted to alter it!

TEAS. It would appear (says the Boston Centinel) that, in the article of teas, as in some other articles, we were in danger of losing the benefit of our own reduction or abolition of duties, by the incidental increase of price by the producers. The Hong merchants of Canton, hearing of our new tariff, naturally calculated on an increased consumption and demand for the principal ingredient of our afternoon beverage, and are said to have endeavored to get more profit themselves, by our expected augmented indulgence in the herbs of the east.

THE MARKETS. On Wednesday last, green peas were selling in the New York market at 50 cents per peck, and strawberries at 150 cents per quart. On the same day, green peas, at Baltimore 18½ @ 25 cents per peck, and strawberries 6¼ @ 12½ cents per quart. It is probable that peas will be sold at 25 cents the bushel, this day, in Baltimore—May 26—and a plenty of fine strawberries at 6½ cents per quart.

THE PROTESTED DRAFT. The Pennsylvanian says—that the United States bank has presented the protested draft, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, to the United States government, with a claim for damages at the rate of fifteen per cent. By the late arrivals at New York, the original draft and protest have been returned to the bank, and the directory of that institution has sent in its bill of damages to the treasury department.

[We have heard that the bank proposed to collect the draft—but that the government would sell it, and the bank became the purchaser. In this case, the affair is a mere business transaction, and the bank ought to claim of the United States what would be claimed of an individual, in a similar matter: and yet mirabile dictu!—half a thousand columns of "indignation" are being manufactured on this account, for the "by authority" presses. The making of such a draft, we rather apprehend, has few precedents, if any—and, surely, the sale of it was not called for, unless because of some imperious demands on the treasury, with which we are unacquainted. But if the government trades in drafts, the lex mercatoria is just as applicable as it would be to a private individual—and the fuss made about it is childish, or—base.

MR. RANDOLPH AND THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. From the Richmond Whig.—John Randolph, of Roanoke, for some days, (and we believe still), in this city, is understood to have declared himself distinctly and decidedly in favor of renewing the charter of the present bank of the United States. We learn that his course of argument is somewhat this: that his opinion of its unconstitutionality has not changed, but that he views that question as withdrawn, and the country brought to the alternatives of choosing between the present institution and one of more extensive powers and capital, to be established for the special benefit of Mr. Van Buren. Mr. Randolph believes that the southern people only are influenced by constitutional scruples in their opposition to the new charter; that if the present institution is overthrown, another of more doubtful utility, and of enlarged capacities, will be immediately erected in its stead, and brought under the control of the executive for electioneering purposes; and he prefers an institution which he knows, and which has proved useful and independent, to another untried, and which may fall under government influence, and enlarge the already dangerous extent of executive power.*

Mr. Randolph arrived in Baltimore on Sunday last, and on the next day proceeded to Philadelphia.

The "American," noticing the arrival of Mr. Randolph in this city, gave the following account of it. Mr. R. is said to have been "much offended," because of the crowd—but the singularity of his equipage and proceedings, were legitimate causes for that curiosity which his presence excited. Many wished to see what sort of an animal it was within the vehicle—which, as one who saw it said, looked as though it might have been digged out of the ruins of an old coach house which had flourished before the revolution. If "Roanoke" will not do things like other people, he cannot expect that the people will treat him as they would another man. And after all, Mr. R. would, perhaps, have been sorely mortified if his arrival had not created any sensation, though only of the "groundlings," let loose on a Sunday evening. Erostratus burnt the temple of Ephesus, for fame—others seek and obtain it by other means.

From the American. The hon. John Randolph reached this city on Sunday afternoon from Washington, and proceeded to Philadelphia yesterday morning. He travelled in his old fashioned English coach and four; with a postilion on one of the leading horses, and Juba on the box. We learn that his passage through Pratt street to the city hotel was the occasion of some little inconvenience and irritation to him. His remarkable equipage came leisurely along that street just about the time of the arrival of the steamboat Kentucky, and thus attracted the attention of the crowd of persons who were in waiting to witness her arrival, as well as the hundreds who had just landed from her, at the intersection of Light and Pratt streets. It was soon generally understood that Mr. R. was in the coach, and curiosity, on the part of some, and the force of the example on others, immediately induced numbers of the spectators to follow him. By the time he reached the hotel, we learn that the crowd was so dense in front of it that his entrance at the principal door was impossible; at length the equipage proceeded to the private door on Fayette street, and he was conveyed from the coach into the hotel in the arms of Juba. Mr. R.'s appearance is said to indicate an extremely delicate state of health.

* The "Richmond Enquirer" thus notices the preceding—

"A report has been sedulously got up for some weeks, that the bank of the United States would be certainly rechartered—perhaps with some modifications. An attempt has been made to reconcile to the public this arrangement, by this sort of argument—that we are to choose between a treasury bank and the present bank of the United States! Indeed, this idea has been carried so far, that a member elect to the next congress, who was supposed to be as violent an opponent of the bank of the United States as any man breathing, has lately declared in this city, that he would probably go for the bank, not a bank—for the present institution with some modifications, rather than take, what he is pleased to term, a New York Van Buren bank! The design of the bank friends seems to be, to drive us into one net by the panic fear of getting into another."

And adds—"The voice of Virginia is against this institution—loud, distinct, unchangeable. It is against the New York scheme, if any such should be entertained—and we are much mistaken, if it be not also against the treasury substitute, if any such should be brought forward. True—Mr. Calhoun and a few of his friends in congress, may be in favor of the bank—but he has always been its friend. He was one of its fathers—and notwithstanding his present new-fangled doctrines of state rights, he will be found its advocate at the next congress! But the mass of the south will be assured of it. For our own parts, we would rather see the government sustain a grievous inconvenience, from the want of such an institution; we would rather see it pay 10, 15, 20 per cent. more for transmitting its funds from place to place, than violate by such an institution, the federal constitution." [O dear—OBSTACLES PRINCIPLES.]

UNITED STATES BANK STOCK. We have the pleasure to say that the honest gentlemen-brokers of New York, are still being punished. In spite of all sorts of fabrications, the stock rises; and on the 22d was at 114½—and fearfully expected to go still higher.

MASSACHUSETTS. The ladies' fair, at Boston, for the benefit of the blind, produced near twelve thousand dollars; and a similar fair, for the same kind purpose (previously held), yielded the large sum of three thousand dollars, in the comparatively small town of Salem, which had already contributed six hundred dollars.

The Boston Transcript says—We are pleased to learn that something is at last to be done, and with energy, to ensure the immediate completion of the Bunker Hill monument. A gentleman of this city has addressed a letter to the government of the Massachusetts mechanic association, offering a donation of $5,000, on condition that $50,000 shall be raised by subscription within three months, for the purpose above specified. A meeting of the association was held last evening, and from the spirit manifested by the members, there is not, we are informed, the slightest doubt that the work will go on and be finished forthwith.

The estate, corner of Tremont and Beacon streets, well known as the Eliot estate, measuring 184 feet 8 inches on Beacon and 65 on Tremont street, backing on Phillips' place, containing 10,954 feet, was lately sold at $3 10 per foot. The right to one-seventh part of Phillips' place, so called, being all the interest and estate of the heirs of the late Wm. H. Eliot therein, subject to the rights of light, air and drainage belonging, to the mansion house estate above described, at $450.

We understand that a company of gentlemen have purchased the White estate, so called in Roxbury, for $26,000, for the purpose of erecting thereon a number of elegant cottages. This estate has long been known as one of the most beautiful garden spots in this vicinity.

[Advocate.]

PROFESSIONAL MEN. According to Williams' Annual Register, for 1833, just published, the number of members of the professions of divinity, law, and physie, in the state of New York, is as follows:

Attorneys and counsellors at law,.....1,956
Physicians and surgeons,.....2,580

Clergy, viz:

Presbyterians and Congregationalists,..... 502
Baptists,..... 448
Methodists,..... 401

PENNSYLVANIA. It is estimated that, since the opening of canal navigation this spring, Easton has sent to market about 100,000 barrels of flour, 70,000 bushels of corn, 8,000 barrels of whiskey, and 5,000 barrels of linseed oil, besides large quantities of other productions, among which was a considerable quantity of roofing slate, a large quarry of that article having been worked for some time in that neighborhood.

It is also said of this flourishing town, that upwards of fifty buildings, chiefly brick, will be erected there this season, and a large edifice, for the Lafayette college, 112 feet front, will be commenced. In addition to the merchandise and produce of the neighborhood, which we have noticed above as coming from Easton, we may add that, in the last week, 64 Manch Chunk boats, loaded with 3,147 tons of Lehigh coal, entered the canal, and contributed towards the $1,648 received during the week.

MARYLAND. James H. Alexander, esq. civil engineer, and professor Ducatel, of the university of Maryland, have been appointed by the governor and council, to collect and prepare the materials for a geographical and topographical chart of the state, and a geological survey thereof. Philip P. Tyson, esq. will assist in the latter. These interesting matters are committed to gentlemen happily fitted to execute them in the most satisfactory manner.

BALTIMORE. We have more than once mentioned, an addition to this city which is now being made, by the improvement of a property called "Canton," which lies on our river, south of Fell's Point, and has a fine depth of water along its front. The company having expended a large sum of money in levelling, filling up, and opening the property, and built a long line of wharves, &c. &c. on Saturday last offered 200 of their lots for sale, all which were disposed of. These lots are generally 20 by 60 feet, and varied from one hundred to five hundred dollars, according to location. The whole product of the sale exceeded 30,000 dollars.

Buildings will be immediately commenced on many of these lots, and we may soon expect to see a new town rising up. It is intended that the rail roads shall be extended to Canton, and the time is not distant, we think, when a lively and large business will be carried on there. The whole tract is said to abound with good water.

CUMBERLAND SUFFERERS. The following is a return of the monies collected in the several wards of the city of Baltimore, for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Cumberland:

2d do.....	129 25
3d do.....	138 93
4th do.....	171 16
5th do.....	216 75
6th do.....	1,014 27
7th do.....	1,714 12
8th do.....	150 37
9th do.....	986 50
10th do.....	350 88
11th do.....	683 48
12th do.....	143 95

Total.....$5856 28

In addition, one gentleman of the 6th and another of the 7th wards had, individually, forwarded 150 dollars each: making the whole sum $6,156 28.

The 7th, 6th and 9th wards are always the heaviest contributors on occasions of this sort. They are compact, and the chief seats of business; and many, resident in other wards, have their places of business in these, and so swell the amounts obtained in them.

VIRGINIA. The Winchester Republican says—We have received a printed catalogue of the officers and students of the university, for the present session. It gives us great pleasure to see that the number of students who have matriculated during the term exceeds that of any other session, except the second: In 1825, the whole amount of matriculates was 123; 1826, 177; 1827, 128; 1827-'28, 131; 1828-'29, 130; 1829-'30, 133; 1830-'31, 133; 1831-'32, 140; 1832-'33, 157.

The total estimate of expenses for the session of ten months, exclusive of books and stationary, clothing and pocket money, is $23.

We understand that a fine spirit of order and industry now pervades the institution—and that the students are actively engaged in preparing for the examination in July.

We learn with regret that the university of Virginia is about to lose the services of Dr. Robley Dunglison, he having accepted the chair of materia medica, therapeutics, hygiene, and medical jurisprudence, in the university of Maryland.

MISSISSIPPI. A new and flourishing town of fifty houses, called Amsterdam, has jumped up on the Big Black river, about 100 miles above its junction with the Mississippi, in the last 12 months. It is in the heart of a rich cotton-growing country, and steamboats easily ascend to it.

FLORIDA. The return of votes, though not official, shew that col. White has been re-elected the delegate from this territory to the congress of the United States, over gen. Call, after a most arduous and very violent campaign.

EMIGRATION TO MICHIGAN. The Detroit Courier mentions the arrival at that place, of seven steamboats, from Buffalo, from the 1st to the 7th inst. with 2,610 passengers.

We are told that the steamboats at Buffalo oftentimes depart previous to the time appointed, to avoid the pressure of persons wishing to take passage in them.

TEXAS. By the brig Fredericksburg, arrived at New York from Matamoras, we learn, (says the Courier), that a vessel of war from Vera Cruz, arrived at that place a few days previous to her sailing, with troops, who, with others assembled at that place, amounting altogether to about 350 men, were to march in a short time to Texas for the purpose of driving the American emigrants from that place.

[Texas has been considered as a sort of neutral, or middle ground, for the congregation of all sorts of adventurers, making laws for themselves, in fact, though pretending to respect those of Mexico. The 550 troops above mentioned were to be joined by 1,200 others, and eight pieces of artillery; and the prevailing anarchy will probably be put down, very promptly.]

LATE TREATY WITH DENMARK. The Washington Globe contains a list shewing the result of every claim presented to the board of commissioners under the late treaty with Denmark. The full amount awarded in all the cases is $2,154,425. The sum actually payable is $670,564 78.

IMPUDENT VILLAINS. The progress of crime in the United States is appalling. The exports from Europe of murderers, robbers, gamblers, thieves and pick-pockets, &c. with thousands of paupers, are "free" enough, indeed! Strong measures must be adopted to prevent their various depredations and impositions on society. The punishment of those convicted should be sure, and the full penalty of the law certain, without the hope of executive pardons. Let the penitentiaries be enlarged, if necessary—and second offences close their doors against the egress of persons condemned for any crime resulting from manifest perversions of the heart—while the unfortunate should be more tenderly dealt with, and encouraged to reform themselves. But so it is, that the meshes of the law are too often broken through by "rogues of distinction," who are artists in villainy.

One of the editors of the Boston Centinel was lately assaulted in the street, after nightfall, by some ruffian, supposed to be a gambler, the editor alluded to having aided in the exposure of a den of villains of that character. Since the assault he has received the following anonymous note through the post office:

Boston, May 5, 1833.

Sir: The personal chastisement inflicted on you on Monday night, must convince you that justice, though slow, is sure. You have received an anonymous hint that for a certain paragraph that appeared in your paper some time back, (the object of which was to call the public attention to a certain house in this city), you should not go unpunished.

If you are wise, institute no inquiries into this affair, but let it blow over, lest a greater evil befall you, the loss of life; for if that be extinguished, there is no promethean heat that can that light relume. I have given your brother editor of the Galaxy, a much broader preliminary hint than I have ever gave you, and I am inclined to think this affair of yours will convince him, there is something more in them than meets the eye or flesh in these corporeal chastisements and written hints.

If either of you are not silent now on a subject which does not concern you, which is connected with the morals of the city, you shall both hear in a more summary and decisive manner from

ABELINO.

LAW CASE. State of Delaware versus John Porter, jun. A very extraordinary trial under the above title is recorded in a Wilmington paper of the 14th instant. An indictment was found by the grand jury against John Porter, jr. for committing mayhem by emasculating a young lad of sixteen. It is the second offence of the kind in the United States—the former instance having been that of Potter, in North Carolina. The young lad gave a pitiful account of the manner in which he was waylaid and assaulted by the defendant—and his testimony was so direct and conclusive that the counsel for the prosecution made no remarks to the jury. The account concludes—

Chief justice Clayton briefly charged the jury to the effect—that the fact, the crime had been committed was notorious, and undisputed—that the question with the jury was, which testimony should be believed—that the prisoner had attempted to prove sickness and an alibi—that, on the contrary, the attorney general had produced witnesses invalidating this testimony—and it was for the jury to say, which should be credited—in short whether the prisoner was the individual who committed the deed.

The jury after a few minutes returned with a verdict of guilty.

The prisoner was then arraigned before the court to receive his sentence: He arose apparently much agitated—is of a dark complexion, black eyes—of a youthful appearance, no beard—with a general physiognomy entirely against him. His head apparently is broad between the ears, which phrenologists say is a development of the organ of destructiveness.

The chief justice, in a feeling and impressive manner, pronounced his sentence to be a fine of $2,000 to the state, and one year's imprisonment. The legislature of this state has since [this outrage] passed an act, making this crime capital, and punishable with death.

BRIEF NOTICES.

The salary of the British ambassador at Paris is £10,000, say 50,000 dollars a year—of his secretary £1,000, or 5,000 dollars, and he has an attache at £400, or 2,000 dollars.

The New Bedford Mercury of the 23th ult. says—A launch, if launch it can be called, of rather a novel character, took place at a wharf in this place on Saturday afternoon—a vessel of about 300 tons, which had been thrown bottom upwards to be repaired, having been planked and finished in the lower part of the hull, which is under water when afloat, was attempted to be put into her destined element, by rolling over; but the plan was not fully executed. There was a great collection of people to witness the novel scene. The bottom of the vessel has been made almost new with timber as well as plank. During the night, another effort was made, which was successful.

We did not recollect that Virginia ever was a land of witches; but the Charleston Free Press informs us that at the last meeting of the Virginia Historical and Philosophical society in Richmond, among other curious documents read, was “an authentic record, certified by the clerk of Princess Anne county, of the trial of a female in 1705, for witchcraft.” The records of the early settlement of the Old Dominion, if they could be snatched from oblivion, would doubtless afford as many amusing specimens of popular superstition, as the extant histories of our New England brethren supply for the amusement and edification of the descendants of the pilgrims. It may not be amiss to suggest, whether it would not advance the purposes of the Virginia Historical society, and contribute to the gratification of the public, if they would publish, in some suitable form, the various interesting facts, of which from time to time they become possessed?

The two hundred tons of ice lately exported from Boston for Calcutta, was surrounded with tan. If it shall arrive safely—a grand voyage will be made. It is a “Yankee notion”—and “chivalric” in trade.

The Lexington, (Ky.) Gazette notices the exhibition, in that place, of Miss Snyder, a young lady, about nineteen years of age, who is regarded as one of the greatest natural curiosities ever seen. The lady has neither hands nor arms, nor is there to be seen the least appearance of an arm! She has one leg and foot complete, with the exception of the toes being only four instead of five. The other leg has but one joint, (that of the ankle), and it is only but half the length of the first; the foot having on it, (like the other), only four toes. She is three feet one inch high, weighing 60 lbs. is in the possession of all her mental faculties, converses very fluently on any subject, and is very fond of engaging in conversation with her visitors. She sows, knits, paints, cuts a variety of flowers, watch papers, &c. and writes tolerably well with her left foot.

We notice the publication of a new weekly journal at Thomaston, Georgia, under the title of “The Hickory Nut, and Upon Vigil,” with the motto “Crack it who may, it will be discovered to be sound to the kernel.”

Goods were recently received at Cincinnati in fifteen days from the city of New York, by way of the Erie canal, the lake, and the Ohio canal and river.

It is stated that Mr. Clay purposes to pass through New England in the month of July next.

Benjamin S. Seaborn has been tried and found guilty of setting fire to the city of Raleigh.

The lands at Carrollton, belonging to the New Orleans canal and banking company, which cost the company $92,000, were sold on 1st of May for $250,000, leaving a profit to the bank of $148,000.

As two persons were lately ploughing a field on the south side of the island of Martilla's Vineyard, they turned up a considerable quantity of silver coin, which seemed to have been tied up in a bag. The amount is said to have been from two to three thousand dollars.

Capt. Joseph C. Hall, of the marine corps, died suddenly on the 17th inst. on board the ship Franklin, lying at the navy yard, New York. He was much esteemed as an officer and man; and his remains were interred with the highest marks of respect.

We see in a Virginia paper a renewal of the old practice of noticing marriages—a certain Mr. B. has been joined to “the beautiful and much admired Miss F. A. C.” and then follow three stanzas, about “heaven” and “even,” “one” and “done,” and “among the few” who “lov'd so true.”

Certain convicts in the state-prison of Connecticut, lately murdered one of the keepers that they might make an escape; but they failed, and three have been tried, found guilty and sentenced to death.

The Boston Atlas says:—“The works upon the dry dock at the navy yard in Charlestown, have been brought to a close. “Old Ironsides” is to be taken into it next week.

This dock is a splendid monument of the present state of the arts.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

A London paper of April 6, says—“The directors of the bank of England held a meeting in the bank parlor this afternoon, at which the governor and deputy governor reported the minutes of the conference between them and lord Althorp, held a few days since. The precise tenor of the intentions of government with regard to the renewal of the charter, have not yet transpired, but we are assured that ministers have stated it as their intention to propose to parliament that the sum of £100,000 per annum shall be deducted from the sum paid to the bank of England for the management of the public debt, and that with this reduction in the amount paid to the company, and some changes of minor importance, the charter is to be renewed for a limited number of years.

In commenting upon the advices that had been received from this country, of the pacific settlement of the nullification question, the London papers say—

“On the whole, the conduct of general Jackson, in the trying situation in which he was placed with regard to South Carolina, was much applauded. The inaugural address of the president, delivered to the house of representatives on the 4th of March, and now before us, is a document written with great talent, but like that which was published a short time since, in reference to the course to be pursued by the executive towards the nullifiers, is drawn up, not by the president himself, but by an individual who has been at his elbow ever since general Jackson filled the highest situation in the republic. This is well known in the United States.”

Dublin, April 2. The “Volunteers” will hold their weekly meeting to-day. It will probably be the last, as the gassing bill (one of the names by which the Irish disturbance bill is designated here) is expected in Dublin before the close of the week. I think it likely, however, that the “Volunteers” will adjourn till Saturday, and, if their meeting should not be prohibited on that day, that they will adjourn till next Tuesday. It is the universal impression here that the lord lieutenant, after receiving the bill, will forthwith exercise the powers confided to him, by issuing a proclamation prohibiting any future meetings of the Conservatives, as well as the Volunteers. The motion which stands for discussion at the latter this day, is the following, which is to be brought forward by Mr. Barrett:

“That it is the opinion of the Volunteers that the Irish members should remain at their posts, in order to do as much good as possible to the English and Scotch people; and that they are also of opinion that every member should, on every question not incompatible with principle, oppose a ministry which has violated the union, and risked the connexion between the two countries.”

This resolution will, no doubt, be adopted by the volunteers. On Saturday night, or early on Sunday morning, an armed party of Whitefeet attacked the house of Thomas Cross, a respectable farmer, living at Ballynagh, near Prosperous, demanded his arms, and, on being refused, fired into the house; Cross returned the fire, and shot a young man named Philip Geraghty, who was carried off by his party, and brought to his father's house at Millertown, near Robertstown, and thrown on a dung-hill, though yet alive, where he was found at day-light, by his mother, who went out to turn a horse out of her yard. He was brought into the house, where he died in about an hour and a half. The distance from Cross's house to Geraghty's, the way he was brought, is five miles; he was traced by his blood by the party of police from Prosperous. Cross had but one man in his house, named Alcock, who refused to assist his master.

[Dublin Evening Packet,

Yesterday evening a party of the Dulceck police were patrolling on the road bordering the demesne when they fell in with three men whom they called upon to stand; two of them submitted, but the third fled pursued by one of the constables, who fired with the view of intimidating the fellow, when he turned round and shot his pursuer through the body, which caused instant death. The murderer escaped, but the others are in custody; they are identified as having committed a robbery at Snagborough, about an hour before.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

By an arrival at Baltimore, we have news from Smyrna to the 7th April, which says—"The authority of the Turkish government, which, it will be recollected, was for a short time suspended in consequence of the presence of an Egyptian armed force, was now regularly maintained at Smyrna; and peace between the porte and the pacha of Egypt was confidently looked for, through the intervention of the allied powers. This opinion is corroborated by the following extracts of letters from the best informed sources:

Smyrna, April 6. "We are waiting with great anxiety for further advices from Constantinople. Peace must be near at hand—at least every thing concurs in inducing this belief."

Extract of another letter, same date. "Our last advices from Constantinople, to 30th ult. give hope that the great exertions making by the ambassadors there will very soon result in a peace. When this desirable event takes place, we shall no doubt have a very animated business here."

"The latest report at Smyrna was that 'the Russians had entered Constantinople.'" [These are the most recent accounts from that quarter.]

LATEST NEWS.

From London papers to the 11th April.
GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The "Whitefeet" continue their depredations. Mr. O'Connell denounces them as "awocious"—the "vilest of the vile," "villainous miscreants"—"deserving 'the execration of every good or honest man,'" &c. It is very certain that the enormities of these wretches, have not only caused the passage of the "Algerine bill," as O'Connell calls it, but rendered it necessary that it should be put into force. Mr. O'C. has resolved to issue weekly letters to the people of Ireland, and the first has appeared. It is long, and we cannot give it at present. His main exhortations are to "agitate" the country, by discussing all questions relating to its interests—but to respect the laws, and put down the "Whitefeet." It is a very earnest and spirited address.

The court martial, under the Irish disturbance bill, has been organized at Dublin; and a considerable military force was about to proceed to Kilkenny.

Some of the London papers say, that lord Grey's ministry was on the wane. There is much speculation as to what will be done about the bank and the East India company.

Dennis Collins, the old pensioner, who threw a stone at the king, is ordered to be transported for life.

A new ship of 120 guns, the largest in the British navy and called the Royal William, has been launched at Pembroke.

The cholera has broken out on board a convict ship at the Motherbank.

The cotton and iron trades were brisk in England, and the woollen was doing well.

Dublin, Sunday, April 7. The following proclamation extending the provisions of the bill to the county and city of Kilkenny, appeared in the Dublin Gazette. It is stated that a proclamation will appear early in the present week, prohibiting the meetings of the Volunteers, the Conservatives, and the Trades' Union:

By the lord lieutenant and council of Ireland.

A PROCLAMATION.

Anglesey. Whereas, by act passed in the third year of his present majesty's reign, entitled "an act for the more effectual suppression of local disturbance and dangerous associations in Ireland," it is amongst other things enacted that it shall and may be lawful for the lord lieutenant and other chief governor or governors of Ireland, with the advice of his majesty's privy council in Ireland, at any time after the passing of the said act, and from time to time during the continuance thereof, as occasion may require, to issue his or their proclamation, declaring any county, county of a city, or county of a town in Ireland, or any portion thereof, respectively, to be in such a state of disturbance and insubordination as to require the application of the provisions of the said act.

Now, we, the lord lieutenant, do, by this our proclamation, in pursuance and execution of the said act, and by and with the advice of his majesty's privy council in Ireland, declare the county of Kilkenny, the county of the city of Kilkenny, the city of Kilkenny, and the liberties of the said city, to be in such a state of disturbance and insubordination as to require the application of the provisions of the said act.

And we do by this our proclamation, warn the inhabitants of the said county of Kilkenny, the city of the county of Kilkenny, the city of Kilkenny, and the liberties of the said city, to abstain from all seditious and other unlawful assemblages, processions, confederacies, meetings, and associations, and to be and remain in their respective habitations at all hours between sunset and sunrise, from and after Wednesday the tenth day of April instant, of which all justices of the peace of the said county, and county of a city, constables, peace officers, and other whom it may concern, are to take notice,

Given at the council chamber in Dublin, this 6th day of April 1833.

"God save the king."

FRANCE, &c.

Nothing of general interest appears to have happened in France, Belgium or Holland. Letters from Sicily, once the "granary of the world," say that an awful famine prevails—chiefly because that heavy rains had prevented the sowing of the crops. The plains have long been covered with water. The cities and towns are crowded by persons from the country, seeking food and employment.

PORTUGAL.

The affairs of Don Pedro seem much brightened. It appears that he has obtained a considerable supply of money—that he had 22,000 well disciplined troops, 7,000 of whom are French and 5,000 British. The differences with admiral Sartorius had been adjusted; and the opinion now is, that Pedro will succeed in his enterprise.

Don Carlos, of Spain, and the princess Beira, had arrived at Lisbon.

SPAIN.

The latest intelligence from the capital of this country is to the 1st ultimo, and principally leads to the distractions that prevail in the councils of the king. The weakness and oscillation of the king's mind are becoming daily more evident, and the forthcoming events in a country swayed by such a government, despotic in its power, and influenced moreover by a degrading subservience to a bigotted priesthood, it is impossible to foresee.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

We have long reports about the negotiations which have been attempted, and many long and learned speculations on coming events; but it is manifest that nothing of a decisive character has yet been done, to restore peace between the sultan and the pacha; and that the former must sink before the power of the latter, unless supported by foreign arguments or arms. It seems also certain that a Russian force was advancing, and that the Russian fleet will not, at present, leave the Bosphorus. Things were quiet at Constantinople, but the sultan had no reliance on the few troops that were collected there—only 15,000 men. Some suppose that a general war may grow out of the affairs of Turkey and Egypt. All the great powers of Europe are armed—and ready for fight. [The latest accounts from Turkey, are by the arrival at Baltimore, noticed above.]

GERMANY.

There was a great riot at Frankfort. A large body of young men in the dress of students, attacked the guard house, in the night, and the contest between the people and the soldiers lasted till morning. The soldiers prevailed—but a good many were killed or wounded, and the students sustained a severe loss. It is added that similar riots, or insurrections, had happened at Cassel, Wurtzburg, &c. and that Austrian troops were advancing for "the preservation of order," and to rivet the chains of slavery on the people—for these riots took place because of the systematic proceedings of the Germanic diet to put down liberal opinions, and silence free discussions. The king of Wurttemberg has issued a manifesto dissolving the general assembly of his states, and ordering a new election. The turbulent spirit of the former body is assigned as the reason of this proceeding. The prince of Hesse Cassel has also issued a manifesto, conceived in still stronger terms—asserting that a majority of the chamber had, from the very commencement of the session, assumed an attitude hostile to the government.

The armed force of the German despots, we apprehend, is too strong to allow a hope for the freedom of the people. The first is a perfectly organized machine, which destroys at command, and does not reason. It is like one of the old engines of the "holy inquisition." It embraces and murders—"by the grace of God!"

BRITISH TAX ON COTTON.

From the Manchester (Eng.) Guardian.

The tax on cotton. The directors of the Manchester chamber of commerce have just forwarded to the lords of the treasury a memorial praying strongly for the repeal of the heavy and impolitic duty on the importation of raw cotton. "This document states that the consumption of this staple in the factories of the United States of America now extends to 77,516,316 lbs. being as much as the whole consumption of Great Britain amounted to, less than twenty years ago; and that the competition of the American manufacturers already materially interferes with the interests of British merchants, in the markets of Mexico, the Brazils, and even in those of the Mediterranean. The memorialists add that France also now produces yarn annually to the weight of 63,000,000 lbs. and that the value of her export of cotton goods for one of the last years amounted to no less than £2,192,240 sterling; also that Switzerland produces 19,000,000 lbs. of yarn, and has almost ceased to purchase from Great Britain any numbers below 50s. They further state that the cotton manufacture is increasing in Prussia, the Rhenish provinces, Lombardy, Austria and Saxony; that in all these countries the wages of labor are decidedly lower than in England; and that the repeal of our import duty is absolutely necessary to check their growing competition, and diminish the temptation to invest capital in the erection of factories on the continent, which capital, if the present system be continued, may it is much feared, be supplied in part at least by Englishmen. As to the impolicy of subjecting to a heavy tax the raw material of by far the most important of our manufactures, the memorialists observe that they consider it needless to say much, that impolicy having, at the time of the recent augmentation of the tax, been frankly and fully admitted, both by the noble chancellor of the exchequer, and the right honorable vice president of the board of trade. And they pray, that since there appears every reason to hope, that at the end of the financial year there will be such a surplus revenue as to admit of some reduction of taxation, relief may be extended to the cotton manufacture by the removal of an impost which is not only from its very nature repugnant to every principle of political economy, but in its practical operation tends to expose to hazard and injury that branch of trade, on the prosperity of which, far more than that of any other of our manufactures, depends the employment and comfortable subsistence of our laboring population.

The tax on cotton, by "Boyd's British tariff" (1828) was six per cent. ad valorem—but if the product of a British colony, free. The reasons assigned for taking off even this small rate of duty, are clearly stated in the article quoted above—the "competition" of America, France, &c.

IRISH CHURCH REFORM.

From the Philadelphia papers.

The ministerial plan of church reform for Ireland is again before the house of commons, lord Althorp having moved a series of resolutions in a general committee of the whole house, for the purpose of carrying the whole plan into effect. The resolutions in Monday's debate were opposed by Mr. Lefroy, Mr. Halcomb, sir Robert Inglis and sir Robert Peel, and supported by Mr. Shiel, Mr. Pryme, Mr. Macaulay and lord John Russell. The principal objection to the plan urged on Monday was, that the tax to be levied on the incomes of the Irish clergy, in lieu of the abolished first fruits, and to supply the amount of the churches, would be an unjust and oppressive exaction on a body of men who have already paid the first fruits of their livings, and who for three years past have received little or no income. First, as to the payment of the first fruits; what is the whole amount paid by the Irish clergy in first fruits? Not more than £321 a year for the last thirty years. This, therefore, must be regarded as merely a nominal payment; it is a pittance not worth mentioning.

As to the other objection, it leaves out of sight this most material fact, that the clergy have for ages been receiving enormous payments for most inefficient services, and often for no services at all; and that as the body of the people who pay the tax are of a different religion from the clergy who receive it, this is a system of injustice and oppression which has now grown to so great a practical grievance that it is in imminent danger of tumbling down about the years of those who support it. But even leaving all considerations of equity out of the question, what is the plain matter of fact? Why that the whole of the church revenues are in jeopardy; and they can only be rescued by the sacrifice of a part. For it is the enormous amount of those revenues that puts them in danger. They are burdensome to the people, and they are as unjust as they are burdensome. The church vessel has too heavy a cargo, and if the crew refuse to throw over a portion of it when the ship is laboring, the whole must sink together.

The speech of Mr. Shiel furnished numerous precedents for interference with church property, and for a just and rational settlement of the expenses of establishments where they exist. The strongest case was that of Canada, which being the work of a modern British legislature, shows common sense and justice. The majority of the Canadian population being Catholics, (that province having for a long time been French), parliament declared the Catholic to be the established religion; but the laids of Protestants were exempted from the tithes levied for the support of the Catholic clergy. The same principle ought a fortiori to be applied to Ireland; for the proportion of Protestants to Catholics is far less in Ireland than in Canada. The plain truth is, that if there is any established religion at all in Ireland, it ought to be the Catholic. On every principle on which churchmen themselves defend establishments, this ought to be the case. A Protestant establishment in a Catholic country is an anomaly, an injustice; and so far from being, in the eyes of any right judging Protestant, favorable to the spread of Protestantism, it affixes upon that religion a stigma and an odium, and is a heavy clog upon all its movements.

It burdens the Catholic, but it also binds him more firmly to his own faith. It enriches, and at the same time enervates the Protestant; in peaceful times it makes him envied and hated—in times of trouble it makes him a victim and a spoil.

The only consideration which can induce dissenters or liberal Episcopalians to acquiesce in the ministerial plan, and to receive it with gratitude, is, that it is all which there is the least probability of attaining at present.

THE CAPE DE VERD ISLANDS.

Attention is due to the extract annexed from a Boston paper. Our American charity is not always discriminating, and too frequently is prodigal of relief, without inquiring how far it is really needed, or gratefully received.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser of 2d May.
A letter from William G. Merrill, esq. consul at the Cape de Verd Islands, to William B. Reynolds, esq. chairman of the committee appointed in this city, for the relief of the sufferers, under date of the 4th of March, gives an account of the distribution of the provisions received from various parts of the United States. Mr. M. observes that before the arrival of these provisions, hundreds of persons perished, who might have been saved, if the governor would have permitted the sale of orkilla, but this being a monopoly of the crown, he was instructed not to allow this to be done on any terms. On the arrival of the Susan, twenty-five militia men and a small boat only, were furnished to Mr. Merrill to assist him in landing the cargo; while at the same time, the government found the means of chartering a vessel to convey soldiers to Africa, and another to Lisbon with despatches. The number of deaths by famine during the last year is represented by Mr. Merrill at about 33,000 nearly two-fifths of the population. The provisions for the relief of the sufferers which were sent from this country, had in some respects a very beneficial effect, and an unhappy one in others. There prevails an impression, says Mr. M., "that the Americans will supply their future, as well as their present wants." Even some of property are impressed with the same idea, and have declined purchasing except for their own consumption, notwithstanding their being offered at low prices. In some instances, however, they would not, were they admitted duty free, which, has not been the case to the present day, and the reason why they have not been is, that it is, (as they wish to impress upon the minds of strangers), their only resource to pay their soldiers. The only act of the government, indicative of gratitude for the measures of relief, is an exemption of "all vessels sent out with provisions, freight free, (or a large portion of it), from port charges, and a permission to take salt enough to ballast them; duty free; with the exemption of one or two privileges granted to Messrs. P. & C. Flint & Co. who were the first to offer their vessel to convey them, and to captain Rider, who announced the fact of the distress of the islanders to the American public. Mr. Merrill concludes by declaring, that as the government has the means of furnishing the islanders with provisions in future, as long as the orkilla is produced, any additional funds designed for their relief would only be misapplied by being sent to these islands.

¶¶ We cannot but admire the fidelity of the governor, in holding on to the orkilla, during so great a destruction of life for the want of food! If the facts stated are true—many will regret the ill-directed course of their charity, though feeling an honest pleasure in reflecting upon the motives which induced it.

Orchilla is a species of lichen, (says the Encyclopedia Americana), celebrated for yielding a fine purple color, which is employed in dyeing.

LOTTERIES IN NEW YORK.

From the Journal of Commerce.

The answer of Yates & McIntyre to the call of the senate for a statement under oath, of the number and amount of schemes which have been drawn in this state since the 30th August, 1826, and the number and amount of tickets sold by them during the same period, has been promptly furnished, and seems to have left a favorable impression upon the minds of that body, since they proceeded, on the same day to accept the proposition of Messrs. Yates & McIntyre to close the lottery business on the 31st. December next. Had they credited the charges of gross deception and mismanagement brought against those gentlemen in a petition recently presented, they would not have permitted another scheme to be drawn. The assembly, if we mistake not, have already accepted the proposition of the managers. We may therefore safely conclude, that after the close of the present year, all lotteries will be extinct in this state; and what is still better, the new constitution declares that "no lottery shall hereafter be authorized in this state; and the legislature shall pass laws to prevent the sale of all lottery tickets within this state, except in lotteries already provided by law."—i. e. lotteries which will have become extinct by virtue of the present arrangement, before the commencement of another year.

[Q.—The whole lottery system we think, will soon "go by the board," as it ought; for it is a most wicked gambling for money.]

GEORGIA POLITICS.

The Milledgeville Recorder of the 8th inst. states that the columns of that paper had been kept open with the faint hope that they might lay before their readers some conventional proceedings of moment, but that nothing of public interest connected with the objects of the convention had been transacted.

The same paper states also, that contrary to an opinion expressed by its editors some weeks previous, "that the Troup party would have a majority," they now find the Clark party are predominant, out-numbering the Troup men from twelve to twenty. We annex the following from the Recorder, as containing the substance of the article to which we have above alluded:

They (the Clark party) have the power, and they have thus far exercised it, of controlling the convention. If they are really disposed to remedy the intolerable evils at present existing, to give to each freeman of the state as nearly as possible the same rights—if they are disposed to lessen the burdens of our citizens, and to render unnecessary additional taxation to meet the expenses of the government, in all this they will find zealous and cheerful coadjutors in the Troup minority. If the objects of the convention is left unaccomplished, or but partially and inefficiently performed, upon that party will assuredly rest the censure and the odium.

We seize this moment to say to our friends that within the three days past, since the members of the convention have met at this place, many things have taken place publicly and privately, which, when spread before them, will create their utmost astonishment, and, if we are not greatly mistaken, excite their strongest indignation. And as we feel it our duty, it is our determination to lay before the people the actions and doings, whether privately or publicly performed, of those to whom they have confided the important interests for which the convention was called into existence. This is the people's convention, they are entitled to be informed of the conduct of their delegates; and whether such an exposition shall tell for or against individuals, the people shall, (so far as it is within our power) be fully and precisely informed.

On Thursday the 9th instant, the convention resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and the report of the committee of 27 was taken into consideration. Thursday, Friday and Saturday were consumed in speeches, and in the discussion of various propositions for the organization of the senate and house of representatives of the general assembly. Judging from what had taken place, it seems to be the opinion that the senate will be considerably reduced, if not the house. But the great point of contention is the basis of representation. Sectional feelings and interests had prevailed, so far, in the debate. A large number of the delegates, especially those of the north western counties, advocate the white population alone as the basis of representation, while the middle counties contend for the present basis of representation, which is the federal, as established in the constitution of Georgia, and in that of the United States. The delegates of the lower counties contend for territorial representation, and appear willing to unite with those who will offer them advantages in the general assembly which, on account of the sparseness of the population of those counties, they cannot possess, unless territory is represented in one or the other branch of the legislature. On Saturday the main question at issue was tested, in committee of the whole, and decided in favor of white population as a basis for representation, but it was thought, when the subject would come before the committee, the federal representation might be retained by a spirit of compromise between the various interests and views of the several sections of the country.

At a numerous meeting of the citizens of Taliaferro county, Geo. on the 23rd ult. the following resolutions were adopted:—

1. Resolved, That the law passed at the last session of congress, called the enforcing law, alias "THE BLOODY BILL," is arbitrary and despotic, and amounts virtually to a repeal of the constitution; that it attempts to establish a military despotism, whereby the reserved rights of the states and the liberties of the people are made dependent upon the decision of an irresponsible judiciary, and the discretion of the executive. Well may we have been warned to "prepare for a Caesar and the purple." As freemen, therefore, we denounce the law as a most dangerous innovation upon our sacred rights; and pledge ourselves to unite with our fellow citizens in resisting it at all hazards, wherever and by whomsoever, it may be attempted to be enforced.

2. Resolved, That Messrs. John Forsyth* and James M. Wayne, in supporting the enforcing bill, deserted the best interest of Georgia, betrayed the confidence reposed in them by going over to her enemies in the hour of trial, and have rendered themselves obnoxious to the charge of being influenced by a thirst for executive patronage, and unfit to represent a free people—and ought to resign.

And that we most cordially approve of the exertions of our other senator and representatives to maintain, for us, our constitutional rights.

3. Resolved, That, although we do not fully accord with all the principles of Mr. Clay's tariff bill, we are nevertheless disposed to accept this compromise; with the distinct announcement that we will not abate our vigilant exertions, until the duties shall be finally reduced to the revenue standard. And "as that compromise should be our utmost concession, we must hold ourselves ready to take the most decided steps the instant it is violated."

4. Resolved, That the executive of Georgia, in the case of the missionaries, did, by his conduct, sacrifice the dignity of the state and prove himself incapable of sustaining her honor—and that a crisis has arrived in which it is all important to have a politician of tried firmness and ability at the head of our state government—and further,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, there is no one so well qualified to repair the tarnished honor of the state as our patriotic fellow citizen, George M. Troup.

Each of which was, on motion, unanimously adopted by the meeting except the fourth, to which there was one dissenting voice.

Mr. Shackelford then introduced the following:

Resolved, That, having zealously contributed to the repeated elevation of Andrew Jackson to the presidential office, and with pleasure recurred to the better portions of his public course, we fearlessly condemn his inauspicious resolve to coerce by the might of military force the collection of unconstitutional taxes.

Which was, after some discussion, adopted by the meeting, only two dissenting.

ABDOLAM JAMES, chairman.

A. D. SHACKLEFORD, secretary.

LAW IN ALABAMA.

Huntsville, (Alabama), April, 30.

The circuit court of this county, this hon. Horatio G. Perry, presiding, closed its session on last Thursday.

The case of Wm. Hall against John Cowart and others, for an assault and battery, brought to this court on a change of venue at the instance of the plaintiff, from the county of Jackson, came on to be heard before a jury, composed, in general, of the most respectable and intelligent men. Counsel for the plaintiff, Messrs. Levine and Craighead; for the defendants, Messrs. Clay, McClung and Parsons.

The plaintiff proved that about twenty persons, of whom the defendants, or most of them, were a part, came to his house, arrested him in presence of his family, in open day, and after carrying him some short distance, gave him fifty lashes; that he resisted the arrest by aiming to shoot and otherwise, during which they broke his gun and knocked him down with a stick. He also proved that several of the defendants, in conversations afterwards, had admitted that they and others, as members of the association commonly called the "slick company," had made the arrest and given the lashes; but that they did so as a punishment, under the slick law, for the crime which they said the plaintiff had committed, of passing counterfeit money, of which the counsel for the defendants offered to prove the plaintiff had been guilty. This proof, being objected to, was excluded: The counsel for the defendants then offered to prove that the plaintiff's general character was that of a counterfeiter and dishonest man, which, on objection, was likewise excluded; and no other proof being offered, the argument was heard.

The plaintiff's counsel insisted that their client had made out a cause of action in which the defendants had no legal excuse, and one meriting the most exemplary damages; and many fit topics were urged to induce them to assess such damages.

The defendants' counsel insisted that, as the plaintiff had resorted to proof of the confessions of the defendants, which admitted the punishment—asserted the crime for which it was inflicted, and disclosed the character in which the defendants acted, the whole confession must be taken together. This being the case, the crime for which they punished the plaintiff, and the character in which they acted, formed the only excuse on which they relied. It was insisted further, that the slick law had done much good—that the company was composed of men of the best character, and of known discretion, and that they had punished no innocent man: That, according to the common fame of the times, which was relied on as having the effect of historical truth, there had lurked about the borders of Jackson a band of counterfeiters, who had very much annoyed the mass of population, distinguished, it was said, for virtue and social order, and inundated the country with a spurious currency—that they could not be prosecuted to effect in the county, by reason of their having many accomplices, by whom they could prove any fact necessary to their acquittal; and that honest juries were disinclined to convict for that offence, because the penalty was death, and that as the slick law was milder, and the company had greater facilities of detection, they could do, and had done, more to arrest the progress of the evil than the law of the land had done, or could do. One of the counsel reminded the jury, that, if they assessed damages at all in favor of the plaintiff, it would have to be paid in good money; and that it would be the first that had astonished the plaintiff's pockets for a good while. The jury, after a short retirement, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at a hundred dollars.

REPORT ON MANUFACTURES.

Report of the minority of the committee on manufactures, prepared and submitted by Mr. Adams.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 28, 1833.

Mr. Adams, by direction from the majority of the committee on manufactures, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the matters referred to them by the house; and, on the part of the minority of the same committee, he presented the following report on so much of the president's annual message to congress as relates to domestic manufactures and the protection necessary to be afforded the same; referred to the committee by resolution of the house, of 13th December, 1832.

The subscribers, members of the committee on manufactures, to which was referred so much of the message of the president of the United States to congress, at the commencement of the present session, as relates to the protection necessary to domestic manufactures, dissenting from the report of the majority of the committee, present herewith respectfully to the house their own views upon the subject referred by the house to the committee to report thereon.

The parts of the message which relate to the protection necessary to domestic manufactures, may be considered separately or in connexion with other great national interests, forming the subject of the annual communication from the chief of the executive department of the government to the legislature. In the message itself they are recommended to the consideration of congress, in connexion with proposals for such further reduction in the revenue as may not be required for the objects of general welfare and public defence, which the constitution authorises, and for which reduction the occasion is stated by the president to result from the impending final discharge of the national debt; an event on the occurrence of which the subscribers most cordially sympathise with the sentiments expressed by the president. They consider the final and total discharge of the public debt as a subject of grateful acknowledgment to the wisdom, energy, and fidelity to their trust, of those who preceded us in the management of our national concerns; of mutual gratulation to ourselves, who enjoy the benefits of this alleviation of the burdens cheerfully borne by our fathers, and hitherto by us, for the sacred preservation of the public faith; and of anticipated felicity to our successors in the exemption from burdens which we and our fathers have borne without murmuring or complaint, to secure to them, our posterity, the blessings of freedom, independence and union. Enjoying, in all the purity of patriotism, the comfort of this great alleviation of public burdens, the subscribers deprecate, with equal earnestness and sincerity, the contingency of any event which should, at the very moment of fruition, dash from the lips of our prosperity the cup of joy, and substitute, in its place, the bitter potion of disunion, civil dissension, and fraternal war.

Under these impressions, it was not without feelings of deep concern, and of painful sensibility, that the subscribers beheld, in the message of the president of the United States, the broad and unqualified assertion of principles, and the development of an entire political system for the future government of the union, as new and unheard of, as to them it appears incorrect, and incompatible with the foundations of our political existence.

The first of these principles, and that from which all the others appear to the subscribers to be derived—the basis of the message and of the whole system of administration, for the future of this union, is contained in the following position, which the subscribers submit to the consideration of the house in the very words of the message itself—"The wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are, every where, the basis of society, and true friends of liberty."

That the president of the United States should, in a public document, addressed to the representatives of the whole people of this union, peremptorily declare one part of the population, by them represented, better than the rest, appears to the subscribers little compatible with that equality of rights upon which our whole social system is, by them, believed to be founded. If one part of the population, parties to the social compact, is the best, it necessarily follows that another part of the same population is the worst; that there are different degrees of merit in different portions of the same population, estimated not by their moral, but by their social condition; not by their individual qualifications of virtue and understanding, but by their respective occupations and possessions.

In examining this fundamental principle of politics and morals, thus put forth as the foundation for the system of policy to be hereafter erected for the government of this great and growing confederated nation, the subscribers have endeavored to ascertain to whom it is that this proud pre-eminence of merit is assigned by the chief executive magistrate of the union. He asserts that the wealth and strength of a country are its population, and that the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Now, the population of a country consists of the whole mass of human beings abiding within it; and, of the population of this country, a vast proportion of the cultivators of the soil are in a state of servitude—possessing no rights, civil or political—and existing only as the property of another part of the same population. That these cultivators of the soil constitute a large portion of the wealth of this country, is undoubtedly true; that they constitute a considerable portion of its strength is far more questionable; but the subscribers cannot believe it was to them that the intention of the president was to ascribe the transcendent honor of constituting the best part of our population; and, if not to them, neither was it to the class of freemen, in another part of the union, also cultivators of the soil, laboring, like them, by the sweat of their brow, for their daily subsistence, by daily labor, but in the full enjoyment of civil and political rights, and constituting, in truth, not a better, but as good, a part of the population as any other in the community. It was not, however, to them that the president intended to attribute the superiority of excellence as a component part of the population. His meaning is more fully disclosed in the subsequent clause of the sentence above cited, in the affirmation that "independent farmers are every where the basis of society, and true friends of liberty." Taking the whole sentence together, the subscribers believe that, in the understanding of the author of the message, the cultivators of the soil, in the first part of the sentence, were identical with the independent farmers in the second; and that the sentiment, in the mind of the writer, and the aphorism of moral and political economy laid down by the whole sentence, is that, in all countries, generally, and especially in our own, the best part of the population—the basis of society—and the friends pre-eminently of freedom, are the wealthy land-holders.

This principle is certainly not new in the history of the world, or of human government; it is the fundamental axiom of all landed aristocracies; it is the foundation of the feudal system, and, when carried out into practice, must inevitably resolve itself into it. The term aristocracy, by its derivation, is the government of the best; and where the property of the soil is distributed in portions so unequal, that its cultivators are divided into masters and slaves, or into landlords and tenants, power will naturally concentrate itself in the hands of the large holders of the lands, who will soon constitute themselves the basis of society—the independent farmers the best part of the population—true friends of liberty, confined exclusively to themselves, but holding in oppressive servitude the real cultivators of the soil, and ruling, with a rod of iron, over all the other occupations and professions of men.

Such has been the development of this fundamental principle of government, in the history of other ages and countries. So has it especially disclosed itself in the annals of France, of Spain, of Germany, of Poland, of Russia and of England. The independent farmers, or wealthy land-holders, of all those countries, have constituted the ancient feudal barons, as they now constitute the modern nobles, holding the laborious husbandmen of the same countries in servitude, or in abject poverty and the most degrading dependence.

The subscribers believe that the Declaration of Independence, and the government of this union, are founded upon a different and opposite principle—upon the principle that all men are born with equal rights; and that however in one portion of the union, the independent farmers or planters, cultivating the soil by their slaves, may be considered, by one of themselves, as the basis of society, and the best part of the population, the assumption of such a principle, as a foundation of a system of national policy for the future government of these United States, is an occurrence of the most dangerous and alarming tendency; as threatening, at no remote period, not only the property, but the peace of the country, and as directly leading to the most fatal catastrophes—the dissolution of the union by a complicated, civil and servile war.

Had it been possible for the subscribers to consider the principles thus authoritatively laid down in the message as a mere abstract speculative opinion, indicative only of a mind habitually occupied in meditation upon the first principles of government, they might have deemed it their duty to pass it over in silence, regretting that an opinion so adverse to all the lessons of history, and to every rational theory of human rights, should ever have found its way into the mind of the executive chief of the union; and still more into an official communication from him to the legislative assembly of the nation. But they find it pervading every part of the message relating to the administration of the internal affairs of the country—they trace it in the denunciation of uncompromising hostility to the bank of the United States—they discern it in the general dissuasion of all future encouragement, or aid to be given to objects of internal improvement—they perceive it in the portentous recommendations to abandon all purpose of deriving a revenue for the general benefit from that invaluable fund of national wealth—the public lands; and in the astonishing proposal to give them all away to the states within which they are situated, or to adventurers who may be allured by promises of sharing in those spoils of the national domain, plundered from the whole people of the union, to become members of this best part of the population, the independent farmers, cultivators of the soil, taken from all their fellow citizens to be gratuitously bestowed upon them. They see it, above all, in the destiny to which the message consigns the great manufacturing interest of the country, including the handicraftsmen and mechanics of all our populous cities and all our flourishing towns. These are not the basis of society—they are not the cultivators of the soil—they are not the best part of the population—their equal rights may be trampled upon—their highest interests may be sacrificed—their property may be wrested from their hands—their families and their families may be driven by measures of national policy, by acts of the government of the union, to beggary and ruin, for the benefit of the independent farmers, the wealthy land-holders—the best part of the population.

Such are the practical consequences which must flow from the reproduction by the head of this national union, as a fundamental principle of government of the old and long exploded doctrine, that the wealthy land-holders of all countries constitute the best part of their population. Under this theory it can no longer be surprising to find in the message an entire system of propositions and of recommendations, which, if adopted and sanctioned by the legislature, will accomplish a revolution in the government of the United States, and, in the solemn and deliberate opinion of the subscribers, a total subversion of their constitution.

In descending from the general axiom, that in all countries the independent farmers or wealthy land-holders, cultivators of the soil, constitute the best part of the population, to the measures of legislation recommended to congress for carrying out this principle, in the administration of the government, four features are discernible, as especially characteristic of the message. First, the abandonment for the future of all appropriations of public monies to purposes of internal improvement. Second, the practical total dereliction of all protection to domestic industry, whether agricultural, manufacturing or mechanical. Third, the nullification of all future revenue from the public domains, by the bestowal of them in free donation to voluntary settlers upon them, from the privileged class of citizens, cultivators of the soil, to swell the numbers of the best part of the population, at the expense of all the rest, or to the favored states in which this common property happens to be situated. Fourth, the denunciation of the bank of the United States, depreciating the value of the stock held in it by the nation; distressing the commercial community with suspicions of the solidity of its funds, and stimulating the profligacy of fraudulent gambling in its stock. In every one of these four particulars the recommendations of the message are in diametrical opposition to the well established, deliberately adopted, and long tried policy, by which the union has hitherto been governed, under the present constitution of the United States—in diametrical opposition to the purposes for which it was formed—to the principles upon which it has been administered, and, with the most painful, but most undoubting conviction, the subscribers must add, to the solemn compacts and indefeasible obligations by which the nation is bound.

Although the plan of government marked out and delineated in the message forms a whole system, sufficiently consistent with itself, and all derivable from the fundamental position that the wealthy land-holders constitute the best part of the population, yet it is observable, that in every instance the subordinate principle advanced as the groundwork of each separate recommendation, is, by the terms of the message, so qualified in the theory, as scarcely, if at all, to differ from the views and opinions entertained by the friends of the interest which the recommendation itself is adapted to destroy. Thus, for example, in the recommendation to abandon all future appropriations of public monies for purposes of internal improvement, the only principle avowed is "that the constitution does not warrant the application of the funds of the general government to objects of internal improvement, which are not national in their character." From this position, the most ardent and most liberal friend of internal improvement will not dissent. No appropriation ever has been asked—there is not the shadow of a danger that any appropriation of funds ever will be asked, but for objects alleged to be of a national character; and of their legitimate title to that character, the representatives of the whole people, and of all the state legislatures in congress assembled, under the control of a qualified negative by the chief magistrate of the union, all acting under a constant responsibility to their constituents, are qualified and competent judges. That there will be, as there have been, diversities of opinion, whether any specified object of internal improvement is or is not of a national character, may be freely admitted; and that in all cases where it may be reasonably doubted, the wise and prudent policy of the constituted authorities will induce them rather to withhold than grant the appropriation, is a conclusion deducible not less from the experience of the past, than from the confidence due to the moral character of the delegated representatives of the nation. That in the great majority of applications for appropriations in aid of internal improvements, which have been made to congress, the objects for which they were solicited have been of a national character could not be, and was not doubted. Of the appropriations made, the subscribers confidently affirm, that none can be pointed out which are not unquestionably of that character. If there has been error in the administration of the government, in the application of appropriations to these objects, it has been an error of parsimony and not of profusion; a refusal of the public money where it ought to have been granted, and not a bestowal of it where it ought to have been denied. In the sober and honest discretion of the legislature, under the vigilant supervision of the executive chief, a guard amply sufficient for the protection of the public resources against wasteful or imprudent expenditures, has been provided by the constitution.

It is said in the message, that, "without some general and well defined principles, ascertaining those objects of internal improvement to which the means of the nation may be constitutionally applied, it is obvious that the exercise of the power can never be satisfactory." Suppose this position, in its fullest extent, to be admitted. The message does not deny that the power of granting appropriations for internal improvements of a national character is vested, completely and unequivocally vested, in congress, by the constitution; and the president himself, in the discharge of his official duties, has, in numerous instances, given his sanction to such appropriations. And in that grant of power, as in all others, is necessarily and unavoidably implied the power of ascertaining and defining the principles upon which, in the spirit of the constitution, it shall be exercised. If, therefore, in the exercise of the power of making such appropriations hitherto, there has been a neglect or omission to ascertain and define the principles upon which they have been made, it is a duty yet to be performed by congress itself, and which requires the interposition of no other power. It is obvious that to resort elsewhere than to congress itself, to ascertain and define the objects upon which the power is unquestionably delegated to them of appropriating public monies to internal improvements, is precisely equivalent to a denial of the right of congress to exercise the power in all cases whatsoever.

With regard to the danger to which the message supposes congress may be exposed of making hasty appropriations to works of the character of which they may be frequently ignorant, the argument necessarily presupposes a habitual, gross and criminal neglect of their duties; by a majority of both houses of congress, a reflection upon the honor and honesty of those bodies, of which the subscribers deem it sufficient to say that it is equally unwarrantable and misplaced. So long as the members of both houses of congress shall entertain a just sense of their duties to their country, to their constituents, and to their own characters: so long there is, and will be, no danger—none, whatever, of their being exposed to make hasty appropriations to works of the character of which they are ignorant, or to any other purpose. The members of both houses of congress, are accountable for the wisdom as well as for the purity of their official conduct, not to the executive magistrate, himself accountable to them for his own, but to their constituents and to their country. Nor has that country committed to the executive magistrate the custody of its own purity, in the exercise of the elective franchise. If it be true that a prospect of making navigable a creek or river—of bringing commerce to the doors of the people—or of increasing the value of their property, may operate occasionally as inducements to individuals to favor by their suffrages the success of a candidate whom they may suppose to be better qualified than his opponent, to obtain for them those great and valuable improvements—is it justice or equity—is it a fair perception of the nature of things, to stigmatize this as a corrupting influence? No influence can be more just and pure. To benefit the people, by making navigable the river or creek in their neighborhood—by bringing commerce to their doors—and by increasing the value of their property, are among the most important and most valuable services that a representative can render to his constituents: To draw good from evil, is one of the high and holy attributes of Omnipotence. To draw evil from good, is the peculiar attribute of the arch enemy of mankind; but singular, indeed, is the aspect of that political axiom, which imputes dishonesty to the representative in the zeal with which he promotes the interests of his constituents; and finds the evidence of corruption in the exercise of the highest beneficence. Suppose this calumniated influence to be successful; suppose a candidate to be elected to congress, by the confidence of his constituents in the superiority of his talent and capacity to obtain appropriations of public money to render their neighboring river navigable—to bring commerce to their doors, and to increase the value of their property—talent and capacity are qualities of which men seldom form erroneous estimates, in the choice of their representatives, when their judgments are enlightened by their interest. Talent and capacity, brought into the representative councils of the nation, by the selection of a member for one district, under the influence of a belief that it will be exerted for the benefit of those by whom he is chosen, is talent and capacity available on the scene where it has been introduced, for all the great interests of the nation. It is there that the representative of every single district becomes a representative of the whole people. As the representative of one district, he has, to promote the interests of his immediate constituents, but one of more than two hundred votes. But that one vote he has also upon all the questions within the competency of congress, and affecting the interests of the whole nation, and of all its parts. The result then of every election which brings into this house a member, recommended to the favor of his constituents by the zeal and ability with which he may promote the internal improvement of his own neighborhood, is essentially advantageous to the whole nation, and has a direct tendency to establish a high standard of intellectual worth, as the measure of qualification for a seat in the house. It is congenial to that spirit of moral elevation and dignity which constitutes the only solid foundation of representative government; and it is only by confounding the elements of good and evil, that it can be stigmatized as tainted with corruption.

As little can the subscribers yield their assent to the reasoning in the message, which effectively urges upon congress to refrain from the exercise of all powers of which more than one-fourth, that is, seven states of this union, would be unwilling now to make the grant, and which any still smaller portion of the people may, at any period since the existence of the constitution, have opposed or resisted under the vague and indefinite denomination of doubtful powers. Fearful and hopeless, indeed, would be the condition of the people of these United States, if every grant of power delegated by them, for their own benefit and improvement, to their united national supreme legislature, should be annulled or struck with impotence by every scruple of doubt which the refinements of metaphysical subtlety, the transient ebullitions of popular excitement, or the factious instigations of electioneering artifice, have, from time to time, disseminated over differing sections of the country. There is, perhaps, not a single grant of power to congress in that great national compact of government, the constitution of the United States, which at some period of our history has not been assailed by numerous parties and their controversial wranglers, as doubtful powers; even at this hour we are, apparently, on the verge of a conflict in arms, on the very borders of a civil war with one of the states of the union, for the exercise of powers, the want of which first gave rise to the constitution itself, which have been quietly exercised from the organization of the government for nearly forty years without a dissenting voice; and which now, under the new lights of nullification have been discovered to be such plain and palpable violations of the constitution, as to warrant the state in which this discovery has been made, in resorting to her sovereign power, to declare them within her own borders null and void. There are seven states of this union, the whole free population of which by the returns of the last census, amounted only to seven hundred and seventy-one thousand two hundred and eighteen souls; a majority of these, sufficient to command the vote and decision of them all, would be less than four hundred thousand; and thus, upon the recommendations of the message, a nation consisting of ten millions of freemen, must be crippled in the exercise of their associated power, unmaned of all their energies applicable to the improvement of their own condition, by the doubts, scruples, or faneul discontents of a portion among themselves, less in number than double the amount of population in the single city of New York.

The subscribers assume as a principle, demonstrated beyond all possibility of doubt, that of the whole free population of the union, a vast majority—they entertain, themselves, no question that it is a majority amounting to more than three-fourths of the whole—believe, without a scintillation of doubt, that the power of appropriating public monies to objects of internal improvement of a national character, as understood by congress itself, has been delegated to congress by the whole people, in the constitution of the United States. The message itself does not question this grant of power; and it is tacitly affirmed by the chief magistrate himself, in his sign manual affixed to every act of congress making such appropriations which has received his signature. What reason or motive, then, can there be for congress to interdict itself from the exercise of beneficent power, essential to the welfare and prosperity of the whole people, to gratify the dog-in-manger disposition of less than one-twentieth part of the community? Truly, very truly, does the message say that "there is nothing so worthy of the constant solicitude of this government as the harmony and union of the people;" but, is it imagined that harmony and union can be promoted by the perpetual sacrifice of the will, the interest, and the well-being of nineteen-twentieths of the whole people, to the contracted and envious passions or to the sordid parsimony of the remaining twentieth? The subscribers will neither express nor entertain a suspicion that the recommendation to apply to the states of this union for grants of additional power to congress, and in the mean time to abstain from the exercise of all powers, which the one-twentieth part of the people may be pleased or instigated to consider as doubtful, was not made in good faith and sincerity; but without questioning the motive which could lead to such a proposal, they cannot but regard it in effect as disclosing the purpose of disabling and abdicating all power of making appropriations for all and every great object of internal improvement hereafter and forever. As little hesitation have they in declaring it as their belief, that this purpose, and the whole system of which it forms a part, is in nowise calculated to promote the harmony and union of the people. It is a natural emanation from the fountain of a principle divided itself, and the source of all fatal division—a principle which pronounces one class of the citizens of this union, to the disparagement of all others, the best part of the population.

The subscribers disclaim all communion, of sentiment with this opinion, to which they can assent as true in no sense whatever. They deny that there is any sense to which language can give utterance; and in which the cultivators of the soil, be they who they may, included under the denomination, can, with truth, be called the best part of the population. They believe, on the contrary, with the greatest orator, statesman and patriot of ancient Rome, and with the sublimest genius of ancient Greece, and with Cicero and with Plato, that "whosoever gives preference to one part of the citizens, and neglects another part, introduces into the community the elements of the most pernicious discord and sedition. It necessarily produces rival factions, some favoring the populace, and some favoring the few, and leaving scarcely any favorites of all." This was the patriotism of Cicero; this was the philosophy of Plato, two thousand years and upwards before the Declaration of Independence. The doctrine is founded upon eternal truth. It is the only doctrine upon which governments of equal rights can be founded; as that which divides the population into a best and a worst part is the never failing source of tyranny and oppression, of civil strife, the shedding of brother's blood, and the total extinction of freedom.

The subscribers hope and trust, therefore, that congress will not abdicate by nonuser, the power delegated to them by the constitution of the United States, of making appropriations of public money to great national objects of internal improvements. They consider the exercise of the power as essential to the welfare and prosperity of the whole people; they believe it to have been delegated for the purpose of promoting that welfare; and that to refrain from the exercise of the power would be a dereliction of duty in congress itself, and treachery to the trust committed to them by the people. They further believe that the people of this union never will submit to a permanent abandonment of the principle, hitherto so successfully and so advantageously to them carried into practice, of making such appropriations; that however it may be suspended for a time, under a theory of partial preference to an imaginary best part of the population, it will never be extinguished but with the life-blood of the union itself. For what is the final result of this doctrine of abdicating powers arbitrarily designated as doubtful? What but the degradation and impotence of the nation itself?—the degradation of chaining its own hands? of fettering its own feet? of disabling itself from bettering its own condition? The impotence of inability to employ its own faculties for its own improvement. It is the principle upon which the roving Tartar denies himself a permanent habitation, because to him the wandering shepherd is the best part of the population; the principle upon which the savage of the American forest refuses to till the ground, because to him the hunter of the woods is the best part of the population. Imperfect civilization in all stages of human society shackles itself with fanatical prejudices of exclusive favor to its own occupations, as the owner of a plantation with a hundred slaves believes the summit of human virtue to be attained only by independent farmers, cultivators of the soil. Not by such opinions or such maxims of government were the people of the United States animated and inspired, when, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity, they did ordain and establish the constitution of the United States of America." Their purpose, in this great and solemn mutual covenant, was their own improvement—the improvement of the condition of the whole. The constitution itself is but one great organized engine of improvement, physical, moral, political. It directed the assemblage, from time to time, of chosen bodies of men, vested with limited powers, to consult, to deliberate, and to act upon all the great interests of peace and war, common to the people. It was no compact of separate and distinct bodies politic. The separate states were not competent to form any such compact, or to confer any such powers; the people of each state were competent to form, and did form, constitutions for themselves but their sphere of action to ordain and establish was limited within their own boundaries. For where did the state, the creature of the sovereign people of Massachusetts, where did, or where could, that state acquire the right of bestowing upon the people of Pennsylvania a right of representation in this house? As well might the state of Massachusetts have undertaken to ordain and establish who should be represented in the parliament of Great Britain, or in the chamber of deputies of France. The whole people of the United States were alone competent to determine and to ordain how, and in what manner, they and their posterity should be represented in this assembly; and as well might it be contended that the state of Ohio, which had no existence, or the state of Louisiana, which was a Spanish colony, were parties to the constitution of the United States at its formation, as that the parties to it were the thirteen states of which the old lifeless confederation had been composed. The constitution was, as it is on its face declared to be, the act of the whole people, and it is the instrument by which they organized the means of effecting the improvements of their own condition, by the agency of their government. In refraining from the exercise of the powers delegated to them for the good of the whole, the government not only abdicate their own power, but effectively disable that of the nation itself. The energy which slumbers in their hands, is no better than dead to the good of the people; it arrests the hand of divine beneficence itself; degrades the nation to a level of inferiority among the families of mankind, and proclaims as the fundamental law of their association their inability to apply their own faculties to their own elevation in the scale of being.

It is then, with sentiments of deep mortification and of unqualified dissent, that the subscribers have observed the earnest recommendations to congress in the message, to abandon the whole system of appropriations for internal improvements, which has hitherto been pursued; which was in the full tide of successful experiment, and which, for a long series of years, has been contributing to increase the comforts, to multiply the enjoyments, and to consolidate the strength and happiness of the American people. To abandon them all, for in no other light can they consider the extraordinary, though vague and indefinite commendations of simplicity, as the suitable characteristic for the government of a nation of swarming millions of human beings—the intensely urgent exhortations to congress to refrain from the exercise of all beneficent powers, which one-twentieth part of the people may carp and cavil at as doubtful—the incomprehensible argument that harmony and union are to be promoted by stifling the firm and manly voice of nineteen-twentieths of our constituents, to satisfy the brain-sick doubts, or appease the menacing clamors of less than one twentieth—and finally the direct recommendation to congress, to dispose of all stocks now held by the general government in corporations, whether created by the general or state governments, and to place the proceeds in the treasury.

In these recommendations, and in the spirit with which they are pressed upon the consideration of congress, the subscribers can discern nothing less than a proposed revolution of government in this union—a revolution, the avowed purpose of which is, to reduce the general government to a simple machine. A simple machine? The universe in which we daily revolve, and which seems to our vision daily to revolve round us, is a simple machine under the guidance of an Omnipotent hand. The president of the United States, one of the functionaries provided by the constitution for the ordinary management of the affairs of the government, but not entrusted even with the power of action, upon any proposed alteration or amendment to the constitution, undertakes to reduce the general government to a simple machine—the simplicity of which shall consist of universal beneficence, in preserving peace, affording a uniform currency, maintaining the inviolability of contracts, diffusing intelligence, and discharging, unfelt, its other (nameless, unenumerated, and undefined) superintending functions. Truly this simplicity may be aptly compared with that of the government of the universe; needing only an Omnipotent hand to guide and regulate its movements, and differing from it, as would seem, only in the self-denial of all power to improve the condition, or promote the general welfare of the community, by and for whom this simple machine was ordained. To the subscribers, it appears that of all the attributes of government among men, simplicity is the last that deserves commendation. The simplest of all governments is an absolute despotism, and it may confidently be affirmed, that, in proportion as a government approaches to simplicity, will always be its approaches to arbitrary power. It is by the complication of government alone, that the freedom of mankind can be secured; simplicity is the essential characteristic in the condition of all slavery; and if the people of these United States enjoy a greater share of liberty than any other nation upon earth, it is because, of all the governments upon earth, theirs is the most complicated. The simplicity to which the recommendations of the message would reduce the machine of government, is a simplicity of impotence; an abdication of the power to do good; a divestment of all power in this confederated people to improve their own condition.

In the recommendations of the message, relating to the disposal of the public lands, the subscribers perceive the same speculative aversion to control, which seeks to reduce the government to a simple machine, the same preference of one class of citizens—the independent farmers, cultivators of the soil—over all other members of the community. The recommendations of the message are, “that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue—that they be sold to settlers, in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expenses of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts; and that, in convenient time, the machinery of accurate surveys and undoubted titles be withdrawn from the states, and the right of soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the states respectively in which it lies.”

The proposition is to give away all the public lands—first, to enable individual adventurers to secure an independent freehold, because cultivators of the soil are the best part of the population; and finally to surrender all the remainder to the states in which the lands are situated, because “it cannot be expected that the new states will remain longer contented with the present policy, after the payment of the public debt.”

The public lands are the property of the whole people of the United States; they are the national domain. To give them away to individual adventurers, is to take away the property of one portion of the citizens, and bestow it upon another; and, as if this outrage upon the right of property were not sufficient without the superaddition of insult, the plundered portion of the community are told that those on whom their lands are lavished, are the best part of the population. It is said in the message that “the proceeds arising from the sale of the lands are distributed chiefly among states which had not originally any claim to them.” Were this assertion true, what possible bearing can the places where the proceeds of the sale of property are distributed, have upon the right of the proprietor to the proceeds of the sale. The proceeds of the sales of public lands are not distributed in gratuities. What is meant by the assertion that they are distributed among states? They are not distributed among states at all. What is meant by “states which had not originally any claim to them?” What state had originally any claim to the public lands in Louisiana or Florida? What portion of the public lands is there to which the whole union, and of course every state in the union, had not originally a claim? From the very formation of the confederation, all the states, within which not an inch of public land existed, had a claim to their just proportion of the public lands situated within the boundaries of the other states—and that claim was just; in deference to the justice of that claim, all the cessions of public lands were made by the states in which they were situated; and without those cessions, the confederation never would have been formed. The right of the whole people, therefore, to all the public lands, is a perfect right, independent, totally independent, of all consideration of the localities where the proceeds of the sales of them may be distributed, and for the enjoyment of which, as a right founded in the first elements of human society, the states wherein the lands are situated have no more right to be disinterested than the tenant of a dwelling house belonging to another has the right to be disinterested that the fee of the possession is in his landlord and not in himself.

This right of property is, however, not wholly unqualified. The cessions of territory made to the United States by the states of New York, Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, South Carolina and Georgia, were all conditional; and the common condition of all the grants was, that the lands by them respectively ceded should be held and disposed of for the use and benefit of all the United States, the ceding state included, and for no other use whatsoever. Upon this condition, all the cessions were accepted by the United States in congress assembled, and the United States thereby contracted the solemn and positive engagement to hold and dispose of all the lands thus ceded conformably to that condition, and to no other use whatever.

The constitution of the United States, in the third section of the fourth article, declares that “congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States;” with the express addition that “nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular state.” And in the sixth article, it provides “that all debts contracted and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation.”

It appears to the subscribers, that congress could neither give away the public lands to individual settlers, to enable them to acquire independent freeholds, nor surrender them to the states in which they are situated, without a threefold violation of the constitution; first, by abdicating the power entrusted to them of disposing of the territory of the United States, conformably to the conditions under which it is held, and of making all needful rules and regulations respecting it; secondly, by prejudicing the just and undoubted claims, both of the United States, and of every particular state within which there are no public lands; and, thirdly, by trampling under foot solemn engagements entered into before the adoption of the constitution. In the list of powers to be exercised by congress, when the government shall be reduced to the simple machine, avowed to be the purpose of the president by the recommendations of the message, this power of disposing of, and making needful rules and regulations for the territory and other property of the United States, is entirely overlooked; very consistently, indeed; for if the whole property should be squandered away to make independent freeholders, or surrendered to the states wherein the common possession happens to be located, there will be no longer any territory belonging to the United States to dispose of, or needing rules and regulations to be prescribed by congress. The government will be made a much simpler machine; but it will be a simplicity purchased with all the wealth, all the rights, and all the good faith of the nation—purchased by prejudicing the claims of the United States, and of every state other than those in which the lands are situated—purchased by setting at naught the first principle of justice, the sacred rights of property, and the explicit engagements not only entered into before the adoption of the constitution, but pledges of faith, without which the confederation itself never would have been sanctioned.

The same principles are applicable to the public lands situated within the states, formed from the territories included in the purchase of Louisiana, and in the Floridas. These are lands not only belonging to the United States, but purchased with monies from their common treasury. Upon the principles recommended in the message, the whole mass, of them may be given away to foreigners, to emigrants from every quarter of the globe, aliens and perhaps enemies to this country, who may thus be converted into independent freeholders, and constitute, under this improved code of morals, the best part of the population. The subscribers deem it an excellent part of the policy of the union to welcome the useful industry of foreign freemen seeking the enjoyment of liberty and equal rights and honest subsistence, and the chances of affluence upon our shores; but they conceive it neither politic nor just to bestow upon them, or upon any adventurers, whether of foreign or of domestic birth, the acquisitions of the nation, made with the monies levied upon all the people in all the states.

Congress are told in the message that it cannot be expected that the new states will “remain longer contented with the present policy, after the payment of the public debt.” By the present policy is here meant the policy of holding and disposing of the public lands as public property. The proposal is, therefore, to change the present policy, for that of giving away this public property, partly to individual adventurers, and the remainder to the “new states”—one of which is the state of Tennessee. And what are the arguments by which this change of policy, or, in other words, this surrender of property, is urged? It is said that “the adventurous and hardy population of the west, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our government, for the lands they occupy, paid into the treasury a large proportion of forty millions of dollars; and, of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended amongst them.” Is this a reason for giving away to new adventurers, or to new states, the property belonging to the adventurous and hardy population of the west, in common with the adventurous and hardy population of all the rest of the union? To the epithets of adventurous and hardy, applied to the population of the west, the subscribers take no exception, as descriptive of qualities truly belonging to that class of our fellow citizens; that population went forth from the old and long settled states, from the thirteen confederates of the revolution, and left behind them a population not less adventurous and hardy than themselves. If the population of the west have contributed their equal share of taxation under our impost system, so have the population of all the rest of the union. If, in the progress of the government, they have paid into the treasury a large portion of forty millions of dollars for the lands they occupy, they have received, in the property of those lands transferred to them by the nation, the value to them of many hundred millions of dollars as an equivalent. That a small part of the revenue received from the proceeds of the public lands has been expended amongst them, if estimated in proportion to the relative amount of revenue collected amongst them, may be doubted; but the subscribers believe that justice and policy would alike dictate a larger expenditure of the revenue amongst the population of the west, than has yet been authorised. It is in the western country that the greatest, the most useful and the most expensive works of internal improvement have been undertaken, or are most urgently needed. To such works, unquestionably of a national character, the subscribers believe that a full and ample proportion of the public revenue, whether collected from the sales of public lands or from other sources, ought to be applied, and the monies so appropriated would be almost exclusively expended among the population of the west. It is in this manner that, without doing injustice to any other part of the union, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands may be applied to the special improvement of the western country; that they may be, beneficially to all, expended among the settlers of the public lands themselves, and while contributing to the improvement of the whole union, facilitate and encourage the progress of the new settlements, by furnishing, at once, occupation for industry, reward for labor, and the rapid appreciation of the lands upon which the settlers may fix their abode. Such, the subscribers believe, are the dictates of a policy, at once prudent and magnanimous: but this policy cannot be promoted by arresting the progress of works already commenced; by refusing appropriations for works deconstructed to be of a national character; or by giving away to single adventurers, or to the new states, the whole invaluable fund, inexhaustible, if duly managed, for long centuries to come, of lands purchased by the blood of our revolutionary fathers, and by their treasures of our own.

In this examination of the proposal to give away all the public lands of the union, the subscribers have deemed it their indispensable duty, though a painful one it has been, to resort to the first principles of natural justice, to the sacred right of property, and to the positive injunctions of the constitution, to prove that it is alike subversive of them all. The project itself is not new: the subscribers are unwilling either to trace its origin, or to scan the motives and purposes from which it proceeded. But never before have they witnessed—never again, they will hope, may it be seen seriously recommended in a message from the president to the congress of the United States. The public lands are the property of the union; the possession, the use, and the disposal of them, for the benefit of the whole, are guaranteed by the elementary principle at the foundation of civil society, by the immutable laws of justice, and by the express terms of the constitution, which we have all sworn to support. The power to give them away has not only never been delegated to congress; it has been, by direct implication, prohibited. The attempt to give them away, by an act of congress, would be an act of transcendent usurpation, null and void in itself, and substituting arbitrary power in the place of constitutional right. The attempt to carry it into effect would be a dissolution of the union—an inextinguishable brand of civil war. This the subscribers do with the profoundest conviction believe; this they cannot, without violating the trust reposed in them by their constituents, refrain from declaring. They solemnly deprecate the contingency that such a proposal should ever again be made.

Congenial with it, and apparently flowing from the same erroneous and partial fundamental principle of government, that the wealthy land-holders are the best part of the population, the subscribers are constrained to consider all the recommendations of the message in relation to the manufacturing interest of the country. The spirit of the message looks steadily, though with occasional blenching, to that interest, as a victim to be sacrificed. The approaches to the altar are not always direct, but the instrument of death is never sheathed, and the grasp with which it is held is ever intent to strike the blow. As in the principle of limitation to the congressional power of appropriating money for internal improvement, so, in the restriction of that which may be exercised for the protection of domestic industry, care is taken to commence with a general axiom, which the friends of the manufacturing interest themselves will readily admit. That the revenue of the national government should be adapted to their expenditures, and that the expenditures should be strictly limited within the sphere of objects warranted by the constitution, and regulated by a severe and vigilant economy, the most ardent friends of the manufactures will cheerfully allow. Nor would they deny "that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war." If the enunciation of the principle of legitimate protection in these terms discloses a mind in search of reasons for withdrawing the protection secured by existing laws, it is rather in the disposition thus evinced, than in the abstract proposition with which it is clothed, that the manufacturing interest may discern the determined hostility with which it is assailed. The manufacturer asks for no protection beyond that which may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of the articles essential to the national safety in time of war. But this protection has been extended to the manufacturing establishments by the existing laws. It has been extended to them, not as a favor to that separate interest, for no such favor has ever been indulged in the legislation of the union, but for the purpose of counteracting the injury of foreign regulations, and for the purpose of securing the supply of articles essential to the national safety in war. The manufacturers of the old and long settled states have been protected from the injurious regulations of foreign nations, as the planters of the south and the settlers of the west have been protected from the depredations and hostile incursions of Indian savages. Nearly the whole charge of the military peace establishment is borne by the nation for the protection of the south and of the west. Of the millions upon millions expended, ever since the existence of the government, upon Indian wars and negotiations, the manufacturer of Pennsylvania, of New Jersey and of Massachusetts, has paid, and continues to pay, his full proportion. And what is Indian war or Indian negotiation to him? The whole naval establishment of the union is maintained to protect the immediate interest of the commercial part of the community. The manufacturer, the farmer, the planter, have no direct interest in this; they all pay taxes to protect from foreign hostility the property of the merchant and the person of the navigator. The war last waged with Great Britain, and which cost the nation upwards of a hundred millions of dollars, and perhaps fifty thousand lives, for what was it proclaimed but for wrongs to the merchant and the mariner, in which the manufacturer and the farmer, as distinct classes of society, had not one dollar of interest, yet for the maintenance of which they bore their equal portion of taxation, and devoted their equal portion of lives? The manufacturer of the interior has the same right to the protection of the whole union against the regulations of foreign countries, as the merchant upon the coast, or the mariner upon the ocean. The manufacturer of the north has the same right to the protection of the nation against the competition of foreign rivals, armed with foreign laws, as the planter of the south, or the settler in the west, has to the same protection against the robberies and butcheries of Indian savages, instigated by the secret impulses and profuse subsidies of the same foreign rivals. The manufacturer asks no more. The principle in the message now under examination is in terms equally applicable to all branches of the national industry. The protection afforded by existing laws to the southern planter and the western settler, to the merchant and navigator, should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract foreign hostility, and secure the national independence and safety. If the separate and exclusive interest of the manufacturer or of the northern farmer were consulted, the army might be disbanded; the wooden walls of the navy might be laid up in ordinary, and its gallant seamen be discharged from the service. Six or seven annual millions more of expenditure might be retrenched, and the government be reduced to a machine of still more edifying simplicity—so simple, indeed, as to be left without occupation worthy of the cost of its own maintenance, and bound, in the pursuit of its own policy, to dissolve itself as a useless and cumbersome burden to the nation.

But the practical question of the message is not, what degree of protection ought to be extended to any branch of the national industry, but what degree of protection, by the existing laws, it ought not to exceed. And the principle is thus laid down by way of introduction, to a recommendation that the protection actually granted by the existing laws to a particular interest, namely, that of the manufactures should be gradually diminished—if, upon investigation, it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to that interest is greater than is indispensably requisite for these objects, that is, for counteracting the regulations of foreign nations, and for securing a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war.

To this inquiry and investigation the subscribers would interpose no objection whatever, provided that the same investigation shall be instituted to ascertain whether the protection granted by existing laws to other great though partial interests, namely, to the southern planter and western settler, to the merchant and the mariner, do not exceed what may be indispensably requisite for counteracting the regulations of foreign nations, and for securing the independence and safety of the nation. The investigation, to be just and impartial, must extend equally to all the interests protected by the expenditure of the national revenues; and if the standard of inquiry shall be the smallest possible amount of protection indispensable to the manufacturers, let the same standard, the smallest possible amount indispensable to the planter and the settler, the merchant and mariner, be applied to the estimates of expenditure to be hereafter bestowed upon them.

But the subscribers cannot forbear to call the attention of the house, and of the nation, to the formal abandonment, in the message, of the very principle of just and lawful protection to the manufacturing interest laid down by itself. Scarcely has the circle of litigation been drawn round the unquestionable duty of the government to protect the manufactures by its laws, when, by a most remarkable instance of self-contradiction, the message abandons its own principle, and substitutes another and a totally different one in its stead. "Those (it now says), who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country, must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war." The subscribers will not scrutinize, with logical acuteness, the further limitations, even of this measure, which may be detected in the subsequent qualifications of this diminished standard; nor inquire how the indefiniteness of a "reasonable scale and of a liberal support" can be applied to a list of articles indispensable to the safety of the nation. Articles indispensable to the safety of a nation would seem to admit of little latitude in the formation of their catalogue; nor can much commendation be due to the liberality which provides for its own indispensable necessities—but it is to the principle itself that the subscribers deem it their duty to take exception, as utterly inconsistent with that which had been just before laid down; as abandoning the future interests of domestic industry to the mercy of foreign legislation, leagued with foreign competition; and, finally, as consigning all the great manufacturing establishments of the country to speedy and inevitable destruction.

In this last proposition, as in the recommendation to give away all the public lands, the house and the country cannot fail to discern a projected revolution of government. When the very first act of congress, after the organization of the new government, that appears upon the statute book of the United States, declared the necessity that duties should be laid on goods, wares and merchandises imported, the purposes to be accomplished by that act were declared to be the support of government, the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures. Thus, from the very foundation of this government—from the day when George Washington was first inaugurated as president of the United States, the protection, ay, and the encouragement, of manufactures has formed one of the fundamental objects of the national policy. But here, in the compass of one short page of this message, we are told, first, that the protection afforded by existing laws to any branches of the national industry, should not exceed what may be necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign nations, and to secure a supply of those articles of manufacture essential to the national independence and safety in time of war. This, we are told, is, in justice, due in effecting the adjustment of the future revenue to the interest of the different states, and even the preservation of the union itself. And, in the next breath, we are told that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war. The principle of affording encouragement to manufactures, proclaimed in the first act of the first congress, is discarded. The protection to be gradually diminished is the protection of existing laws. The revenue is to be reduced, not merely for adaptation to the necessities of the public expenditures, but with the express object and design of discouragement to manufactures, by diminishing the protection which they enjoy; nor is this discouragement to cease, till all the protection which now shields them from the deadly hostility of foreign competitors, dictating the death warrants of foreign legislation, shall be withdrawn, and the niggardly boon of protection shall be denied to all but articles of indispensable necessity to safety in time of war.

It is, therefore, a revolution in the government which the message now proposes. It is the adoption for the future of a system of policy directly opposite to that with which the administration of Washington laid the foundations of the social existence of this great community—our national and federal union. Those foundations were, that all the great interests of the nation were alike entitled to defence and protection by the national arm, and from the national purse. And to the interest of manufactures was the first pledge of encouragement and protection self imposed by the good faith of the nation. That pledge is now, by the recommendations of this message, to be withdrawn. The government is to be reduced to a simple machine, and its operations of superintending beneficence are to be unfelt. The great body of the manufacturers, including the numerous classes of mechanics, handicraftsmen, and artificers, and with them great multitudes of cultivators of the soil, though not that best part of the population, the independent freeholders, all the hard-working men, in short, the laboring part of the exclusively free population of the country, are to be turned out of the paternal mansion, cast off as worthless children of the common parent, and surrendered to the mercy of foreign laws, enacted for the express purpose of feeding foreign mouths with the bread denied by our simplified machine of government to them.

Under that system of policy, thus now proposed to be abandoned and proscribed, the nation has risen from a depth of weakness, imbecility and distress, to an eminence of prosperity unexampled in the annals of the world. It has flourished in despite of all foreign competition, and all foreign legislation, whether in peace or at war. It has flourished by the undeviating pursuit of that very policy, which we are now urged to abandon and to proscribe. It was by counter legislation to the regulations of foreign nations, that the first operations of the government of the United States were felt by their people; felt, in the activity given to their commerce—felt, in the encouragement and protection extended to their manufactures—felt, in the fulfilment of the public engagements to the creditors of the nation—felt, in the gradual, though the subscribers grieve to say yet imperfect, discharge of the debt of justice and of gratitude due to the warriors of the revolution—felt, in the rapid increase of our population, in the constantly and profitably occupied industry of the people, in the consideration and respect of foreign nations for our character—in the comfort, and well being, and happiness of the community—felt, in every nerve and sinew, in every vein and artery of the body politic. That for this government the proposition should now be earnestly pressed upon congress to substitute another, the supreme excellence of which shall consist in its being unfelt, when we look to the source from which the exhortation proceeds, cannot but move our special wonder. The subscribers can have no partiality for a government, founded upon the consideration that the benefit of its operations shall be unfelt.

From the great manufacturing interest of this country, then, and from all the interests, whether agricultural or commercial, indissolubly linked with it, the protection of the national laws, now existing, is so far as they are or may be affected by foreign regulations, by the recommendations of the message, to be gradually withdrawn: and protection is hereafter to be limited to one specific class of articles of manufactures, under the denomination of articles indispensable to the safety of the nation in time of war. The subscribers ask, what is the reason for this distinction; and what are the articles thus to be distinguished with pre-eminence and permanent favor? Why is protection, why is this specific mode of protection, by high and prohibitory duties, upon the article when imported from abroad, to be extended to articles indispensable to the national safety in time of war, when it is at the same time to be denied to all others? The protection of high duties is founded upon the principle of shielding the domestic manufacturer from the ruinous competition of foreigners, producers of the same article. This principle is founded, not upon the nature or uses of the article, but upon the right of the citizen to protection, pledged to him by the social compact, the correlative obligation of his country to him, for his duty and obligation of allegiance to her. Why is the planter of the south, and the new settler of the west, entitled to the protection of the nation, at the cost of many annual millions, to maintain an army to make that protection effective? Why, but because that planter and that settler are bound in allegiance to that country whose protection they are thereby entitled to claim? Why are the merchant, the mariner, the fisherman, entitled to protection, and why is a navy maintained at the cost of annual millions to make that protection effective? Because the merchant, the mariner, the fisherman, owe their allegiance to the country which protects them. This protection is due to them in peace as well as in war: else why do you maintain an army and a navy in time of peace? The manufacturer is entitled to the same protection from his country as the planter, as the new settler, as the merchant, as the mariner, as the fisherman, and for the same reason—because he owes to that country his allegiance. He hears his portion of the burden of expenditures, sustained by the nation to maintain an army and a navy for the protection of interests which are not his. He has a right to claim the same protection to his own. It is the right of the citizen, and not the necessities of the community, which constitutes the fundamental principle, upon which the obligation to protect the interest of the manufacturer, or of any other member of society, is incumbent upon the nation. The subscribers believe, therefore, that the distinction between articles of manufacture indispensable to the safety of the nation in time of war, and other articles, cannot in any manner affect the right of the manufacturer to protection, or the duty of the government to extend it. It is the interest of the citizen, and not the wants of the country, which circumscribes the legitimate objects of protection. In the formation of the social compact, undoubtedly the safety and independence of the whole are the ultimate object of every engagement undertaken by the community to protect the interests of every one of its parts; but that safety and independence are to be secured as much by the protection of interests, contributing to her well-being in time of peace, as by that of securing to herself a supply of the instruments of death, necessary for a battle or a siege.

But were the distinction assumed in the message, of discriminating between articles of manufacture, indispensable to the safety of the nation in time of war, and other articles, with reference to the respective rights of each of the classes to temporary or permanent protection, just, why is this specific mode of protection, high duties upon the imported article, recommended? If the object to be attained is to secure an abundant supply of the articles, the policy of the government would seem to be, rather to admit them free of impost, and even to encourage the importation of them by bounties than to burden them with onerous duties. The articles of most indispensable necessity in time of war, are articles of little or no use in time of peace. The policy of erecting and supporting manufactures of them in time of peace, that is, at a time when, from their very nature and from the slender demand for them, they must be obtainable from abroad upon the cheapest terms, and when you have little or no demand or use for the articles which you thus deliberately make costly to you beyond all necessity or reason, seems to be exceedingly questionable. You saddle with burdensome taxation articles which you might obtain almost gratuitously from abroad; you tax yourselves to pay enormously dear for articles which you compel yourselves to buy, which you do not want, and for which you have no use, because the time may come when you will want them; and then you choose to have them made by your own citizen, and by no foreigner—when the very tax that you impose, would supply you from abroad with stores of the articles sufficient for a ten years' war, at less cost than you now lavish upon your manufacturer to furnish you the same supply. Again, it may very reasonably be questioned, whether in the present or in any possible future condition of this country, and of the rest of the world, any article of domestic manufacture whatever can be essential to the independence or safety of the nation in the sense that it must necessarily be manufactured within the country, and not imported from abroad. Assume the broad principle that the independence and safety of a nation are highly promoted and rendered effective by her possessing within herself all the resources essential to the subsistence, the comfort, and the enjoyments of her people in war and in peace, and the subscribers give to it their hearty assent—and from this principle they derive the firm belief that sound policy requires of the nation the constant perpetual protection of the manufacturing interest generally, as the duties of the social compact impose the same protection upon her, as a duty to the citizen manufacturer. Narrow down your protective system to a mere list of contraband of war, and you not only load the nation with burdens, utterly useless to herself when she bears them, inadequate to your purpose in the very contingency for which you would provide, but you put to the ban a vast multitude of the free laborers of the country, and involve yourselves in the inextricable absurdity of holding the nation bound to foster and encourage the arts of war, and to prostrate and sacrifice the arts of peace.

The subscribers are then convinced that the principle broadly laid down in the message, "that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war," is erroneous and unsound. They remark that this is the first time that such a policy has ever been suggested by any chief of the executive government to congress, from the establishment of the constitution to this day, and that it is proposed avowedly to subvert the system of policy which has hitherto invariably prevailed. Alarmed at the violation of rights and at the desolation of property which it portends in a special manner to the great mass of their constituents, they seek in the message itself the arguments by which this novel plan of government is attempted to be sustained. They are aware that it flows very naturally and directly from the fundamental maxim, that the wealthy land-holders, cultivators of the soil, are the best part of the population. That it is entirely congenial to the determined purpose of abolishing the national bank. That it tallies exactly with the proposal to give away all the public lands, to multiply the best part of the population. That it is in perfect coincidence with the proposal to abandon gradually all appropriations for internal improvements, to sell all the stocks held by the government in the funds of incorporated companies, and then to reduce the duties of impost to a simple, economical revenue standard.

And, in carrying out this system to its inevitable consequences, it is apparent that, when all this shall have been done, the same spirit of simplicity and reform will command that the army should be disbanded, because its only use is to protect one portion of the community at the expense of all the rest; that the navy should be gradually diminished, and ultimately abolished; because the degree of protection which it extends to the commerce and navigation of the country, may exceed what shall be indispensably necessary to counteract the regulations of foreign powers; and, finally, that the government of the union, simplified into a machine of total uselessness and inability to protect any great interest of the nation, should dissolve itself into its original elements, and vanish—the baseless fabric of a vision.

The subscribers believe that to secure to the nation during war, a supply of all the articles necessary to the subsistence, comfort, and well-being of the people, is one of the objects which require and command the protection of manufactures generally, as one of the great duties of the nation itself. But to limit the policy of protection to the articles of domestic manufacture indispensable to our safety in time of war, is tantamount to the denial of all protection to every article, excepting those the want of which and the uses of which are applicable only to the state of war. Food and raiment are articles indispensable to the safety of a nation in war as well as in peace. If it were meant that all articles of domestic manufacture, serving for food or raiment, should be entitled to the permanent and ultimate protection of the national government, the limitation itself presented by the message would be nugatory. With that understanding all the manufactures of woollen and of cotton would have an equal claim to permanent protection with those of iron, lead, or copper. The necessities of the nation in time of war furnish an unanswerable argument for the protection of its manufactures—of all its manufactures in time of peace. This is the sound principle. The attempt to draw a line of distinction between articles indispensable to our safety in time of war, and all other articles, with a view to confer the exclusive privilege of permanent protection upon the former, and to withdraw all protection from the latter, must be utterly deceptive, and, if carried out into practice, could terminate only in gross injustice.

In the report of the committee of ways and means, which accompanied their bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports, it is said that they have endeavored to arrange the duties with reference to the principle of raising twelve millions and a half of revenue upon from sixty-five to seventy millions of dutiable commodities, at rates of from ten to twenty per cent. varying from them chiefly in those instances where national independence in time of war seemed to demand some sacrifice in peace, (as in the case of iron.) Thus iron is the only article specified by the committee of ways and means as entitled to extraordinary and permanent protection, by heavy duties of impost, to defend the article of domestic production from the competition of importation from abroad—and the explicitification in their bill is, to shield the article of iron, by duties five or six times heavier than the fragment of impost to which they abandon the articles of wool, woollens, and cotton fabrics. But this favoritism extended to the article of iron, is founded upon a misapplication of the principle upon which it professes to rely. The only reason which makes it an object of importance to the nation, to possess within itself a supply of articles of exclusive use and necessity in times and for purposes of war, is because the supply of those articles from abroad, in time of war, may be cut off or greatly obstructed by the power of the enemy. Of all other articles, the supply may be as abundant from abroad in time of war, by the conveyance of neutral flags, as in time of peace. The articles usually denominated contraband of war, may be intercepted by the enemy, and cannot be protected by the neutral flag. The list of these articles of contraband is usually regulated by treaties. The number of them, as recognized by the customary law of nations, independent of treaty stipulations, is very unsettled. Great Britain, being almost always a belligerent nation, and possessed of preponderating power upon the ocean, has, in latter times, constantly struggled to enlarge the list, by including in it not merely the fabricated instruments of warlike destruction, such as cannon, muskets, swords, pikes, bombs, grenades, and the like, but provisions, and the materials especially for ship building. All the other maritime nations, on their part, endeavor to contract the list of contraband, and confine it to articles actually wrought and manufactured, and used only and exclusively for war. We have had treaties both with France and Great Britain, each containing a list of articles to be understood between the parties as contraband of war. The treaties with France contain the most contracted, and the treaty of 19th November, 1794, with Great Britain, the largest list of contraband that has ever been claimed by modern belligerent nations; and it so happens that, in both these treaties, unwrought iron is expressly excluded from the list of contraband. No nation has ever pretended that it was or should be included in that list. The supply of it from abroad cannot, therefore, be intercepted by the enemy in time of war, and there is no reason whatever for protecting by high duties the domestic production of it against the foreign competitor, other than the reason common to all other articles or productions of domestic industry. It stands upon the same footing with all the rest, and has no claim whatever to superior protection, from its being merely the principal material from which the instruments of death are composed. It is, therefore, extreme injustice to all other articles of domestic growth or manufacture, to withdraw from them their just share of protection, to heap it upon the solitary article of iron.

The subscribers, therefore, believe that the principle itself advanced in the message, and illustrated by the recommendation gradually to withdraw from the manufactures of the country all the protection which they enjoy by the existing laws of the United States, with the single exception of the articles indispensably necessary for the national independence and safety in time of war, is incorrect, unjust and unconstitutional. They believe that protection, permanent protection to the interest of domestic industry, including agriculture, manufactures, and the mechanic arts, is a right secured to the citizens whose property and subsistence depend upon that protection, by the constitution itself, as well as by the laws; that the withdrawal from them of that protection, would be the denial to them of a constitutional right, and equivalent to a sentence of banishment upon them. In saying this, the subscribers do not deny the right of the government to modify this protection by an adjustment of the revenue to the necessary public expenditures. They object neither to the reduction of the revenue, nor to the reduction of duties of imposts; both these operations may be effected without impairing the protection enjoyed by domestic industry, and they are precisely the operations which it is at this time the duty of the government of the United States to perform.

The recommendation of the message, gradually to withdraw from the manufactures the protection which they enjoy by existing laws, appears to the subscribers the more exceptionable, as it obviously countenances the principles asserted, as well as the attitude assumed of hostility to the manufacturing interest, and of defiance to the government of the union, under the shield of state sovereignty, by popular commotion in one of the members of the union. Before the message was delivered, a convention, assuming to represent the people of South Carolina, and to exercise, in their name, as absolute, unlimited, and therefore, despotic power of sovereignty, had issued an ordinance, declaring and ordaining that all the several acts and parts of acts of the congress of the United States, for imposing duties and imposts on the importation of foreign commodities, and now having actual operation and effect within the United States, were null, void, and no law, nor binding upon the state of South Carolina, its officers or citizens.

And the same convention, by the same ordinance, had ordered that all promises, contracts, and obligations, made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, with purpose to secure the duties imposed by the said acts, and all judicial proceedings which should be thereafter had in affirmance thereof, were, and should be, held utterly null and void.

The same convention had further ordained that it should not be lawful for any of the constituted authorities, whether of the state of South Carolina, or of the United States, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the said acts of congress within the limits of that state; that it should be the duty of the legislature to adopt such measures, and pass such acts, as might be necessary to prevent the enforcement, and arrest the operation of the said acts, and parts of acts, of the congress of the United States, within the limits of that state, from and after the first day of February next.

The same convention had further ordained that all the officers of the state, civil or military, except members of the legislature, should take an oath to obey, execute, and enforce the said ordinance, and such act or acts of the legislature as might be passed in pursuance thereof; that the officers of every individual who should omit or neglect to take this oath, should be, thereby, ipso facto, vacated; and that no juror should be empanelled in any of the courts of the state, in any case in which should be in question the ordinance, or any act of the legislature passed in pursuance thereof, unless he should, first, in addition to the usual oath, have taken an oath to obey, execute, and enforce the ordinance, and all acts of the legislature to carry the same into operation and effect.

And the same convention, speaking as the people of South Carolina, further declared, that they would consider any act on the part of the federal government to enforce the laws thus nullified, otherwise than through the civil tribunals of the country, as inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the union; that they would therefore hold themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connexion with the people of the other states, and would forthwith proceed to organize a separate government, and do all other acts and things which sovereign and independent states might of right do.

This ordinance was issued, bearing date the 24th day of November. Ten days after which, on the 4th of December, the message of the president, after noticing that, in one quarter of the United States, opposition to the revenue laws had risen to a height which threatened to thwart their execution, if not to endanger the integrity of the union, observes, that whatever obstructions may be thrown in the way of the judicial authorities of the general government, it was hoped they would be able, peaceably, to overcome them by the prudence of their own officers, and the patriotism of the people. But that, should this reasonable hope be disappointed, it was believed the laws themselves were fully adequate to the suppression of such attempts as might be immediately made; and that, should the exigency arise, rendering the execution of the existing laws impracticable, from any cause whatever, prompt notice of it would be given to congress, with the suggestion of such views and measures as might be necessary to meet it.

The subscribers could not but observe with concern and surprise, that, in a message delivered at a time when the above-mentioned ordinance of the South Carolina convention had been ten days issued, and when its contents had been several days fully known in this city, the condition of things, and the opposition to the execution of the laws of the United States in the state of South Carolina, was described in terms so inadequate, as appeared to them, to the real magnitude of the crisis in the affairs of the union. A document purporting to be the act of the sovereign people of South Carolina—an act of sovereignty so transcendent, as to speak in the language of command to the legislature of the state, as to prescribe oaths to be taken by the existing officers, civil and military, of the state, on the penalty of forfeiting their offices—an act of an authority, spurning, as beneath it, the ties of morality, and assuming to annul existing promises, contracts, and obligations—an act, first depriving the civil tribunals, both of the state and of the United States, of the power of performing their judicial functions, and then declaring that the first effort of the federal government to enforce the laws of the union, otherwise than through the judicial tribunals, should be the signal to the state of South Carolina for dissolving her connexion with this union, and forming a separate government—this act, accompanied with addresses to the people of the state, and of the other twenty-three states, declaring that it was the fixed and unalterable determination of the people of South Carolina never more to submit to a protecting tariff, must have been in the possession of the president at the time when his message was communicated to the two houses of congress. Only six days after the delivery of this annual message, the proclamation emanating from the same source, was published to the world, founded, as appears on its face, upon the ordinance alone, which had thus been in the president's possession before the message was sent to congress. It would seem that the recommendations of the message were so nearly identical with the terms condescendingly proposed as a concession by the authors of the ordinance for the future revenue system of the union, which South Carolina would graciously consent to prescribe, that an expectation was entertained that, on the receipt of the message in South Carolina, the nullifying ordinance would immediately be abrogated. And, indeed, upon an attentive comparison of the recommendations of the chief magistrate with the autocratic concessions of the South Carolina nullifying convention, there will be found between them a shade of difference so nearly imperceptible, that this expectation was not destitute of foundation. To the subscribers this affords but a source of deeper mortification, upon perceiving that formal recommendation in the message of a gradual, and, ultimately, total withdrawal of all legislative protection from all the manufactures of the country, excepting only those articles indispensably necessary to the safety and independence of the nation in time of war; an exception so strangely expounded in the report and bill of the committee of ways and means, to mean unwrought iron.

The proclamation did, indeed, take a direct and formal issue with the nullifying convention, upon both the articles of fundamental law, by virtue of which that assemblage asserted their right to exercise sovereign despotic authority in the name of the people of South Carolina. The proclamation denied the right of the people of South Carolina to nullify the laws of the United States. It denied the right of the state of South Carolina to secede from that union, to which the people and state of South Carolina, by the pledge of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, in the Declaration of Independence, and by their own solemn accession to the constitution of the United States, had bound themselves and their good faith, in the face of God and man. To both these principles of the proclamation the subscribers assent and adhere; and the clear and indisputable consequence from them is, that the South Carolina convention was an unlawful and unconstitutional assembly, and their ordinance an unlawful and unconstitutional act—null and void in itself, and the enforcement of which, by physical power, would be levying war against the United States.

The duties incumbent upon the president of the United States in this emergency, and the deep responsibility by which he is bound to the performance of them, are fully and unequivocally set forth in the proclamation. The sense of those duties was profoundly impressed upon the mind of its author. The subscribers deem it altogether unnecessary, and irrelevant to the present state of this country, to inquire by whom or when, or for what purpose, the absurd doctrines of nullification and secession were first gotten up and promulgated. They well know that those doctrines never can be carried out in practice; but by a dissolution of the union. The consummation of either of them must, in itself, be a dissolution of the union. If any organized power, under any circumstances whatever, in any one state, can nullify the laws of congress, then has the union no legislative, and consequently no judicial or executive power. The government is ipso facto dissolved, and the union must crumble to atoms with it. If any one state can at its pleasure secede from the union, every other state must possess the same power; and the constitution of the United States, instead of being a compact ordained and established by the people, to secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty, is but a partnership of corporate bodies without posterity, without soul, without faith, and ready to trample under foot, as is done by the ordinance of the South Carolina convention, its own promises, contracts and obligations, as well as those of others, or the laws of the land. Resistance against certain laws of the United States, even under the authority of single state governments, has more than once been attempted. The doctrines of nullification and secession have more than once been asserted or countenanced by resolutions of particular state legislatures; but this is the first example since the establishment of the constitution, when a formal organization of the power of the people of a state has been accomplished, not only for the avowed purpose of resisting the laws of congress, but of annihilating the whole system of revenue laws, of dictating to the whole union a new fiscal code, and of interdicting with a sentence of outlawry the protection secured by the constitution and the laws to at least one-third part of the people.

The subscribers cannot but lament that the president of the United States, with this ordinance in his hand, with a full knowledge of its whole import, and with a thorough conviction of the duties which it devolved upon him, in defence of the constitution and laws of the union, should, by the whole tenor of his annual message, and especially by the recommendation gradually to withdraw from the manufacturing establishments the protection which they enjoy by the existing laws, have given so much countenance and encouragement to the most unjust claims and most groundless pretensions of the South Carolina convention.

There is an aspect in which this controversy must be considered, and in which the subscribers believe it was peculiarly incumbent on the president, as the chief magistrate of the whole people, to withhold all countenance or shadow of support from those pretensions.

The foundation of the complaints, alleged by the South Carolina convention as the justifying cause of their extraordinary proceedings, is a collision of sectional interests between the slave-holding and the exclusively free portions of the union. The allegation is, that the protection extended to domestic industry by the imposition of duties upon the productions of the like industry imported from abroad, necessarily operates to produce inequality in the burden of taxation upon the free and upon the slave-holding portions of the people, to the disadvantage and oppression of the latter: that whatever of taxation is levied by impost upon manufactures and free labor, is more than repaid by this protection; that it becomes thereby their interest to increase the protecting duties instead of reducing them; and that, as the labor of slaves cannot be applied to manufactures, and as the agricultural products of the south derive no benefit from this protection, the ultimate result of the impost system is to make it at once a tax upon the slave-holder of the south, and a bounty to the free laborer of the north.

This statement of the case presents two prominent points of consideration. The foundation of the argument is an irreconcilable opposition of interests between two of the great masses of population constituting the union.

1. This opposition of interests is geographical, the division line being that between the states where the population is entirely free, and those where the population consists of masters and slaves; the divisions are of north and south.

2. It is an opposition of interests between servile and free labor.

The subscribers believe these positions to be very far from correct; but they deem it not necessary to discuss them here; they are the positions upon which the whole system of the proceedings of South Carolina is founded, and as such they must be considered.

It cannot be denied that in a community spreading over a large extent of territory, and politically founded upon the principles proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, but differing so widely in the elements of their social condition, that the inhabitants of one-half the territory are wholly free, and those of the other half divided into masters and slaves, deep, if not irreconcilable collisions of interest must abound. The question whether such a community can exist under one common government, is a subject of profound, philosophical speculation in theory. Whether it can continue long to exist, is a question to be solved only by the experiment now making by the people of this union, under that national compact, the constitution of the United States.

At the formation of the constitution itself, these collisions of interest presented themselves at the threshold. No sooner was the representation of the people in the popular branch of the legislature to be adjusted, than it arose. It is one of the first principles of republican freedom, that the representation of the people should be proportioned to their numbers. It is another, that the taxation of the people should be proportioned to their numbers and their property. But here was a community, one-half of whom held it for a principle that all popular representation should be proportioned to the numbers of the people, while the other half held a third part of their own numbers as the property of the other two-thirds. They claimed, therefore, that, in the popular branch of the legislature, they should be privileged with a representation, not only of their numbers, but of their property—of their living machinery.

Here was a great, and, it would seem, an irreconcilable collision of interests between the aggregate parties to the compact under deliberation. How was it adjusted? By concession from the northern and wholly free states. They consented, that while in this hall, in the popular branch of the legislature, they themselves should have a representation proportioned to only their numbers, the slave-holders of the south, should, in addition to their proportional numbers, have a representation here for three-fifths of their living property—of their machinery. What was the equivalent for this concession? A provision that direct taxation should be levied under this constitution, in the same compound proportion of numbers in the free, and of numbers and property in the slave-holding states.

The basis of this compromise between great conflicting interests was, that the proportion of representation in the popular branch of the legislature, and the proportional burden of direct taxation, should be greater in the southern than in the northern, or, in other words, greater in the slave-holding than in the free states. Such was the compromise in principle; how has it operated in practice?

The representation of the slave population in this house has, from the establishment of the constitution of the United States, amounted to rather more than one-tenth of the whole number. In the present congress, it is equivalent to twenty-two votes; in the next congress, it will amount to twenty-five. This is a combined and concentrated power, always operating to the support and exclusive favor of the slave-holding interest, and against that northern free interest which is protected by the duties of impost. This privilege of representation for property has been always enjoyed by the slave-holding states, from the establishment of the constitution to this day; and they will continue to enjoy it as long as the constitution shall remain in force. But it was not enjoyed by them under the confederation, nor can they ever enjoy it under any confederation of states. But while their enjoyment of the privilege under the constitution is constant and unremitting, the correlative and equivalent privilege of lighter direct taxation has been effective to the free states only twice, and for very short periods, in the forty-five years that the constitution has existed. The history of the union has afforded a continual proof that this representation of property, which they enjoy, as well in the election of president and vice president of the United States, as upon the floor of the house of representatives, has secured to the slave-holding states the entire control of the national policy, and almost without exception the possession of the highest executive office of the union. Always united in the purpose of regulating the affairs of the whole union by the standard of the slave-holding interest, their disproportionate numbers in the electoral colleges have enabled them, in ten out of twelve quadrennial elections, to confer the chief magistracy upon one of their own citizens. Their suffrages at every election, without exception, have been almost exclusively confined to a candidate of their own caste. Availing themselves of the divisions which, from the nature of man, always prevail in communities entirely free, they have sought and found auxiliaries in the other quarters of the union, by associating the passions of parties, and the ambition of individuals, with their own purposes, to establish and maintain throughout the confederated nation the slave-holding policy. The office of vice president, a station of high dignity, but of little other than contingent power, had been usually, by their indulgence, conceded to a citizen of the other section; but even this political courtesy was superseded at the election before the last, and both the offices of president and vice president of the United States were, by the preponderancy of the slave-holding votes, bestowed upon citizens of two adjoining and both slave-holding states. At this moment, the president of the United States, the president of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives and the chief justice of the United States, are all citizens of that favored portion of the united republic. The last of these offices, being, under the constitution, held by the tenure of good behavior, has been honored and dignified by the occupation of the present incumbent upwards of thirty years. An overruling sense of the high responsibilities under which it is held, has effectually guarded him from permitting the sectional slave-holding spirit to ascend the tribunal of justice; and it is not difficult to discern, in this unflexible impartiality, the source of the obloquy which that same spirit has not been inactive in attempting to excite against the supreme court of the United States itself, and of the insuperable aversion of the votaries of nullification to encounter or abide by the decision of that tribunal, the true and legitimate umpire of constitutional, controverted law.

The disproportionate numbers of the slave-holding representation in the house of representatives have secured to it the absolute control of the general policy of the government, and especially over the fiscal system, the revenues and expenditures of the nation. At the first establishment of the government, it was the slave-holding interest which dictated the principle that the public revenues should be raised, not by direct taxes, but by impost. Had direct taxation been resorted to, the very letter of the constitution prescribed that a heavier burden of it should fall upon them than upon the states where no slaves existed. The selection of impost, as the exclusive mode of taxation for raising revenue, was made and dictated by them, and for their special benefit. But they were then willing that, in raising the revenue, some protection should be extended to domestic industry. It had not occurred to them yet, that, by their disproportionate numbers in the popular branch of the legislature, they could exclude all the free labor of the country entirely from the protection of the law.

Under that protection, the industry of freedom has thriven and flourished. Often checked and retarded by that preponderant system of policy which the slave-holding interest, by its disproportionate representation in the general government, was always enabled to prescribe, and to which the labor of the free was compelled to submit, a right to some protection, under the compact of constitutional union, had never been denied to it. Sparingly, scantily, and grudgingly as it was dispensed, still the right to protection was conceded; and, in the raising of the revenue, actual protection was, to some degree, yielded. Free labor received its reward; but its prosperity never exceeded that of the slave-holder, nor was the protection which it enjoyed ever equal or comparable to that secured to the slave-holding interest, both by the constitution and the laws.

In this condition of the common country, with the slave-holding interest in possession of all the highest offices of dignity and power, legislative, executive and judicial, a discovery is suddenly made in South Carolina—the only state of the union in which the slave population largely outnumbers the free, and where, consequently, six-tenths of the people are the property of the other four-tenths—there it is that the discovery bursts upon the nation, that duties of impost, levied for the protection of free labor, are unconstitutional; that domestic industry has no right to the protection of existing laws; and that all the revenue laws are palpable violations of the constitution of the United States. Upon the heel of this discovery comes immediately the fixed and irrevocable determination, that free labor shall no longer and never more enjoy this protection of the law. And how is this determination carried into effect? A convention of the people—that is to say, of rather more than one-half the four-tenths of the owners of the rest—a convention, representing, at the utmost, one hundred and fifty thousand souls, and, of course, less in numbers than three-fourths of the single city of New York, is assembled—itsself unconstitutionally constituted, and assembled in defiance of the fundamental laws both of the union and of the state. It assumes, in the broad face of day, the exercise of absolute, despotic, irresistible, uncontrollable power; nullifies the whole code of revenue laws of the United States; dissolves contracts, promises, obligations, sanctioned by solemn appeals to God; prescribes oaths, as abhorrent to the pure intelligence of the being invoked to attest them, as to the souls of those upon whom they are imposed; declares the people of South Carolina absolved from all their ties of allegiance and fidelity to their country; annihilates the judicial tribunals of the union within the state; and then declares that, if an attempt is made to execute the laws of the union, otherwise than through those annihilated tribunals, South Carolina will secede from that union to which her fathers pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor: from that union she will secede, and constitute herself a supreme, sovereign, feudal dominion of despotic, irresistible, and uncontrollable power. Since the attempt of the Titans to scale the throne of heaven, so bold an enterprise was never conceived. Since the project of the builders on the plain of Shinar to make themselves a name, lest they should be scattered abroad upon the whole earth, so gallant an exploit was never undertaken. And it was this moment, when rebellion was stalking forth under the worse than Gorgon shield of state sovereignty, that the president of the United States chose, for recommending to the insulted, vilified, and contemned legislative authority of the union, tamely to yield, in substance, to this overbearing pretension, and gradually to withdraw from the manufacturing establishments, with some vague and indefinite exceptions, the whole protection of the existing laws.

It has been seen that by the constitution of the United States, the right of representation in the popular branch of the legislature, and in the colleges of electors to the offices of president and vice president of the United States, is unequally divided between the northern and southern, or, in other words, the free and the slave-holding states; that while the free states are represented only according to their numbers, the slave-holders are represented also for their property; and that the equivalent for this privilege is, that they shall bear in like manner a heavier burden of all direct taxation. That by the ascendancy which their excess of representation gives them in the enactment of the laws, they have invariably, in times of peace, excluded all direct taxation, and thereby enjoyed their excess of representation, without any equivalent whatever. This is, in substance, an evasion of the bilateral provision in the constitution. It gives it an operation entirely one-sided. It is a privilege of the southern and slave-holding sections of the union, without any equivalent to the northern and north western freemen whatever.

It is not a little extraordinary that this new pretension of South Carolina, the state which above all others enjoys this unrequited privilege of excessive representation, released from all payment of the direct taxes, of which her proportion would be nearly double that of any non-slave-holding state, should proceed from that very complaint that she bears an unequal proportion of duties of imposts, which, by the constitution of the United States, are required to be uniform throughout the union. Vermont, with a free population of 280,000 souls, has five representatives in the popular house of congress, and seven electors for president and vice president. South Carolina, with a free population of less than 260,000 souls, sends nine members to the house of representatives, and honors the governor of Virginia with eleven votes for the office of president of the United States. If the rule of representation were the same for South Carolina and for Vermont, they would have the same number of representatives in the house, and the same number of electors for the choice of president and vice president. She has nearly double the number of both. Were a direct tax now to be levied, to which South Carolina herself could not object as unconstitutional, her proportion of it must be just as nearly double that of Vermont, as is the number of her members in the house of representatives. If, by the protection to her farmers, and mechanics, and manufacturers, against the competition of foreign labor, armed with foreign legislations, the men of the Green Mountains find brisker markets for the productions of their toil, if their mountains themselves are clad in a fresher and more perennial verdure; if the very face of nature upon her soil gladdens with the hue of hope, and the smile of joy, at the beneficence of their government, acting in auxiliary subserviency to the beneficence of heaven, while the slave-holder of South Carolina cannot derive so much benefit from the protection of man, because his industry is not his own, and all his profits must be earned by the sweat of another's brow, is this a reason to justify him for tearing to pieces the charter of national freedom by which he is bound to the freemen of Vermont? By the letter of that fundamental compact, his power in the enactment of the laws, to be binding upon both, is nearly twice that of the mountaineer. By the letter of that compact too, were the revenues of the whole community to be levied by direct taxation, his share of contribution must be nearly doubled. With what pretence of reason, therefore, can he complain of a slight inequality bearing upon him; not by the burden of the impost, which is every where the same, but by the princely curse of Omnipotence upon slavery, denying to him the remote and contingent advantage which the free laborer of Vermont derives from the protection of the laws?

The subscribers believe, therefore, that the ground assumed by the South Carolina convention for usurping the sovereign and limitless power of the people of that state, to dictate the laws of the union, and prostrate the legislative, executive and judicial authority of the United States, is, as destitute of foundation as the forms and substance of their proceedings are arrogant, overbearing, tyrannical and oppressive: they believe that one particle of compromise with that usurped power, or of concession to its pretensions, would be a heavy calamity to the people of the whole union, and to none more than to the people of South Carolina themselves. That such concession by congress would be a dereliction of the highest duties to their country, and directly lead to the final and irrefragable dissolution of the union.

That the president of the United States has a deep and just sense of the solemn duties devolving upon him in this great emergency, the subscribers have seen with great and most sincere satisfaction, by his proclamation, and by his message to congress communicating that document, and others issued from the executive department, together with those emanating from the disorganizing faction in South Carolina. It only remains for him to suit the action to the word. Bound by his official oath to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed, those laws have armed him with ample power to discharge that duty so long as the execution of the laws shall meet with no resistance by force. Even that resistance also, he has not been left without means, lawful means, to overpower and subdue. If other means be necessary or expedient, it is the duty of the legislature to invest him with them. But with the usurpations of the South Carolina convention there can be no possible compromise. They must conquer or they must fall.

The subscribers are the more deeply impressed with the conviction that no compromise can be authorized or permitted with the insurrectionary spirit of the documents from South Carolina, because they consider them utterly incompatible with the principles of republican government, and because they believe, with equal confidence, that if met with open front and unyielding energy, there is nothing in this array of rebellion in the slightest degree dangerous, they will not say to the existence, but even to the peace and tranquillity of the union. For a conflict of physical force, which may God in his mercy forbid, but should it unhappily ensue, the parties to it are one hundred and fifty thousand, at the utmost, strong, on one side, and ten millions on the other. But the ordinance of nullification itself, and all the other state papers of this new sovereignty in embryo, professedly disclaim all purpose or intention of resorting to physical force, unless in self-defence. If, in the spirit of county court litigation, they can by quibbles and quibbles of the law, entangle the justice of the union in a net of subtleties, by evasions, repelings and withennams; if by imposing unhalloved and detested oaths upon their own citizens, in violation of their allegiance and obligations to their country—if, by enjoining upon them under heavy penalties, fraud, perjury, the breach of their own promises, contracts and obligations, and the forfeiture of all their civic duties as American freemen, if by all these ingenious and peaceable devices the collection of the revenues of the United States within the state of South Carolina, can be practically and permanently frustrated, the purpose of nullification is accomplished; she asks no more—she draws no sword—she faints at the very sight of blood—she thinks “the sovereign’s” thing on earth, and as a sovereign state, she will administer nothing but parmacuity to heal the inward bruises of the constitution. From the principles announced by the president in his proclamation, and in his recent message, and from all the measures of the government yet adopted in preparation for this exigency, there is no reason to apprehend that force will, in the first instance, be used on the part of the United States. The determination not to yield, is a spirit passive in its nature until aggression provokes it to action. It endures until summoned to resistance in self-defence. In the collision of exasperated passions, it is the temper of aggression that always strikes the first blow. Nullification, in assuming the attitude of self-defence, denies its own nature: it is essentially aggressive, and will assuredly find that it can never accomplish its purpose but by hostile action. So long as it stays its hand, however, the laws of the union will have their execution. The executive minister of the law performs his duty until met by the resistance of physical force, and until then the thunder of the ordinance is but a brutum fulmen. Let the government of the union in all its branches manifest the pure, unaggressive, but firm and inflexible temper of self-defence, and nullification will vanish like a noxious exhalation before the morning sun.

By the constitution of the U. States, it is provided that the U. States shall guaranty to every state in this union a republican form of government. The subscribers believe, with one of the most eminent and virtuous citizens of S. Carolina,* that republican government in that state, ceased, with the ordinance of nullification. It ceased, as he says, “in spirit and in truth.” It ceased even in form—government is the enactment and administration of laws, or it is a dominion of arbitrary power—republican government is a government of laws. The government by will, is not republican government. The constitutions of several of the states, expressly declare the intent of their institution to be, to establish a government of laws and not of men. In these United States, the people, although the true and legitimate source of all political power, have never exercised the powers of government themselves. They delegate power by constitutions of government, all under strict limitations to secure the rights of the citizen from the oppression of arbitrary power. Under these constitutions the legislative, the executive, and the judicial powers are separated from each other, a separation without which, some of them expressly declare, and all tacitly recognize that there can be no enjoyment of liberty. They entrust the power of legislation to two co-ordinate assemblies of men, each operating as a check upon the other, and generally under the further check of a qualified negative in the chief executive magistrate. Such is the constitution of the United States. Such is the constitution of the state of South Carolina. These constitutions are the fundamental laws of the land, protective of the rights of every individual citizen. Under this protection, a convention is assembled, representing a part of the people of South Carolina, but assuming to represent them all—acknowledging no law; affecting the exercise of absolute, irresistible, uncontrollable power, and issues an ordinance annulling the constitution and laws of the United States within the state of South Carolina, commanding the legislature of the state to enact laws in violation of the constitution of the state; absolving the citizens of the state from the fulfilment of their promises, contracts, and obligations; and imposing upon them oaths, which they cannot take without giving the lie to their consciences in the face of God. The convention which issued this ordinance has an existence authorised by the legislature, for a whole year. After giving out this memorable ordinance, it adjourns, to meet again at the convocation of its president. Upon the principles which it assumes as the rule of action for itself, it is invested with the whole sovereign power of the people of South Carolina, subject to no limitation but that of time, and that extending to a whole year. During all that period its authority is paramount to that of the legislature, to the constitution of the state, to the constitution of the United States. It possesses the whole power of the people—legislative, executive, judicial—it may constitute itself a tribunal for the trial of offenders against any ordinance which it may ordain—it may pass sentence of death upon any such offender—it may erect within its hall a guillotine or a gibbet, and execute its own sentences by the hand of its own president. It has passed a law, not only impairing, but nullifying in express terms the obligation of contracts—it may, by the same sovereign power, pass bills of attainder, ex post facto laws—it may proscribe the freedom of the press, the freedom of speech, the freedom of conscience—it may establish a religion, and religious inquisition—it may grant titles of nobility—and lastly, it may invest all these powers in its president, to have, and to hold, and to exercise, to him and the heirs of his body forever. To say that they will not exercise these powers is only to say that they will not thus abuse the power which they claim to possess. It is pure unadulterated despotism—despotism in a single assembly, superseding the protection of the constitution and the laws, guaranteed by the United States to every state in the union, and to all its citizens. During the existence of that convention, the government of South Carolina is not republican. It has no government. It is under the rule of an organized anarchy, with a nominal legislature subordinate to a lawless assemblage of tyrants, calling themselves the people of South Carolina.

It must especially not be forgotten that among the implied, necessarily implied powers, claimed by this convention, is that of enacting laws for the United States—laws paramount even to the constitution of the United States. To repeal a law is to enact a law—to nullify a law is an act of more transcendent authority. The power competent to repeal is competent to enact a law. To nullify a law is an act of superior and paramount authority. The ordinance of South Carolina, nullifying in words only within the limits of that state, the whole code of revenue laws of the United States assumes, in fact, the authority of repealing that whole code throughout the United States. It legislates for the whole union. Submission to it for one instant would recognize an appellate power of legislation, co-extensive with the whole union, in every one of its states. To call such a system anarchy, would be to give it too mild a name. Its usurpation of the most odious character—usurpation of one state over the laws of twenty-three, and brands the state itself as well as the individuals by whom the absurd pretension is raised, with the indelible character of "close ambition varnished o'er with zeal."

From these pretensions the state of South Carolina must desist. The subscribers have no doubt that unless encouraged to persevere in them by some faltering or weakness of concession on the part of the government of the United States, she will desist from them, and thereby redeem herself from the obloquy of a desperate struggle to subdue the whole family of her sisters under the dominion of her own ungovernable will. She must resume her seat in the family circle, from which she has so unadvisedly started, and submit to the laws, which she shared in establishing, until she can persuade her associated equals to concur with her in repealing them. Of this result the subscribers entertain not the slightest doubt, if the clear and indisputable rights of the whole union shall be maintained with becoming perseverance and fortitude by the government of the U. States.

But the subscribers have seen with deep regret that the message upon which it has been their indispensable duty to animadvert, does in its whole purport relating to the administration of the internal affairs of the nation, and most especially in the recommendation to congress gradually to withdraw from the manufacturing establishments of the country, with a vague and indefinite exception, the whole protection of the existing laws, give an alarming encouragement, not only to the unwarrantable proceedings of the South Carolina convention, but to the most extravagant doctrines and outrages of nullification. Connected with the other effective recommendations to abandon all further purposes of national internal improvement, and all future revenues from the public lands, with the hand of ruin raised against credit and currency, in the denunciations of the bank of the U. States, and, at the root of all, the proclamation of the principle that the wealthy land-holders, or, in other words, the slave-holding planters of the south, constitute the best part of the national population, they can perceive nothing other than a complete system of future government for this union directly tending to its dissolution—a system totally adverse to that which has prevailed from the establishment of the constitution, till the day of the delivery of the message—a system altogether sectional in its character, wasteful of the property of the nation, destructive to its commerce, withering to its future improvement, blasting to the manufactures and agriculture of two-thirds of the states, and looking in its ultimate results to sacrifice the labor of the free to pamper with bloated profits the owner of the slave.

The admission in the message, that the laws for the raising of revenue by imposts have been in their operation unequal and oppressive upon the south, the subscribers believe to be utterly without foundation. They have proved that by the constitution of the United States the principle is expressly recognised, that as an equivalent for the privilege of slave representation in the legislature and the electoral colleges, the slave-holders should bear an additional and proportional burden of all direct taxation. It may be that under any possible system of taxation, the owner of slaves may feel the burden of it more heavily than the free man, because he must pay the taxes of his slave as well as his own. All taxation is an assessment upon property—all just taxation bears some proportion to the property of the party taxed. If the rich pays a larger tax than the poor, it is not therefore a tax unequal and oppressive upon the rich. The unequal tax is that which exacts from the poor the same amount of contribution as from the rich. There are, to speak in round numbers, two millions of slaves in this union. At the average value of three hundred dollars a head, they constitute a mass of six hundred millions of dollars of property, all owned in the slave-holding states, who possess, or may if they please possess, all other kinds of property which can be held in the states where slavery is exploded. The slave-holders, therefore, are, as respects the whole union, the rich, and the freemen of the other states are the poor, of the community. The slave-holders own six hundred millions of dollars' worth of wealth more than the inhabitants of the wholly free states. And this property is self productive. It is no breed of barren metal, but a breed of living value—a breed of flesh and blood, of bone and sinew, of productive and profitable labor. Its owners hold it not only as individual property, but as collective political power. It yields them not only the increase of increasing population, equivalent in this country to a compound interest of three per cent. a year. It yields them not only the fruits of all the industry of two millions of human beings, but it yields them, collectively, twenty-five representatives in one branch of the common legislature, and upwards of thirty votes of two hundred and eighty-eight electors of president and vice president of the U. States. Upon what principle of natural justice or equity can the holders of this property pretend that they will not contribute to the revenues of the nation, more than the freeman who holds no such property, and enjoys no such representation.

It has been seen that with a free population of 280,000 souls, Vermont sends to the national house of representatives only five members, while South Carolina, with a like population of less than 280,000, sends nine—New Hampshire, with a free population of 270,000, sends only five. In the year 1813, under the third census, Vermont and New Hampshire had each six members in the house of representatives, and South Carolina the same number as at present, and as she will have under the new census, that is, nine.

In the direct tax of the year 1813, the sum apportioned to the state of New Hampshire was ninety-six thousand seven hundred and ninety-three dollars thirty-seven cents—that upon the state of Vermont was ninety-eight thousand three hundred and forty-three dollars and seventy-one cents—that upon the state of South Carolina was one hundred and fifty-one thousand nine hundred and five dollars and forty-eight cents.

If the fifteen millions of annual revenue, which are supposed by the report of the secretary of the treasury to be necessary for the wants of the government, and were proposed by the report of the committee of ways and means to be levied as a permanent revenue, should now be raised by a direct tax, the sum apportioned for its payment to the state of New Hampshire would fall a little short of four hundred thousand dollars—that to the state of Vermont would a little exceed the same amount. The sum apportioned to the state of South Carolina would be upwards of seven hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars, very little short of those of the two states of New Hampshire and Vermont together. Is there a human being who can imagine that the people of S. Carolina will pay, of fifteen millions levied by impost, an amount approaching to that which will be paid by the people of Vermont and of New Hampshire united? In strict justice to the non-slave-holding states, all the revenues of the union ought to be raised either by direct taxation, or by a system the operation of which would produce the same result. The slave representation is a permanent uninterrupted privilege enjoyed by the owners of the slaves. The equivalent for it ought in justice to bear the same character. Duties of impost do so to a certain extent—but the substitution of them instead of direct taxation, is beyond all question favorable to the slave-holding states. Nine-tenths, at least, of all the revenue raised by impost duties are levied upon the articles of cotton, wool, and woolsens, silks, flax and hemp, iron, spirits, and molasses, wines, coffee, tea, and sugar. Now, the consumption, by any part of the slave population, of any one of these articles, when imported, is exceedingly small; instead of being in the proportion of three to five in comparison with that of the free white population, it is certainly not in the proportion of one to ten. If we analyse the articles upon which the great mass of the revenue by impost is raised, we find it to be upon food and raiment; tea, coffee, sugar, wine, molasses, spirits; are of the first kind thus classified; wool, cotton, silk, flax, and leather, are of the second. Now, who does not know that the food and raiment of the slave are almost entirely of domestic growth and production? They are fed upon the fruits, and clad in the apparel produced by their own labor on the plantations to which they belong: It is probable that their owners consume more of the articles imported from abroad than an equal number of citizens in the states where all are free; but if so, it is either because they are more wealthy by the possession of slaves, or because they are not accustomed to habits of frugality so parsimonious and self-denying. The passions, the vices, and the virtues, of men, are all modified by their condition in civil society. Among men who subsist only upon the fruits of their own labor, industry and frugality are constantly stimulated by the natural and perpetual impulse of bettering their own condition. Wherever one portion of the community lives in perpetual servitude to another, where master and slave both subsist upon the labor of the slave, industry and frugality not only lose much of their natural influence upon human conduct, but are apt even to lose the name and consideration of virtues. The slave feels neither the spur of industry nor the curb of frugality; for the fruits of his industry are not his own, and his scanty subsistence leaves him nothing to spare. The master's wants, supplied by another's toil, multiply with the means of gratification, and his natural tendencies will be to spend rather than to hoard. All labor to him will assume the hue and disrepute of servitude, and frugality to his eyes will lose her natural healthy bloom, and fade into the livid complexion of penurious avarice. Under these influences, South Carolina, with a free white population rather less than that of New Hampshire, may possibly, by the consumption of imported articles, contribute rather more to the public revenues of the union: but the subscribers have no hesitation in declaring their belief that the difference of amount between them, if ascertained to a dollar, would be found too trifling and insignificant to warrant a whisper of complaint; and that it would bear no sort of comparison to the difference, disadvantageous to South Carolina, which would appear by the levy of an equal amount by direct taxation.

There is then, neither injustice nor oppression upon South Carolina, nor upon the southern portion of the union generally, resulting from the collection of the national revenues, by duties of impost—nor is it true that South Carolina has suffered impoverishment under this system of taxation, in comparison with New Hampshire, Vermont, or New England generally. Of this the unanswerable demonstration is found in the same fact of relative representation in congress, under the successive enumerations of the people. In 1813, under the third census, the representation of South Carolina in this house, consisted of nine members—that of Vermont was six, that of New Hampshire six. Under the last census, S. Carolina retains for the next ten years the same number of nine members; New Hampshire only four, and Vermont only five—New Hampshire and Vermont have thus lost each one member on the floor of the representative hall, while South Carolina has retained her number unimpaired. The relative increase of the population of South Carolina has therefore, for the last twenty years, been greater than that of Vermont or New Hampshire, and let it be remembered, that in South Carolina, this increase of population is at the same time in the most literal sense, an increase of wealth. There, population is property, and the increase of that part of the population which is the property of the remainder, has been in larger proportion. The slaves have multiplied more rapidly than their masters. Thus altogether, for the last twenty years, the population and the wealth of the people of South Carolina has increased more than those of Vermont or of New Hampshire, and this is the result of the system of impost, which the political economists of the new school would teach us to believe is grinding the south to dust for the benefit of the north, and fattening the New Hampshire farmer, and the shepherd of the Green Mountains, upon the spoils of the South Carolina planter.

In examining the part of the message specially referred by the house to the committee of manufactures: namely, that which relates to the protection necessary to domestic manufactures, the subscribers have necessarily been led not only to an examination of the principle laid down, as the basis of the recommendations, relating to this particular interest, but to a general survey of all the foundations of the new system of government for this union, the outline of which is presented for the first time in this document. They have considered it as a whole of which all the parts are adapted to each other. As a whole, which, if carried into execution, would change the nature of the government of the United States, and in their belief, at no distant day, effect its dissolution. The assumption of the principle, that with the exception of articles of indispensable necessity in time of war, all legislative protection must ultimately be withdrawn from domestic manufactures, the subscribers believe to be itself contrary to the vital spirit of the constitution, and equivalent to a bill of attainder, not against one individual, but against a whole, respectable, and most important class of citizens—the denial to them of a right secured to them by the social compact of the constitution itself. And this assumed principle appears to us the more exceptionable, the nullifying faction of South Carolina, and had but too manifest a tendency to encourage them in the violent and unconstitutional measures by which they were, at the very moment when the message was delivered, arming the worse than eastern despotism of state sovereignty, against that same right of the citizen to the protection of the laws. Had it stood by itself, the recommendation gradually to withdraw from the manufactures the protection of existing laws, would have appeared inconsiderate, and at the moment when made, most unseasonable. But coupled as it was, with recommendations totally to abandon all future purposes of internal national improvement, to give away without equivalent the immensely valuable property in the public lands, and to sacrifice with the national bank, all the property of the nation, in corporate companies for roads and canals: and the whole system emanating from a speculative theory of political morality, pronouncing the wealthy land-holders of every country the best part of their population, the subscribers could neither disguise to themselves, nor could they, consistently with the sense of their duties to their country, withhold the exposure of their conviction that, taken altogether, it presents a decomposition of all the elements which hold this union together—an array of great interests against each other, instead of a combination, by mutual concession and mutual support of great interests, in union with each other. The planter of the south, the new settler of the west, the husbandman of the north and centre, the merchant of the Atlantic shore, the navigator of the ocean, and the artisan of the workshop and the loom, have each, in his several sphere of action, a separate and distinct interest, but a common right, a common stake, a common pledge in that great social compact, the constitution of the United States. All are equally entitled to its protection, and to that of its laws. To bind, to interweave, to rivet them in adhesion inseparably together, is the duty of the American patriot and statesman: to bring one of those great interests in hostile collision with all or any of the others, is to loosen the bonds of the union, and to kindle the fires of strife. A sound, uniform and accredited currency; an inexhaustible and invaluable fund of common property in the public lands; an organised and effective application of the national energies and resources to great undertakings of internal improvement; and a firm, efficient protection of commerce and navigation against the arm of foreign violence, and of manufactures and agriculture against the indirect aggressions of foreign legislation and competition—these the subscribers believe are the cements, which can alone render this union prosperous and lasting. To discompose and unsettle the currency, to cast away the treasure of the public lands, to abandon all enterprises of internal improvement, and systematically to deny all protection to the domestic manufactures, is to separate the great interests of the country, and to set them in opposition to each other. It is to untie the ligaments of the union.

The subscribers, with the most respectful consideration, but with the freedom which their sense of duty requires, cannot but indulge the hope that the author of the message will reconsider the principles upon which its recommendations are founded, and review them upon a scale of more enlarged political philosophy than that of favoritism for one part of the population, to the disparagement of all the rest; or that of reducing the government of a nation, swelling from tens to hundreds of millions of governable population, to a simple machine. To solve civil society into its elements, is to send back man to the state of nature: it is to degrade the citizen to a savage.

The subscribers believe that this great confederated union is an union of the people, an union of states, an union of great national interests; an union of all classes, conditions, and occupations of men; an union co-extensive with our territorial dominions; an union for successive ages, without limitation of time. They read in the preamble to the constitution, that it was ordained and established by the people of the U. States, among other great and noble purposes, to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity. As sovereign states have no posterity, they are incompetent to enter into any such compact. The people of the United States in ordaining the constitution, expressly bound to its observance their posterity, as well as themselves. Their posterity, that is, the whole people of the United States, are the only power on earth competent to dissolve peaceably that compact. It cannot otherwise be dissolved, but by force. But to make it perpetual, the first and transcendent duty of all, who at any time are called to participate in the councils of its government, is to harmonise and not to divide, to co-operate and not to conflict.

The most remarkable characteristic of the controversy, which now threatens the dissolution of the union, is, that it originated in the discontent of one great protected interest, with the protection extended by the existing laws to another. The controversy is sectional in its nature. It is the superabundantly, the excessively protected interest of the south, which revolts at the feeble and scanty protection of the laws enjoyed by the north, the centre, and the west. To inflame these discontents, and to arm them with offensive weapons, sophisms which reason blushes to be called to confute, are wrought up into axioms of political economy; fiction usurps the place of fact, to invert the most authenticated story of our national independence. Construction nullifies the connection between words and their meaning to make the constitution say what it denies, and deny what it says, and invention is beggared for tales of decay and desolation and poverty and distress, in the south, in the face of an increasing relative representation in this house, and a doubling amount at once of population and property. The southern planter is told that duties of impost are paid, not by the consumer of the dutied articles, but by the producer of cotton, rice and tobacco. What is the purpose of this absurdity? To stimulate his selfish and sordid passion of avarice, and his hatred of the northern manufacturer. It is not true, but his anti-social passions believe it. He is told that this union is a mere confederacy of states—of sovereign states, from which any one of them may break off at pleasure. This is grossly, palpably false, and to bolster it up the most notorious historical facts are falsified. He is told that each of the states of this union separately declared itself sovereign and independent, and as bare untruth, is not of itself sufficient to bear out this imposture, the county of Mecklenburg is metamorphosed into the sovereign and independent state of North Carolina, to stamp the legend of the sterling standard upon the base metal of nullification. The tale is utterly groundless, but the abused planter believes it. In the constitution of the United States, the whole people of the union, speaking in the first person, declare themselves parties to its declaration themselves to ordain and establish it for the most exalted purposes of human action, upon this side the grave—even to secure to themselves and to their posterity, the blessings of liberty. The planter is told that these are idle, unmeaning, cabalistical words—that there is no people of the United States. That the paper called the constitution of the United States, is a league of despotic corporations, which can have no posterity to whom the blessings of liberty may be secured—which having no soul, can have no dread hereafter of the penalties of violated vows, and can never be excommunicated—which having no conscience, can be bound by no ties of morality to the fulfilment of its promises, contracts and obligations—free from all restrictions, human or divine, independent of all laws of the land or of heaven—sovereign as the throne of Omnipotence, and competent to nullify not only the laws of the whole union, but the unalienable rights of man and the decrees of eternal justice. He is substantially told all this, and he believes it.

He is then told that he is poor, and miserable—that his plantation is going to ruin—that his slaves double their numbers in not less than twenty years—that they are not worth half so much as they were when cotton sold for thirty cents a pound. That in South Carolina they cannot produce half so much as in Alabama, Mississippi, or Louisiana. But that it is all owing to the accursed tariff—all owing to the protection of northern manufactures by the laws of the union. He is told that the tariff takes money from his pocket and puts it into that of the northern manufacturer. He is told that the northern manufacturer is a thief and a robber—and that it is upon him, the planter, that his robberies are committed. He is told that a cruel, tyrannical, oppressive majority in both houses of congress are the representatives of this highwayman of the north—that they pervert the very principles of popular representation to the purposes of oppression and robbery—that they dare not open their hearts to the sentiments of justice and humanity. He is told all this and he believes it.

And behold the whole foundation of the superstructure of nullification. Falsified logic—falsified history—falsified constitutional law, falsified morality, falsified statistics, and falsified and slanderous imputations, upon the majorities of both houses of congress for a long series of years. All—all is false and hollow. And for what is this enormous edifice of fraud and falsehood erected? To rob the free working man of the worth of the wages of his labor—to take money from his pocket and put it into that of the southern owner of machinery. It has been said that there is no philosophic falsehood so absurd, but it has been maintained by some sublime philosopher. Surely there is no invention so senseless, no fiction so baseless or so base, but it has been maintained by some learned intelligent, amiable and virtuous, but exasperated and bewildered statesman. Nor was there ever in the annals of mankind an example of a community fretted into madness and goaded into rebellion, by a concerted and persevering clan of grievances so totally destitute of foundation, and pretences so preposterously fictitious, as that which has found its consummation in the nullifying ordinance of the South Carolina convention.

In the name of the people of South Carolina, that convention have declared, that they will never more submit to a protective tariff—and to place beyond all doubt what they mean by a protective tariff, they have nullified, that is, declared null and void, all the revenue laws of the United States. They have, to the extent of their power, extinguished all the revenues of the United States derived from duties of impost. To nullify the protection of the laws imparted to their fellow citizens, constituting more than half the population of the union, they have abolished the revenues of the nation. They have in express terms declared so long as the principles of protection shall be recognised by the laws of congress, "NO MORE TAXES SHALL BE PAID HERE," that is to say in South Carolina.

South Carolina, then, by virtue of her sovereign power, has deprived the people of all the rest of the union of the protection of existing laws; and she has declared that she never more will pay her proportion of the taxes, not even of the taxes imposed for revenue alone, until the principle of protection, that is of protection by the imposition of duties, shall be renounced—renounced forever. In their theory, the South Carolina convention make an all-important distinction between duties imposed for revenue, and duties imposed for protection; but in their practice, they involve them all in one common ruin.

Now, the subscribers cannot suppress the mortification and alarm with which, at the very moment when the arm of one of the states of this union was thus raised, proclaiming with a voice of thunder her inflexible purpose to strike a vital blow at the right, the first constitutional right of more than half the people of the union, to protection—even to the protection of existing laws—that at this peculiar moment, the chief magistrate of the United States should have addressed to the legislative councils a message, recommending not only a gradual withdrawal of all that protection, but a whole system of administration for the future government of the union, adapted to that principle of withdrawn and nullified protection—a system revolutionary in its character, totally departing from all the paths of peace and prosperity trodden by Washington and all his successors, down even to him who now calls us to deviate from them; to explore new wastes of desolation, beyond which there is no promised land, but all is one unbounded and interminable desert—a system impending with universal ruin, draining all the sources of fertility from the fountains of internal national improvement, shaking to its foundation all commercial confidence, by the determined annihilation of the bank, and wresting forever from the people of the United States and from their posterity, for unnumbered ages, the inestimable inheritance of the public lands, bequeathed to them by their fathers, or acquired at the expense of their own toil and treasure, as a property common to them all, and already yielding them yearly millions of income, which may be, and ought to be, applied to the employment and compensation of the laborious poor, and at the same time to the permanent and growing improvement of the condition of the people.

Such, in the opinion of the subscribers, is the protection due to domestic manufactures—to the interest specially committed, by the standing order of the house, to the charge of the committee of which they are members. The protection necessary to domestic manufactures is the protection of the existing laws. It is the protection extended, though in other forms, to all the other great interests of which the community is composed—the protection enjoyed by the planter of the south, by the woodsman of the west, by the merchant of the populous cities, by the mariner of the seas—protection from foreign hostility—protection from foreign competition.

But the subscribers must not be misunderstood. This protection is in no wise incompatible with a reduction of the revenue, nor even with a reduction of the duties by impost. The taxation of the country may be reduced to the wants of the government, at whatever scale the standard of these wants may be fixed by the wisdom of congress, without at all impairing the principle of protection. The two principles have no necessary connexion with each other; and all this bitter controversy has arisen from the blending of them improperly together. That the taxation of the country ought now to be reduced the subscribers do not believe, because at the present moment the treasury, so far from overflowing, is drained of more than its last dollar. Because the tariff act will not, in their opinion, bring any excess of revenue into the treasury, at least for the two succeeding years; and if even the prospect of such an unexampled evil should approach, the next congress will be invested with ample powers to ward it off, and will certainly not be slow to exert them. Nothing can be more fallacious than the fancy that we can control the action of our successors upon subjects over which their jurisdiction will be the same as ours; with this exception, that theirs will be in full vigor, and ours forever extinct. It is not for the dead to give laws to the living. Prospective legislation upon the most uncertain of contingencies, if not absolute usurpation, is akin to it in the impotence of its claims. It is the broken column and mutilated inscription of ETERNAL ROMÉ. If the time should come when even the prospect of a redundant treasury shall be imminent, taxation ought to be, and undoubtedly will be, reduced; and in reducing its amount, the obligations of congress will be to accomplish that object without injuriously affecting any of the great interests of the country. That this cannot be done by one uniform ad valorem duty of any given per centage upon all imported articles, is certain; nor can it without great injustice be effected by disarding all discrimination, except that of articles charged with impost, and articles entirely free. Nothing can be more unequal and oppressive in taxation, than the assessment of the same rates of duty upon all dutiable articles. Its first inequality is its bearing upon the rich and the poor; the same tax, which is unfelt by the wealthy land-holder, may crush to the earth the day-laborer who tills his ground. Its next inequality, is that produced by foreign legislation and foreign competition. An article of foreign manufacture comes into your market cheapened by a bounty upon its export, at the place whence it came; it comes in competition with a like article, the production of your own soil or of your own industry; tax it at the same rate of per centage upon its value, as you do an article upon the production of which none of your own citizens have staked their fortunes and subsistence, and you consume all your manufactures with fire. It may be taken as a rule of universal application, that with a uniform rate of ad valorem duties, without discrimination, there can be no domestic manufacturing establishments. This is the protection which they now enjoy by the constitution and existing laws of the United States. This protection the subscribers believe to be indispensably necessary to their existence, and its withdrawal by the general government, whether immediate or by gradual steps, leaves them only the melancholy alternative of sudden death, or slow and lingering extinction. In either event, it will be the sacrifice of all the free industry of the union to that best part of the population, the wealthy land and slave-holder of the south. This is the policy recommended by the message of the president of the United States, and against which the subscribers, as members of the committee of manufactures, in submitting this their report to the house, deem it their duty respectfully, but most earnestly to remonstrate.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Louis McLane, of Delaware, to be secretary of state in the place of Edward Livingston, appointed minister to France.

William J. Duane, of Pennsylvania, to be secretary of the treasury, in place of Louis McLane, appointed secretary of state.

Edward Livingston, late of Louisiana, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the court of his majesty, the king of the French.

Thomas Pennant Barton, of Pennsylvania, to be secretary of the legation of the United States at Paris.

[It is stated, that Mr. Livingston, will proceed to France in the Delaware 74, capt. Ballard, bound for the Mediterranean, if she can be prepared in time.

It is again reported that Mr. Stevenson, of Virginia, late speaker, will be appointed minister to England.

By the articles inserted in another page, it appears that many changes have been, or are, contemplated at Washington.]

"JOHN RANDOLPH," of Roanoke, died in Philadelphia, at noon, on Friday, the 24th ult. He was born on the 2d June, 1773, and, consequently, sixty years old, less a few days.

He was exceedingly emaciated—but "his mind retained its usual character until within two hours of his dissolution. It then appeared to sink, and suffer, like the body, complete exhaustion." He arranged his temporal affairs, and directed that his corpse should be transported to Roanoke, and buried under a particular tree.

It is said, that the property left by him is worth a million of dollars; and reported that he made provision for the emancipation of all his slaves, and for the support and management of those who are either too old or too young to take care of themselves—and added, that he left a handsome legacy to Mr. Randolph, late lieutenant in the navy;* but believed that the chief part of his estate will descend to his two half-brothers, and one half-sister. The much valued judge Tucker is one of these.

On the day after his decease, a large meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia was held in the district court room—judge Hopkinson was called to the chair, and col. J. G. Walmough appointed secretary.

On motion of John Sergeant, esq. who made a forcible and eloquent address on the character and abilities of the deceased, a committee was appointed to confer with the personal friends of the late John Randolph, esq. with the view of making arrangements for offering a public tribute of respect to his remains. This motion was supported by Horace Binney, esq. in a speech of some length.

The motion was unanimously adopted by the meeting, and the following named gentlemen were appointed the committee, viz: Nicholas Biddle, Samuel Brock, Joseph Hemphill, B. Wiling, C. J. Ingersoll, James Brown, G. M. Dallas, gen. T. Cadwallader, John G. Walmough, judge Hopkinson and Horace Binney.

A correspondence was opened on behalf of the committee with John S. Barbour, Henry E. Watkins and William J. Barks-ville, esquires,† requesting their views as to any tribute of respect that might be offered to the remains of the deceased. The latter feelingly acknowledged the compliment tendered—but declined the acceptance of any other mark of respect, because of the delay that it would cause in removing the body: and, on the ensuing day, it was received in Baltimore, and sent on to Virginia.

The papers are filled with notices of the death and sketches of the character of Mr. RANDOLPH, and we have also reports of the remarks of Messrs. Sergeant and Binney at the meeting of the people above mentioned. We intend to record some of them.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. We met a friend a few days since in the street, who stated, (in the course of a casual and brief conversation), that the exchanges of the bank of the United States, made without charge, in checks drawn, or [foreign] bank notes received, amounted to more than one hundred million of dollars per annum! We thought ourselves pretty well informed as to the magnitude of the operations of this establishment, and fully knew that its facilities, afforded in exchanges and remittances, saved us several hundred dollars a year—but the greatness of the sum named caused us to express a belief that the gentleman had mistaken, or misunderstood, the amount. On which he said, that he would obtain a copy of the whole statement which had been made of the "exchange transactions" of the bank, during the last year—and hand it to us.

Such is the "history" of the paper annexed, which, we believe, is copied from certain of the documents that were laid before congress*—and, perhaps, has already been published; though we do not recollect to have seen it before. But whether or not, the facts set forth are of deep interest to the people of the United States, because of the astounding truth presented—that values to the amount of $241,714,912, were exchanged by the bank of the United States in 1832, at about the average rate of one-eleventh of one per cent.—or say, ninety cents on every thousand dollars of the whole sum; and that, of the above mighty amount, about $120,000,000 were exchanged without any charge for premium: and, the average premium on the remaining 120 millions being less than one-fifth of one per cent. shews that a large part of this amount must, also, have been negotiated without charge; but the fifth of one per cent. is a rate that would not nearly have insured the SAFETY of the mails, and paid the EXTRA POSTAGE, if bank notes, instead of drafts, had been transmitted.

Our own little business, [in publishing the REGISTER] renders us able to speak of this matter in a very positive manner, for we have more or less subscribers in every state and territory in the union; and the truth is—to say nothing about extra postages on double, treble and quadruple letters—that two per cent. hardly pays the shavings exacted of us by the brokers, on the bank notes received by us—except those of the bank of the United States and its offices, such as are issued in Maryland, and in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Richmond, only; for, although the issues by certain other local banks in Virginia, Delaware and Pennsylvania are freely received by the Baltimore banks in deposit, or freely circulated in Baltimore, they are not sufficient to bring down the average amount of shavings paid to less than about two per cent. on account of all other bank notes. There is no manner of doubt concerning this fact—for, though the bills of most of the banks in the United States are just as good, "at home," as those of the Baltimore banks are to us—they may be only as merchandise [to us], and must be reduced into money, for use: for we never pay debts to our working people, or others, in "money," or currency, which the baker, and butcher, and grocer, will not receive of them—at par; and hence are compelled to sell bank notes received, as stated above.

We see that the average of all the exchanges, properly so called, of the bank of the United States, in 1832, was only one-eleventh of one per cent. or 90 cents on every 1,000 dollars, exchanged: that is, for drafts issued on, or paid, at "foreign" places, or on account of "foreign" bank notes received on deposit. Could a more moderate ratio be desired? And for this eleventh of one per cent. the goodness of the money remitted is rendered certain—the safety of the mails insured—its use by the individual for whom it is intended made almost positive—and a large amount in postages saved. For this is the practice of the bank: its drafts are made payable at one day's sight—but always paid on presentation, when surely offered by persons to whom they belong; the postage on a draft of 50,000 or 500,000 dollars is no more than on the remittance of a one dollar bank bill; and the "one day's sight," with men doing business in a regular manner, not only renders a robbery of the mail, (if one should happen) useless to the robber, so far as the draft is concerned—but if the person who actually receives it, by any accident loses it, though even endorsed, he may arrest its payment and regain its amount, by making the fact known to the bank on which it is drawn—for that bank or office is furnished with daily lists of all the drafts that are made upon it, for the security of all parties. And by such safe, and beautiful, and cheap operations, we see that 241,717,912 dollars were transferred from places to places, in the last year.

* Of the truth of these sayings and reports we know nothing.

† Who happened to be in Philadelphia, and acted as the more immediate friends of the deceased.

There is a simplicity and strength in these facts, which must claim the admiration of every one that will reflect a moment upon them; and a harmony and usefulness which cannot escape the notice of any man, willing to receive knowledge.

State institutions, however correctly managed, cannot carry on these exchanges, unless at a much higher rate of premium, which would also be rendered more uncertain as to its price, or in the extent to which it might proceed—for reasons that will appear manifest to every person who is at all acquainted with the nature of exchanges. To manage them prudently, cheaply, and safely—they must be regulated by one common head, having a collected information of the supplies or wants of particular places; which is known, with all possible accuracy, at the parent bank in Philadelphia, because of the correct weekly returns which are made from its numerous offices; and, without such knowledge, these heavy exchanges could not be regularly made—no one, wishing to remit money, could either calculate the time or the cost of it, with that certainty which is so important in all mercantile transactions. The local banks have large dealings with one another; but, with the best accommodations which these could afford, it might require several operations though a bank in New Orleans to place funds at Portland, or Buffalo, each of which would be attended with some risk, besides the extra trouble incurred—requiring, perhaps, from three to five drafts, in many cases, to pass the money to its destination—causing also considerably increased expenses, and much delay. The interchanges of currency, on account of the circulation of values in the United States, are of mighty amount—some thousands of millions a year. The exchanges of the bank of the United States, as stated in the table below, goes only to shew the operations of that particular bank, in what, we believe, are generally called “foreign” exchanges—that is, exchanges of personal drafts, or bank bills, payable at other places than those in which they are received: and when to these we add the exchanges of individuals within the states, or through the local banks, and otherwise, we cannot doubt that the aggregate “circulation of values” is thousands of millions, annually; all which are regulated, more or less, by the bank of the United States, as a great “balance wheel.”

We think that the “circulation of values” has been doubled in the abominable and oppressive tariff years—or since 1824; and have, while writing this article, taken the liberty to make an inquiry on that subject. It shall be added—if received in time. We, in Baltimore, had “no sort of idea” of the value of the trade of the Chesapeake bay, in seasons of business, until its surface was covered with British vessels, and its shores ravaged by modern Goths and Vandals—so the people of the United States will only obtain a rightful knowledge of the value of an excited industry, in the loss of such excitement—in seeing deserted fields, dilapidated factories, abandoned houses, and owl-tenanted villages. The increased circulation above alluded to, equally interests the proudest capitalist and the humblest laborer. It benefits every human being within its range—who possesses or produces value. This principle cannot be contested—but time is not allowed, nor is the opportunity fitted, to go into an explanation of it, for such as may require it.—Business-men have no need of it. The veriest dolt that sells or tinkers a pot, ought to know the difference between rapid and slow exchanges of values; and that money is rapid or slow in its exchanges, in exact proportion to the prosperity or adversity of the United States.

There is nothing more clear, in our estimation, than that the vastly increased interior trade and commerce of the United States imperiously demands, (and must and will have), some certain and well known medium for carrying it on.† The shape that it may assume, or the name by which it shall be called, are of little importance to the people, in general. There never will be a “poor man’s bank,” as idiot-politicians have projected; and it is madness to entertain the idea of converting those who want to borrow money, into lenders of money, or currency. Such was the hot-bed of the paper money manufactories which so grievously abounded some years ago, in very many of which more crimes against property were committed than by all the inmates of the thickest peopled of our penitentiaries; and persons who depredated by twenties of thousands of dollars, rolled in their coaches, and were “clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day,” while poor wretches who had transgressed to the value of a ham or a hat, a bushel of corn or a pair of shoes, were locked up within four high walls, and, clothed in prison garments, fed upon measured allowances of the coarsest food. The amount of all the depredations of all the highwaymen and robbers, pickpockets and thieves, black-legs and professional knaves that have existed in the United States from the first settlement of the country to the present day, is but as a “drop in the bucket,” compared with the swindlings that were contrived, concocted, or administered in the mushroom “rag shops” alluded to. We would not “lack charity”—we think that we could assist to drag “old Satan, himself,” out of a ditch, if bemired in the pursuit of an innocuous object, (admitting that the devil can ever be in harmless mood), but never had, nor can have, any sort of sympathy with, or feeling for, gangs of deliberate speculators—remorseless as the bandit bands of the Apennines, and such as commenced loans of what they called money, without even the means of honestly paying for the plates with which they stamped the paper that they issued! These gangs—whose spoliations cost the productive classes of the community hundreds of millions of dollars,† would never have shewed their brazen front, had any just and reasonable approximation to an “UNIFORM CURRENCY” existed in the United States. What has been, may be: we revert to a recollection of these times with ineffable disgust; and deprecate their recurrence as much as we should another “whiskey insurrection” in Pennsylvania—or a “going to the death for his sugar,” with “general Hamilton, commanding the state troops of South Carolina, at Charleston!” The meanest and the worst of mankind that abound, are those who engender conspiracies to injure honest men—such, for example, as those at New York, who are charged with having fraudently obtained a copy of the message of the president of the United States in advance, and acting upon the knowledge (thus gained) of its contents, trafficked in the stock in the bank. Such individuals only want the poor merit of courage, to become highwaymen, or pickpockets.†

the state legislatures, as to become safe depositories of the public funds and capable of accomplishing all the beneficial results, ascribed by the friends of the bank of the United States to that institution.”

And the Pennsylvanian adds—The idea flung out that the administration favored the location and establishment of a great national bank at New York, is all moonshine. State banks and state rights will be brought into play again—consolidation and nullification will bite the dust.

*Directly and indirectly. The profits made by the speculators, though of large amount, were inconsiderable when compared with the effects which followed from the derangements of business, and interferences with the value of property, caused by profligate issues of paper.

†The class of men to whom this charge applies, will give the credit of it to a letter-writer for the Richmond Enquirer, who, relating the outrage committed on the person of the president of the United States, at Alexandria, said—“A person approached the president, and, tendering his hand, observed—General! if you will promise to relieve me, I WILL MURDER THE DASTARD! Much allowance must be made for the excitement of the moment. Had we been present, we should not, perhaps, have hesitated in an attempt to take hold of Mr. Randolph, without a calculation of consequences; but this proposed bargain, by a shaking of hands, to commit an acknowledged murder,” is the “conspicuous” of all the things of the sort that we have met with; and it must be hoped that the president would have instantly resented the gross indignity offered him—(an indignity greater, in our opinion, than Randolph himself had inflicted), except to be excused in his own excitement at the time; or a prompt conclusion that the person addressing him knew not what he said—which, probably, was the case, in the rush of his feelings. But that such a fact should be boldly

*The word “money” is here used, as meaning coin, or a currency which may be exchanged for coin—at pleasure: not such issues of paper as are spoken of below.

†The Globe, however, says—“Neither the president nor vice president will ever favor a national bank. Both unite in the opinion that the state banks may be put on such a footing by

We ought frequently to look back, and see how things have been.

The mass of the people cannot have any other interest in banks, than that they should be prudently and honestly conducted. The proportion of those who hold a greater amount of bank stock than of money which they owe to banks, is hardly as one to twenty thousand of even highly respectable farmers, dealers and mechanics of the United States. In the present state of society it seems almost universally admitted, that banks are indispensably necessary; and it is self-duty in the many, (benefitted by the establishment of banks), to take care that the power given to the few, is not abused—and prevent, so far as they can, by the moral power or political influence which they possess, all sorts of SPECULATIONS or GAMBLINGS, in the stocks of banks, or misuses of their credit or funds: for the many, in the long run—nay, those who live by the labor of their own hands, must finally be the sufferers because of such speculations and gamblings, or monopolies or misuses of funds—if real losses are sustained; because that labor is the only means by which value is created. If one dealer in stock "makes" 10,000 dollars on his sales, and another loses that amount—the people may not be injured, except so far as such dealings have an influence over public morals; but if, by other operations, the currency is suddenly contracted, or expanded, or monopolised—a public injury ensues, and all persons within the range of such operations must feel it, in one way or another. It is a serious question for political economists—whether the expansion of our currency, in the mere waste and prodigality which it caused, when specie payments were suspended during the war of 1812, &c. had not a more ruinous effect upon society, at large, than the contraction of the currency when specie payments were resumed. The last, to be sure, was the most easily seen in the bankruptcy of tens of thousands of worthy men, and the desolation which it caused—but the superabundance of what passed for money was the origin of the wide ruin that prevailed, when the value of paper came to be closely measured by the value of coin.

These brief remarks are simply offered to shew the lively and deep interest which every working or dealing man has in the steadiness and solvency of the currency. If a bank fails—a large part of the loss falls upon those who had no personal interest in its stock—who had never, directly, made one cent of profit out of the bank; for it is the "aim and end" of the herd of speculators, when they cannot gather profits for themselves, is to cast foreseen losses upon innocent and ignorant persons. And instead of individuals being "hanged on a tree," "fifty cubits high," for such depredations, they rather obtain an enviable reputation as good financiers, shrewd managers, and thrifty men!

To return to our subject. It seems very generally admitted that we must have some establishment, capable of continuing the present exchange operations of the bank of the United States, and of preserving uniformity in the currency, so far as the same is practicable—and the momentous question is presented, whether the present bank of the United States, with some modifications of its charter, shall be continued—or a new one built up. This matter was clearly presented to the mind of the late Mr. Randolph; and, without retiring from his constitutional objections to the bank, he had resolved to support a renewal of its charter, in the real or supposed necessity of such an institution, and a well-grounded apprehension that the establishment of a new bank would be attended with other and greater evils, than can possibly ensue from continuing the old one.

That Mr. Randolph was right in this resolution, we think, cannot be doubted by any well informed man—stated in the "Richmond Enquirer," yet most astonishing us, the reply of the president being added, &c. The whole, perhaps, is fabulous. We hope so.

[The name of the individual who would thus have rendered the president of the United States, in his power to pardon, a partner in the high crime suggested, is given in the "Enquirer;" but we shall do an act which may assist in preserving for him any part of the reputation of Erosstratus. The condition on which he would have committed the offence, forbids it. The calculation is horrible. The individual, surely, did not know what he said—and so may be excused; but the deliberate record of his proposition amazes us.]

unless wishing to gamble in stocks, or madly resolved to render all things subservient to his own narrow and selfish political views—willing to inflict any permanent evil on the country, for the gratification of his own temporary preferences.

It was a belief generally entertained by the democratic party, that the old bank of the United States had used its power for political purposes, more than a doubt of its constitutionality, which caused a refusal to renew its charter. We can almost say that we know this to have been the case. Whether the belief above stated was just or otherwise, has nothing to do with the fact. The belief was cherished as in a certainty of its truth; and, with the minds of men so acutely excited as they were at that time, and had been for years—because of radical differences which were thought to exist between the two great political parties, it was easy to slide into an opinion that the establishment of the bank was an unconstitutional proceeding, and use that opinion as the leading reason why the bank should not be re-chartered. We appeal to common sense, in support of what is just stated—and refer to all the old democrats, yet living, as well concerning the belief that was entertained, as for the general action of that belief on their own minds. And being thus "committed" in a declaration against the constitutionality of the bank, as a party, it was not easy to give up the ground which the party had assumed, however great the necessity appeared for rebuilding of some such an institution. This necessity was manifest. And, as in the former case, political feelings had strengthened the constitutional objection to the bank—a sense of the public good, the necessity of extinguishing the rag-currency of the country, and of restoring a sound and safe one, now weakened the constitutional objection in some, and neutralized it in others. We speak of things that we do know. And so it was, that many of the old and "staunch democrats of 1798," voted for the present bank; and president Madison, who was at the head of that party, approved the law. Well—the bank was established; but so imprudently, or wickedly managed, as some thought to make princely fortunes for a hundred or two individual stockholders, or gamblers in its funds—that the constitutional objection was revived by many who had laid it aside, and superadded to the loud and earnest complaints that were made because of a maladministration of the affairs of the bank: and, certainly, the facts brought out shewed many strange, and highly reprehensible, and truly alarming proceedings, in persons who had a commanding influence over its management. We cannot now go into particulars—but intend to revive the history of these times, as a warning and a guide; with a hope that such revival may have some small tendency to prevent recurrence of events which so much agitated and embarrassed the whole country. But the result was—that the bank was reformed; and, by a peaceful and correct administration of its affairs, is now effecting exchanges to the amount of 240 or 250 millions of dollars a year, at the average cost of one-eleventh of one per cent. to the people of the United States!

This article is already too long—and we have only to add, that we shall resume the subject; and especially to shew what was the former, and is the present condition of the existing bank of the United States; and inquire into, and ascertain, if we can, what possible good may result to the public, from destroying the present institution that a new bank may be made. Our serious belief is—that the project is a most dangerous one; and, if carried into effect, will render an immense public injury for the benefit only of some two or three hundred rich persons, resolved to make themselves richer by speculation in, and monopolies of, the stock. We say—"LET VERY WELL ALONE," modify the charter, if thought necessary; so restrict and restrain the powers of the bank that it cannot wantonly oppress any well and honestly managed state bank, and let all wholesome checks and balances be established—but let not the bank be broken down for the simple and sole purpose of benefiting a few solitary individuals—whose interest, compared with that of the community, is of no consideration whatever. Every man is deeply interested in the preservation of a sound and wholesome currency; but not one in fifty thousand of us, have, or will hold, a personal interest in the dividends or profits of the present bank, or any other that may be established by the congress of the United States.

THE LATE TREATY WITH FRANCE, PROTESTED DRAFT, &c. We do not recollect to have seen any reason as signed, "by authority," why the late draft of the treasury of the United States upon that of France, was not paid—though the draft is said to have been protested because the chambers had not appropriated money to pay it.—Perhaps, there is a good reason why the appropriation was not made—a suggestion of which has caused us to look into the treaty and the law carrying it into effect—with the proclamation of the president, &c. and it appears to us, that the first instalment, payable under the treaty, is not due until the 13th day of July ensuing. But, because that the [recent] secretary of the treasury made the draft payable on the 2d February last, we feel much distrust of the conclusion at which we have arrived—although we cannot reach any other, as at present informed.

Those who feel an interest in what follows, will carefully attend to the dates.

The treaty with France was signed at Paris on the 4th July, 1831—by Mr. Rives and count Sebastiani.

The second article of the treaty provides for the payment, at Paris, of 25,000,000 francs to the United States, in six successive years; and says—"the first instalment shall be paid at the expiration of one year next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, &c."

The seventh article of the treaty says that "from and after the exchange of the ratifications," the wines of France shall be admitted at certain rates of duty, &c.

These are the two leading parts in the treaty—and the former rests upon the latter.

The treaty-making power vested in the president and senate, does not extend to the repeal of an established law of the land; and hence the necessity of an act of both houses of congress to reduce the existing duty on French wines, as proposed in the treaty.*

In consequence, an act was passed, and approved by the president on the 13th July, 1832, providing for the appointment of a commission to examine the claims of our citizens, &c. The 10th section of the act is in the following words:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That for the term of ten years, from and after the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, wines, the produce of France, shall be admitted into the United States on paying duties not exceeding the following rates on the gallon, (such as is at present used in the United States), that is to say: six cents for red wine in casks, ten cents for white wine in casks, and twenty-two cents for wine of all sorts in bottles.

On the same day that the president approved the bill just above mentioned, (July 13, 1832), he issued his proclamation, saying that "the ratifications, [of the treaty] were this day exchanged, at the city of Washington, by Messrs. Livingston and Sururier.

Why the law of the 13th July, 1832, was retrospective as to the duties payable on French wines, and reduced them to the rates stipulated for in the treaty from the 2d February, 1832, we cannot conjecture. The president's proclamation says the ratifications were exchanged on the 13th July, THE DATE ALSO OF THE LAW; and they could not have been "exchanged" at a previous date, because of the want of that law; and hence we are entirely in the dark as to the reason why the draft for the first instalment was made payable on the 2d February, instead of the 13th July, ensuing.

There is another thing, however, which has a singular appearance. The treaty provides that the "ratifications shall be exchanged, at Washington, in the space of eight months, or sooner, if possible." The date of the treaty is July 4, 1831—and, to February 2, 1832, is less than seven months; but the law to reduce the duty on French wines, as stipulated in the treaty, was approved only on the 13th July, and the president's proclamation of the same date, says that the ratifications were exchanged on that very day—or more than twelve months after the signing of the treaty. Has the treaty then died a "natural death?" or, was there some other "convention" to keep it alive?

All these things may be easily explained, perhaps—but they have an extraordinary aspect; and why the manner of the draft was adopted, or indeed why it was made at all, we are altogether at a loss to guess.

We suspected a possibility that our insertion of the law and proclamation above alluded to might be incorrect—though almost certain that both were copied from the official paper, "The Globe," because that we make it a standing rule to use official publications whenever attainable; and, for that reason, have caused the law and the proclamation, as inserted in the REGISTER, to be examined by the official publications of them in the "Baltimore Republican," by a competent person—who reports, that the time of approving the law, and of publishing the proclamation, are correct—viz: July 13, 1832; and that the words "second day of February," as given in the law—and those, that the "ratifications [of the treaty] were this day exchanged," in the proclamation—are also correctly inserted. And it will have been observed, that the president in his message to congress of December 6, 1831, said—that the treaty required "legislative acts" which "must have the concurrence of both houses, before it can be carried into effect." But by the date of the draft, the treaty, it seems, was thought to be in "effect," four months, and more, before the passage of the law.

THE CHOLERA. During the week ending 15th May, four deaths by cholera happened at Cincinnati.

The Natchez Courier, of the 3d inst. in noticing the health of that city, says—"The number of deaths within the limits of the city during the past week, is 9, two whites and seven blacks—three by cholera; one white and two blacks. The white person was Saml. Jacobs, Mr. Franklin's overseer, the person who was supposed to have had the principal hand in putting the bodies of the negroes, reported last week, into the bayou. His case was reported "cholera asphyxia and intemperance."

At the last accounts, the cholera was still raging at Vicksburg, (Mississippi), with great violence. Forty cases had occurred in that town, in the week ending at sunrise on the 9th ult. of which 17 had proved fatal. In the last 48 hours of the term, there had been 24 cases and 8 deaths. On the 9th May, however, there was no new case reported. From this it was hoped that the disease had reached its height, and was abating.

Nashville, May 31. "No new case of cholera since our last."

Wheeling, May 21. The board of health proclaims the existence of the cholera in this town—but says that it is confined to a particular quarter, near the market house—16 cases were known since the 16th of May, 7 of which had proved fatal. There were 13 new cases between the 21st and 24th of May, of which 2 had proved fatal, 3 were doubtful, 7 convalescent, and 1 recovered.

New Orleans, May 8. "That this dreaded disease [the cholera] does exist in this city, that the cases, almost without exception, terminate fatally, and that it is gradually though slowly on the increase, are facts not to be doubted."

St. Louis, May 11. We feel it our duty to state our belief of the existence of the cholera within the limits of our city. The disease made its first appearance on persons on board of steamboats, arriving at this place, where it was probably contracted, and thence has extended to the town. We have not learned the number of cases that have been, but from the information in our power do not believe it to be great—at least not sufficiently so to excite any terror or panic in the minds of the rational and experienced.

It is added in a postscript—We have the gratification of stating that there have been no new cases, within the city, since yesterday morning.

The "Times" of the 18th announces the disappearance of the cholera, from St. Louis.

On the Mississippi. The cholera is said to exist on board of almost every steamboat on the Mississippi, causing many deaths.

In Ireland, a good many cases of cholera appear in Cork, Kerry, &c. A belief is stated that some yet happen in every country in Europe in which this disease had been introduced.

Nine persons in one family, in the county of Cork, Ireland, died in the space of five hours—and two other inmates speedily followed them! It was terrible in Limerick.

THE "OPRESSED SOUTH." We mentioned in our last the sale of a crop of tobacco, at Richmond, at the average price of $12 16 per 100 lbs. The Petersburg Intelligencer of the 21th ult. has an account of the following sales of "crops" at the different warehouses in that town, on the 22nd.

Crop of 12 hds	$10 00 average.
4 hds	12 00
2 hds	12 00
8 hds	10 34
6 hds	9 87½

*The president, in his message to congress, of December 6, 1831, said—"In my message at the opening of the last session of congress, I expressed a confident hope that the justice of our claims upon France, urged as they were with perseverance and signal ability by our minister there, would finally be acknowledged. This hope has been realised. A treaty has been signed, which will immediately be laid before the senate, for its approbation; and which, containing stipulations that require legislative acts, must have the concurrence of both houses before it can be carried into effect."

An extensive factory of cotton seed oil has been established at Natchez, and others are about to be built at Mobile, Florence, &c. It is stated that one bushel of seed yields three quarts of oil, and that from 1,000 to 2,000 gallons can be made at the Natchez factory. This oil is used for making paints—and, being refined, will burn as well in lamps as sperm oil, without the disagreeable smell which the latter sometimes emits. It is added, that the "cake is the very best food for stock." Thus an article which has been thrown away, is about to yield large sums to the cotton planters; with which we are much gratified, except in a fear that it may tend to injure the sperm whale fishery, which, as a nursery for seamen, and for other reasons, is among the most important branches of the industry of the people of the United States. The persons employed in this fishery are the ablest and the best seamen in the world, whether engaged in works of peace, or the business of war—sober and steady, brave and faithful.

The building at Natchez is eighty-four feet by eighty, one and a half story high, and contains a steam engine of 22½ inch cylinder, and five feet stroke, driving eight hulling machines, five sets of stones, and a machine to prepare and grind the seed for heating; eight cylinders for heating the meal, and seven lever presses are in preparation, to carry on the business with despatch, and to the saving of manual labor.

Similar mills are building at Petersburg, Virginia, &c.

Another "notion"—rice threshing machines, are in operation at or near Savannah. The Georgian says—"One of the certificates from a gentleman who has been using one for some time, states, that he has threshed 350 bushels per day, by the power of four mules; and another, who has two driven by steam power, that they turn out 700 bushels per day, winnowed at the same time.

"We have no doubt, from what we understand, that they will be generally used on all the plantations in preference to the flail, from its saving of labor and the clear manner in which the rice is taken from the straw. It is an admirable invention, and the inventor merits every credit."

"ANTI-NULLEIFICATION!" From the correspondence of the Portland Evening Advertiser, dated Montgomery, Alabama, April 12. "I have omitted to mention the great number of emigrants whom I have passed. It would seem as if North and South Carolina were pouring forth their population in swarms. Perhaps I have gone by in the Creek nation over three thousand persons, all emigrating, including negroes of course. The fires of their encampments made the woods blaze in all directions. The lands of the Carolinians are being exhausted, and as there, the art of nourishing and invigorating lands is little practised upon, the planters are going to an untitled and to a more fertile country. Politics in South Carolina have had much to do in accelerating this emigration. From Georgia there has been less, hence large parts of Georgia are yet wild. The Cherokees are said to have some of the finest lands in that state, which Georgian cupidity is thirsting for with an insatiable passion. The gold fever and the land lotteries also do much towards retaining the population of Georgia, but the people will soon sweep over the Chatahoochee, and after settling on the best lands in the Creek nation, presently to be in the market, they will fill Alabama. Alabama, I should judge from what I have seen, is a fine and a growing state. The white people work. That is a good sign. They work in the fields. Negroes are scarce. And hence, perhaps, in part, the fine plantations I have spoken of before. Keep off the negroes; thin them off—and this people must be great, powerful, rich, for the sky and earth vie in bestowing upon the people the best of climates and the best of soil."

REDUCTION OF WAGES. We learn, with much regret, that peremptory orders have been received from the war department, to reduce the wages of the artisans employed in the army at Harper's Ferry 25 per cent. This is a serious event to the working citizens of that place—indeed it may be termed a calamity. We have not been in the habit of saying much in favor of the present administration, but really we feel confident that a reconsideration of this measure would move the authorities at Washington to a prompt and cheerful reversal of the order. We cannot believe that the president will suffer so large a body of useful and meritorious men to be reduced to a condition of absolute and fruitless idleness.

[Charleston, (Va.) Free Press.

¶ That there will be a general and heavy reduction of wages, we certainly expect. At many establishments, they have already been made—but twenty five per cent. is severe! One dollar and fifty cents a week deducted from the six dollars heretofore obtained for the support of a poor man's family, will deprive it of all the little comforts which the husband and father obtained for them by his labor. One or two dollars a week does not seem much to persons even in moderate circumstances, or possessed of some little capital in business—but is a large sum indeed, to those whose only capital is in the labor which they are able to perform.

GOLD. Three lumps—one weighing 10 dwts. a second 30 dwts. and the third "as large as a hen's egg," were lately found at Auraria, Geo. the latter by an Indian girl, who carefully concealed it.

NEW ORLEANS SUGAR. We are not a little surprised at the falling off of the exports of sugar from New Orleans within the last two or three years. The New Orleans Price Current of the 20th gives the following exports:

From Oct. 1, to April 20,	21,403 hhds.	1,952 bbls.
Same time last year,	26,830 hhds.	1,995 bbls.
Same, year before,	36,811 hhds.	1,962 bbls.

Thus it appears that the quantity exported is about 5,000 hhds. less than last year, and 15,000 less than the year previous. The surplus taken up the river, and through the lake to Mobile, is not taken into account, unless the increased consumption and the export up the river will account for the deficiency.

TIME AND SPACE.

Philadelphia and Norfolk, &c. Mails are now made up at Philadelphia, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, for Norfolk and Petersburg, on which days the Citizens' union, or rail road, line is met by the Norfolk steamboat, from Baltimore, at or near the mouth of the Patapsco, and the mails and passengers transferred—and thus they reach Norfolk at 7 A. M. on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays—being only about 25 hours from Philadelphia, or 33 from New York! A boat leaves Norfolk, and, in like manner, meets the boat from Baltimore in Hampton Roads, and proceeds for Petersburg and Richmond, arriving at 4 or 5 o'clock, on the days last above given—say about 35 hours from Philadelphia, or 43 from New York, to Petersburg or Richmond. Thus a person may take an early breakfast in Philadelphia, and a late dinner, on the following day, in Richmond. This seems "rapid" enough.

Baltimore and New York. On Monday last, an evening rail road line was started between Philadelphia and Baltimore, by which passengers from New York reach Baltimore at 10 or 11 o'clock in the evening—or 16 or 17 hours. We now have the New York morning, and the Philadelphia evening papers, on the days of their publication. It seems hardly possible that a person may now breakfast in New York, dine in Philadelphia, and sup in Baltimore, in regular order. But any man may.

Philadelphia and Baltimore. A great deal of activity and zeal is displayed concerning the continuous rail road between these cities, as mentioned in our last. It seems rendered almost certain that it will be made. We wish that it were constitutional in the government of the United States to provide for the safe and speedy transportation of the mails!! And so it is—that if the mails go on to increase as they have done for a few years past—we shall be compelled to amend the constitution, or leave some of them behind until the frost is completely out of the earth, in every spring, or employ many wagons to navigate through the mud.

More rail roads. We noticed in our last the bright prospect of a line of rail roads from Washington to New York. Books are about to be opened for subscriptions of stock to make a road from Philadelphia, through Lancaster to Middletown, Pa. with the idea of extending it to the Ohio, in due season.

The Morris canal, which unites the waters of Pennsylvania with those of New York, is in full operation, and doing a large business.

¶ The elasticity and warmth of the character of the American people, may happily correct the torpidity and coldness of their general government.

Dismal Swamp canal. We have the following in the Norfolk Herald of the 22nd ult.

Arrivals through the canal in April, 1833:
Schooners and sloops, loaded	146
Lighters, loaded	14
Rafts of timber	15

Returned, partly loaded:
Schooners and sloops	126

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. Georgetown, May 24. It is with real pleasure we announce that the canal and locks, as far as the eye can reach from Georgetown towards Crommelin, is literally covered with boats as close as they can stow, filled with flour and other produce. Not less than 15,000 barrels passed through the locks into the basin yesterday—more than 150 boats, it is said, were above the town, coming down. [Gazette.

The secretary of the navy has returned to Washington from his long excursion, of which the Globe gives the following account:

"We learn from a gentleman who accompanied him on his whole journey to our southern naval stations, that the secretary was absent fifty-two days, of which nineteen were spent in stops at different cities, and in the examination of the various public works connected with the navy and on maritime defences at the south, leaving only 33 days for travelling. It is a strong illustration of the conveniences and rapidity of communication through a large portion of the new and unsettled parts of our union, that during those 33 days he travelled a distance, in all, exceeding 4,200 miles—being equal to one-sixth of the circumference of the earth, and at an average rate of about 130 miles per day."

SALES OF WOOL, AT BOSTON. Great sales of wool took place at Boston, last week. They were attended by a large number of manufacturers and dealers. The catalogue, (says the Centinel), contained over 100,000 lbs. of fleece wool of very desirable qualities; 70,000 lbs. Nos. 1 and 2, pulled; 15,000 lbs. imported Saxony; 40,000 lbs. Spanish sheep and lamb's; 500 bales Buenos Ayres and Montevideo; 200 bales washed and unwashed Smyrna; besides several smaller parcels of coarse foreign wool. Notwithstanding the sale was fully attended and the wool advertised was of the most desirable kinds, there was but little spirit manifested, and only a very small portion of the wool was disposed of, prices considerably below the expectations of owners. We notice the following as the principal sales which were made, viz: 12,000 lbs. fleeces from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ blood merino, 43 a 45 cents; 3,000 lbs. $\frac{3}{4}$ to full blood merino 53 cents; 10,000 lbs. selected full blood merino and Saxony fleeces 62 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; 3,400 lbs. very good No. 2, pulled lambs at 41 cents; 18,000 lbs. No. 1, pulled, at 44 a 48 cents; 2,500 lbs. imported Saxony 80 cents; 5,600 lbs. do. do. 106 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; 4,500 do. do. 130 cents; 15 bales Spanish sheep's R. at 85 a 87 cents; 5 bales do. do. R. R. inferior, 77 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; 5 bales Spanish lamb's at 77 cents; 20 do. do. at 80 cents; 1 bale Saxony lamb's 93 cents, 10 bales unwashed Smyrna 18 cents; 10 do. do. very dirty 12 cents; 10 bales washed Barbary wool 26 cents, 300 bales fair Buenos Ayres 9 a 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; 8 do. do. very inferior, at 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents; 10 bales Constantinople at 16 cents; 27 bales mohair 44 a 48 cents. The low prices, in general, which were obtained, may be attributed mainly to the fact, that shearing is near at hand, at which it is expected there will be an unusually large clip.

The "Boston Gazette" adds—Since our report on the 24th inst. of the auction sale of this article, [wool] on the preceding day, there has been great activity in the market, and we learn that a large proportion of that which was withdrawn, (on account of the reluctance of manufacturers to purchase at public sale, under an impression that the prices would have an influence upon the article at shearing time), has been taken, by private contract, at the following advanced rates; ranging higher for each description than any sales for many months, embracing

8,000 lbs. New York pulled lamb's, at	50	cts. 6 mo.
6,500 " $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ blood fleece,	55	"
2,500 " No. 1, lamb's, pulled in this vicinity,	52 $\frac{1}{2}$	"
1,200 " superfine lamb's, do.	60	"
4,000 " New York pulled No. 1 lamb's,	60	"
12,000 " grade full blood and Saxony fleece,	64	"
700 " full blood and Saxony fleece,	75	"
4,000 " full blood, grade and Saxony,	64	"
6,000 " New York pulled No. 1 lamb's (ordinary)	46	"
7,000 " Philadelphia do. do.	48 $\frac{1}{2}$	"

Baring, Brothers & Co. write from London under date of April 6th, that "Woolens are advancing and wool high and quick, and not two months' stock in the kingdom for the manufacturers."

These are "fair" if not high prices; and, if continued, may do "very well."

THE LATE FLOODS. It is supposed that $300,000 worth of lumber have been lost in the Delaware, alone, by the late flood. The Ohio was forty-three feet above low water mark at Cincinnati about the 20th ult. and much damage had been done to fences, and the crops on the bottom lands.

There has been a great rise in the waters of the Kentucky river—which was also just then visited by large numbers of huge cat-fish. The Frankfort Commentator says that one was caught which weighed ninety pounds, and another forty, &c.

GREAT NATIONAL WORK. We are much gratified to learn that col. McKenney's history of the Indian tribes of North America, &c. (the publication of which was suspended because of the embarrassments of Mr. Bradford, who had a claim on the copy right), will speedily commence, Messrs. Key and Biddle, of Philadelphia, being the publishers.

The title of this work is a "History of the Indian Tribes of North America, with Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes of the Principal Chiefs—embellished with one hundred and twenty portraits, from the Indian gallery in the department of war, at Washington."

"The tribes represented in the gallery are eighteen in number, viz: Chippewas, (or Ojibwa), Sioux, Menomonee, Winnebago, Sauk, Fox, Otto, Pawnee, Maha, Kansas, Seneca, Shawnee, Delaware, Creek, (or Muscogee), Uchee, Cherokee, Choctaw, (or Chata) and Seminole.

"It is proposed to publish the work in twenty numbers, each to contain 6 heads. The impression will be on fine thick paper, corresponding to the value and size of the work, and to its intended perpetuity.

"An essay suited to such a work, and calculated to throw a light upon the history of this interesting people, will accompany the first number; and as materials will authorise it, the remaining numbers will be interspersed with biographical sketches, and anecdotes of the originals, and with vocabularies."

The original drawings were made from life, chiefly by Mr. King, of Washington, and are perfect likenesses.

"A map of the country will be carefully prepared, and the location of the several tribes represented in the publication, noted upon it."

It is believed "that there no where exists such materials for a work so unique, so interesting, and in all that regards the aborigines of America, so authentic and instructive. Its great value as it regards the United States, can be appreciated properly, perhaps, only by posterity; because the Indians, though thinned and scattered, are yet amongst us. Europe, it is believed, is prepared now to put the proper estimate upon the work. In order, therefore, that countries other than our own, may enjoy the gratification of beholding the red men of our forests, in their almost breathing likenesses, and in their native, and varied and singular costumes, arrangements will be made for publishing the work simultaneously in Europe.

"The price to subscribers for each number will be six dollars, to be paid on delivery."

We heartily wish success to this great undertaking, and trust that the execution of the work will be at once honorable to our country, and profitable to the publishers.

TRIAL OF MAGISTRATES. The mayor and aldermen of Boston were lately presented and tried, for having omitted to make a return of the votes given to Mr. Odiorne, the anti-masonic candidate for congress. The omission seems to have been purely accidental; it had not, nor could it have had, any bearing on the result, nor was moral turpitude imputed—and political effect, only, seems to have been regarded in this prosecution. It is hardly necessary to add that the jury found a verdict of not guilty.

"YANKEE NOTIONS." The "Boston Atlas" says—The amount in the hands of the committee for the benefit of the institution for the blind, is, we learn, $64,200.

Subscribed by individuals	$35,000
Received from the ladies fair	11,400
From Salem, &c.	4,200
Given annually by the state	3,300
On hand previously	5,500
Subscribed in Hartford	1,200

The citizens of Hartford have also pledged themselves to furnish the sum of $1,200 a year for three years, which makes the aggregate $64,200. The condition on which the gift of col. Perkins was based, has therefore been fulfilled by the liberality of the public, before the expiration of the time limited by his offer. The original proprietors of the asylum never could have anticipated so brilliant a termination of their labours.

[Here is true "chivalry"—within the sound of a halloo from Faneuil Hall, the "cradle of liberty," or BUNKER'S HILL.]

MORE "NOTIONS." In a late number of the "Military and Naval Magazine," we find an interesting notice of the old American frigate Alliance, from which it appears that, at the close of the revolutionary war, she was sold by the government, and purchased by Robert Morris; captain Green, with commodore Dale, in the capacity of chief mate, made the first voyage from Philadelphia to China, that ever was attempted. Little did they suppose at the time they started, that a small craft from Salem was on her way before them; but such was the fact; for on their arrival in the Indian ocean, they fell in with a small Yankee schooner, and on hailing her were answered, "from Salem." Captain Green inquired what charts they had; the answer was, "None, for there were none to be had, but have Guthrie's Grammar." This passage was performed out of season, and it is believed to have been the first ever made outside of New Holland by an American.

According to the Philadelphia Chronicle—the Alliance, after all her wonderful escapes from the enemy, and long and perilous voyages, died a natural death in that port, and her bones lay on Smith's Island, opposite the city, where she is used as a tavern, and is in excellent preservation. [Amcr.]

FOREIGN PAUPERS. There were in the almshouse, Boston, on the 15th ult. 160 white men and 134 white women, 82 white boys, and 59 white girls and 30 colored persons. Total 256 males and 208 females—altogether 464 persons.

Of the adult males 88 are foreigners—48 Irish; of the adult females 65 are foreigners, 36 Irish—of the children 105 are of foreign parents. So that of the whole number in the almshouse, 464, no less than 258, or considerably more than one-half are as foreigners. And this too, in Massachusetts, where the proportion of such persons is small—and so also is the general proportion of native paupers.

GERMAN EMIGRANTS. Baltimore appears to be a favorite point of debarkation to the emigrants from Germany. The New York Gazette has the following statement of the number of emigrants which departed last year from the single port of Bremen for the United States. Of the whole number it will be seen that three-fourths came to this city.

To Baltimore, in 60 vessels,	7,364
New York, in 25 vessels,	2,036
Philadelphia,	285
Charleston, S. C.	97
New Orleans,	20

Total, 9,802

AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION. This institution held its ninth anniversary in Philadelphia on Tuesday afternoon. The president, Alexander Henry, esq. presided. The reverend Dr. Spring, of this city, commenced the exercises with prayer. The annual report was read by the secretary—from this document we learn the following facts:

There are about 14,550 schools, with 760,000 scholars, in connection with the union.

Last year the increase was 1,600 schools, 12,000 teachers, 84,600 scholars.

Twenty thousand teachers and thirty thousand scholars have joined churches.

The publications have rapidly increased, 500,000 copies of one work have been circulated.

The establishment of Sunday schools in the valley of the Mississippi has been prosecuted, of which there are 4,245, and last year gave an addition of 1,328; to these 500,000 copies of books have been sent. The expenditure has been about $73,366, of which some states gave from $5,000 to $10,000, while one state (Illinois), contributed $1 00.

The operations of the union have been extended to Calcutta and Canton, and also to the Sandwich Islands. The pecuniary pressure upon the citizens last year was felt by the society, and $30,000 were borrowed upon individual responsibility.

The report set forth the entire harmony of various Christian denominations engaged in the work, and the books were calculated to preserve that harmony.

The report closed with a recommendation that all friends of Sunday schools should, on Thursday the 4th of July next, take measures to commence or improve the work of Sunday instruction in their neighborhood.

The expenditures during the year, chiefly in books, amounted to $127,379 55. Addresses were made by the rev. G. Perry, of the Baptist church, Philadelphia; Gerrit Smith, esq. of Petersboro', New York; rev. Dr. Milnor, of the Episcopal church, New York; hon. P. D. Vroom, of the Reformed Dutch church, New Jersey; rev. Mr. Cowles, of the Baptist church; rev. Mr. Plummer, of the Presbyterian church, Virginia, and the rev. Mr. Chickering, of Massachusetts.

RECEIPTS OF BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS. From the various reports made at the recent anniversary meetings in New York, it appears that the receipts of some of the principal societies for the last year have been as follows:

American Bible society	$84,935 48
American Tract do.	62,443 50
Presbyterian education do.	24,014 56
American home missionary do.	68,621 17
seamen's friend do.	9,226 00
N. Y. deaf and dumb institution	15,752 53

Total $364,993 24

COTTON SPINNING. The following account of the cotton spinning business, is taken from the Glasgow Chronicle of a late date; it cannot fail to prove important, both to our manufacturers and cotton growers.

1. France.—In 1831, cotton spun 74,000,000 lbs. besides the British yarn smuggled through Flanders. In Alsace, power looms are increasing fast. Average wages of spinners 5s. 8d. Hours of labor 12 to 14 hours.

2. Switzerland.—In 1831, cotton spun 18,816,000 lbs. No. 40 costs 14d. when cotton is 8 3-5d. Wages 4s. 5d. Wages in similar mills in Britain 8s. 4d. Swiss goods are successfully sold in South America in competition with British.

3. Prussian and Rhenish provinces.—In 1830, cotton spun 7,000,000 lbs. Power looms have been profitably introduced.

4. Saxony.—Cotton spinning just commencing, but fast augmenting. In 1831, cotton spun 1,900,000 lbs. Average wages 3s. 6d. They spin as cheap as the British, as high as No. 50 warp, and No. 80 weft.

5. Lombardy.—In 1831, cotton spun 4,000,000 lbs.

6. Austria.—Fast advancing. In 1831, 12,000,000 lbs. Average wages 3s. 9d.

7. India.—The new mill, 12 miles above Calcutta, works every day, 91 hours in the week. Spinner managing one mule earns 1s. 9d. His piecers (three in number) 9d. to 12d. each. No. 20 to No. 40.

8. United States.—In 1831, cotton spun 77,550,000 lbs.

These facts corroborate, beyond the range of rational dispute, the opinions which we have never ceased to inculcate, not merely that any further interference with the hours of adult labor in Britain is out of the question, but that, if the corn laws be not shortly repealed, our cotton trade will be ruined.

A LITTLE OF THE OLD LEAVEN. The following, addressed to the editors of the Salem Gazette, we hope, will receive the attention of government. Obsta principiis! The British must not be permitted to decide upon the character of seamen who sail under the "starry banner." We had enough of that.

Gentlemen—By publishing the following facts you will oblige the subscriber, and perhaps render a service to merchants who send their vessels to the Brazils. The ship London Packet, of Boston, put into Bahia in distress, being short of men, wanting repairs and provisions. Soon after her arrival, two men deserted, one an American the other an Irishman. They both signed the shipping articles to proceed the voyage, and were not to receive any part of their wages until the arrival of the ship at her port of discharge, at the city of Boston. The deserters called on Mr. Parkinson, the British consul, at Bahia, for assistance. He sent his clerk with the sailors, to bring a suit against the ship. I was summoned to appear before the judge. I handed the judge the shipping articles. One of the men being a landsman, had engaged for ten dollars per month, yet he was allowed to sue for the highest wages given to the best seamen. The judge decreed that I must deposite the sum of two hundred and sixty-three dollars to answer the decision of the court, or the ship would not be permitted to sail. The trial did not commence until after I had sailed. I have, within a few days, received a letter from Gilmer & Co. merchants at Bahia, informing me that the supreme court has given their decision against the ship.

B. K. CHURCHILL.

Salem, May 14, 1833.

THE KEMBLIES. The Boston Globe of the 17th May, said—Mr. Kemble had a splendid benefit last evening. The house was crowded to overflowing. The Gamster was played with even more ability than at the first representation. The Kembles have played 25 nights, and took half the gross receipts and half the premiums. The whole sum paid them must amount to at least $8,300, including their moiety of the premiums, which was $1,200. The gross receipts of the theatre could not have been less than fifteen thousand dollars. "As the curtain was about dropping, Mr. Kemble, anticipating the call of the audience, led his daughter forward, and in a brief but neat and feeling address, expressed, in his own and daughter's behalf, their grateful sense of the brilliant support which they had received in Boston, during their engagement, which had now terminated"—and he hoped they would have another opportunity of making their acknowledgments. He concluded by bidding his audience farewell, which was responded to by rounds of applause and cheers.

And the Boston Transcript gave quite a melting account of the departure of Fanny, "the peerless." A great crowd collected to see her depart, and pretty girls presented her with flowers; but she escaped through a private door, and was sometime on the road, before, (alack and alas!) it was discovered that she had gone.

NANTUCKET. This interesting little island is said to be in a very prosperous state, and the value of some of the town lots has increased 50 per cent. in the last five years. Its industry and enterprise extracts "the oil of gladness and rejoicing," from the distant and deep ocean.

WELLSBURG, Va. is a thriving town, in the western part of the state. Froin the "Gazette," published there, we abstract the following:

Many new houses are building. There is a cotton factory, with a front of 72 feet, and 4 stories high—now running 1,200 spindles and employing 53 persons; asaw mill which can cut 3,000 feet in 12 hours; a white flint glass works, employing 30 persons, to which is attached a cutting establishment; a large stone-ware manufactory; a woollen factory; a carding machine, and carpet factory, &c. and a salt manufactory. The population is between 1,300 and 1,500; and a branch of the Western bank of Virginia is located at Wellsburg. The neighborhood is rich and cheerful, and rapidly improving—the people feeling the benefit of the home market.

GEORGIA. The Milledgeville Journal of May 16, says—Major Joel Crawford, of Hancock county, was, on Tuesday evening last, unanimously nominated as a candidate for governor at the ensuing election, by a large and respectable meeting of the members of the Troup party, from all parts of the state.

CUBA. Mr. Magneen, of Glasgow, who has been making the tour of the British and foreign West Indies, states, in a letter to the editor of the Glasgow Courier, that "Cuba is increasing in importance quite incredibly. I hold in my hands," says he, "most valuable returns of that Island, and also Porto Rico. The crop of Cuba in one article, sugar exported in 1830, was in round numbers 196,000,000 lbs. and the increase of the slave population by importation, was in (1823 and 1829) two years, 179,000; Porto Rico is rapidly rising into importance. An immense African slave trade is carried on through the island of St. Thomas, to supply that island and Cuba with Africans. Ten, and even twelve, African slave ships may be seen in the harbor of St. Thomas together, taking their African cargoes, and frequently waiting the arrival of ships from Liverpool and the Clyde with the articles which are necessary to complete them."

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Paris papers to the 17th April.

The prisons of Frankfort, in Germany, are filled with persons arrested for political offences, or on account of the late commotion in that city. There was a rumor at Paris that a general insurrection had suddenly broken out in the Grand Duchy of Baden, in which three regiments of the line had embarked; and that these had been joined by a large body of Polish emigrants, who had fled from the several depots in France. The Poles are said to have been well supplied with money. It is added that Hesse Cassel was seriously disturbed. A very large number of Germans had arrived in France on their way to the United States—generally from Bavaria, and many of them persons of what is called the "better classes."

Everything yet remained quiet in France. At the close of the session of the chamber of deputies on the 14th of April, gen. Lafayette, accompanied by many of the members, waited upon M. de Broglie, to intercede for 423 Poles who had left the place assigned them, and who, by their departure, had brought themselves under the rigor of the ordinances of the government. The general spoke with great energy in their justification, and explained their motives. M. de Broglie is said to have promised to use his influence to mitigate the penalties they had incurred.

A committee has been raised in this chamber to examine the project of a law relative to the treaty with the United States.

The London Globe announces that it is the intention of the Irish government to enforce the provisions of the suppression bill, as well against the conservative party as against the agitators.

The affairs of Turkey have assumed a very serious character. Mehemed Ali declines foreign interference in his affairs. We do not hear of any further proceedings to protect the sultan.

Trouble is said to have broken out in Constantinople, and Ibrahim is reported to be again in the occupation of Smyrna. From Janina they write, that the European fleets stationed in the Archipelago have received orders to sail for the Dardanelles.

There is nothing new or important from Spain, Portugal or the Netherlands.

A letter dated Para, (Brazil), April 29, received in New York, says that the regency at Rio Janeiro had sent on to Para a new governor, who, on attempting to take the reins of government, was opposed by the mob. An engagement ensued, which continued from the 16th to the 18th ult. when upwards of 100 were killed, and a great many wounded. All the foreign vessels in port were chartered to take away persons and property, some proceeding to Maranhham and others to Lisbon. The new governor, failing to effect his object, left the place, and took passage for Maranhham.

Another, received in Boston, says—"On the 16th April, all business ceased; every mercantile house, as well as every dwelling house, was shut up, and many of the Portuguese and their families embarked on board the shipping in port. Things remained in a dreadful state of suspense until the 18th, when an open rupture took place. The president caused arms to be distributed amongst the mob, mostly blacks and mulattoes, and 'kill the Portuguese,' resounded through the streets of Para. A scene of horrid slaughter ensued. Men were hunted like wild beasts, and shot down with less regret. For two days, the city presented a scene too shocking to behold—too barbarously brutal to be believed of a Christian people. When they had sacrificed all the Portuguese that were to be found, carts were sent round the city, and the dead bodies conveyed away and tumbled promiscuously into a common grave."

It is said that an insurrection of the slaves has broken out at Demarara. A letter from the interior of Jamaica, dated 19 April, says the weather had been dreadful, the crop will not be half an average one. Negro grounds burnt up—not a spear of grass.

We have some further items by an arrival from England. An "ample reform" of the church of England, it is said, will be brought forward by the ministers.

The price of iron advances in England. Many petitions were still presented for the abolition of negro slavery. 3 per cent. consols 87—business at the stock exchange, dull. There were rumors of a change in the ministry—they do not seem relied on.

Mr. Colbett's son got 89 votes to represent parliament, from Coventry! Mr. Ellice had 1,509, and Mr. Thomas 1,206.

The "Irish Volunteers" have been dissolved—by proclamation. Outrages were still committed, and strong measures arranged to check them.

A grand "resurrection" in Germany seems to have been contemplated, and was yet apprehended. The plot exploded at Frankfort before its time. Young men seem to have been principally engaged in it. The Poles, in France, appear to have been generally informed of the intended proceedings. Perhaps, it is so said to oppress or expel them. An explosion is expected in Switzerland.

An "excitement" among the workmen is said to exist at Lyons, in France. The duchess of Berri is to be set at liberty, after her confinement. Admiral Roussin has requested that a French fleet may be immediately sent to the Dardanelles.

The affairs of Holland and Belgium are still in negotiation. Don Pedro had received considerable supplies at Oporto, and was preparing for offensive operations.

Greece seems to be settling down into some degree of quietness. Most of the chiefs had acknowledged the new king. A letter from Nauplia states, that among the decrees which have lately been promulgated by the Greek government is one which enjoins all Greeks, who are of age, to take the following oath: "I swear by the holy trinity, and on the holy gospel of Christ, to be faithful to my king, Otho, and to be obedient to the laws of Greece."

The apostolicals attempted an insurrection at Saragossa, in Spain, but they failed. A great deal of political intrigue is going on. Many distinguished persons had been banished from Madrid. The king has issued a decree, requiring that the provinces shall appoint deputies to pay homage to his daughter, as heiress apparent, in default of male issue. The august baby is a year or two old, we believe!

REMOVALS—OR "REFORMS."

The general, and rude and abominable denunciations which had lately been poured out by the "Globe," led us to expect that a common sweep of persons in office, at Washington, was intended—for "coming events cast their shadows before." The "Telegraph" asserted from 100 to 150 names were on a proscribed list, and added, that it had "the sanction of the president!"—saying, however, that all the heads of departments had not approved it.

We shall simply record certain of the things which have been published.

Extract from the Globe, of the 21st May.

"To deny that there are not among your friends a sufficient number of talented, experienced and efficient men to perform the duties required of public functionaries, would, indeed, be paying but a poor compliment to those by whom you were elected. If your friends are equally competent with your enemies, it is difficult to conceive why they are not brought into general requisition. Your opponents have charged you with proscription; or the charge be true, one would suppose from the number of political and personal enemies who are permitted to retain office, that it is rather a proscription of your friends than your enemies."

"The people are inclined by grateful feeling and by every consideration connected with your weighty and engrossing duties to bear disappointment from one who deservedly occupies so large a space in their affections, but they will naturally become dissatisfied with a continued disregard of their known wishes. Rumors of reform have from time to time reached the uttermost parts of the union, but the just expectations of the nation have not as yet been entirely fulfilled."

"Your friends have a right to expect that you will come forward with that magnanimity which is the characteristic of your soul, and tell the American people that you will remove every cause of complaint; that you are determined to redress the just grievances of which they complain; that no man shall have your confidence who has not the confidence of your constituents; and that you will no longer retain any individual in office contrary to the public will," &c. &c.

From the National Intelligencer, of May 25.

Washington, May 24.

GENTLEMEN: I have understood that a report has been circulated in this city, that I am one of the signers of a memorial which has been placed before the president, requesting the dismissal of a number of the clerks now in the employ of the government. I feel insulted and indignant at a charge of this description; and those who know me will readily believe that I am one of the last individuals to whom any person would dare to present such a document for signature. Having learned that all those in the public offices who are possessed of any talent, education, or moral worth, are amongst the proscribed, I am proud enough to believe that my name is upon the list, and that this has created the misapprehension. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES R. M. BRYANT.

From the same of May 27.

The reader will have learnt, from paragraphs and communications in this paper, (another of which, from a worthy neighbor of ours, is published to-day), that a list has been actually made out of persons to be denounced to the executive, for removal from office, and that such a list has been circulated in this city for signatures. We do not know the name of a single individual concerned in this remarkable enterprise, by which a reform is proposed to a greater extent than has been heretofore thought of, justifying all the sinister deductions from the late publications in the official paper in this city, intended to urge the executive to second the views of those professing friends of the administration who are concerned in this project. The list is said to have been placed in the hands of the executive. We have received what purports to be a synopsis of the list, of the correctness of which we cannot be certain, though in general terms assured of it. To show how wide the meditated sweep of the besom of reform is, we annex this synopsis, such as we have seen a copy of it; repeating that we cannot vouch for its accuracy.

*These matters are addressed to the president of the United States, teaching him what he should do.

REG.

Register's office—The register himself, his chief clerk, and seven other clerks.

Land office—The chief clerk, and eleven other clerks.

War office—The secretary of war, his chief clerk, and eleven other clerks.

Bounty lands—One clerk.

Indian office—Two clerks.

Quartermaster general's office—One clerk.

Army paymaster general's office—The paymaster general, his chief clerk, and two other clerks.

Army subsistence department—One clerk.

Army surgeon general—The surgeon general.

Navy department—One clerk.

Navy commissioners—One of the commissioners.

General post office—Two of the heads, the chief clerk, and twenty-five other clerks.

And, lastly, the commissioner of the public buildings in Washington.

To most of our readers it will be needless information, but to others it may be useful to state, that a very large proportion of the persons included in the above list are among the most able, faithful, experienced officers, and respectable citizens, that ever have held public employments under the government of the U. States.

The following is the article alluded to in the preceding—it is addressed to the editors:

GENTLEMEN: Some six or eight days ago, a paper was handed to me for my signature, purporting (as I understood by a hasty perusal), to be, an address from the citizens of Washington to the president of the United States, requesting the president to remove from office, all clerks under government that have and do justify the outrageous attack recently made upon him, by ex-lieutenant Randolph, and all others that have calumniated and abused the president, as well as those of loose, idle and dissipated habits. I signed the paper hastily, without asking any questions, (as my feelings had been recently greatly excited on account of the attack made upon the president by Randolph), much now to my regret, as I understand that additions have been made to the paper, with a list of about one hundred and fifty clerks, among whom are some of our most respectable and worthy citizens, accompanied with charges, &c. which I never knew nor ever heard any thing about. I would sooner thrust my hand into a red hot furnace than to let my name have gone forth to support charges, for proscription, that I never knew nor ever heard any thing of, and I do most cordially hope that those persons engaged in making the additions, and appending a list of the names of clerks, with charges, &c. to the paper, after my signature was had, if clerks, may meet with that rebuke from the president, heads of departments and citizens, generally, that such conduct justly merits; and I do disclaim ever having held any conversation, or had any intercourse at any time directly or indirectly with any of the parties concerned, in any way or shape.

From the National Intelligencer of May 28.

The article which follows this paragraph was published in the daily National Intelligencer of yesterday. Having reserved it for one day to see whether it would be contradicted in any particular, we now re-insert it for the special benefit of our country readers. No error has been pointed out to us in the list except the omission of the treasurer of the United States, who is included in the general denunciation, and the insertion of the secretary of war, whose name, we are informed, was not on the list of the proscribed, as stated yesterday.

From the Globe of May 28.

The Intelligencer heads an article "Proscription"—gives a list of proscribed officers, and says:

"We have received what purports to be a synopsis of the list, of the correctness of which we cannot be certain, although in general terms assured of it."

We have not seen the list of which the Intelligencer speaks—nor "the address of the citizens of Washington to the president," on the subject, of which the "worthy neighbor" of the editor, speaks as being signed by himself, but we have made it our business to see one of the citizens principally concerned in getting up the paper mentioned, and we are authorised, not "in general terms," but particularly to state, that the list or synopsis of the Intelligencer is false—false in the most material points.

From the National Intelligencer of May 29.

After quoting the preceding paragraph from the "Globe"—"The material point," in this extraordinary piece of business, is, unquestionably, that a proscription list has been got up, to be presented to the executive. That fact, hitherto only currently reported, is now acknowledged and avowed by the official organ of the executive. The conductor of it has made it his business "to see one of the citizens principally concerned." He knew, therefore, who were concerned—"in getting up the papers mentioned;" and he is authorised—authorised to do what? To declare that there is no proscription list in existence? Or, that such list bears no resemblance to the synopsis which was shown to us, and which we have imparted to our readers? Not at all. The fact of its existence is undeniable, however at first incredible. But the official editor is authorised to state that the synopsis is false in the most material points.

"Now we undertake to say, that our account of it falls short of the truth, instead of exceeding it."

"Two errors we have already acknowledged, viz: the omission from our list of the name of the very respectable treasurer of the United States, and the insertion of that of the secretary of war. [The proscription has kindly spared him.] These perhaps, are the material errors referred to. No others have been suggested to us. It is now rumored, however, that, instead of a hundred and fifty, or thereabouts, the list actually bears a hundred and seventy names, the additional number being clerks. It is also reported, but we doubt the truth of the report, that the commissioner of the general land office is on the list."

"There is one way of settling all doubts as to what the list is or is not. Let it be published. Let the official editor obtain a copy of it from the executive, or from the gentleman whom he made it his business to see, who was principally concerned in getting it up. We shall then know who were the destined victims of this proscription. We challenge the publication of it. The people of the United States, not to speak of the denounced, have a right to demand that publicity be given to the whole transaction."

From the same of May 30.

The Baltimore Gazette, in an editorial article under Tuesday's date, suggests as probable that the proscription list, the existence of which is now acknowledged, was made out on other than political principles. Certainly it was; for the prominent persons denounced are of the original Jackson school of politicians. But, if the editor of the Gazette supposes that the denunciation is founded on any defect in morals or capacity in the denounced, he is entirely out in his conjecture. As to nine-tenths of the persons denounced no pretence of the kind can be set up. The larger proportion of the persons denounced are gentlemen of distinguished moral standing as well as intellectual and practical ability.

On the general subject an article in the "Pennsylvanian" says—

"Let the democracy of the nation be awakened to its majestic strength, and sustain our beloved chief magistrate, in emphatically cleansing the 'Augean stable.'" Let not his venerable form, which has so often breasted the cannon's mouth, and shed its courageous blood for our liberty and independence, be polluted with impunity, by the unwholesome touch of the pitiful wretch who becomes the daring leader of defaulters, drones and slanderers of the people's rights, and the democracy of the union."

SISTERS OF CHARITY.

While gratifying ourselves in recording the following articles, we think it also a duty to publish them.

Mayor's office, Baltimore, November 3d, 1832.

REV. A. J. ELDER: DEAR SIR—The duties assigned me, as mayor of the city of Baltimore, being concluded this day, I cannot retire to the quietude of private life, without acknowledging the obligation which the board of health and myself are under to you, sir, for your persevering attention to our afflicted fellow citizens, and through you to those invaluable Sisters of Charity, whose benevolent conduct has been of such essential utility in alleviating the horrors incident to the fatal epidemic, which a short period since, raged in our city. But, their attention to the sick was not the only service rendered by the Sisters of Charity; they voluntarily furnished clothing, at their own expense, to the destitute orphans of those who fell victims to the cholera; thus exhibiting the purest system of unostentatious charity that could have been devised.

At the hospitals, their labor and attention became so important, and their exertions so incessant, that, even they, were often physically exhausted, and required the helping hand of others. At this time, the Sisters of Charity at the orphan asylum, and the infirmary freely tendered their sisterly assistance to smooth the path of anxiety and care, of those especially devoted to the hospitals.

But, it surely is a solemn consideration, that the Sisters of Charity will retire with two less of their number, than when they commenced their labor of love, in Baltimore.

The rapacious and desolating scourge, with indiscriminate violence, seized sisters MARY FRANCIS and MARY GEORGE, and transferred their administering spirits to regions of peace and tranquility. We humbly bow in submission to the Divine dispensation, confiding in the evangelist who saith "blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

The board of health and myself, have deemed it an imperious duty, in behalf of the citizens of Baltimore, to express our warmest gratitude, and deepest sense of obligation, for those services which were given, without compensation: thereby, leaving us doubly your debtors.

Be pleased, therefore, my dear sir, to tender the sincere and grateful thanks of the board of health and myself, to sisters Barbara, Clure, Lacadia, Julia and Euprozene, at hospital No. 2—to sisters Mary Paul, Domelella, Mary Jane and Mary James, at hospital No. 3—to sisters Ambrosia, superior of the infirmary; and also, to Henrietta, Dorothea, Hillaria, Octavia, Delphine and Chrysostom, of that institution—to sisters Felicity, superior of the orphan's asylum; and also, to Camilla, Bernerdine, Marcellina Brozila and Alphonso, of that institution, for their unwearied attention to the sick of cholera; and although they will receive no pecuniary remuneration from us, yet I humbly hope, their reward is registered in heaven.

I remain, dear, sir, yours, and the sisters of charity's obliged friend, and humble servant, WILLIAM STEUART,
Mayor of the city of Baltimore.

Philadelphia, May 20, 1833.

At a meeting of the board of guardians the following preamble and resolutions were adopted, and the letter referred to, ordered to be published.

Whereas, a written communication has been received by this board from the rev. John Hickey, superior of the sisters of charity, intimating, for reasons therein stated, that it is his intention to recal the sisters now in the almshouse, as soon as this board shall have had time to supply their place; And whereas it is proper that some testimony should be borne to the zeal, fidelity and disinterestedness which these amiable philanthropists have exhibited: Therefore,

Resolved, That this body entertain a deep, lasting and grateful sense of the generous devotedness—the serene and Christian kindness, and the pure and unworried benevolence which have prompted and sustained the Sisters of Charity attached to this institution, during the trying period of pestilence and death, and afterwards in the midst of constant suffering and disease.

Resolved, That the invaluable services of these amiable women have been productive of lasting benefit to this institution, in the admirable and energetic measures which they have introduced for the relief and comfort of the sick and afflicted, and entitle them to the warmest thanks and gratitude of the whole community, which has been benefited by their labors.

Resolved, That this body, in parting from the Sisters of Charity, regret that the rules and habits of the order to which the sisters belong, do not admit the acceptance of any reward, as it would give them pleasure to bestow such a testimonial as might serve partially to express the grateful feelings which they entertain.

Resolved, That in permanent testimony of our feeling in this regard, the above resolutions be recorded in the minutes of this board.

To the board of managers of the Philadelphia almshouse.

GENTLEMEN: When your board made application through bishop Kenrick for the SISTERS OF CHARITY, the ravages of the cholera among the unfortunate inmates of the institution over which you preside, required that your request should be immediately complied with. It was a crisis of pestilence which demanded prompt decision on the part of the superiors of the sisters at Emmetsburg, and accordingly eight of their number immediately set out to meet the exigency.

It has never since been in our power to ascertain, by actual observation, how far their continuance in your institution would be in accordance with the charitable end of our society, and with the religious retirement and the exercises of piety peculiar to its members.

Being now on the spot, and having made all the inquiries necessary to determine my judgment, I feel it my duty, gentlemen, to advise you that I do not consider their long continuance in the almshouse to be that department of charity in which they can be most usefully employed. With all the good will and kindness which you gentlemen have manifested in their regard, I do not perceive that, consistently with the principle on which the institution is founded, supported and governed, it is in your power to secure to them those opportunities of practicing the duties of their state of life, according to their rules—that protection of their feelings from the rude assaults of such persons as are necessarily in your institution, and who regard it as their own, whilst they look upon those who minister to their comfort, as servants paid for doing it—or that security from misrepresentations of motives and action, to which a few retiring and timid females are necessarily exposed, laboring amidst such a population of paupers.

Besides, in every case of legal provision for the poor the expenses of attending them are included, the places occupied by the sisters might afford employment to others who stand in need of it, for the sake of an emolument which enters not into the motives that influence the sisters or their superiors. Consequently, the poor would be attended to in your institution—whilst the sisters could be employed in other departments of charity, where the unhappy sufferers have to depend on a mere pecuniary support; where the orphans will look on them as mothers, and the sick as sisters. Where theirs will be the task to plant the seeds of virtue and education in the minds of poor children, whose poverty and wretched parents sometimes conspire to deprive them of both, unless such facilities be afforded.

Trusting, gentlemen, that you will appreciate these motives, I beg leave to say, that after allowing such time as you may think requisite to have their places supplied by others, it is my intention to recal the sisters who are now in the almshouse.

In making this communication, gentlemen, permit me to say that no complaint has been made by the sisters against any member of your board, but on the contrary, every testimony has been borne to the kindness and zeal for their comfort, which you have manifested, individually and collectively, in their regard, during the whole time of their stay in your institution, and for which permit me, gentlemen, in their name, to return you my unfeigned thanks. I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN HICKEY,
Superior of the Sisters of Charity.

Upwards of 41,000 persons, as appears by printed returns from the associations, have been added to the churches by baptism, during the last associational year; 2,425 of these churches have no pastors. It being the fact that no returns for 1832, were received from several associations in North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and a few other states, the editor of the Register infers, that the above tabular aggregate of baptisms, falls considerably below the actual number. The probability, in his opinion, is, that about fifty thousand were baptized in the denomination during the year.

LIFE OF JOHN JAY.

"The Life of John Jay, with selections from his correspondence and miscellaneous papers," by his son, William Jay, has lately been published in New York. Mr. Jay died in 1829, aged 84 years. Few men had filled a larger space in public life than he did. He was one of the best and most zealous members of the old congress, the first chief justice of the United States, &c.

We have not seen the work; but feel much pleasure in copying the following from the "New York American." It places Mr. Jay in a most worthy and honorable light—and we heartily rejoice in it. "National honor is national strength;" and that honor is materially connected with the reputation of our prominent citizens. His submission to instructions, while rendering his objections to the broad scope of them, is an admirable instance of what is now claimed as the true "democratic" principle.

A truly American feeling on every question with foreigners respecting the rights and dignity of his country, was a marking trait in the character and conduct of Mr. Jay. Under the pressure of adverse circumstances congress suffered themselves, in 1781, to receive the dictation of the French minister as to the terms on which alone American ministers in Europe should treat for peace with England; and they actually agreed, on the proposition of M. Gerard, to insert in the instructions of their ministers the following paragraph additional to that in which the American functionaries were directed to repose full confidence in, and freely to consult the French cabinet—"and ultimately to govern yourself by their advice and opinion." John Adams, then minister in France, having been found of too sturdy honesty, and too sagacious judgment, for the purposes of count de Vergennes, congress was induced, chiefly by the importunity of the French minister in Philadelphia, to associate other four commissioners with him, in order to treat of peace. The persons selected were John Jay, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin and Henry Laurens. Mr. Jay, when he received his new commission with the instructions just alluded to, was in Madrid. How they affected him will be perceived by the following letter—admirable not less for unaffected personal humility, than for high and genuine pride of country:

St. Ildefonso, 20th Sept. 1781.

To the president of congress.

Sir—Your excellency's favor of the 5th July past, with the papers therewith enclosed, were delivered to me on the 29th ult. by major Franks, whom the procrastination of the minister still obliges me retain.

The new commissions with which congress have honored me, argue a degree of confidence which demands my warmest acknowledgments; and which, so far as it may be founded on an opinion of my zeal and integrity, they may be assured will not prove misplaced.

At the commencement of the present troubles, I determined to devote myself, during the continuance of them, to the service of my country, in any station in which she might think it proper to place me. This resolution, for the first time, now embarrasses me. I know it to be my duty, as a public servant, to be guided by my own judgment only in matters referred to my discretion; and, in other cases, faithfully to execute my instructions without questioning the policy of them. But there is one among those which accompany the commissions, which occasions sensations I never before experienced, and induces me to wish that my name had been omitted.

So far as personal pride and reluctance to humiliation may render this appointment disagreeable, I view it as a very unimportant circumstance; and should congress, on any occasion, think it for the public good to place me in a station inferior and subordinate to the one I now hold, they will find me ready to descend from the one, and cheerfully undertake the duties of the other. My ambition will always be more gratified in being useful than conspicuous; for, in my opinion, the solid dignity of man depends less on the height or extent of the sphere allotted to him, than on the manner in which he may fulfil the duties of it.

But, sir, as an American, I feel an interest in the dignity of my country, which renders it difficult for me to reconcile myself to the idea of the sovereign independent states of America submitting, in the persons of their ministers, to be absolutely governed by the advice and opinion of the servants of another sovereign, especially in a case of such national importance.

That gratitude and confidence are due to our allies is not to be questioned; and that it will probably be in the power of France almost to dictate the terms of peace for us, is but too true.

That such extraordinary extent of confidence may stimulate our allies to the highest efforts of a generous friendship in our favor, is not to be denied; and that this instruction receives some appearance of policy from this consideration, may be admitted.

I must, nevertheless, take the liberty of observing, that however our situation may, in the opinion of congress, render it necessary to relax their demands on every side, and even to direct their commissioners ultimately to concur (if nothing better can be done) in any peace or truce not subversive of our independence, which France may be determined to accede to, yet that this instruction, besides breathing a degree of complacency not quite republican, puts it out of the power of your ministers to improve those chances and opportunities which, in the course of human affairs, happen more or less frequently unto all men. Nor is it clear that America, thus casting herself into the arms of the king of France, will advance either her interest or reputation with that or other nations.

What the sentiments of my colleagues on this occasion may be, I do not as yet know; nor can I foresee how far the negotiations of the ensuing winter may call for the execution of this commission. Thus circumstanced, and at such a distance from America, it would not be proper to decline this appointment. I will, therefore, do my best endeavors to fulfil the expectations of congress on this subject; but as for my own part, I think it improbable that serious negotiations for peace will soon take place, I must entreat congress to take an early opportunity of relieving me from a station where, in character of their minister, I must necessarily receive and obey (under the name of opinions) the directions of those on whom I really think no American minister ought to be dependent, and to whom, in love for our country, and zeal for her service, I am sure that my colleagues and myself are at least equal. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN JAY.

TRIAL OF THE REV. EDWARD IRVING.

From late English papers.

The hearing of this case, which was a charge of heresy, against the celebrated rev. Edward Irving, of London, came on before the presbytery of Annan on Wednesday last. The proceedings were opened with a prayer, after which the indictment was read, which charged the rev. defendant with maintaining the sinfulness of Christ in his human nature. He had written that the devil tempted because he knew our Lord to be temptable; that human nature was corrupt to the heart's core, and black as hell; and this was the human nature which the son of God took upon himself, &c. &c. Numerous passages from the writings of the accused were read. In consequence of the promulgation of these doctrines, the general assembly of Scotland had enjoined the presbytery of Annan to call upon the rev. Edward Irving to avow or disavow them; in order that, if he avowed therein, he might be deposed from that station in the church of Scotland to which the presbytery of Annan, by the imposition of hands, ordained him. The moderator inquiring if he admitted the truth of the libel, Mr. Irving, with great solemnity, replied—"If I have said and taught that Christ was fashioned as a man—that he took our sinful nature upon him—but by the grace of God he was upheld, and yielded not to the motions of that sinful nature—then it is a glorious doctrine, and I will maintain it, yea, even unto death." Moderator—"It is necessary that you answer aye, or no." The rev. Edward Irving—"What I do hold is, that the flesh of Christ, being of the seed of David—born of a woman—was sinful; but that it was presented holy unto God—holy, holy as the law of God itself. And surely you do not call this a true libel." After some fencing, a plea was recorded that the accused admitted the correctness of the extracts. The members of the presbytery then delivered their opinions, seriatim, that the doctrine in question was heretical, inasmuch as Christ was conceived of the Holy Ghost; and, although a man, was without sin. During these addresses, Mr. Irving kept his face buried in his hands, and often sighed aloud. Mr. Irving delivered an eloquent and earnest address, which lasted nearly two hours. His spirit-stirring eloquence, his extraordinary appearance, his great physical powers, his gestures, his intonations, all combined to command the utmost attention, and to make, it was obvious, a deep impression. The presbytery unanimously pronounced his doctrines heretical, and the moderator asked him if he had any objection why sentence of deposition should not be pronounced. Mr. Irving rose and said, with great vehemence, "objection? all objection! objection? all objection! I object not for my own sake, but for the sake of Christ, my Lord, whom I serve and honor. I object for your sakes, who will thus call down on your heads the righteous wrath of God. I object for the church's sake, who are led blindfold to ruin. Objection! All objection!" The moderator requested the senior member of the presbytery to offer up a prayer, when a gentleman who sat with Mr. Irving, and who was said to be one of his deacons from London, arose and with great vehemence exclaimed, "depart! depart! arise and flee! flee ye out of her! ye cannot pray to Christ whom ye deny! depart! depart! I say depart! flee, flee!" Great consternation and confusion now began to prevail, and the church being almost dark, (for it was 7 o'clock), added to them not a little. The deacon, who seemed greatly excited, made his way forcibly through the crowd. (Here there was a burst of hisses from the galleries.) Mr. Irving, who was proceeding to follow his friend, then exclaimed, also with great vehemence, and apparently to the crowd that somewhat obstructed his passage. "Stand forth! stand forth! What! will ye not obey the Holy Ghost! As many as will obey the voice of the Holy Ghost, let them depart!" He then made his way towards the door, and just before reaching it, he exclaimed, "prayer, indeed out!" Several gentlemen of Mr. Irving's party followed. In the midst of great confusion, Mr. Sloan offered up a brief prayer; after which, the moderator formally pronounced the sentence of deposition of the rev. Edward Irving from the ministry of the church of Scotland.

UNITED STATES BANK INTEREST.

The New Orleans Mercantile Advertiser furnishes the detailed report of a judicial decision in the U. S. district court, in favor of the rules adopted by the bank of the United States in the calculation of interest.

The suit was brought by the bank for the recovery of $1,000, being the amount of a promissory note dated 14th of June last, at four months. It was discounted on the 3d of July, having 103 days to run, but the bank added the four days of grace, making it 107 days, for which they took discount. No objection was made to the addition of the four days grace, but the payment was refused, upon the ground of usury, against the 9th article of the charter, because the bank had calculated its discounts by Rowlett's tables, which are based upon 360 days for the year, and thirty days for the month; and that this calculation of six per cent. for 360 days instead of 365, was a violation of that part of the charter which provides that the bank shall not receive "more than six per centum per annum." In the present case the difference was twenty-five cents.

The point has never been decided in the U. S. courts. The select committee of the house of representatives of March, 1832, reported in favor of this usage as one that "conformed to the established, and it is believed universal usage in the United States prevailing among individuals as well as in monied institutions, and to the most approved tables (Rowlett's) heretofore in use"—but no judicial decision has ever been had upon the point.

Judge Harper examined the question at length in the case before him, and decided that neither the provisions of the charter, the congressional expositions of it, the policy of the rule, nor the general custom of banks and merchants, sustained the plea of usury against the bank.

It is to be noted that in Louisiana, where this contract was made, there is no statute against usury, and there being no United States law on the subject, the legal points were on the construction of the charter, and general principles of law. The well known New York case, of the bank of Utica against Wager, in which this same rule of calculating interest was decided to be usurious, differs from this in its being that of a state bank, violating an express statute of the state. The judge further suggested that usury in the bank would not void the security. The charter imposes no specific penalty. The remedy is on the part of the government for a breach of charter, not in the individual to make his obligations void.

It seems from a part of the judge's charge that he was expected to lean against the institution because of his opposition to its recharter. He says,

"As to the argumentum ad hominem, touching independence of decision, and the patriotism of lending judicial aid in breaking down an institution which like an incubus weighs heavily on the body politic, I will only say, that however much I may condemn the general principles upon which it is founded, as a politician, yet, as it has received the sanction of all the properly constituted authorities, it is my duty, as a judge, to uphold it in the exercise of all its legal rights."

This was an action of trespass vi et armis, false imprisonment; and brought in the circuit court of the United States, Pennsylvania district, and tried before judges Baldwin and Hopkinson. The jury were empanelled on Monday, the 29th April, and the case was closed on the 7th ult. The trial has been one of the most interesting ever held in a court, and excited an intense interest during its progress.

The following is a brief outline of the circumstances:

Some time previous to the month of October, 1822, negro Jack, a slave, the property of the plaintiff, absconded from his master, residing near Princeton, New Jersey, fled to the county of Montgomery, in Pennsylvania, in the neighborhood of Hartborough, commonly called the Billet, and there was hired by the defendants, John and Isaac Kenderdine. On Sunday morning, the 20th of October, 1822, the plaintiff, with his brother, Ralph Johnson, and his friends, Messrs. Withington and Skilmore, left Princeton, crossed the Delaware; and about an hour before sunset, arrived at the Billet, for the purpose of securing and taking up Jack as a runaway slave. They put up at the best known tavern in the village, then kept by Mr. Marples. Upon ascertaining where Jack was, they left their great coats and umbrellas at Marples', and proceeded to the residence of the defendant, John Kenderdine, who lived about four miles from the Billet. They previously ordered their supper to be ready on their return, and mentioned to Marples (the landlord) the object of their visit, and what they were about to do. About dusk, they arrived at Kenderdine's—there was sickness in the family, and the male members of the family were from home. Three of the four Jersey party left the wagon in the road, and went to the kitchen of the mansion house and knocked at the door. They were told to walk in, when one of them said an accident had happened to their wagon, and they wished help. In an instant Jack was recognized—they then said no accident happened, but that they used this precaution to secure him. Jack agreed to go at once. He was placed in the wagon with fetters, and upon returning to the house and making an ineffectual attempt to obtain Jack's clothes, the party proceeded to return to the Billet. There was contradictory testimony as to certain threats alleged to have been made in and on the road by the associates of the plaintiff, but it was proved that they declared that if they would go with them to the Billet, they would satisfy Isaac Kenderdine that they had the right to take Jack.

Before they started, Isaac Kenderdine had arrived at his brother John's house, and demanded their authority to take Jack. The taking was conducted so quietly that it was not heard in the sick room up stairs.

Before the party had got back to the Billet, they were overtaken by John and Isaac Kenderdine, and a large assemblage of persons who had been collected; were attacked with stones and clubs; the plaintiff received a blow which produced a contusion on the side of the head, and the physician pronounced it a serious wound. When they arrived at the Billet, they were surrounded by a mob of 40 or 50 persons, and were compelled to go at once to judge McNeil, an associate judge of Montgomery county, to prove their property. The plaintiff being very weak, begged to stay till morning. This was refused, and the plaintiff and one of his associates rode in their wagon, and the other two walked to the residence of the judge. Among the crowd were the defendants, Tompkins, a justice of the peace, and the constable Silas Roney, who was at that time only a spectator. When they arrived at the residence of judge McNeil, a partial hearing took place, and the judge recommended a further hearing as to the slavery of Jack, and that in the mean time justice Tompkins should commit Jack to jail, and bind over the plaintiff and his associates to prosecute his claim. John and Isaac Kenderdine went to justice Tompkins and entered security in $800 for the appearance of Jack to answer the claim of his master. The constable and the mob then conducted the Jersey party back to the tavern, and kept them in custody till the next day.

The defendant gave in evidence that judge McNeil had directed John Kenderdine to bring the plaintiff and his party before him, by force, if they resisted, but judge McNeil stated that he meant legal force, and when they were before him, seeing a justice of the peace (Tompkins) and the constable (Roney) in company, he believed they were brought before him by legal authority.

During the night, Withington escaped and came to the city, and it was supposed gave information to the friends of the plaintiff of his detention; the remaining three were treated with great severity, being refused even a bed. Before daylight on Monday morning, a compromise was agreed to by all the parties who were present, and the plaintiff offered to manumit Jack and pay the expenses. A message was despatched to John Kenderdine to obtain his consent, but he peremptorily refused, declaring they should be prosecuted. On Monday morning, the three Jerseymen were taken before Justice Tompkins, and security in $6,000 was required of them to answer the charge of kidnapping. The plaintiff and his party not being able at that time to give the security, the justice was proceeding to write a commitment, when the constable interposed and said he would be security for their appearance on the next day. They were accordingly conducted back to Marples's tavern and remained there under custody till the next day, Tuesday. During the second night, John Kenderdine, and eight or ten of his friends, came to the tavern, and insisted upon taking charge of the prisoners; some of the party behaved with great rudeness. The constable remonstrated, but they persisted, and he withdrew from the charge. On Tuesday the friends of the Jersey party arrived from Newtown, in Bucks county, and the city of Philadelphia, and they entered into security in $2,000, respectively, and one security in the like sum to appear at the next court of quarter sessions, to answer the charge of kidnapping. John and Isaac Kenderdine were bound over to testify against them. The grand jury examined the witnesses for the prosecution, and returned a true bill. At the trial at Norristown, Montgomery county, before the petit jury, great excitement against Johnson and his co-defendants, prevailed. A subscription was made to employ additional counsel to aid the attorney general in conducting the prosecution; after a long and arduous trial, the defendants were acquitted, and negro Jack was delivered up to his master, Caleb Johnson, the present plaintiff, by order of judge Jones, one of the judges of the court of common pleas of Montgomery county.

There never was any authority in writing, either warrant or commitment, to detain the Jersey party; there never was any hearing on oath or affirmation, nor was there any complaint made on oath or affirmation before judge McNeil or justice Tompkins on Monday; the evidence was contradictory whether any complaint on oath or affirmation was made before justice Tompkins on Tuesday.

On the present trial there was no dispute that Jack was a slave—since his restoration to his master he had manumitted him. Jack was now living near to his master in the vicinity of Princeton, and had attended the last court as a witness for the plaintiff, when the trial was postponed. Caleb Johnson the plaintiff was a farmer of considerable wealth and unexceptionable character, it appeared also that the defendants were men of moderate property, also of fair character and highly respectable members of the society of friends.

Separate suits brought by Ralph Johnson and Skilmore were pending, and prosecutions against seven of the defendants for the penalties of $500, each imposed for obstructing the recovery of fugitive slaves under the act of congress of 12th February, 1793.

A wide range was taken by the respective counsel in their addresses to the jury. The abstract merit of slavery, the importance of securing to the owners of slaves, their rights, and the impolicy and injustice of conniving at the escape of fugitive slaves were fully considered and discussed.

On the part of the plaintiff it was contended that this was a high handed violation of all law and authority on the part of the defendants, and that they should be punished with most exemplary severity.

The counsel of the defendants justified them in every part of their conduct, and contended that in points of law as well as merit, they were entitled to an acquittal.

The court, in a most able and decided charge, instructed the jury, that the plaintiff and his associates were justified in every step that they had taken to recover the slave; that the preservation of the union depended on the affording to the owners of slaves all legal and proper facilities to recover their property; that the proceedings of the defendants from the commencement to the conclusion had been without color of authority, and in direct violation of the constitution of the United States, and the state of Pennsylvania, and the only questions were, which of the defendants had participated in those irregularities, and what amount of damages should be given. The jury retired the 6th instant, and some day came into court with a verdict for the plaintiff of $4,000, and a verdict of not guilty against the other defendants—Jacob Lumpkin, John E. Kenderline, Thomas Kenderline, Robert Kenderline, and Thomas Iredell, Henry Sandman, Samuel Gray.

The jury, we understand, formally requested judge Baldwin to furnish a copy of his charge for publication.

Counsel—Thomas Kittera and Josiah Randall, esquires, for the plaintiffs: Wm. Raele, jr. and John Sergeant, esquires, for the defendants.

[Q—The opinion of the court shall be inserted in extenso—though its length is great.]

GEORGIA CONVENTION.

On Monday, the 13th of May, the convention took up the report of the committee, and the substitutes offered by several members.

After some debate, the convention agreed to take up a substitute offered by Mr. Mays, of DeKalb, by sections. The first section provides for the organization of the senate, and divides the state into senatorial districts, of two counties each, without regard to population, &c. A motion to strike out two was decided in the negative, yeas 114, nays 128. A substitute offered by Mr. Bowen, of Jackson, was also negatived, yeas 93, nays 150. The question was then taken on agreeing to the first section of Mr. Mays' substitute, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 162, nays 81. The second section provides for the organization of the house of representatives, by the election of members according to white population. Mr. Dawson offered an amendment to this section, changing the basis of representation by white population, as provided in that section, for the federal representation. The question on this amendment was decided in the negative, yeas 123, nays 126. Another substitute was offered, incorporating the federal representation as a basis, which was rejected, yeas 100, nays 138. After another substitute had been offered and rejected, the question was taken on agreeing to the section, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 126, nays 110.

On Tuesday, a very animated debate arose on a motion to reconsider the vote of the preceding day on the question of agreeing to the adoption of Mr. Mays' substitute, which was decided in the negative, yeas 114, nays 130. The convention then adjourned at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

At four o'clock, the 3d and 4th sections of the substitute of Mr. Mays, were taken up. An amendment proposed by Mr. Harris was taken into consideration. By it the house is to consist of 144 members, except in the formation of new counties. These 144 members are to be distributed as follows: 15 counties having the highest number of white population, to be entitled each to 3 members; 25 counties having the next highest number of white population, to be entitled each to 2 members; and the remaining 49 counties to one member each. After every census, a new apportionment to be made by the legislature, and should new counties have been created, the counties entitled to a larger number of representatives than one, to be reduced, &c. This amendment was received, yeas 140, nays 92. Some other amendments were proposed, but rejected. On Wednesday, Mr. Harris offered a section, dividing and distributing the state into senatorial districts, in the number previously agreed on. The section was adopted, yeas 151, nays 79. Several other propositions were made and rejected. In the afternoon the convention adjourned sine die.

GEORGIA AND THE CHEROKEES.

From the Federal Union, May 16.

THE CHEROKEES. It will be recollected, that a short time since, we made a few remarks on the very reprehensible attempt made by certain persons to convince the Cherokees, that the president would sustain them in their opposition to our laws, in which we expressed the "hope that president Jackson would embrace some early opportunity to convince the Cherokees of their true situation, and that his mind had undergone no change in relation to their rights and pretensions." We have had this hope fully and early gratified. We were well apprized of the exertions on foot by our vigilant governor to disabuse the public opinion, and to convince the people of Georgia, both white men and red men, that the machinations of their enemies were in vain—for we consider them the enemies of both—and we felt a most confident conviction that the president still held his uniform sentiments upon this subject. The correspondence this day published by governor Lumpkin in our columns, sets the question at rest; and they must now blush, who have, in any way, deceived the Indians with that belief that the revenue collection act, called the force act, would give them any aid. Language cannot be more express than that used by the secretary of war, Mr. Cass, and the commissioner of Indian affairs, Mr. Herring. Mr. Cass says—"These letters will undoubtedly remove any errors which may have prevailed, and will shew that the opinions of the president are unchanged." Mr. Herring says—"The president yet thinks, as he has always thought, the executive has no constitutional right to apply military force to remove persons from any parts of the states of Georgia or Alabama." Again he says: "I am instructed further to express to you the opinion of the president, that the immediate removal of your people, in conformity with the very liberal terms held out to them, offers the only prospect of their permanent and prosperous establishment." These letters are official, and convey directly the views and wishes of the president—and any man who would hereafter attempt to misrepresent them, deserves the reprobation of every Georgian.

Executive department, Ga. Milledgeville, May 14, 1833.

In order to correct various misrepresentations, circulated through the press and other channels, I have to request newspaper editors, friendly to the great interest of the country, and especially that of Georgia, to publish the following correspondence.

WILSON LUMPKIN.

Executive department, Ga. Milledgeville, April 26, 1833.

Hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war.

SIR—A few days ago I addressed a letter to the president of the United States, on the subject of our Indian relations, which I requested might be submitted to you.

In connection with the same subject, I herewith enclose you a copy of a letter, received by me a few days ago from a respectable gentleman, who resides in the neighborhood of John Ross. That gentleman, with various others, inform me, that Ross is exhibiting this insincere letter, and impressing the ignorant Indians and Indian countrymen, with the belief, that he is authorised to say, from the authority of the war department, that in a short time, all the Georgia settlers, who have settled under the authority of the laws of Georgia, will be driven from their homes by the United States' army. There may be some exaggeration in these statements; but I am forced to the conclusion, from what I have heard, and from the reading of this impudent letter, that great efforts are making in that country to mislead and delude the unfortunate Cherokees.

I do not hesitate in my reply to such communications, to assure the people of that country, that no change has taken place in the views of the federal executive, and that the Indians, so long as they choose to remain in Georgia, must yield implicit obedience to the supremacy of the laws of the state. And that no power of the federal government will ever be exerted to remove the inhabitants who have settled under the authority of the state, &c. &c. I am engaged in using all the means in my power to counteract the mischievous influence of the enemies of good order in this half settled country. But I consider it highly important that you should, with all possible despatch, make such a communication to the Cherokees, as shall put an end to all false stories of the character pointed out. Such a communication should be publicly and authentically made to the whole people, who may assemble at their council on the 14th of next month. It is submitted to your consideration, whether a communication from you or the president of the U. States, himself, might not be made through me to the Cherokees most effectually. At any rate, please to let me hear from you immediately on this subject, for I deem it indispensable, at their approaching council, by some means, to remove the idle delusion into which these people are led, by the exertions of bad men. If the copy of the letter which I enclose you, be not a forgery, it deserves strong reprehension. Such productions, from such a quarter, are most mischievous. With great respect, your obedient servant,

WILSON LUMPKIN.

Department of war, office of Indian affairs, March 14, 1833.

SIR: Your letter of the 8th instant, addressed to the secretary of war on the subject of intrusion on Cherokee land by white citizens, has been referred to this office for reply.

It cannot be denied that your complaints are well founded, and that your people have sustained injuries from the rapacity and lawless conduct of our citizens. It is, however, in some degree an unavoidable evil, incident to the present condition of your tribe, and no blame is fairly attributable to the department on that account. It is due to the secretary of war to say, that as soon as he received notice of intruders having presented themselves on your land, he gave orders for their expulsion. These orders will now be repeated, and a military force will forthwith be sent to the assailed parts of your country, for the purpose of expelling and keeping off intruders. And orders will also be given to the district attorney of the United States to prosecute for trespass, all such as may dare to return after their expulsion. You cannot consider it a misplaced assurance, and it is made with the utmost sincerity, that the department cherishes deep solicitude for the welfare of your nation, and will, to the extent of its powers, endeavor to promote it. With high respect, your humble servant,

ELBERT HERRING.
 Messrs. John Ross and others, Cherokee delegation.

Department of war, May 2, 1833.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter of the 26th ult. together with the copy of one from the commissioner of Indian affairs, dated March 14th, and addressed to some of the principal men among the Cherokees.

Before the receipt of your letter, application had been made by some of the Cherokees, to know whether any change had taken place in the opinions of the president, respecting the constitutional right of the executive to remove persons from land claimed by the Indians, where the laws of the state had been extended over such land. They stated that they made the inquiry because some of their people had taken up such an impression, founded on the above letter of the commissioner. Immediate measures were taken to correct this misapprehension, and explanatory letters, copies of which I have the honor to enclose, were written, and despatched to col. Montgomery, the Cherokee agent, major Curry, the special agent for emigration, and to the Cherokee persons who sought the information. These letters will undoubtedly remove any errors which may have prevailed, and will show that the opinions of the president are unchanged. Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

His excellency, Wilson Lumpkin, Milledgeville, Georgia.

Department of war, office of Indian affairs, May 1, 1833.

SIR: In consequence of an application from several of the Cherokees, I have been instructed by the secretary of war to call your attention to my letter to you of March 15th, 1833, and to say to you that the provisions of that letter relate solely to those portions of the Cherokee country within the states of Tennessee and North Carolina, and over which the laws of those states have not been extended. The views of the president upon this subject have been too often and too publicly expressed, to leave any doubt of the course which, in his opinion, should be pursued. And this explanation would have been considered unnecessary, had not some of the Cherokees intimated different views. The president yet thinks, as he has always thought, the executive has no constitutional right to apply military force to remove persons from any part of the states of Georgia or Alabama. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ELBERT HERRING.

Col. H. Montgomery.

Department of war, office of Indian affairs, May 1, 1833.

SIR: Enclosed I transmit you copies of two letters of this date, one endorsed to the agent, col. Montgomery, and the other to several of the Cherokees. You will see by these letters, that some misapprehension has existed, or has been effected, respecting the purport of an order sent by this office to col. Montgomery on the 15th March last, for the removal of intruders from the Cherokee country.

That order is intended to operate only upon the Cherokee lands within the states of North Carolina and Tennessee, over which the state laws have not been extended. The views of the executive on this subject have been so well known, that it was not supposed that any mistake could arise. If, however, any has arisen, it will be cleared up by these instructions. I am directed to communicate these facts to you, that you may be aware of the precise views of the president, and that you may correct any erroneous impressions which may have been made, and which may have a tendency to prevent a favorable decision by the Cherokee council, which is about to convene. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ELBERT HERRING.

Benjamin F. Curry, esq.

Department of war, office of Indian affairs, May 1, 1833.

GENTLEMEN: I have been directed by the secretary of war to acknowledge the receipt of your letter to him of April 5th, and to inform you that no change whatever has taken place in the opinions of the president, so often expressed to your people, and so clearly stated in the letters to which you allude, from the war department, of February 2d and 20th, 1833, as well as in previous communications respecting the constitutional right of the executive to apply military force to the removal of persons from any part of the Indian country over which the laws of the proper states have been extended. My letters to Mr. Ross and others of the 14th March, and to col. Montgomery of the 15th of March, were intended to relate solely to that part of the Cherokee country lying within the states of North Carolina and Tennessee, and over which these states have not extended their jurisdiction. The whole views of the executive were so well known to your people, that it was not supposed that any misapprehension on this subject could have existed. And I am directed to state to you clearly, that the opinions of the president, heretofore expressed, are unchanged, and that no interference with the laws of the respective states on this subject, must be expected. These views have been communicated to col. Montgomery, though they cannot be necessary for his action in the matter. And I am instructed further to express to you the opinion of the president, that the immediate removal of your people, in conformity with the very liberal terms held out to them, offers the only prospect of their permanent and prosperous establishment. Very respectfully, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
ELBERT HERRING.

John Ridge, esq. and others, Head of Coosa.

TREATY WITH RUSSIA.

By the president of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a treaty of navigation and commerce, between the United States of America and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias—together with a separate article thereto—was concluded and signed at St. Petersburg on the sixth, (eighteenth), day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, which treaty and separate article are, word for word, as follows:

In the name of the most holy and indivisible trinity:

The United States of America, and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, equally animated with the desire of maintaining the relations of good understanding, which have hitherto so happily subsisted between their respective states, and of extending and consolidating the commercial intercourse between them, have agreed to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty of navigation and commerce: For which purpose the president of the United States has conferred full powers on James Buchanan, their envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near his imperial majesty; and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias has conferred like powers on the sienr Charles Robert count de Nesselrode, his vice chancellor, knight of the orders of Russia, and of many others, &c. and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have concluded and signed the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

There shall be between the territories of the high contracting parties, a reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation. The inhabitants of their respective states shall, mutually, have liberty to enter the ports, places and rivers of the territories of each party, wherever foreign commerce is permitted. They shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of said territories, in order to attend to their affairs, and they shall enjoy, to that effect, the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances there prevailing, and particularly to the regulations in force concerning commerce.

ARTICLE II.

Russian vessels arriving, either laden or in ballast, in the ports of the United States of America; and reciprocally, vessels of the United States arriving, either laden or in ballast, in the ports of the empire of Russia, shall be treated, on their entrance, during their stay, and at their departure, upon the same footing as national vessels, coming from the same place, with respect to the duties of tonnage. In regard to light house duties, pilotage and port charges, as well as to the fees and perquisites of public officers, and all other duties and charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied upon vessels of commerce, in the name or to the profit of the government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, the high contracting parties shall reciprocally treat each other upon the footing of the most favored nations with whom they have not treaties now actually in force, regulating the said duties and charges on the basis of an entire reciprocity.

ARTICLE III.

All kinds of merchandise and articles of commerce, which may be lawfully imported into the ports of the empire of Russia in Russian vessels, may, also, be so imported in vessels of the United States of America, without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name, or to the profit of the government, the local authorities, or of any private establishment whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or articles of commerce had been imported in Russian vessels. And reciprocally, all kind of merchandise and articles of commerce, which may be lawfully imported into the ports of the United States of America, in vessels of said states, may, also, be so imported in Russian vessels, without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name, or to the profit of the government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or articles of commerce had been imported in vessels of the United States of America.

ARTICLE IV.

It is understood that the stipulations contained in the two preceding articles, are, to their full extent, applicable to Russian vessels and their cargoes, arriving in the ports of the United States of America; and reciprocally, to vessels of the said states and their cargoes, arriving in the ports of the empire of Russia, whether the said vessels clear directly from the ports of the country to which they respectively belong, or from the ports of any other foreign country.

ARTICLE V.

All kind of merchandise and articles of commerce, which may be lawfully exported from the ports of the United States of America in national vessels, may, also, be exported therefrom in Russian vessels without paying other or higher duties or charges, of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name, or to the profit of the government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or articles of commerce, had been exported in vessels of the United States of America. And reciprocally, all kind of merchandise and articles of commerce, which may be lawfully exported from the ports of the empire of Russia in national vessels, may also be exported therefrom in vessels of the United States of America, without paying other or higher duties or charges of whatever kind or denomination, levied in the name, or to the profit of the government, the local authorities, or of any private establishments whatsoever, than if the same merchandise or articles of commerce had been exported in Russian vessels.

ARTICLE VI.

No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States, of any article, the produce or manufacture of Russia; and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the empire of Russia, of any article, the produce or manufacture of the United States, than are, or shall be, payable on the like article, being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the importation or exportation of any article the produce or manufacture of the United States or of Russia, to or from the ports of the United States, or to or from the ports of the Russian empire, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE VII.

It is expressly understood that the preceding articles II, III, IV, V and VI, shall not be applicable to the coastwise navigation of either of the two countries, which each of the high contracting parties reserves exclusively to itself.

ARTICLE VIII.

The two contracting parties shall have the liberty of having in their respective ports, consuls, vice consuls, agents and commissaries, of their own appointment, who shall enjoy the same privileges and powers, as those of the most favored nations; but if any such consul shall exercise commerce, they shall be submitted to the same laws and usages to which the private individuals of their nation are submitted, in the same place.

The consuls, vice consuls, and commercial agents, shall have the right, as such, to sit as judges and arbitrators in such differences as may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels belonging to the nation whose interests are committed to their charge, without the interference of the local authorities, unless the conduct of the crews, or of the captain, should disturb the order or the tranquillity of the country, or the said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents should require their assistance to cause their decisions to be carried into effect or supported. It is, however, understood, that this species of judgment or arbitration shall not deprive the contending parties of the right they have to resort, on their return, to the judicial authority of their country.

ARTICLE IX.

The said consuls, vice consuls and commercial agents, are authorised to require the assistance of the local authorities, for the search, arrest, detention and imprisonment of the deserters from the ships of war and merchant vessels of their country. For this purpose they shall apply to the competent tribunals, judges and officers, and shall, in writing, demand said deserters, proving by the exhibition of the registers of the vessels, the rolls of the crews, or by other official documents, that such individuals formed part of the crews; and this declaration being thus substantiated, the surrender shall not be refused.

Such deserters, when arrested, shall be placed at the disposal of the said consuls, vice consuls, or commercial agents, and may be confined in the public prisons, at the request and cost of those who shall claim them, in order to be detained until the time when they shall be restored to the vessels to which they belonged, or sent back to their own country by a vessel of the same nation, or any other vessel whatsoever. But if not sent back within four months from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause.

However, if the deserter should be found to have committed any crime or offence, his surrender may be delayed until the tribunal before which his case shall be depending, shall have pronounced its sentence, and such sentence shall have been carried into effect.

ARTICLE X.

The citizens and subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise, and their representatives, being citizens or subjects of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and may take possession thereof, either by themselves, or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same, at will, paying to the profit of the respective governments, such duties only as the inhabitants of the country wherein the said goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases. And in case of the absence of the representative, such care shall be taken of the said goods, as would be taken of the goods of a native of the same country in like case, until the lawful owner may take measures for receiving them. And if a question should arise among several claimants as to which of them said goods belong, the same shall be decided finally by the laws and judges of the land wherein the said goods are. And where, on the death of any person holding real estate, within the territories of one of the high contracting parties, such real estate would, by the laws of the land, descend on a citizen or subject of the other party, who, by reason of absence may be incapable of holding it, he shall be allowed the time fixed by the laws of the country, and in case the laws of the country actually in force may not have fixed any such time, he shall then be allowed a reasonable time to sell such real estate and to withdraw and export the proceeds without molestation, and without paying to the profit of the respective governments any other dues than those to which the inhabitants of the country wherein said real estate is situated, shall be subject to pay in like cases. But this article shall not derogate, in any manner, from the force of the laws already published, or which may hereafter be published by his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, to prevent the emigration of his subjects.

ARTICLE XI.

If either party shall, hereafter, grant to any other nation, any particular favor in navigation or commerce, it shall, immediately, become common to the other party, freely, where it is freely granted to such other nation, or on yielding the same compensation, when the grant is conditional.

ARTICLE XII.

The present treaty, of which the effect shall extend, in like manner, to the kingdom of Poland, so far as the same may be applicable thereto, shall continue in force until the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, and if, one year before that day, one of the high contracting parties shall not have announced to the other, by an official notification, its intention to arrest the operation thereof, this treaty shall remain obligatory one year beyond that day, and so on, until the expiration of the year which shall commence after the date of a similar notification.

ARTICLE XIII.

The present treaty shall be approved and ratified by the president of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the senate of the said states, and by his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington within the space of one year, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, in duplicate, and affixed thereto the seal of their arms. Done at St. Petersburg the sixth (eighteenth) December, in the year of grace one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two.

JAMES BUCHANAN.
NESSELRODE.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

Certain relations of proximity, and anterior engagements, have rendered it necessary for the imperial government to regulate the commercial relations of Russia with Prussia and the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway by special stipulations, now actually in force, and which may be renewed hereafter; which stipulations are, in no manner, connected with the existing regulations for foreign commerce in general; the two high contracting parties wishing to remove from their commercial relations every kind of ambiguity or subject of discussion, have agreed, that the special stipulations granted to the commerce of Prussia, and of Sweden and Norway, in consideration of equivalent advantages granted in these countries, by the one to the commerce of the kingdom of Poland, and by the other to that of the grand duchy of Finland, shall not, in any case, be invoked in favor of the relations of commerce and navigation, sanctioned between the two high contracting parties by the present treaty.

The present separate article shall have the same force and value as if it were inserted, word for word, in the treaty signed this day, and shall be ratified at the same time.

In faith whereof, we, the undersigned, by virtue of our respective full powers, have signed the present separate article, and affixed thereto the seals of our arms. Done at St. Petersburg the sixth (eighteenth) of December, in the year of grace one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two.

JAMES BUCHANAN.
NESSELRODE.

And whereas the said treaty and separate article have been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were, this day, exchanged at the city of Washington, by Edward Livingston, secretary of the United States, and the baron de Krudener, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, in the said United States, on the part of their respective governments:

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, ANDREW JACKSON, president of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States, and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the eleventh day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and of the independence of the United States the fifty-seventh.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By the president:
EDW. LIVINGSTON, secretary of state.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 15—VOL. VIII. BALTIMORE, JUNE 8, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,133.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ We have expended a great deal of extra editorial and mechanical labor to present our readers with a condensed view of the commerce and navigation of the United States, for the year 1832; intending, in a few pages, not only to give every generally useful fact and figure found in the 8vo. volume of 298 pages, but have also made large additions—that the business of the last may be, (without trouble to our readers,) compared with that of the preceding year. It is so arranged that the part yet to be published will be inserted in the first pages of the next number, and the whole present one continued mass when the volume is bound. These are about the most valuable documents which issue from the departments, and thanks are due to Mr. McLane for the more than usually prompt publication of the tables, for the last year—by which their interest is much increased.

So much time and close attention have been paid to these tables, that several other things, about which we would have said something, have been passed over, concerning the bank of the United States, &c. with a hint or two to the weather-cock and venerable editor of the "Richmond Enquirer"—whose disposition to please seems to have deprived him of a power to discriminate between "a hawk and a hand-saw"—unless the wind is from the south west. A directly southern breeze no longer screws him up—though even an exact return of his own former "STATE RIGHTS" gales. That is forbidden—by proclamation! "Curses" are blessings—and blessings are turned into curses, "at the shortest notice"—the prevailing wind being from the right quarter. Obsta principis is changed into finis coronat—or, "the end justifies the means;" which, being further interpreted into the vernacular tongue, signifieth "wearing a collar." We may have a little room and time, next week, to bring up leeway—but the primary object of the REGISTER shall not be neglected in the observance of things so transient as sayings and doings like those referred to. They are as small eels not worth the skinning, except in a season of perfect leisure—or in mere sport!

¶ The president of the United States, accompanied by Mr. McLane, secretary of state, Mr. Cass, secretary of war, and Mr. Donnellson, his private secretary, arrived in this city, on Thursday, on his tour to the east. He was very handsomely, and most respectfully introduced to Baltimore, by the rail road—the carriages being drawn by a fine locomotive engine; and so received by the committee appointed for that purpose. Accommodations had been provided for him at Newcomb's, [Indian Queen] hotel—where he, yesterday, received the salutations of a very large number of our citizens, of all parties. He departed to-day in the steamboat Kentucky, for Philadelphia—and will stop there until Tuesday.

On leaving the rail road, the president took his seat in an open barouche, with general Samuel Smith and James H. McCulloch, esq. and, as he passed on to his lodgings, was greeted by masses of the people. His suite followed in another carriage.

We have not time to go into details—but may briefly notice some of the principal incidents which happened in this city, or shall happen at other places, visited by the president.

CHOLERA. We shall continue our notices of this disease. It does not appear to have any respect to the season, hot or cold, wet or dry—or to high lands or low lands; but many believe that the diet and habits of individuals have considerable influence to extend or restrain its ravages—and hence some suppose that, as the season of fruits advances, the cholera will become more general and fatal. But the laws of this disease—why it comes or wherefore it departs, are altogether mysterious, and, most probably, will forever remain so.

Memphis, Tennessee, May 15. This frightful and mysterious disease has again made its appearance among us. Several deaths have occurred during the past week, but, we are happy to say, that, out of the many, we can enumerate but three of our citizens. Steamboats pass frequently; and we learn from passengers that the cholera is raging below; to an alarming extent.

VOL. XLIV—Sic. 16.

Wheeling. The report of the board of health of May 31, announced 37 cases for the last three days—14 of which terminated fatally—23 cases remaining. Among the late victims were persons of the most respectable character, and best habits.

Letters from Wheeling of the 1st inst. give terrific descriptions of the ravages of the cholera, at that place. Since the 16th May, there had been more than seventy funerals. One of the bank robbers had died in jail, and another was sick. The venerable Noah Zane was said to be at the point of death.

Washington, Pa. One fatal case has happened in this borough—supposed to have been contracted at Wheeling.

At Mayfield, Kan. the cholera broke out on the 29th ult. and, in 48 hours, carried off ten persons—and nine more were to be interred on the morning of the 31st! But the disease seemed to be already moderating. The "Eagle and Monitor" says

¶ Our friends need not expect a paper next week, as it will be totally out of our power to issue one.

Ohio. It is reported that the disease had shewn itself in several of the towns of this state.

On the Mississippi. It was stated, at New Orleans, that the steamboat Chester had lost 100 of her passengers by the cholera, on her way to St. Louis! She had 150 United States troops and many Swiss emigrants on board. It was hoped that this report was much exaggerated.

THE FLOODS. The Virginia papers speak of great damages sustained by risings of the James, Appomattox and Pamunky rivers—the wheat fields, on the low lands, being completely drowned. The injury on three farms, at Dover, is estimated at $15,000. One field on the Pamunky of five hundred acres, and expected to produce 7,000 bushels, has nearly all been drowned. The whole loss is supposed to amount to one million of dollars.

EMIGRANTS FROM EUROPE are beginning to pour into the United States. Many tens of thousands may be expected in the present season. From Ireland, England, Scotland and Wales, many will come; but the greater number, most probably, from Germany. And emigration from the latter will gather strength as it proceeds, as well in promoting a better knowledge of the real condition of things in the United States, in advices from those who have settled here, as because of increased abridgements of the rights and comforts of the German people—to whom only the alternative of a dark and awful despotism, or a bloody civil war, seems presented.

Many of the emigrants who are coming from Germany are of the best, or productive classes—and a large number of them have some money to begin a new life with, in America. Others, who are mere day-laborers, may find abundant employment on the rail roads and canals that are making, in several of the states. In general, they are patient and industrious, and exceedingly economical.

COTTON AND WOOL. In the late debate in the British parliament on the currency, the following statement was made by Mr. Poulett Thompson:—

In 1820, 152,000,000 lbs. of cotton-wool were imported; in 1832, the imports amounted to 259,000,000 lbs. an increase of 70 per cent. In 1820, the consumption of sheep's wool was 9,778,000 lbs.; in 1832 it had increased to 27,666,000 lbs. an augmentation of 183 per cent.

¶ In 1840—we have no manner of doubt, that the manufacture of cotton in the United States would have equalled that of Great Britain in 1820, had the tariff, with respect to cotton goods, remained untouched; but no one, we think, can make any safe calculation on this subject now, unless in a great reduction of the price of labor. And we pray most earnestly, that, if the working-people in our factories must be brought down to the white-slave condition of those of England, that we may enter into a full competition with England—such competition will not be attempted! We cannot support manufactures at such a cost of human happiness. At present, they are the blessing of the poor—we speak generally; but, in the case stated, would be the curse.

BRITISH DUTY ON COTTON. When introducing "the budget" into the house of commons, lord Althorp proposed to take off the additional duty on cotton, laid in 1831—no doubt because of the increased manufactures of cotton goods in the United States, and on the continent of Europe, with all which the English manufacturers are much alarmed. Speaking of the reasons that induced the additional duty in 1831, he said—"I do not propose to put raw cotton on a better footing than it was when the addition to the tax in 1831 was proposed. I propose only to take off that amount of tax (as nearly as I can calculate it) which was imposed on that occasion. Previous to that period, there was an ad valorem duty upon the pound of raw cotton to an amount which might be equivalent to three-eighths of a penny, to which was then added two-eighths of a penny, making the whole about five-eighths of a penny per lb. the result of that being that the whole amount of the duty on cotton for the last year, had been £626,000. It has been estimated that the portion of the duty imposed in 1831 might be about £326,000—but I do not think its reduction will diminish the revenue more than £300,000. In most cases where a duty is reduced, we may calculate on the deficiency being partially made up by an increased consumption, but in this case I cannot anticipate such a result. The noble lord then said that he intended to substitute for the ad valorem duty a fixed duty of five-sixteenths of a penny per lb. and, in answer to an observation of an honorable member, he did not believe that the gentlemen connected with the importation of cotton would have any objection to a fixed duty.

EXPORTS. The "Telegraph" refers to the treasury tables, and shews that the exports of cotton, tobacco and rice, in 1852, had a value of $39,877,032—leaving only about 23,000,000 for the value of all other domestic products; and "recommends the subject to the consideration of all its readers."

And what of that? Forty millions seems a great sum—but does not supply the people of the United States with leather, and its manufactures—our boots and shoes, and hats! And the annual creations of value in manufactures, of all sorts, which have their centre at either of the cities of Boston or Philadelphia, are, perhaps, nearly or quite equal to that of all the cotton, tobacco and rice exported. And the domestic market for the products of the land, because of manufactures, is far, far greater, than the foreign one for the commodities named.

THE TARIFF. From the United States Gazette. We know not, we never pretend to understand, what the Globe intends by its paragraphs; but those who have an eye to the political barometers of the day, may infer something from the fact that "the Globe" has come out in behalf of the wool growers, preparatory, perhaps, to a further advocacy of the old tariff. We copy from that paper the following paragraph:

"There is one class, however, in the north, that Messrs. Clay and Calhoun seem to have forgotten in their arrangement—but, perhaps, they imagined that they would not, as a body, perceive and resent the injury done them. We mean the farming class. To foster the great manufactures of coarse woollens, coarse wool from foreign countries is admitted duty free; and by withdrawing, gradually, all adequate protection from the better woollen cloths, worn in the northern and middle states, of American manufacture, the wool which is the growth of our own country, and which has hitherto formed the material for this class of woollens, is excluded from all encouragement, and in fact, deprived of a market. This, according to Mr. Niles, is not only cutting the throats of the sheep, but taking from agriculture the only direct advantage it has ever received from the protective policy."

When the Globe is out for the sheep, woe to the fleeces. ["This is not" according to Mr. Niles." The editor of the "Globe" knows about as much of the history of the tariff law of 1823, and concerning the high duty imposed on coarse wool, as of—the pursuit of a plain and honest political course: else he covers that knowledge, as he disregards truth, when "convenience serves." The high duty on coarse wool was supported on the same principle as the foolish duty of 10 cents per gallon on molasses—to defeat the bill of 1828.]

EX-LIEUTENANT RANDOLPH. We mentioned, in the REGISTER of the 18th ult. that the conduct of certain "miserables" seemed to make it appear that they rejoiced in the indignity inflicted on the person of the president of the United States, by Mr. Randolph, as "furnishing matter to feed their scurrilous appetites upon;" and we said that the conduct of these appeared to render it our duty, as a "faithful chronicler," to record certain articles on this abominated subject, which have been laid aside for that purpose; but we have, at least, deferred the publication of them, because unwilling to do any thing that might keep up, or increase, the excitement which the "miserables" are still attempting to make. We promptly, and decidedly, expressed our opinion concerning this outrage—as we had expressed it on previous occasions; but cannot bring our mind into a belief that the person of the president is more "sacred" than that of a representative of the people; though the late offence was much aggravated, because of its action upon an old and venerable individual. But if the right to avenge a private wrong, on the person of a public agent, be admitted—there can be no limit to its extent, unless in the extent of private passion and power*—every man becoming a judge in his own case; and thus society is loosened from all the sober and just restraints which the law of the country, supported by the moral sense of the community, imposes. This principle cannot be admitted—nor will its practice be suffered.

But we have seen much about the pursuit of Mr. Randolph, without the District of Columbia, in which his offence was committed; and it is even stated, in the "New York Journal of Commerce," that the U. S. revenue cutter is employed in boarding ships from that port (after they get to sea), and in stopping and searching them, for him! We regard these as very extraordinary, and dangerous, proceedings; and would like to have a homily from the invariable Mr. Ritchie, on "state rights," as affected by such conduct. An offender against the laws of the United States, may be arrested any where within the United States—but we are totally ignorant of any written law which renders the person of our president more sacred than that of the meanest of our citizens. The moral law may make a great, and a very proper, distinction in the cases stated; but it was not the latter law which influenced Mr. Randolph in the assault—nor will it sustain persons in such attempts to arrest him. The ex-lieutenant, we understand, proceeded to Virginia, to make arrangements for the interment of the remains of the late JOHN RANDOLPH—but it will not at all surprise us, if he puts himself in the way of being arrested, that the law may be ascertained by the verdict of a jury of his countrymen.

REMOVALS OR "REFORM." It appears that the great scheme of "punishments and rewards," at Washington, has been laid aside—for the present. The "National Intelligencer" of the 1st inst. says—

"We are glad to hear it reported, in such a manner that we believe it, that the president of the United States has literally fulfilled the wish of our editorial friend at Philadelphia, by throwing the proscription list under the table; that is, he has determined to pay no regard to it. Some would have it, that he has expressed his disapprobation of this new scheme of reform, even more strongly than by a mere negative upon it. These modern reformers have over-shot the mark."

§5.—The history of this proceeding is curious. That a set of "little ones" had determined to bring about a revolution in the public offices at Washington—to "punish" without cause, and "reward" without discretion—except in a pledge of the "rewarded" to creep and crawl as directed, with a view to future political jugglings, seems undoubted; but certain of the secretaries are said to have interposed, and the president himself would not "go it"—and the "little ones," perhaps, by grasping at too much, like the "boy and the filberts" in the fable, may be made to "cry out," because of the "committal" which they happened to make.

The editors of the "National Intelligencer" have placed Mr. Ritchie, of the "Richmond Enquirer," in a very ridiculous position, concerning this business. We have had "queer notions" about the latter—yet hardly thought that, at the same time, he would "look two ways for Sunday."

But there is a great deal in being used to twisting. "All sorts of turning done here,"—is marked on the sign-board; but such artists do not turn both ways at the same moment.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL. From the National Intelligencer of June 7. An adjourned meeting of the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company was held yesterday, and continued to a late hour in the day. Every effort to procure a delay of a few days, or until the general committee should have reported, was voted down by the united vote of the United States and the corporation of Washington; Maryland and Georgetown being divided, and Virginia and Alexandria resisting in vain. In the end, the election of officers was held, and the following gentlemen were elected, to serve for the ensuing year, viz:

President—John H. Eaton, of Tennessee. Directors—Walter Smith, of Georgetown, Phineas Janney, of Alexandria, William Gunton, of Washington, John I. Abert, U. S. Army, William Price of Maryland, and Richard H. Henderson, of Virginia.

THE REV. MR. AVERY, charged with the seduction and murder of a young girl named Cornell, has had a long and most arduous trial, at Newport, R. I. but the jury, after being out sixteen hours, returned a verdict of not guilty, and he was discharged. The papers are filled with disgusting particulars of the evidence. It seems to have been a very extraordinary affair—and one of fearful import.

POTOMAC BRIDGE. An extract of a letter from Washington, published in the New York Journal of Commerce, states that the contemplated granite bridge across the Potomac, of 43 arches, had been let by contract to a company from Pennsylvania, for $1,400,000. The writer adds—"There were 17 offers, which ranged from that sum to $7,500,000—and I am of opinion; that the highest is too low. In some places the water is 45 feet deep."

[A "pretty considerable" range of estimates, if the figures be correctly given—from 1,400,000 to 7,500,000 dollars, for the same work!]

THE BUNKER HILL MONUMENT. The affairs of this monument have been taken up by able hands—working-men—the "Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic's Association," of which Mr. Buckingham, editor of the Boston Courier, is president; and the probability now is, we are happy to say, that it will soon be completed. We intend to recur to this subject, at some season of leisure, and insert the address, with Mr. Everett's speech, &c.

BLACK HAWK, &c. From the Globe of June 1. We understand that a report having been received from gen. Clark, the superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis, in which he expresses the opinion, that the Sac prisoners may be restored to their friends without affecting the interests or safety of our citizens, and that their release would be peculiarly gratifying to the friendly chiefs; and Kee-kuk and his associates themselves having solicited their discharge from confinement, and pledged themselves for their good conduct, preparations have been made for their return to their homes.

We learn that they (Black Hawk & Co.) will be conducted through the principal cities, with a view to exhibit to them the extent of the population and of the country, its wealth, resources, and means of defence, and to impress them with a conviction of its strength and power, which will be productive of lasting good consequences. They will probably leave Fortress Monroe early in the next week, proceed as far east as Boston, hence to Albany, Buffalo and Detroit. Their subsequent route will then be determined by the officer having them in charge.

[Black Hawk, &c. arrived in Baltimore on Thursday last.]

NEW HAMPSHIRE. Joseph M. Harper, Franklin Pierce, Benning M. Swan, Henry Hubbard and Robert Burns (all Jackson) have been elected members of congress from this state, by an average vote of about 23,000. The national republican ticket had about 6,000, and the anti-masonic 1,500. There was no regular opposition to the first named ticket.

The legal provision for the support of schools in New Hampshire is certainly a very liberal one. The sum of ninety thousand dollars is required by law to be annually raised and appropriated to this purpose; and the amount annually accruing to the state from the tax paid on banks (about 10,000) is distributed among the several towns in sums proportioned to the state tax paid by them respectively, to be applied in the same manner. A proportionate sum would amount, for the state of New York, to more than $600,000.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Col. William McRea, a distinguished officer in the late war, recently died at St. Louis, of the cholera.

E. Buckingham, jun. junior editor of the "Boston Courier," lately died at sea, when on a voyage for his health, aged 24—a young man of superior talents, and excellent character; and who promised to become an ornament to the profession.—[We beg leave to offer our sympathy to his father—our much esteemed friend, and do it feelingly—from two like cases.]

Two volcanic islands have lately appeared in the neighborhood of Cyprus.

Mr. Thomas P. Moore, late minister of the United States at Bogota, has arrived at New York, and brought with him the remains of Mr. Anderson, who previously represented the United States, at Bogota. All was quiet in New Grenada.

It is stated in a French paper, that the French navy department intend to substitute in the government ships, iron wire ropes for the usual cordage in the rigging; and that this change will effect an annual saving to the amount of 300 or 400,000 francs.

Col. Wm. Wynne was offered and refused $8,000 for the "beautiful and accomplished" Mary Randolph, [a mare] who at present is enjoying "life in New York!"

Romulus M. Samderson, of North Carolina, has been appointed by the president, to be a commissioner under the law to carry into effect the convention with France, in the place of Thomas H. Williams, resigned.

George Breathitt, jun. brother of the governor of Kentucky, and who acted, occasionally, as private secretary of the president, died at Washington a few days ago.

The Louisville Focus states that the business of that city is very brisk. On the 23d ult. thirty-five steamboats were lying there, whose aggregate burthen was at least eight thousand tons. The health of the place is also good.

The Columbia, (Penn.) Spy of Saturday last says, that the Susquehanna river had been in good condition for the descending trade for a week previous, and that the number of arks and rafts that had come down in the same time was perhaps never before exceeded.

The rail road and steamboat line between Philadelphia and Baltimore arrived at the latter on Tuesday last, in 7h. 50m. the quickest passage yet made. Distance about 130 miles.

Christopher Bechter, a gold refiner in Rutherford county, N. Carolina, states that he has coined at his establishment, since the 18th June, 1831, as follows:

Coined in $3, $5 50 and $1 pieces,	104,330 dwts.
Fluxed,	259,760 dwts.

A long concealed pot of Spanish dollars has been discovered in digging the cellar for a house in Germantown, Pa.

Some person has made the following exact estimate of the property of the late Mr. Randolph! Four thousand acres of river land, averaging $20 per acre, $80,000; two hundred negroes, at $300 each, $60,000; horses, carriages and furniture, $15,000; books and wine, $10,000; ready cash, $10,000—making an aggregate of $175,000.

[The Frederick-burg "Arena" says—The rumor we gave in our last, upon the authority of a New York paper, that Mr. Randolph had provided for the manumission of his slaves, is, we believe, well founded. The Compiler says the number is more than a hundred. We have it from a good source that the number is not far short of five hundred.]

By the present arrangement of the steamboats and rail road cars, passengers may proceed from Philadelphia to Baltimore, and back again the same day. Time of travelling from 6 A. M. to 10½ P. M. with 30 minutes for business in either of the cities.

Another venerable and valued citizen has departed. Oliver Wolcott, esquire, died at New York, on the 1st inst. in the 74th year of his age. A sketch of his character is laid off for insertion.

The Camden and Anboly rail road company are doing a heavy business. About seven hundred passengers travel in their different lines daily, and the number is continually on the increase.

Mr. Webster is on a journey to the west, and is every where received with the highest marks of respect. At Utica, N. Y. he was called upon by several hundred persons, of all political parties. A well deserved compliment to his character and talents.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 23rd April.
GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

In the house of commons on the 17th, Mr. Grant brought forward his motion for the emancipation of the Jews, which, after an interesting debate, the motion was put and prevailed, without a division.

On the same day, a motion was offered requiring a return of the number of American ships, with their registered tonnage, entered inwards into the port of Liverpool from New York, from 1st January, 1832, to 1st January, 1833. A like return of British ships for the same period. Also, return of the number of bales of cotton entered inwards into the port of Liverpool from the United States in foreign ships from 1st January, 1832, to 1st January, 1833. A like return in British ships for the same period.

Mr. O'Connell called the attention of the house to the proclamation of the lord lieutenant of Ireland, requiring the government to give the reasons for applying the late act to Kilkenny. After some debate, the question was taken, when only twenty-eight voted in favor of Mr. O'Connell's motion. There were 143 members present.

On the 18th, lord Althorp moved for leave to bring in a bill for the commutation of tithes. His lordship stated that the amount of the whole church revenue in England did not exceed £3,500,000,* and that the average income of the clergy, including deans, archdeacons and prebendaries, was not more than £500 per annum. The measure he proposed was, in the first place, to give permission to the tithe payer and the tithe receiver to make a perpetual commutation at a corn rent, varying according to the price of corn and if at the end of the year the parties should not have agreed, then to make a commutation of the tithe compulsory, at the wish of either the payer or the receiver; the amount in such case to be fixed by tithe valuers appointed by the bishops and the magistrates at quarter sessions. The tithe receiver to have the option of being paid in money or grain, and in case of his preferring the latter mode of payment, the payer to have the selection of the kind of grain in which payment is to be made.

[The leave asked, was granted after debate. The principles of the bill seemed approved, but some of its details were objected to.]

Mr. Hume moved two resolutions relative to sinecure offices; the first of which was, "that in all future vacancies of sinecure offices in the civil and colonial service of the country no new appointments to such vacant offices shall be made with any salary, fees or emoluments thereto attached;" and the second resolution was, "that no person shall receive any salary, fee or other emolument, from any office to which he may be appointed, the duties of which are, or shall be performed by deputy." Lord Althorp did not object to either resolution, and after a few observations, by several members, both resolutions were agreed to.

On the 19th, lord Althorp made his financial statements, or offered the "budget." He proposed to reduce the duties on advertisements, on marine insurance policies, on shop windows, soap and raw cotton—the latter one-third; and abolish the taxes on carts, clerks, porters, riders, &c. His recapitulation presents the following reductions:

1. Tithes—whole duty	£27,000
2. Marine insurance—estimated diminution	100,000
3. Advertisements—do.	75,000

Lord A. mentioned many savings which had been made—in parliamentary places, diplomatic expenses, and in the abolition of offices, retired list. The places abolished were 1,387, at an average annual value of £173 10s. each.

The following extract from his speech may be sufficient to give a general view of the revenues and expenditures of the United Kingdom:

"I shall now begin my financial view, by stating the amount of the income and expenditure for the year between the 5th of April, 1832, and the 5th of April, 1833. The amount of the income for the year was £46,853,000; the amount of the expenditure was £45,366,000, leaving an excess of income over expenditure of £1,487,000. The committee will, I have no doubt, recollect that in the estimates I made last session, I stated the probable excess of the income over the expenditure below this. I only calculated the excess at £800,000; but I am happy to say that by the reduction of expenditure, the excess of income over expenditure, £1,487,000, will more than enable us to cover the deficiencies of the preceding year. (Cheers.) That deficiency the committee will recollect was £1,200,041. Taking the two together, the committee will see that the improvement on the revenue of the present year is not less than £2,728,000. (Cheers.) I will now state what the income of the country was for the two years. For 1832 it was £46,818,000; for 1833 it was £46,853,000. Showing an excess in the latter year of only £235,000, and proving that the surplus on the year arose from the expenditure being considerably reduced.

*He said that the income of the church was grossly exaggerated. It had been asserted that it amounted to £9,000,000. Now, the incomes of the bishops (including the bishopric of Sodor and Man), were £158,000; that of the deans, &c. £236,000; and that of the parochial clergy he estimated under £3,000,000; so that, instead of £9,000,000, the amount was not three and a half millions.

"The expenditure for the year ending April, 1832, was £47,859,000; for 1833, £45,366,000, the diminution being £2,493,000 for the last year. It will be seen from this statement that the improvement which has taken place may be expected to be greater in the following year, because it does not depend on any accidental increase of revenue, but on the economical management of the public funds, and on the saving thereby effected. I will now state more in detail the income and expenditure of the last year. The income last year from the customs was £16,769,621; from the excise £16,529,131; from the stamps £6,857,540; from taxes £5,003,937; from post office £1,453,900; from miscellaneous sources £238,526, making a total of £46,852,650. I will now state the expenditure. The sum charged for the debt, including interest on exchequer bills—the whole sum charged to the consolidated fund for the debt was £28,225,691. The other charges on this fund were £1,859,248; making the whole charges on the consolidated fund £30,084,939. The expenditure of supplies was—for the army £7,006,496; for the navy £4,505,000; for the ordnance £1,634,817; for the miscellaneous service £2,138,953; making a total of £45,365,507.

"The expenditure for the preceding year was—for the army £7,551,000, which last year was reduced to £7,006,498; the expenditure for the navy in the preceding year was £5,842,835, and in the last year £4,505,000; the ordnance for the preceding year was £1,478,914, and for last year £1,634,812, being an increase of £155,878; the miscellaneous was £2,900,430 in the preceding year, and in the last year it was £2,133,953, showing a diminution of about £800,000. I have already stated the balance of the revenue over the expenditure, for the last year, at £1,487,000; and I will now calculate what is likely to be the estimated balance of the ensuing year, supposing no alteration in the duties, and that the revenue should remain as at present. The whole amount of the revenue for the year will be £46,494,128; and I do not take it at so large a sum as last year. I look for a reduction in the excise; because the arrears of the malt duties, which were due at the close of last year, were much greater than were due at the close of the present year. The charges on the consolidated fund for the present year will not be the same as for the past year. I have obtained an estimate of the increased charge, and the expenditure charged on the consolidated fund for the year will not be less than £30,300,000."

On the 19th, a deputation, consisting of more than three hundred persons, representing the sentiments of those who are desirous for the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the West Indian colonies, waited upon lord Althorp and Mr. Stanley at the foreign office. On the same evening in the house of commons,

Mr. Stanley said that a notice of motion given by his noble friend (lord Althorp) on the subject respecting which the feelings of the country were much excited, stood for Tuesday—he meant the motion respecting colonial slavery. Although it was most important that the views of his majesty's government, with regard to that subject, should be stated to the country as early as possible, yet, under the circumstances under which the question came into his hands, he trusted he should not trespass too largely on the indulgence of the house if he asked to be allowed to postpone the motion from Tuesday next till Tuesday the 14th of May. (Hear, hear.)

The papers by this arrival contain the proclamation of the lord lieutenant, for the suppression of the Irish volunteers.* After the preamble reciting the whereas, the operative part of the proclamation is given in the following terms—

"Now, we, the lord lieutenant general and general governor of Ireland, deeming the said association, called 'The Irish volunteers,' to be dangerous to the public peace and safety, and inconsistent with the due administration of the law, do, by this our order in writing, prohibit and suppress the said association; and we do further, by this our order, prohibit every and any adjourned, renewed, or otherwise continue meeting of the said association, or of any part thereof, under any name, pretext, shift, or device whatsoever.

"Given at his majesty's castle of Dublin, the 10th day of April, 1833. By his excellency's command,
"W. GOSSETT."

The following document contains the general instructions to the military in reference to the performance of their duties under the suppression bill.

General order.

Adjutant-general's office, Dublin, April 11.

1. In the discharge of the important duties they may be required to perform in the county of Kilkenny, the lieutenant general commanding the army in Ireland calls on the officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers, to exercise the utmost possible caution; and whilst by their exertions in aid of the civil authorities, they mark their determination to use their best endeavors to prevent outrage and restore order, he has no doubt that they will by their good conduct and kindness towards the inhabitants, obtain their confidence, and conciliate their good will.

2. Officers having the commission of the peace must above all things, be most careful to confine themselves strictly within the powers conferred on them by law.

3. All those acting as magistrates, and all others in command of detachments, will take every pains to acquire a knowledge of the dangerous characters resident in the vicinity of their quarters, and in conjunction with the police, to apprehend such as are charged with crime, or who, being suspected of it, are found transgressing the law, by being absent from their houses, between the hours when such absence is illegal; in order to effect this, patrols of police, and military combined, should be frequently made at different times of the night, and with the utmost secrecy.

4. Force will never be used when the object can be otherwise obtained; but against those who resist the law, the troops will do their duty.

By command of the lieutenant general commanding.

GEORGE D'AGUILLAK, dep. adj. gen.

The influenza is raging generally in London. Many distinguished individuals have been attacked; but not many persons had died of it. The generality of the disease may be esteemed from these facts—that the business of several of the courts was interrupted—that nearly eight hundred of the London police were sick—that the Italian opera, Covent Garden, Drury Lane, the Haymarket and Strand theatres, were all closed, because of the illness of performers, though at one of them a play had been "ordered by her majesty." It is said—"there is not an inhabited house within the bills of mortality, in which there has not been one or two sufferers." Those who live in damp situations suffer most.

The same disease prevails in Dublin.

The first practical exhibition of martial law in the "proclaimed" district of Kilkenny took place on the night of the 14th of April, when 8 men were taken up, being found out of their houses at 11 o'clock at night; some of them at a public house. They were brought before a board of magistrates, consisting of the deputy mayor, Joseph Greene, resident county magistrate; the recorder, and Aldermen Robison and Gore, by whom they were desired to give an account of themselves. It appeared they were from home through inadvertence or carelessness, "as they intended no harm," and were discharged with an admonition from the bench. It appears that no military authorities sat in judgment. Two others were not so fortunate, and were committed.

The Whitefeet were yet active in outrages.

The reverend sir Rowland Hill died on the 10th April, in the 89th year of his age.

PRUSSIA, &c.

An article from Berlin of the 6th of April, says,

"The appearance of a new disorder, called the white plague, which is probably only a modification of the cholera, does not excite so much alarm as the latter disease did two years ago. This new disorder is said to have reached the Vistula, and in some places to have passed it, and to be a diarrhoea, which very soon proves fatal. The influenza rages here in an extraordinary degree, and the small pox and measles, which preceded it, abate very slowly. In the school for cadets, 90 boys are ill of the latter disease, but none have died."

FRANCE.

The detachment of Polish refugees which left Besancon in the night of the 7th of April, consisted of three colonels, six lieutenant colonels, 12 majors, 63 captains, 96 lieutenants, 204 second co. 8 non-commissioned officers and 25 privates.

At the sitting of the chamber of deputies on the 19th April, the discussion of the budget of ways and means, for 1833, was resumed and finally adopted, by a vote of 198 to 34. The amount required and agreed to was 955,870,548 fr. including 1,705,000 fr. the estimated receipts from Algiers.

According to a royal ordinance dated the 4th of April, rectifying several tables of the population of France annexed to the ordinance of May 11, 1832, it appears, says a Paris paper of the 20th, that the total population of the kingdom amounts to 33,695,072 souls, being 2,138 more than in the first tables.

Four more physicians have been sent to attend upon the duchess of Berri!

It is said that Lucien Bonaparte is about to visit the United States.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

Another diplomatic note, signed by Talleyrand and Palmerson, is published—but things remain as they were.

GERMANY.

The diet has availed itself of the pretence afforded by the riot at Frankfort on the 3d of April, to introduce the troops of Austria into that city, to keep the inhabitants under closer subjection. Prussia, too, which is always on the alert to enforce the principles and decrees of despotism, has quartered a body of troops in the environs. Measures are also said to be in agitation by the diet to suppress, still more effectually, any murmurings of the press.

Frankfort is called a "free" city, and the people are very indignant at being thus garrisoned. The Gazette of the 11th

April says—"Our town remains perfectly quiet, but the posts are still doubled, in order to prevent any further disturbances. Screens have been fixed to all the windows of the prison which look towards the street since the confinement of the political prisoners. This will not deprive them of light or air, but will only prevent their being seen from without."

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

Some negotiations appear to be going on between the sultan and the pacha. The Russian fleet remained in the Bosphorus, and Russian troops were on their march for Constantinople. An Egyptian fleet of 30 sail was said to be off Tenedos, thought with a view of blockading Constantinople, if the British and French shall not interfere. Ibrahim, with 80,000 men, was reported as advancing from Koniah, with the supposed purpose of attacking the Turkish castle on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont.

GREECE.

The French troops were just about leaving Greece.

LATER NEWS.

From London papers to April 30, inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

In England the ministry have been left in a minority on the malt tax, half the duty on that article having been remitted by a majority of 10, which, by some of the English editors, is thought to be a virtual annihilation of the budget of the chancellor of the exchequer. The Times of the 30th April, however, in remarking upon that subject, says:

"The idea of the administration resigning on such a point would be the height of folly and absurdity. There could scarcely be a greater calamity for this country than a change in the counsellors of the crown at the present moment, when plans have been matured for the settlement of so many great questions, and when the country is so eager to reap some of the fruits of the reform. The arrangement of the affairs of the East India company, the bank charter question, the new code for abolishing or mitigating colonial slavery, the state of the church, besides many other things of great importance, press for an immediate decision. The least interruption to the march of the government at this interesting crisis would lose half of one of the most important sessions in our annals. Besides, no party but the faction of anarchy could gain any thing by the change. The return of the tories to office is impossible; the country rejects them, and they themselves are confessedly afraid to take it; and we suppose the country is not yet prepared to submit to the dominion of the Irish lord of misrule, or of the Brunswick Hampden. All that we could gain by any exhibition of unpatriotic pique or pride in tendering their places by the present cabinet, would be some confusion, and a great interruption to the business of the country. We hope, however, that ministers will take warning from the danger into which their own want of foresight has plunged them."

[If it is proper that an administration should retire, on the failure of support by a majority of the house of commons, in England—what would have happened in the last four years in the United States? We believe that only one favorite project has received the support of our house of representatives—and that (for the removals of the Indians), by a very spare vote.]

It seems that the ministers had decided not to resign, and that the king expressed his unabated confidence in them.

Private letters say, that unless the house of commons reconsider the vote on the malt duty, the property tax will certainly be carried.

The cotton duty reduction was fixed to go into operation on the first of June. The merchants at Liverpool had petitioned that it might be postponed to a further period, but the ministry refused to comply with their request.

There has been a good deal of fluctuation in the price of British and foreign stocks, at London.

A London paper, called the Old England, in speaking of the coercive measures adopted towards Ireland, says "protestant England is now becoming aware that the fight of her faith must be fought in Ireland."

In the house of commons on the 22nd April, Mr. Attwood's motion for an inquiry into the distress of the country, and especially as to how far that distress was connected with the operation of the monetary system, was three nights debated, and Mr. Attwood's motion, which was opposed by ministers, was rejected, 331 to 139. Lord Althorp then put his original motion, which was carried by 304 to 49. It was as follows:

"That any alteration of the monetary system of the country which would have the effect of lowering the standard of value, would be highly inexpedient."

The vote by ballot was the subject of a long debate. Lord Althorp, though an open advocate of the ballot out of the house, yet opposed Mr. Grote's motion that "in all future elections the vote be taken by ballot?"—and it was consequently rejected, 211 to 105. For a reformed parliament, this is a strange decision.

FRANCE.

The duke of Orleans was to start for England on the 15th of May, and would pass some weeks in London. The duke de Valencey, son of the duchess de Dino, was to accompany his royal highness.

The acts of certain of the Poles, in France, in leaving the places assigned them, as mentioned before, will, probably, cause many difficulties in respect to these, and also others, who remained in depot. Under the present circumstances, the French government, it is said, means to apply the law which authorizes it to refuse the admission of foreigners whose presence may disturb the public tranquillity.

The French government are preparing a large naval force at Toulon, to be in readiness to go to sea upon the arrival of the English squadron, which was expected soon to arrive there. Orders had been transmitted to the storekeepers to provide a quantity of materials for their service.

The Carlist journals assert that the duchess de Berri is extremely ill. Her devout partisans deny her pregnancy, and maintain that she is afflicted with some singular complaint, which can only be cured by miraculous power; and a lady of rank, in Paris, has accordingly transmitted a part of the gown of the Notre Dame de Liesse, for the duchess to kiss. A radical cure is expected shortly to be effected.

The French chamber of deputies have voted 50,000 francs, for the purchase of the MSS. and works of the late M. Champollion; and a pension of 3,000 francs to his widow.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

German papers mention that the agents of Ibrahim Pacha are very active at Constantinople; that the sultan is in hourly danger of his life; and that fears are entertained about bringing the Russian troops into the capital, as the sight of them might make the people desperate and accelerate an explosion. The same authorities state that ten thousand Russian infantry have passed the Danube on their road to Constantinople. Accounts from Berlin speak of a report to the effect that a proposal has been made by one of the European cabinets for diplomatic conferences at Vienna, for the purpose of discussing in common the affairs of the east.

It seems clearly understood that the Turks have invited the protection of the Russians. And yet said, that the porte, more fearful of his friends than his enemies, had resolved to accept the terms offered by his rebellious pacha. We think that both may be true—in such a cabinet as that of Constantinople.

Another account says—the sultan has consented to treat with the viceroy of Egypt, upon the basis of the propositions transmitted by him to his son Ibrahim. The French envoy appears to be acting the part of a mediator between them. All active proceedings are therefore suspended for the present.

Another—the sultan has accepted the terms of peace proposed to him by the pacha of Egypt, through Ali pacha.

GERMANY.

The late events at Frankfurt, &c. have caused much excitement, and may produce important effects, in Germany. The people seem kept "in order" only by the pressure of military force.

POLAND.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 18th of April states, that an insurrection of the Poles had taken place in Cracow, who had cut to pieces some detachments of Russian troops. Considerable bodies of Poles are represented to be organized in the forests, and the Russian government is said to have had recourse to severe measures to suppress the spirit of revolt that has been manifested.

The emperor of Russia has issued a manifesto, relative to the state of things in Poland, and the czar has the effrontery, at the commencement of it, to assert that "every body knows the high degree of prosperity to which Poland had been raised by fifteen years' assiduous care and paternal solicitude on the part of the Russian government.

The autocrat has issued a more rigorous prohibition against Poles and Russians travelling to France. His "paternal solicitude" for their welfare is such that he chooses to retain them within the reach of the knout.

PORTUGAL.

Accounts from Madrid state that there is reason to believe that the affairs of Portugal will be arranged in a manner to conciliate the princes of the house of Braganza.

BARBARY POWERS.

A letter from Genoa, of the 18th inst. says—"some misunderstanding has arisen between the regency of Tunis and this government, who have fitted out four double-banked frigates, which have sailed. Another double-banked frigate and several gun boats are preparing, said to be destined for Tunis. A report has reached this from Tunis, of the 9th inst. that great preparations for war were making there, and that the Goletta was being put in the best state of defence. About 10,000 men were embarked."

BUENOS AYRES.

On the 25th, the house of representatives, after a long debate, passed the following decree, which we hail with pleasure as indicating the advance of liberal sentiments in our sister republic: "The government is authorised in the case of Mr. Samuel F. Lafone and Donna Maria Quevedo, or in any case of a similar nature which may occur, to grant a dispensation of the impediments which were established by the civil laws, in order to the celebration of marriage between Catholic and Protestant individuals."

The parties above mentioned, are those between whom marriage was solemnized by our fellow countryman, rev. William Torrey, and for which both he and they were subjected to a long series of vexations, both from the civil and ecclesiastical powers of the country. The British Packet however states, that "notwithstanding the discretionary power which has been given to the government, there still exist ecclesiastical impediments to the intermarriage of Catholics and Protestants, which we believe has been, in no instance, dispensed with by the present prelate. Jour. of Com.

THE LATE JOHN RANDOLPH.

At a meeting of citizens of Philadelphia, assembled the 25th May, 1853, in the district court room of the United States, to unite in a tribute of respect to the remains of our distinguished countryman, the late JOHN RANDOLPH, of Virginia, who died on Friday last in this city, on motion it was resolved unanimously, that the hon. Joseph Hopkinson, take the chair, and that the hon. John G. Watmough, be appointed secretary.

The object of the meeting having been stated from the chair, the following resolution was moved by Mr. Sergeant, and seconded by the hon. Horace Binney.

Resolved, That—be a committee to confer with the personal friends of the deceased, and if consistent with their views and feelings, to make arrangements for uniting with them in a public tribute of respect to the remains of our distinguished countryman, the late JOHN RANDOLPH, of Virginia, whose death in the midst of us, has peculiarly reminded us of the splendid contribution his talents and genius through a long public life have made to the reputation of our country.

The resolution being under consideration, it was moved by Joseph R. Ingersoll, esq. and unanimously carried to fill the blank with ten.

The following named gentlemen were accordingly announced, Horace Binney, Nicholas Biddle, Samuel Bree, Joseph Hemphill, Richard Willing, C. J. Ingersoll, James Brown, gen. Cadwallader, John Sergeant, George M. Dallas.

On motion of David Paul Brown, esq. it was unanimously resolved, that the chairman and secretary of this meeting be added to the committee.

On motion of the hon. John Sergeant, it was Resolved, unanimously, That the committee make known their proceedings through the public papers, unless they should deem it expedient to call another meeting.

On motion, the meeting then adjourned.

JOSEPH HOPKINSON, chairman.

JOHN G. WATMOUGH, secretary.

The meeting having adjourned, the above named committee met accordingly:

After a few preliminary remarks from the chairman, Nicholas Biddle, esq. a motion was made and carried unanimously, authorising him to communicate with the friends of the deceased, and ascertain what future mode of proceeding would be most acceptable to them, and most suitable to the occasion.

The following correspondence is the result, which we are happy to be able to lay so promptly before the public.

Philadelphia, May 25th, 1853.

John S. Barbour, Henry E. Watkins and William J. Barksdale, esqrs.

GENTLEMEN—I have the honor to enclose to you as the friends of the late JOHN RANDOLPH, of Virginia, a copy of the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia, held this day.

On behalf of the committee appointed at that meeting, I am instructed to consult you as to the most acceptable mode in which the citizens of Philadelphia may share with you, in performing the melancholy offices of respect due to an occasion which has deprived you of a personal friend, the state of Virginia of a distinguished son, and our common country of one of her most eminent citizens. I shall be happy to communicate your views to the committee, and in the meantime remain, with great respect, yours,

N. BIDDLE, chairman.

Philadelphia, May 25th, 1853.

SIR—We have received your letter of this day, covering the proceedings of the citizens of Philadelphia, assembled on the occasion of the death among them of John Randolph of Roanoke.

This melancholy event deprived the state of Virginia of a distinguished citizen, who has illustrated his claims to her respect and regard, in a life of faithful and active service. The sovereignty, prosperity and renown of that commonwealth were objects of his affection, at all times close to his heart; and in their support he employed the best efforts of his powerful and splendid genius. The tokens of respect that you have shown for his life and memory, cannot but be grateful to those who hold in just estimation the virtues, the abilities, and public services of Mr. Randolph. In return, we beg you to receive from ourselves and other citizens of Virginia, now present, our cordial and grateful acknowledgments.

The wish which he avowed for the removal of his mortal remains, and their interment within his native land, will make their early departure necessary. And the delay that must follow the acceptance of any further tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased, than that already manifested by the inhabitants of this city, would be attended by great inconvenience. It is hoped that this cause will be acceptably received by you, for our declining, as we most respectfully do, your generous proposition, to unite with us in doing other honor to the memory of our distinguished countryman. With all respect, your obedient servants.

(Signed)

J. S. BARBOUR,
HENRY E. WATKINS,
W. J. BARKSDALE.

N. Biddle, esq. chairman of the committee in behalf of the people of Philadelphia.

Substance of the remarks of Messrs. Sergeant and Binney, at the Philadelphia meeting:

Mr. Sergeant said, he rose to offer a resolution upon the subject which had caused this meeting. The very distinguished citizen who had here terminated his mortal career, though he had died away from his home, had not died among strangers. He was well known in the city of Philadelphia. He was known throughout the United States. He was known, he might add, in every part of the world where the language was understood in which he spoke, and there were men capable of appreciating the extraordinary powers he had exhibited in a public life of between thirty and forty years. In one department of high intellectual exertion, he had justly acquired a pre-eminent reputation, and by it had added to the reputation of our country. He had contributed to place her, at least, on a level with other nations, and to enable her to put in a well-founded claim to the palm of eloquence. It was due, he said, to this community, it was due to the personal friends of the deceased, it was due to the state of Virginia, whose eminent and honored son he was, that the occasion should not pass without some public expression of the sensibility which the death of our distinguished countryman so naturally excited.

In the course of a long public life, full of keen and ardent contest, Mr. Randolph, it was not to be denied, had often offended those who came in contact with him. This kind of irritability, perhaps, belongs to the constitution of a highly gifted nature. Genius is apt to be irritable. The flame that is to be seen afar off, must burn intensely. It overheats the frail vessel that contains its elemental fire, and often scorches those who are in its immediate neighborhood. Death strips off the covering, and with it should fall into the grave the memory of its infirmities. What remains, is light, purified by separation. Shining, but not consuming, but spreading its rays in all directions, it enters into the mass of intellectual light, which adorns and enriches our country.

He said he would make but one more remark. That Mr. Randolph should have come here to die, was, to us, merely accidental. And yet there was something in it, which one who loved the union, could not but heartily welcome. Virginia's eminent son loved and honored his native state as much as any man could do. It was his pride to be in all things a Virginian; and Virginia requited his affection with continued confidence. At her feet he had laid the trophies he had won, and she rejoiced, and sent him forth again to earn new honors. That he breathed his last breath here, in Pennsylvania, would seem to signify that Virginia's eminent son was also a son of the union; that the title of citizen of the United States was still the paramount title, and that the whole union was his country. He said he would detain the meeting no longer.

When seconding the resolution, Mr. Binney said, that while he could add nothing to the force and beauty of the remarks with which the motion had been introduced, it gave him unfeigned satisfaction to second it. It must be confessed that Mr. Randolph was an extraordinary man; extraordinary in many points, and particularly in his command of the public ear for so long a period, by his signal accomplishments as a debater. He has probably spoken to more listeners than any other man of his day, having been unrivalled in the power of riveting the attention by the force and pungency of his language, the facility and beauty of his enunciation, and the point and emphasis of his most striking manner. No man who has heard Mr. Randolph, can ever forget him; and no man who ever heard him once, was ever unwilling to hear him again, except when, under the sway of an excitement to which allusion has been made, that was sometimes said which his most partial admirers wished unsaid. The recollection of these occasions has however passed away, and there remains only the remembrance of those powers which have added another name to the list of our eminent countrymen. Mr. Randolph has been in public life from nearly the dawn of parties in this government to the present time; sometimes a leader, thoroughly prepared and efficient, and always even after sickness had impaired his physical powers, a man whom every one was more willing to have on his side than against him. His reputation now belongs to his country. His career is closed, after enjoying for nearly forty years the confidence and affection of his immediate neighborhood and connections, and the respect of his native state—unexpectedly closed in this city, where it may be said to have begun. As a distinguished son of Virginia, distinguished by her confidence, and by his own talents and station in the public councils of the nation, dying at a distance from his friends and home, it is the duty of hospitality, as well as of sympathy and patriotism, to honor his remains. I therefore cordially second the motion of Mr. Sergeant.

NOTICES OF HIS DEATH

By the editors of the "National Intelligencer."

The Philadelphia papers announce the decease of the hon. JOHN RANDOLPH, of Virginia, who expired at the city hotel, in that city, on Friday last, at noon. Mr. R. passed through this city on Sunday week, in an extremely feeble condition; and the hopeless state of his health for some time past was generally known to his friends, that the news of his death will cause little surprise to them, however deeply it may be regretted.

MR. RANDOLPH, it is well known, was a member elect of the 23d congress, of which body he had been, with occasional intermissions, a member for thirty-five years. From his first entrance into public life, in 1798, he has been one of the most prominent politicians of our country. In some respects, he was one of the most remarkable men of the age, and in a few particulars, perhaps, the most remarkable. If, in the course of his long career, the peculiarity of his temper, and his propensity for sarcasm, made him enemies, no man, on the other hand, has warmer personal friends; and the time has been when few would have disputed the justice of the high compliment which was paid him, when he was pronounced to be "eloquent as CHATHAM as CÆRO incorruptible."

By Mr. Pleasants, editor of the "Richmond Whig."

At the present crisis of public affairs, this event cannot but be deplored by every friend of state rights, as a national calamity. We eagerly looked forward to the time when Mr. Randolph should resume his station in the councils of the nation, as the era from which the doctrines of Jefferson were destined to date their regeneration. We could not bring ourselves to believe that he would not survive his voyage.

Mr. Randolph and ourselves were long at enmity; but we never for a moment withheld from him that admiration which his noble qualities demanded from all. The former sentiment has long since died; the latter flourishes in renewed vigor, and will cease but with the extinction of life. If ever this country owned a son, possessing in a very high degree, those properties usually attributed to genius, apart from what authors denominate more particularly talent, John Randolph was that man. The rapidity and extent of his perception, is almost without a parallel in the history of the world. The eagle brilliancy of his eyes, celebrated wherever he was known, and which almost possessed the power of petrifying those who encountered his gaze, was but a type of the almost superhuman strength, and clearness of his intellect. He arrived not at conclusions like ordinary mortals, by the slow process of reasoning. With him to state the premises, and to see the inference at once, was instinct. Nor were his conclusions less correct, than if derived from a long chain of reasoning, like the instinct of Zerah Colburn, distancing and astounding the profoundest philosophers, without himself knowing how to explain the operation of his wonderful talents. The singularities of Mr. Randolph, were such as universally attend great genius, when coupled with an infirm constitution. The truth of this is exemplified in the cases of Pope, Rousseau, Alfieri, lord Byron, and others, whose eccentricities though probably not so extravagant, very much resembled his. Peace be to his ashes. He will be considered by future ages, when the rage of party is forgotten, the pride of his country, and the miracle of his age.

By Mr. Ritchie, editor of the "Richmond Enquirer."

John Randolph, esq. of Roanoke. Some sadder pen than our own, will be found to do justice to the merits of Mr. Randolph. We may say truly, that a great man has this day fallen in Israel. As an orator, he was, with one exception, superior to any other man whom Virginia, and we may add, the United States, has ever produced—Patrick Henry alone bears away the palm from all competitors. For his powers of conversation, Mr. Randolph stood unrivalled. His genius was of the most brilliant order—and the most polished taste had lent all her graces to its improvement. As a politician, his reputation was great. The friends of the rights of the states, can never forget the distinguished services he has rendered on numerous occasions to their elevated cause. Peace be to his ashes! The man that traces these hasty lines buries all unworthy feelings in his grave.

Arrival of the remains of Mr. Randolph, at Richmond—from the Whig of May 29:

The remains of Mr. Randolph arrived last night in steamboat Patrick Henry, and were carried to Mrs. Duval's boarding house, where the funeral service of the Episcopal church was read over them this morning, at ten o'clock, by the rev. Mr. Lee. According to the request of the deceased, uttered a few weeks since, this was all the ceremony, he having intimated a wish that no funeral sermon should be preached over him. The procession started a few minutes after eleven, and was followed by an immense concourse of people as far as the toll gate of Mayor's bridge. Thirteen minute guns were fired as the procession set off, by a detachment of artillery, under the command of lieutenant Hollins, as a token of respect entertained by that company for the memory of the deceased. Lieutenant Randolph who arrived last night, joined in the procession. Julia and Johnny whose names have become classical, and will go down to posterity in indissoluble union with that of their master, formed a conspicuous part of the procession. Our sympathies were deeply affected by the silent and unostentatious grief of the former, down whose cheeks the tears trickled, as he assisted to place the remains of his master in the hearse. Strange as the deceased was known to be in his humors, capricious as was his temper, and small as his sympathy with mankind might appear to be, he had yet so contrived to entwine the affections of the poor African around him that he has probably never thought of existing without him.

Mr. Randolph's mind is said to have blazed out powerfully and brilliantly, as the lamp was dwindling into the socket. His mind dwelt incessantly upon Virginia, his dear old Virginia, the land of his birth, the home of his affections, and the theatre of his glory. His desire to be buried in his native land is characteristic.

"Mortuus et moriens dulces reminiscitur Argos."

It is rumored that Mr. Randolph has by his will left all his slaves free.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

April 25th, 1833.

Regulations for the government of the mail arrangement on the great Atlantic line from Washington, D. C. to Portland, Maine, commencing on the 1st May, 1833.

1. Double mail lines are to be run from Washington to Hartford, Ct. one of which will be known as the fast line—the other as the ordinary line. East of Hartford the mail is to be conveyed as now in one line; but conformably to the following schedule:

2. The fast line is to convey no other matter than letters and newspapers, and to deliver mails at the following offices only: Washington, Baltimore, (Wilmington, on the winter arrangement), Philadelphia, New York and Hartford.

3. The ordinary line is to convey all mails and mail matter not admitted into the fast line, and to deliver mails at all offices on the route.

4. The mails for the fast line are to be made up at each of the above named offices for every other of the above named offices, both delivery and distribution, under a distinct address to it—and marked "fast mail"—and be placed in a red canvass bag addressed by label to such office—no other portmanteaus than those under the large lock, and no other canvass bags than the red cases are to be conveyed by the fast line.

5. No distribution of the fast mails by an intervening distribution office is to be made—but all such intervening distribution offices will have their fast mails made up as aforesaid half an hour before the time set for the arrival of the mail, so as to subject it to no greater detention than will be required for opening the bags and taking out the mail for said office, and returning its own mails to the bags and closing the same.

6. Care should be taken to put in red bags to go out of the portmanteaus only such published matter as is entitled to go in the fast line, and to put such matter invariably in red bags. This regulation applies to mails to be conveyed on the great western line from Baltimore. Red bags in portmanteaus are to be labelled on wrapping paper folded, and tied and sealed at the mouth of the bag—out of portmanteaus on wood.

7. When a canvass bag, addressed to an intermediate point, as to New York for instance, is received at that office and emptied of its contents, let it pass through to the end of the fast line, Hartford for instance, as an empty bag open, with the label pinned on, to receive the returning mail—and so vice versa.

8. The offices of Portland, Portsmouth, Boston and Providence will, in making up their delivery or distribution mails admissible in the fast line for the large offices on the route of that line, mark them "fast mail" for the better convenience of the postmaster of Hartford in arranging the mails, to the appropriate bags.

9. Mails for Wilmington from the east will be, during the summer arrangement, sent to Philadelphia, from which office they will be despatched direct to Wilmington. At Washington and Baltimore, they will be made up in a separate portmanteau, under a large lock, to be left at New Castle.

10. The schedule for the winter arrangements is to be observed at Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, whenever steamboats cease running on the Chesapeake and Delaware—at New York and the offices east of it, whenever steamboats cease running between New Haven and New York.

11. Ordinary mails from Washington to Baltimore, and vice versa, are to be despatched every morning and to run through in not exceeding seven hours.

12. Ordinary mails from Baltimore to Philadelphia, and vice versa, are to be despatched by every steamboat of the "Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland steamboat company," and by the Havre de Grace and Port Deposit stage lines.

13. Ordinary mails from Philadelphia to New York, and vice versa, will be sent as now by the steamboat line, and by a stage line to depart early in the morning from Philadelphia, so as to lap, in time, upon the steamboat line at Trenton, by which stage lines the mails for Trenton and intermediate offices are to be sent—and by a stage line to depart at the latest hour for crossing the Hudson river from New York, to go to Newark that night and lap the next morning on the steamboat line at New Brunswick by which stage line, the mails for New Brunswick and the intermediate offices are to be sent—on the winter arrangement a second stage line for the ordinary mail will be sent regularly through from office to office.

14. Ordinary mails from New York to Hartford will be despatched daily by the steamboat and by the stages, Sunday excepted. On the Sabbath the fast mails will be sent by the stages, as the New Haven steamboats do not run on that day—returning, the ordinary mail will be sent by stages to New Haven and thence by steamboat to New York—and the fast mails will be conveyed the entire distance by stages. The stages conveying the fast mails may receive at the offices between New Haven and New York pocket mails to be delivered at New York.

15. The distribution at Stamford is discontinued. It will hereafter be performed in the post offices at New York and Hartford.

16. To prevent delays, the contractor will receive his load of passengers and baggage before receiving the mail;—and the postmaster is required on discovering too great a load of the former to allow the requisite speed, to report the fact to the department.

17. Punctual arrival at or before the time fixed in the schedule, will be indispensable, as the outgoing mail is in no case to be detained beyond the time set for its departure, except in the single instance noted in the schedule.

18. The subjoined schedules will be faithfully complied with, and performed by each contractor on the line, from and after the 1st May, 1833.

19. Postmasters will report each failure immediately, with the cause if known—and will also report monthly registers of arrivals and departures.

20. Postmasters will advise the department of any disadjustment or want of the proper connexion with the pending routes that may be occasioned by the change of time made by the following schedules, together with their best suggestions of improvement.

Summary statement of the quantity and value of goods, wares and merchandize, imported into the United States, in American and foreign vessels, commencing on the 1st day of October, 1831, and ending on the 30th September, 1832.

[In cases of comparison, between the years 1832 and 1831, the careful examiner will please to observe—that, while the lists for the year 1832, contain all the articles in the tables for THAT year—the value of a few items, under the same denomination, is not found in the columns for 1831. And, in the tables for 1831, there were some items, under certain denominations, which are not to be found in the tables for 1832. We make this explanation for the sake of those persons who may desire to make very close and accurate comparisons—but the whole amount of the things omitted is of small, if any, importance—affecting only a few articles of inconsiderable value, on either side. The aggregates are given, [for 1831], us though every item had been inserted, for the sake of a general, or summary, comparison.]

EDITORIAL AND MISCELLANEOUS.

The editor of the Philadelphia "Commercial Herald" finds fault with us for not having rendered "credit" to that paper for the large table concerning the exchanges of the bank of the United States, inserted in the REGISTER of the 1st inst. We heartily reciprocate the respectful terms in which the "Herald" prefers this complaint—but if the editor had read the remarks with which we introduced the article, he would have seen that the table was furnished to us in manuscript—for we said, "perhaps, it has already been published; though we do not recollect to have seen it before." And besides, we assumed no "credit" for giving this public document—not believing that any may be claimed, in similar cases.

A recurrence to this subject presents an opportunity briefly to say—that we have not obtained a statement of the exchanges of the bank of the United States previous to "the abominable and oppressive tariff years"—as it was hoped that we should; for the good reason, perhaps, that previous to 1823-4 the exchanges of the bank were not recorded as they now are, because of the smallness of their amount. We have, however, been furnished with the following solitary items:

In May 1820, the bank and its branches had domestic bills on hand to the amount of	$1,896,000
In May 1821	1,748,000
1822	2,900,000
1833	23,147,000
Purchased in Philadelphia—May 1820	46,000
May 1821	60,000
May 1822	57,000
May 1833	1,825,000

These simple facts shew—not only that the bank, under its present administration, has mightily extended its exchanges, and thereby supplied the public with a currency so nearly "uniform," that the average difference on all its exchanges is only one-eleventh of one per cent. as shewn in the table above alluded to; but also demonstrates the greatly increased business of the people of the United States—since the agriculture and commerce of the country were to have been destroyed by the protection of domestic manufactures!

We shall revert to these facts on some future occasion.

In a subsequent page will be found a New York project for a new bank of the United States.

The explosion of the steamboat Lioness, on the Red River, by gunpowder, is one of the most awful of the many calamities which have happened on the western waters, and will cause more than general regret, as well because of the number of lives lost, as on account of an individual killed—JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, the late distinguished senator of the United States from Louisiana; for he was not only well known to the public as an able statesman and one of the most useful members of the senate, but esteemed and beloved by thousands of persons who had had opportunities of making a personal acquaintance with him. He was a gentleman of rare accomplishments—generous, and faithful, and kind; of very courteous manners, and possessed of the most liberal feelings: a fast friend, and an honorable opponent. His loss will not be easily supplied—in the councils of his country; never, in the hearts of his immediate connexions.

We give an account of this horrible affair in page 260. How the fire reached the gunpowder (of which it is said there were sixty casks on board), is unknown; and the blow was so instant and astounding, that many more must have perished but for the narrowness of the river. Those who might, perhaps, have explained the immediate cause of the disaster, were all killed.

This is not the first explosion of a steamboat by gunpowder—but may, possibly, lead to the passage of laws to prevent other calamities of the kind. These boats ought not to be permitted to carry gunpowder, except on giving public notice that they are transporting it; and persons who conceal the fact that gunpowder is shipped in a steam boat—ought, on a simple proof of the fact, to be sent to the penitentiary for life.

Mr. Johnston was a native of Connecticut, but taken in early infancy by his father to Kentucky, where he was educated. He emigrated to Louisiana in 1804 or 1805, and served in the first territorial legislature, and was afterwards appointed a judge, twice elected a representative in congress—and he was twice, if not three times, elected a senator of the United States.

The New Orleans Argus, speaking of him says—We have not the time to enumerate important measures connected with the prosperity of this state, of which he was either the promoter, or the ardent and efficient supporter. It is less necessary; for his public services are known to all. Those who only knew him as a public man will regret his loss. Those who knew him intimately will mourn it. It will be long again before they can meet with the same warm heart and cool head—the same absence of, and contempt for, profession and pretence; and the same ready performance of all the duties which friendship imposed.

The great and very important question concerning slavery in the British West Indies, seems about to be decided. We insert two or three brief papers on this subject—one of them, an outline of the plan of the ministry. We incline to believe that this plan is impracticable—but it is manifest that a strong, and, most probably, successful effort will be made for the abolition of slavery, at any cost and every hazard! The abolitionists in England would seem to know but little of the real state of things in the West Indies—for a general and prompt emancipation of the slaves, even if admitted right in itself, would probably overwhelm both the white and colored population in one common ruin—unless means shall be provided for withdrawing all white persons from the islands, except those who may be stationed in them for the preservation of order and enforcement of the laws. A mixed body of free whites and free blacks cannot be maintained, because of existing prejudices, and the greater numbers of the latter. We have a deep interest in these proceedings, and on several accounts; and, looking at them in any light presented, we find them encompassed by doubts and difficulties.

TREATY WITH FRANCE. We have an official translation of a report made to the French chamber of deputies, concerning the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th of July 1831, see page 263.

It will be seen that the 2nd day of February 1832 is stated to be the time when this treaty was "ratified at Washington." We desire to understand how this happened—that certain apparently strange things may be reconciled.

We shall recapitulate the facts:

1. The treaty, concluded at Paris in July 1831, was to be ratified "and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington, in the space of eight months, or sooner, if possible."

2. The treaty, contains two points only—an agreement to pay 25 millions of francs, in six annual instalments—the first "to be paid at the expiration of one year next following the exchange of the ratifications;" and a stipulation that the duties payable on French wines shall be reduced.

3. The president of the United States, in his message of Dec. 1831, said that the treaty would require "legislative acts" having the concurrence of both houses [of congress] before it can be carried into effect.

Now the "legislative acts" referred to were not laws until the 14th July 1832; and, on the same date, the president issued his proclamation saying that "the ratifications were this day exchanged, at the city of Washington."

It would, then, appear—that there has been two "exchanges of ratifications"—the one on the 2nd of February, and the other on the 14th July: the first four months before the passage of the law without which the treaty could not be "carried into effect."

"We give the following from the Richmond Enquirer, though we do not understand what are the "new relations" spoken of:

We understand, that in consequence of the new state of our relations with France, arising from the protested draft, &c. it has been deemed advisable by the president to despatch Mr. Livingston immediately to France. It is impossible yet to say how far the state of the question with France may not affect our relations also with Naples. It is said that the president was desirous of nominating Mr. Livingston to the last senate—but that he considered the condition of our domestic concerns at that time rendered any change in the treasury and state departments inexpedient. In consequence of Mr. L.'s new appointment, it has been seen that Mr. McLane has been transferred to the state department, and Mr. Duane has been appointed to the treasury.

It is also said, that no information has been received from Great Britain as to the opening of the negotiation—and that hence no appointment is forthwith made to London."

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT. During his stay in Baltimore, president Jackson had an interview with Black Hawk, and the other Indians—who arrived here on the same day that he did. The following account of what was said on that occasion is copied from the "Republican." The president said—

My children—When I saw you in Washington, I told you that you had behaved very badly, in raising the tomahawk against the white people, and killing men, women and children upon the frontier. Your conduct last year compelled me to send my warriors against you, and your people were defeated, with great loss, and your men surrendered, to be kept until I should be satisfied, that you would not try to do any more injury. I told you I would inquire whether your people wished you should return, and whether, if you did return, there would be any danger to the frontier. Gen. Clark and gen. Atkinson, whom you know, have informed me that Sheekak, your principal chief, and the rest of your people are anxious you should return, and Ke-o-kuk has asked me to send you back. Your chiefs have pledged themselves for your good conduct, and I have given directions, that you should be taken to your own country.

Maj. Garland, who is with you, will conduct you through some of our towns. You will see the strength of the white people. You will see, that our young men are as numerous, as the leaves in the woods. What can you do against us? You may kill a few women and children, but such a force would be soon sent against you, as would destroy your whole tribe. Let the red men hunt and take care of their families, but I hope they will not again raise their hands against their white brethren. We do not wish to injure you. We desire your prosperity and improvement. But if you again plunge your knives into the breasts of our people, I shall send a force, which will severely punish you for all your cruelties.

When you go back, listen to the councils of Ke-o-kuk and the other friendly chiefs. Bury the tomahawk, and live in peace with the frontiers. And I pray the Great Spirit to give you a smooth path and fair sky to return.

To this the prophet and the other answered.

My Father—My ears are open to your words. I am glad to hear them. I am glad to go back to my people. I want to see my family. I did not behave well last summer. I ought not to have taken up the tomahawk. But my people have suffered a great deal. When I get back, I will remember your words. I won't go to war again. I will live in peace. I shall hold you by the hand.

The president, as before stated left Baltimore in the steamboat Kentucky—and the "Gazette" says—"A little incident occurred at the time of the departure of the boats, which shows that even during the present animated opposition between the two lines, all other feelings were made to yield to the desire of showing respect to the chief magistrate of the nation. The position of the boats, as lying at the wharf, is such that the Charles Carroll, belonging to the Union Line, has the advantage in starting; but captain Claytor, her commander, with the urbanity and prompt sense of propriety which characterize him, on this occasion waived his privilege, and permitted the Kentucky to take the precedence. The act, and the manner in which it was performed, excited warm feelings of approbation among the crowd of spectators who were assembled on the wharf to witness the departure of the president."

Immense crowds of persons attended to get a sight of Black Hawk and his companions. So great was the pressure, that it was thought necessary to remove them to fort McHenry; previous to which, however, they had been conveyed in carriages, through the principal streets of the city. They left us for Philadelphia on Monday last.

The president's receptions at Philadelphia and New York were got up with much zeal, and very considerable pomp—and great numbers of persons attended to pay their respects to him. We have laid aside the papers to give a brief narrative of the proceedings had—but cannot pretend to go into the details.

We certainly wish, and as heartily as any person, that a president of the United States, or the president, may ever be treated with all courtesy and respect—for in doing that, the people show a proper respect for themselves; but many things happened in the famous tour of Mr. Monroe which every plain republican regretted, after the excitement had passed away; and circumstances are now occurring, which, perhaps, even the chief actors in them will not be pleased with, hereafter. Many little incidents, harmless in themselves and of the most trifling character, are rendered supremely ridiculous because of the solemn manner in which they are stated. The court-newspapers in France, when the "glory" of the Bourbons was at its height, (Frenchmen being all slaves), were hardly more offensive than certain which might be named on the present occasion—for if the king laughed or coughed, or took a pinch of snuff, a loyal record was made of it—and the birth of a son to Louis the 16th, gave rise to a proceeding on the part of many ladies of Paris, which, for its delicacy, seem about to be excelled by some of the male bipeds of the United States. What the former only referred to by its color, the latter seem almost ready to take, "whole."

MR. WEBSTER. We have accounts of the progress of this distinguished orator and statesman through the western part of New York. At Buffalo, Black Rock, &c. committees, appointed by the people, waited upon him, and tendered their respectful and kind salutations—and he was also waited upon by a committee of the mechanics and manufacturers, &c. A splendid boat bearing his name, was launched at Black Rock, in his presence, on which occasion he delivered a brief address, in reply to certain remarks made to him. He had been invited to public dinners at several places, but politely declined them—wishing to devote all the time at his command to the examination of interesting objects, and an “unrestrained and unceremonious intercourse” with the people.

FREE LABORERS. We see it mentioned in the papers, that Mr. William Wirt, of Baltimore, has purchased an estate in Florida, which he intends to work with hired hands, and hence the “United States Gazette” says, that he ought to be president of the anti-slavery society; on which the New York Commercial Advertiser observes—“We have no objection whatever to the proposed station for Mr. Wirt; but can assure the editor of the United States Gazette, that he will not be entitled to it on the score of originating the scheme of employing free laborers in Florida. Two gentlemen of our acquaintance from this city, purchased plantations in Florida soon after its acquisition by the United States, and commenced a trial of the experiment which Mr. Wirt proposes to adopt. In order to test the accuracy of its results, they purchased half the number of negroes ordinarily required to stock their plantations, and for the other half of the labor to be performed, they hired white men, principally Yankees. They returned to this city, on a visit, about three years ago, at which time, we learned from them, that the free labor experiment had been altogether successful. They found that it required not more than half the number of white laborers to perform a given amount of work—that consequently there was but half the expense of furnishing them with food, &c.—that they performed their labor with much greater skill, and in every respect better than the negroes, and that they did not commit the reckless waste and petty thefts of which the slaves are constantly and notoriously guilty. These gentlemen were, therefore, fully determined, as a matter of economy, to employ free laborers only, if they could succeed in hiring enough of them, and to dispose of their slaves on hand, in the best way they could. It has not occurred to us to ascertain recently how far they have succeeded in carrying into effect the final purpose they expressed, but entertain no doubt of the sincerity of their intention, or of the correctness of their representation.”

The Jamaica papers inform us that an experiment of free white labor, on a large scale, was about to be made on that island—for which purpose an agent was about to proceed to Germany.

We once thought that slave labor was the cheapest—but are now sure that it is not. If the soil and climate of the densely populated eastern states could be fitted for the cultivation of cotton, sugar and tobacco—the southern states would not furnish the supply of these articles.—The industry and economy of the former would break down the labor-hating and wasteful latter—just as free labor in young Ohio has already interfered with the profits of the tobacco planter in old Maryland—notwithstanding all the benefits of experience, and of location, in the last named state. Ohio can—and, as it were, without an effort, annually produce as much tobacco as the foreign market will advantageously take of the various “Maryland sorts.”

A great mistake generally prevails in the south, as to the laboring classes in the north. It is supposed that these are worked harder than the negro slaves. It is not so. But a sound economy prevails. Nothing is wasted—every thing is done in its season—all things are put in their places; the people think—and, after using a tool to-day, they suppose that it may be wanted again, and so carefully set it aside, in good order. For such and other like reasons it is, that there is no working people in the world who have so much leisure as the Yankees. They drive their business—instead of suffering it to drive them. Their philosophy teaches—that it is better to be before time, than after time; that it is easy to wait for Time, but hard to catch him. His only holding place is BEFORE.

SUGAR PLANTING. From the Savannah Republican of May 29. We have been favored by a friend, with the following statement of the produce of last year, of three distinct plantations, in that part of East Florida, known by the name of Alachua. The names of the planters are omitted, because this notice is made without consulting them; they are left, however, at this office, where any one so disposed may see them.

Information connected with the general agriculture of our region of the United States, we think must be interesting to our planting subscribers—and we therefore, give this example of planting, with pleasure.

160 hlds. sugar,	- - - - -	$11,200
14,000 gallons molasses,	- - - - -	2,800
4,000 bushels corn,	- - - - -	2,500
Fodder, rice, beans, peas, &c.	- - - - -	1,000

Total, - - - - - 17,500

2nd plantation—20 hands.

90 casks sugar,	- - - - -	5,400
7,000 gallons molasses,	- - - - -	1,000
Fodder, beans, &c. &c.	- - - - -	1,000

3d plantation—12 hands.

50 casks sugar,	- - - - -	2,500
7,000 gallons molasses	- - - - -	1,500
2,000 bushels corn,	- - - - -	1,200
Fodder and extra produce,	- - - - -	500

Total, - - - - - 5,700

[The 1st plantation produced 372 dollars to the hand—the second 370—and the third 475.

The aggregate is 79 hands and 30,600 dollars—or 387 dollars for each hand.

This is a great deal more than the average product of free labor in the north, especially if agricultural.]

EMIGRANTS. A mighty number of emigrants are arriving at Quebec—chiefly from Ireland. Thousands seem to be coming almost every day. Many will seek the north western parts of the United States—but Canada promises soon to be a very populous and powerful colony. The destiny of this country may well interest political speculators. At present it is important to the “mother country” as an out-let for her superfluous population—especially the “paupers.”

PAUPERS AND CRIMINALS. During the last winter, 1,083 cords of wood were distributed in Philadelphia; and of the persons relieved 2,257 were natives of the United States, and 888 foreigners—of the latter 493 were Irish, 195 Germans, 103 English, &c.

Of the 412 males confined in the Walnut street, (Philadelphia) prison, on the 1st Jan. 1832—96 were foreigners; 48 Irish, 20 English, 10 Scotch, 10 Germans; of other countries only one each;

AFRICAN COLONIZATION. Numerous applications are making to the board of managers for the passage of free persons and slaves to the colony at Liberia—and especially from Georgia and Virginia. The means of the society do not keep pace with these applications.

DINNER AND SUPPER. Rapid exchange of civilities!

The New York Gazette states that a dinner party is made up in Philadelphia for the 4th of July, to which a number of gentlemen from New York are invited; they leave there at six in the morning, dine at two, and start at three for New York to a supper, accompanied by the gentlemen who give the dinner in Philadelphia.

[To make the “thing” complete, the New York party ought to breakfast at home—which they may leisurely do after sun-rise, without at all interfering with subsequent operations.]

MASSACHUSETTS. The Essex Gazette has a return of all the attempts made to elect a member of congress for “Essex North district,” from Nov. 1, 1830 to May 6, 1833—in all fourteen! In every case there has been three candidates—national republican, Jackson and anti masonic, with a good many scattering votes. What a waste of time, (which is money), and of money itself, has been caused by this perseverance, under an unwise law? A plurality of all the votes given, is required. It is so, we believe, in all the New England states, but has been reformed in Vermont—so that, at the third trial, a majority elects.

Mr. Gorham, (nat. rep.) has been elected to congress from the Boston district.

It is uncertain whether com. Dearborn has been re-elected. He had made a gain as compared with the last election.

The result in the Essex North district is unknown; but it is probable that Mr. Osgood, a “coalition” candidate has been elected.

RHODE ISLAND. It appears from the proceedings of the legislature of Rhode Island, that the attorney general of that state has instituted a process in the supreme court of the United States, against the state of Massachusetts, in relation to the boundary line between the states.

A writer in the Connecticut Courant remarks:—"Well may the state of Connecticut be proud of the ample provision made for the education of her children. No community in the world of equal dimensions has such a fund for such a noble object. Let it be the pride and glory of all parties and creeds to render it as safe and productive as possible."

The income of this fund, received last year, was $80,915—which is divided among the towns in proportion to the children in the schools, &c. It is expected that the income will be considerably increased.

BALLOONING. Mr. Durant lately ascended from Castle Garden, New York, in a balloon; to a height exceeding three miles—the greatest ever attained is said to have been four miles.) He left the Garden at 4 m. past 5 o'clock—in 25 seconds was out of sight, and in 2 minutes he lost sight of the earth. He descended safely in 1 h. 37 m. in West Chester county, about 12 miles from the place of starting. The cold was intense, at his greatest altitude.

FRANKLIN INSTITUTE, at PHILADELPHIA. We have received "a list of the premiums offered to competitors at the eighth exhibition" of this institute, to be held in October 1835. More than one hundred articles are enumerated for premiums—gold or silver medals, and there are a few to which a premium in money is also added. Several of the offers have relation to the use of anthracite coal, and many to various manufactures of iron, in both which Pennsylvania is deeply interested. Handsome premiums, in money, are offered for the best stoves, or grates, for anthracite coal, the cost of which shall not exceed ten dollars, and for the best street lamp; and a committee of the institute are devising ways and means to offer a premium of one or two thousand dollars, "to the company or individual who shall first succeed in making sheet iron equal to that now imported into this country from Russia."

This institute has rendered important services to the community, and we are glad to be informed that it has a stable foundation.

The following is the 105th premium—
To the person who shall invent, on or before the first day of October next, the best plan which will prove effectual in preventing the escape of sparks, (when the fuel employed is wood), from the smoke pipe of a locomotive engine on Stephenson's construction, without diminishing the draft so as to interfere with the rapid production of steam, or otherwise impairing the power or speed:

Two hundred dollars and a silver medal.

The above premium is offered at the request of the New Castle and Frenchtown turnpike and rail road company, who have liberally engaged to provide the funds for the payment of it. Various experiments have been made by them, which will be freely communicated by the superintendent, at New Castle, to all applicants who may be desirous of competing for the premium.

DELAWARE. The court of errors and appeals have decided the great case of Randal vs. the Chesapeake and Delaware canal company, in favor of the plaintiff. The court was unanimous. The amount claimed is very large—we think more than 200,000 dollars; but the part to be allowed is yet to be ascertained by a writ of inquiry.

BALTIMORE. The Horticultural society of Maryland had their first exhibition on Wednesday last. The show of plants and flowers at the Athenæum exceeded the most sanguine expectation of all persons—and was, indeed, very beautiful and well arranged. Among other things to be admired was an address from our distinguished friend, John P. Kennedy, esq. to a large auditory of ladies and gentlemen.

VIRGINIA. By an act of the legislature, at the last session, the Bank of Virginia, and the Farmers' bank of Virginia were authorised to increase their respective capitals half a million, provided they loaned the same sum to the James river and Kanawha improvement. General meetings of the stockholders of those banks were held, to approve or reject the proposition. The bank of Virginia accepted, 3,050 years, 104 days; but the Farmer's bank, by a vote of about two to one, declined the offer. The treasurer of the state, on behalf of the stock held by the commonwealth, voted, in both banks, for accepting the law.

GEORGIA. At a large meeting of union democratic republicans, (from all parts of Georgia, composed of members of the state convention and others), agreeably to previous notice, convened in the representative hall, at Milledgeville, on Tuesday evening, May 14, the following resolutions (amongst others), were unanimously adopted, viz:

Be it resolved, by this assembly, composed of citizens from various parts of the state of Georgia, convened in Milledgeville, That we approve and will maintain the principles asserted in the Virginia report and resolutions of 1798 and 1799, as expounded by James Madison, the pure, enlightened, and venerable patriarch by whom they were prepared—by which alone can be preserved at the same time the delegated powers of the federal government, and the reserved powers of the states.

Be it further resolved, That we disapprove of the doctrines of nullification, believing that they are opposed to the theory of the constitution of the United States, that they are incompatible with the existence of the federal union, that they lead inevitably to civil war, and the multiplication of standing armies, and are most dangerous to liberty; and that we behold, with deep regret, the continued military preparations in a neighboring sister state, which has yielded itself to the guidance of those pernicious principles.

Be it further resolved, That we cordially approve of the conduct of our senator John Forsyth, and of our representative, James M. Wayne, in the unequivocal, and energetic support, which they have given to the administration of Andrew Jackson, in their uniform and judicious efforts to relieve the country from the burdens of an unjust protective tariff, and in their bold and determined opposition to the political heresy of nullification.

LOUISIANA. An acquaintance lately from the Attakapas, informs us that the planters in that part of the state, never had a more promising prospect of abundant crops of sugar, corn and cotton, than the present season. They have planted an unusually large quantity of the plant cane, all of which is in the most flourishing condition. New Orleans, 24th ult.

FLORIDA. It is not yet certainly known whether col. White has been re-elected, or gen. Call elected, the delegate from this territory. Prodigious efforts were made on behalf of the latter. The "Floridian" published at Tallahassee, May 25, gives all the returns, then received, and shews a majority of 97 for White; but says that Call had been proclaimed elected by "the roar of artillery, and shouts of triumph"—adding that, this was all the evidence of his election, then present.

THE CHOLERA. At Wheeling, from the 16th May, to 4th June, inclusive, there appeared 142 decided cases of cholera, and 74 deaths. In the 5 days ending 4th of June, there were reported to the board of health, 90 cases, and fifty-one deaths! An awful amount indeed—in a population of 3,500; admitting that none of the inhabitants had deserted their homes because of the disease. On the 5th of June there died 7, and, on the 6th, six persons.

It was believed that nearly one-third of the people of Wheeling had been more or less affected by the cholera, and the premonitory symptoms, more or less severely.

Mr. Noah Zane was among those who died at Wheeling. A majority of the fatal cases is of women and children. The Gazette of the 8th says that the disease had nearly disappeared.

Two fatal cases of cholera have happened at Sharpsburg, on the Alleghany river, 5 miles above Pittsburg.

Nashville. The cholera has re-appeared here. On the 28th May, there were 20 cases, and 8 deaths—but on the 29th, only 6 or 7 cases and 2 deaths.

Among those who died at Nashville of the cholera, were Josiah Nichol, esq. president of the office of the bank of the United States, and F. Porterfield, esq. a very respectable merchant. The deaths for the week ending June 3, were 30.

Vicksburg, Mississippi. Died, in this place of cholera, on Tuesday 7th May, Mr. Ruel A. Watson, merchant.

On the same day, also of cholera, Jane, Emily, and Juliet, daughters of Dr. J. W. Hegeman.

These three young ladies were the only children of Dr. Hegeman, and on the evening of the same day, one of them was to be married to the gentleman whose decease is likewise announced.

Beautiful flowers, whom evil fate would not sever, but has plucked them all on a single stem. A day since, you were full of the joy and glee of youth, and in the innocence of your hearts prepared for nuptial festivities. But the wedding and banquet now give place to funeral obsequies and solemn assemblages of afflicted friends! On the marriage day, bride and bridegroom meet in the world of spirits and the lovely sisters are in attendance there. Your parents just now delighting in your health, virtues and accomplishments, are made childless and cheerless in a single day, and a melancholy gloom for your loss pervades the society, of which you were but a moment since the joy and ornament.

At Marine Settlement, Illinois, and St. Charles, Missouri, several fatal cases of cholera have happened. And three persons in one family died in Madison county, Illinois—a man, his wife and daughter.

The cholera has re-appeared at Key West. In the lower parishes of Louisiana it is reported as raging with great malignity.

This disease suddenly appeared at Lexington, Ky. about the 1st inst. and quickly carried off seven persons, after a few hours sickness. On the 4th, ten cases remained which were expected to terminate fatally. Deaths on the 5th—10, 4 white, 6 colored; among the former Mrs. Scott relict of the late gov. Charles Scott.

Mayville seems to have been severely afflicted. The town was nearly deserted. Cases have occurred in the neighborhood of Cynthiahna. Death ensues, or the danger is generally passed, in 8 to 12 hours.

The cholera has appeared among the passengers of two vessels from Ireland, which have arrived at Quebec. They were placed in quarantine.

RAIN. The Winchester (Va.) Republican, has a table shewing the fall of rain, at that place, for each month, in the last 4 years—as follows: 1829—46 in. 9-16ths; 1830—39 in. 10-16ths; 1831—42 in. 10-16ths; 1832—27 in. 11-16ths. Greatest in July (1829) 8 in. 6-16ths—least March 1 in. 10-16ths. Greatest in Sept. (1830) 8 in. 2-16ths—least August 1 in. 1-16th. Greatest in August (1831) 6 in. 1-16th—least December 10-16ths. Greatest in February (1832) 3 in. 10-16ths—least in September 2-16ths. For the three last years 3 in. fell in May—in the present year 4 inches; but there fell at Baltimore, in this month, 5 in. 12-100ths.

WOOL. Extract of a letter from a merchant of the highest respectability, dated London, April 16, 1833: English wools of all kinds, for clothing purposes, are scarce and dear; and the quantity on hand at and under 13d per lb. is small indeed. The demand here more than keeps pace with the supply. It would be difficult to purchase 100 bales at this moment in all this market. Combining wools are more abundant—of those I could buy 8 or 900 bales at prices annexed. South down fleeces are also scarce, perhaps not more than 200 to 250 bales in London at this time, and very little remains with the farmer. I much question if the quantity of English wools on hand has been so small for very many years. It would be impossible to collect 500,000 lbs. under 13d, before the new clip comes to market, which will not be sooner than the end of June or beginning of July, and as so little of old wool will then remain, I think prices more likely to advance than to recede. Spanish wools are also scarce and dear; such as I bought 18 months ago at 1s 10d to 2s 1d per lb. are now selling at 2s 6d to 2s 8d, the advance on them being somewhat more than in German of equal quality. The quantity of German and Spanish wools in this country is unusually small, particularly all sorts under 2s 9d per lb. [Boston Cour.]

☞—This promises well for the American farmer—to whom we wish many returns of the "golden fleece."

MEXICO. We begin to entertain better hopes of this "republic"—if a republic there can be where an established religion exists—for the state of Mexico has released its citizens from all civil obligations to pay tithes, and the state of Vera Cruz has abolished them altogether. And a bill has been introduced into the national congress to secure the freedom of the press.

A public primary school for the education of children had been opened at Tampico, and a college founded.

Gen. Santa Anna, who had been chosen president of the confederacy, has declined assuming the office, and general Gomez Farias, the vice president, is now invested with the supreme executive authority into which he was installed with brilliant pomp; and his inaugural address is much commended. Santa Anna is represented as not having in form resigned the office of president, but to be holding himself in reserve from reasons of patriotic and political prudence, to preserve the public quiet. He seems to have earned golden opinions by this conduct, in addition to which he has transferred to the fund of public education the pension of $2,000 a year, which had been voted him for his public services, by the state of Yucatan.

The value of the gold and silver ornaments in all the churches of the Mexican union has been ascertained to be thirty millions of dollars!

The country seems quiet and prosperous—judging by the products of the mines; a great deal of silver being obtained and coined.

DUBUQUE'S MINES. We learn from the last Galenian, that the U. S. troops stationed at Dubuque's mines, for the purpose of staying mining operations under private leases from claimants of the land in question, have been ordered away; and that the country is left open for emigration and business. From the same paper we learn, that the claimants of the soil are determined to resist the proceedings of the government; and with that view caution all persons against selling or purchasing ore, or its product, obtained upon the land usually known as Dubuque's tract, and on which, alone, mining operations are carried on in that quarter. The agents of the government, it is declared, will be held liable for all leases made under the orders of the secretary of war, when such leases violate their rights as proprietors of the disputed soil.

This question must ultimately be decided by the supreme court. We understand that the right of Julian Dubuque, under whom the present proprietors claim, was ascertained to be a complete Spanish title by the board of commissioners appointed to investigate the validity of the grants of land made by the Spanish government prior to the cession of Louisiana to the United States, sitting at St. Louis in 1806. The possession of the lands was also acknowledged by the Indians in various treaties held by them with the United States, from the year 1804 to 1822. The claimants of the land in question are wealthy men, and will scarcely suffer the United States to dispossess them of a property held by such a tenure, and which is of immense value. [St. Louis Republican, May 17.]

INFAMOUS. Lately in England, a young woman, a Roman Catholic, was married to a young man, a Protestant, by a Roman Catholic priest. The couple lived as man and wife about a year, and had one child; after which the husband abandoned his wife, on the ground, that, as they had not been married by a Protestant clergyman, the marriage was not binding on him. She was bound by her religion, but he was not. She could not, according to her church, have another husband; but he could take another wife, and did; and the poor woman's only remedy, if it could be so called, was an action for a breach of promise of marriage, which she brought, and recovered only about $450. [Centinel.]

Another paper states, that the cashier's effects have been seized, and that they will nearly cover the defalcation.

Resolved, That we believe the habit of wearing the usual badges of mourning, is a custom of the world, not in accordance with the spirit of the gospel; and should be abandoned by the members of Christ's house. We therefore recommend from this time forward, that our brethren and sisters dispense with them.

Sutton, the ventriloquist is said to have won a bet made in one of the river steamboats, that he would induce the engineer to oil some part of the machinery, by his ventriloquical powers.

First a screaming sound came from the shaft of the water-wheel, the oil can was immediately in use, but ere that was accomplished the sound came from the piston at every downward stroke. As the oil was about being carried to that part of the engine the trick was explained, a hearty laugh was joined in by the engineer and spectators. [Sibany Advertiser.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 13th May.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Sir John C. Hobhouse has resigned the office of chief secretary for Ireland, and his seat in parliament, feeling that if he retained it he must vote against ministers for the repeal of the house and window duties.

In the house of commons on the 30th ult. Mr. John Vey, in pursuance of notice, moved the repeal of the house and window taxes. The motion was opposed by lord Althorp, who declared that their repeal would compel ministers to resign, and, after considerable debate, was negatived by the following vote—which shows there is no present prospect of a change of the ministry:

Paris, May 4. The government has received news from Constantinople to the 16th of April.

On the 30th of March, M. de Varennes, the first secretary of the king's embassy in that capital, set out for the camp of Ibrahim, with the aujeft effendi of the porte.

He was the bearer of a hatti cheriff, by which the grand seignor accorded to the pacha of Egypt the investiture of the four pachalics of Syria, namely, Saint Jean de'Acre, Damascus, Aleppo, Tripoli, and their dependencies.

M. de Varennes had instructions to obtain from Ibrahim that he would desist from his other pretensions.

The negotiations lasted four days. Ibrahim has renounced his pretensions to Diabekir, and to the districts of Alaza and Lefkeli; but he has reserved the question relative to the district of Adana and Orfa, which will be discussed at Alexandria.

In the mean time he has consented, at the request of M. de Varennes, to evacuate Asia Minor. His movement of retreat was to have commenced on the 30th of April.

This act confers on Mehemet Ali, independent of the pachalics with which he has been invested for a considerable time, the whole of Syria.

AN AWFUL DISASTER.

New Orleans, May 25. The following distressing account of the loss of the steamboat Lioness, Capt. Wm. L. Cockerelle, on her passage from this port to Natchitoches, was brought by the Huron this morning, after the paper was ready for press.

The steamboat Lioness, Wm. L. Cockerelle, master, on her passage from New Orleans to Natchitoches, took fire when about forty miles above Alexandria, on Red river, and was entirely consumed. The lives of 15 or 16 individuals were lost, and as many others were more or less wounded. It occurred about 5 o'clock on the morning of May 19, when but few had left their berths, which accounts in part for so many deaths.

The names of the unfortunate sufferers are as follows:

Passengers dead—Hon. Josiah S. Johnston, of Louisiana; B. Q. Riggs, esq. of Alexandria; Michael Boyce, esq. do. Mr. Michael Clifford, New Orleans; Mr. H. Hertz, Texas; Mr. Irwin, a deck passenger; Mr. —, do.

Crew dead—John Coley, mate, Louisville; John Clark, steward, late from England; Samuel Landis, sailor; Wm. N. S. Cant, do. James Falsome, do. one sailor, unknown; Mary Anderson, chambermaid; Alexander —, second cook; and a servant unknown, belonging to a passenger.

Wounded—Hon. Edward D. White of Louisiana, badly; Henry Boyce, esq. of Alexandria; Mr. Dunbar, do. badly; J. H. Graham, New Orleans; Josiah Johnston, son of the hon. J. S. Johnston; Michael Colgen, Natchitoches; J. V. Bossier, do. M. Rupert, do.

Crew—Mr. Isaac Wright, pilot, slightly; Mr. John Roberts, engineer; John Gilmore, sailor; and two other sailors and one fireman, names not known.

All others on board escaped without injury. Much of the baggage and some money, belonging to passengers, was lost.

How the fire originated is not known; it is supposed, however, to have been communicated either by sparks from the furnace being drawn down the hatch, which was open to get out a lot of way-freight, or through the hole for the fly wheel of the engine, or rise from a spark of the candle used by the mate and men in the hold getting up freight, which being lodged in a crate of straw or oil, or other material, kindled so rapidly as to defy their exertions to extinguish it, and in attempting which they lost their lives, not one of them getting out to give the alarm, or afterwards to account for the misfortune.

The boat and cargo went down near the middle of the river, and are entirely lost.

Much credit is due to the inhabitants near the spot, and at Plaisance, for their prompt assistance in saving those who were struggling for life in the current, for their kindness and hospitality to the wounded, and for their liberality and friendship to all the strangers thrown destitute amongst them, and to the crew of the lost boat.

J. W. TWICHELL, clerk.

New Orleans, on board the steamboat Huron, May 24.

37-P. S. The melancholy disaster above occurred from gunpowder, which blew up the boat from the fire in the hold.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

From the Alexandria (Lou.) Gazette of the 22d ult.

It becomes our duty to record an event which thrills us with horror as we relate it, and which has brought desolation and sorrow among us, by the destruction of some of our best and most valued fellow citizens; as well as many others with whose names we are at present unacquainted. The steamboat Lioness, on her passage from this place to Nachitoches, blew up with a terrible explosion, and was literally torn to fragments. This disaster occurred on Sunday morning last, just at day light, near the mouth of the Regolet Bon-Dieu. The explosion, or rather the three successive explosions, following each other so rapidly as scarcely to be distinguishable, were heard at a considerable distance.

The fore cabin and the boiler deck, and the hold immediately under them, were scattered into fragments over the water for a considerable distance. Many of the passengers who escaped were enabled to do so by seizing those fragments, after they had been themselves thrown into the water. In about two minutes after the explosion, the hull of the boat sunk, leaving a part of the hurricane deck, and portions of the ladies' cabin floating on the surface. On this the ladies (who are happy to say all of them) were saved, together with many gentlemen.

The explosion seems to have been caused by the firing of some powder which had been shipped in the boat.

There were two of the hands in the hold with a lighted candle engaged in some arrangements there at the time the boat blew up, and the mate had gone down a moment before, to assist them. It is supposed that by some unfortunate accident the powder was fired by them.

By a letter from G. M. Graham, esq. who has just returned from the wreck, we learn that the hon. Josiah S. Johnston, Bazil Q. Rigg, esq. and Charles Boyce, esq. are among the missing.

That the hon. E. D. White has escaped, but is seriously injured from burns and bruises; that Messrs. Boyce, Dunbar, Sewell and William Johnston, have escaped without any serious injuries; that Messrs. Ronbix and Graham were somewhat injured, the latter in fact, very seriously; that many sufferers unknown to Mr. G. were on the plantation of Judge Smith, in a terrible situation from their wounds and burns. Some of these, it is thought, would die.

It is also stated that the inhabitants along the shores of the river generally were prompt and persevering in their endeavors to yield every assistance possible; and that they are still making use of every effort to alleviate the sufferings of those who have escaped with life.

Even amid the gloom and horror of such a catastrophe, it is consoling to see the spirit of benevolence and humanity displaying itself in a generous assistance, and assiduous attention of our fellow citizens towards the sufferers.

37-We rejoice to learn that Mr. White, as well as the son of Mr. Johnston, were fast recovering from their wounds; and, as well as several other sufferers, were considered out of danger. The body of Mr. Johnston had not been found.

POLAND.

The nobility of Podolia have summoned courage to supplicate mercy from their barbarous oppressors, though they only venture to do it in the humblest tone and on their bended knees. The following is an extract from their address to the emperor Nicholas. Permission to use their own language, in courts of justice, protection in their national religion, and an exemption from the horrors of perpetual imprisonment and exile, is all that they venture to ask, and far more than they will obtain. They say—

"Your nobility, O sire, sees with fearful apprehension the difficulties and losses to which the prohibition of our native language in the judicial courts will expose us; and we Poles, like other Slavonian nations, have our own distinct language, for so many centuries become natural, rich in remembrances, common to millions of your subjects, preserved to us by your ancestors, indispensable in our social occurrences; in that language we had all our deeds, contracts, conventions. It explained our wants, it became indispensable, and incorporated with us. Gracious lord, leave that language to us, that in it we may pray to God for you, and your blessed family.

"With our persons we carried our Roman Catholic religion under your sceptre. Religion, watching on human frailties, wants the guidance of ministers of God; the neglect, the fall of religion are forerunners of general corruption. The religion of our ancestors has left to the sovereigns its protection. In your high wisdom, your majesty has found it necessary to abolish the convents and confiscate their estates; but, sire, those convents fulfilled likewise parochial duties. Great scarcity of curates and priests is felt already; the conscience and morality of your people in such general subversion, wanting the assistance of religion, will prove most detrimental. As our common father, we beseech thee humbly, O lord! have mercy upon us, advice as to those impending evils.

"In all countries the nobility is aware that its duty is to support the throne. The difference in fortunes—poverty even, did not deprive them of their privileges. We humbly beseech your majesty to stop orders by which beings without any guilt are carried away from their homes into most remote countries. In every corner of the world they will prove faithful subjects to your majesty; but, sire, the poorest man loves the country where he was born. That universal instinct, witnessed by tears of thousands of families, emboldened us to entreat, sire, your humanity for them.

"Our brothers have offended you, seeking relief from their sufferings, not by prayers addressed to you. But, sire, as an image of the Almighty on earth, you shall not always remain provoked, you shall not always punish us. Parents, with a ghastly bewildered eye, look for their children carried away from them, sent for ever to impervious regions; others seek an asylum in foreign countries, remote from their relations, in want and poverty. Few of them you have pardoned; jointly with us, they beg you to extend your clemency to others.

"We lay, sire, these most humble prayers at the footsteps of your throne."

Kaminnic, the 29th day of September, 1832.

This, alas! is the language used by a people who were once the freest in Europe!

London, April 14.—In spite of the remonstrances which we are willing to believe have been made by the only two powers of Europe that still remain undisturbed by the pestilential influence of Russia, the work of confiscation is still carried on in Poland with an unsparring hand. The greediness with which the barbarous oppressors of that ill-fated land pursue their course of rapine shows that their appetites for Polish plunder is as insatiable as their thirst for Polish blood. It is now nearly three months since the publication of an official notification of the Russian governor specifying in detail the estates and property of every description confiscated in the single government of Volhynia. Recent disclosures of the sufferings of the Polish refugees in this country, and the consequent appeals made on their behalf to the generosity of the British people, have brought this document once more under our observation, and we reproduce it here.

1. Peasants, 37,218, estimated, agreeably to the custom of the country, (where, in selling estates, they are valued according to the number of serf-peasants inhabiting them, and who are attached to the glebe), at £25 a head	£ 930,000
2. Moveables, cattle, manufacturing and agricultural machines, articles confiscated along with landed estates, computing them at one eighth of the value of the estates	115,000
3. Roubles (in silver) 266,853	50,000
4. Ducats, 16,738	9,000

Amount of confiscations in the single government of Volhynia

£1,104,000

The civilized world has not been outraged by a second official record of the progress made by the commissions appointed and authorised to superintend the spoliation of a land which the sword, the scaffold and the deserts of Siberia, have already nearly depopulated. That the members of these commissions, however, have not been idle—that they have been unceasingly occupied in the prosecution of the objects of their disgraceful mission, is unhappily but too well known by the raggedness and poverty of their victims, who, but for the charity of strangers, would have wandered naked on foreign shores until sheer starvation put an end to their miserable existence. Nor is there any great difficulty in forming something like an estimate of the gross amount of plunder which these commissioners will purvey to the imperial coffers at St. Petersburg. Let the amount of the confiscations in Volhynia, be a criterion, and then, in the six governments (namely those of Podolia, Volhynia, Kijew, Wilna, Grodno and Minsk) the amount will be

The kingdom of Poland, in which the insurrection was almost general, will furnish about an equal amount of confiscations, making altogether about £12,000,000

Whether this sum of £12,000,000 be destined for the support of new attempts to bring freedom and civilization beneath the yoke of barbarism and tyranny, it is not our present purpose to inquire; all we were desirous of showing was the probable amount of gain which will accrue from the subjugation of Poland, besides blood-guiltiness, the widow's and the orphan's curse, the hostility and hatred of every honest heart, and all else that follow in the train of wanton aggression on the land and liberty, and life, of a brave and deserving nation.

Warsaw, April 2. The commissioners for quartering the troops give notice, that if several of the house-holders of Warsaw, notwithstanding repeated summonses persevere in their negligence, and will not prepare lodgings for the Russian officers, especially those of high rank, the commissioners will hire such lodgings at the expense of the persons in question, and at the same time they invite all those who have lodgings to let, to apply to their office.

SLAVERY IN THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

The deputation in favor of the immediate emancipation of negro slavery within the British dominions, that had lately a formal interview on the subject with the British ministers, consisted of three hundred and thirty-nine gentlemen who had been sent to London from all parts of Great Britain. The proceedings and designs in England, in this case, are so interesting to our country, that we are induced to extract the following article from a London paper.

Colonial slavery. At a meeting of gentlemen deputed from various parts of the United Kingdom to represent to his majesty's ministers the sentiments of the inhabitants in their respective districts on the subject of colonial slavery, held in London, on Thursday, the 18th of April, the following resolutions and memorial were adopted:—

Resolutions.

"On behalf of ourselves and those who have selected us to attend in London for the purpose of expressing their opinions and wishes on the subject of negro slavery, we, in humble reliance on the blessing of God upon our exertions, and acknowledging his Providence in assembling us upon this great occasion, declare our assent on the following propositions, as truly representing the objects we desire to see accomplished, and the principles in which we think any plan for emancipation should be founded:—

"1. That all persons detained in slavery in any part of his majesty's dominions ought forthwith to be emancipated. Any restraint, extending to the whole community, deemed necessary by way of police regulation, we do not deem inconsistent with this principle; but we deprecate all delay, or partial emancipation; first as a continuance of injustice, and secondly, because it is our conviction that emancipation may be at once safely effected, and the greatest danger of bloodshed and confusion will arise from deferring it.

"2. That as the negro race have already suffered the grossest injustice from detention in a state of slavery, we declare our decided disapprobation of any plan whereby they, by their labor or otherwise, may be compelled to pay, in whole or in part, for that emancipation which we deem to be their right by the law of God, and by the clearest principles of justice.

"3. That as the government may deem it necessary, with a view to immediate emancipation, to incur the expenses of an increase and efficient police establishment for the preservation of peace and tranquillity, the country will cheerfully consent to bear such expenses.

"4. That when that debt of justice which is due to the negro shall have been fully paid by immediate emancipation, the country will cheerfully consent to promote such fair measures of relief to the West Indian planters as may be deemed needful by parliament, leaving to the discretion of his majesty's government the consideration of such cases of distress as may be proved to result from the measure.

"5. That the opinions expressed in these propositions are entertained by a very large proportion of the people of this kingdom, whose abhorrence of the guilt, iniquity, and cruelty of the system is such, that they will, in dependence on the Divine blessing, resolutely persevere in all legitimate exertion, until slavery shall cease forever in every land over which the government of Great Britain exercises dominion.

"SAMUEL GURNEY, chairman."

"The solemn declaration of the committee and members of the colonial union, for the parishes of St. Mary, St. Ann, Trelawney, St. James and Hanover, at a general meeting, held at the court house, in the town of Falmouth, on Saturday, the 25th of July, 1832. James I. Hilton, esq. in the chair.

"We, the undersigned, most solemnly declare that we are resolved, at the hazard of our lives, not to suffer any baptist or other sectarian preacher or teacher, or any person professedly belonging to those sects, to preach or to teach in any house in towns, or in any district of the country, where the influence of the colonial union extends; and this we do—maintaining the purest loyalty to his majesty king William the Fourth, as well as the highest veneration for the established religion, in defence of social order, and in strict conformity with the laws for the preservation of the public peace—to shield this portion of his majesty's island of Jamaica against insurrection and future destruction; and these are our reasons:—

"1. Because we have the most undeniable and unequivocal proofs that the baptists and other sectarians have instilled into the minds of our hitherto contented and happy slave population, opinions that they are and have been an oppressed and injured people.

"2. Because they have falsely propagated among our slaves an opinion that the king of England had made them free, which so bewildered their minds as utterly to destroy every tie of affection for their masters and owners.

"3. Because the chiefs and principal ringleaders in the recent rebellion were mostly class-leaders of the sect called baptist, who not only preached sedition, but enforced rebellion on the properties which were devastated by fire.

"4. Because sectarians generally have, under the guise of religion, taught the slaves to throw off all political restraint, and to assert their independence, which they attempted by rebellion murder, rape and arson.

"5. Because we wish to maintain, and prevent from falling into the hands of a semi-barbarous people, this fair portion of his majesty's dominions, which, allowing these sectarians to propagate their dangerous and insidious doctrines, will, ere long, be affected with the most fearful consequences.

"6. Although in this solemn declaration we disclaim being actuated by any spirit of intolerance in respect to the religious sentiments of our fellow subjects, yet we are determined to discountenance all those who profess and disseminate doctrines so pernicious and so decidedly subversive of all order and subordination, and we confide in the cordial co-operation of the lord bishop and clergy of the established churches of England and Scotland.

"7. Because it is necessary that a stop should be put to the further propagation of the pernicious doctrines of these sectarians, we consider it necessary to withdraw all support and intercourse whatever from any one who may adopt the destructive principles of the baptists or other sectarian preachers in this island, or countenance them or their followers in any degree, and pledged as the members of the colonial union are to stand by each other, from a due regard to public welfare, the fullest reliance is entertained that they will hold the observance of this and every other obligation of the union, under all circumstances, paramount to every other consideration, and will use every exertion to ensure their fulfilment.

"8. That a book be kept in each parish, in which the resolutions of the union shall be entered; and that every member of the union be required to affix his signature to them, and by doing so acknowledge, without any reservation, that he is bound by the most solemn pledge which he can offer to preserve them inviolate."

PLAN OF NEGRO EMANCIPATION.

London, May 11.

I. That every slave, upon the passing of this act, should be at liberty to claim, before the protector of slaves, custos of the parish, or such other officer as shall be named by his majesty for that purpose, to be registered as an apprenticed laborer.

II. That the terms of such apprenticeship should be—

1st. That the power of corporal punishment should be altogether taken from the master, and transferred to the magistrate.

2d. That in consideration of food and clothing, and such allowances as are now made by law to the slave, the laborer should work for his master three-fourths of his time, leaving it to be settled by contract whether for three-fourths of the week or of each day.

3d. That the laborer should have a right to claim employment of his master for the remaining one-fourth of his time, according to a fixed scale of wages.

4th. That during such one-fourth of his time, the laborer should be at liberty to employ himself elsewhere.

5th. That the master should fix a price upon the laborer at the time of his apprenticeship.

6th. That the wages to be paid by the master should bear such a proportion to the price fixed by him, that for the whole of his spare time, if given to the master the negro should receive 12th of his price annually; and in proportion for each lesser term.

7th. That every negro, on becoming an apprentice, shall be entitled to a money payment weekly, in lieu of food and clothing should he prefer it, the amount to be fixed by a magistrate with reference to the actual cost of the legal provision.

8th. That every apprenticed laborer be bound to pay a portion, to be fixed, of his wages, half yearly, to an officer to be appointed by his majesty.

9th. That in default of such payment the master to be liable and, in return, may exact an equivalent amount of labor without payment in the succeeding half year.

10th. That every apprenticed negro, on payment of the price fixed by his master, or such portion of it as may from time to time remain due, be absolutely free.

11th. That every such apprentice may borrow the sum so required, and bind himself, by contract before a magistrate for a limited period, as an apprenticed laborer to the lender.

III. That a loan to the amount of £15,000,000 sterling be granted to the proprietors of West India estates and slaves, on such security as may be approved by commissioners appointed by the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury.

IV. That such a loan be distributed among the different colonies, in a ratio compounded of the number of slaves, and the amount of exports.

V. That the half yearly payments hereinbefore authorised to be made by the apprenticed negroes be taken in liquidation of so much of the debt contracted by the planter to the public.

VI. That all children who at the time of the passing of this act shall be under the age of six years be free, and be maintained by their respective parents.

VII. That in a failure of such maintenance, they be deemed apprentices to the master of the parents, without receiving wages, the males till the age of 24, the females to the age of 20, at which period respectively they and their children, if any, shall be absolutely free.

VIII. That this act shall not prevent his majesty from assenting to such acts as may be passed by the colonial legislatures for the promotion of industry or the prevention of vagrancy, applicable to all classes of the community.

IX. That upon the recommendation of the local legislatures, his majesty will be prepared to recommend to parliament, out of the revenues of this country, to grant such aid as may be deemed necessary for the due support of the administration of justice, and of an efficient police establishment, and of a general system of religious and moral education.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Williamsport, June 1.

The canal—Change of location—General Mercer, president, and Messrs. Smith, Janney, Cuntton and Price, directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, accompanied by colonel Gruger, engineer, paid this town a visit on Wednesday last, on business relating to the canal. We have learned that they transacted business at Harper's Ferry and Shepherdstown, on their way up, a part of which was the letting of that portion of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, being four miles and one-tenth between the Point of Rocks and Harper's Ferry, which the canal company have undertaken, by the recent compromise, to grade. The contracts entered into for this purpose, provide that the work required is to be finished on or before the 1st day of March next, being two months and ten days within the time allowed by the compromise; and yet considered amply sufficient for the execution of the task.

The gentlemen above named proceeded from this place to Hagerstown on Thursday, where they also transacted business; and we greatly regret to be informed, that they there adopted a resolution to institute a survey of a route for the canal, on the Virginia shore, commencing at Middleknuff's dam, (eight miles above this place), where the present contracts terminate. The reason for this contemplated change of location is the excessive and enormous damages given in Maryland by juries, which the board do not think the resources of the company justify them in incurring in future. They will therefore, if more advantageous terms be met with, on the opposite shore above, (of which there appears to be no doubt), conduct their work across the river at the point mentioned.

We do hope that the public-spirited landholders on the Potomac, in this and Alleghany counties, through whose property the canal was contemplated to pass, and upon whose estates it would confer the most signal benefits, will not permit this noble enterprise to leave our borders, carrying with it into a neighboring state, villages and manufacturing capital and establishments which would otherwise be our own, besides its ordinary convenience as a public highway. The survey ordered is to be made forthwith.

In the case of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company vs. George Lefever, tried on Tuesday and Wednesday last, being a proceeding to condemn land for the canal, the jury returned an inquisition of $6,500 damages. The quantity of land condemned was 424 acres, 3/4 of which were arable. The quality was good bottom land. The location of the canal threw a body of the land of the owner between the canal and the river, to which two modes of access were provided by previous stipulation, one a ferry at the most convenient place to the proprietor, the other, a bridge over the canal where a public road crosses it. It was also previously stipulated that watering places were to be made for the proprietor's cattle, and that the water of a spring, used heretofore by his tenants, and over which the canal would pass, should be conducted under the canal by pipes, connecting with a pump upon the upper side of the canal, all of which the company was to have done at their expense. Additional fencing was required, of about 1,800 panels, upwards of 600 of which being new, and the balance removed fencing. The body of land separated by the canal from the farm comprised about 46 acres of the best bottom land in it, and is in a shape perfectly susceptible of cultivation, having now wheat crops upon it equal to any in the country.

As to the benefits which the canal is capable of conferring upon the estates of owners through which it passes, we will mention one instance in the neighborhood. A farm lying contiguous to this town, on the opposite side of the Conococheague, the largest part of which is bottom land, equal to any in the county, was recently sold, after the canal company had condemned what was required of it for their use, to an enterprising citizen of this county for $55 per acre. A small body of it, comprising about an acre or more, cut off and thrown next to the river, was sold to another individual for $700. This land had been several years in market, and a year ago could not command from $40 to $45. Other instances might be adduced, if it were deemed necessary further to illustrate the beneficial operation of canals upon property, which experience every where has confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

OFFICIAL.

Report on the treaty between France and the United States, made by M. Humann, the minister of finance, to the chamber of deputies, on the 6th of April. Translated for publication by order of the department of state.

GENTLEMEN—We are now about to submit to the chamber, the treaty concluded on the 4th of July, 1831, between the United States and France, as was announced by the king at the opening of the session. The object and result of this treaty was to put an end to the discussions which have so long existed between the two countries, to the manifest injury of both.

The United States have been for twenty years demanding indemnification for the seizures and confiscation of American vessels, not only under the imperial decrees of Berlin, Milan and Rambouillet, but even after their revocation. Other demands are also made by them, on account of vessels burnt at sea by French squadrons, in order to prevent the conveyance to the enemy of intelligence respecting their motions.

It is unnecessary to repeat the terms of these decrees, which are well known; suffice it to say, that the proceedings which took place under them, however rigorous they might have been, and injurious to the commerce of neutral nations were only intended as reprisals against the orders in council of the British cabinet. The United States, on their part, in 1809, made similar reprisals, by ordering the seizure and confiscation of British and French vessels in their ports, as also of the productions of those countries, without regard to the character of the vessel which brought them. It must be acknowledged, that these measures altered the position of the United States, as far as regards their complaints respecting the decrees of Berlin, Milan and Rambouillet; and their government, in undertaking to do itself justice, surrendered all right to protests or to found claims, on account of confiscation made in virtue of those decrees.

There were, however, exceptions, of which justice requires the admission; and although France could not be called on to satisfy all the claims of the Americans, there were a certain number which could not with equity be denied. Such, for instance, were the following cases:

Of American vessels seized and confiscated in virtue of the decrees of Berlin, Milan and Rambouillet, before the persons interested in them could have received information of those decrees.

Of American vessels condemned after the 1st of November, 1810, the date of the revocation of those decrees.

Of American vessels burnt at sea by the French squadron.

The imperial government even did not deny that these exceptions were founded on just grounds, and it appears from the negotiation which had been begun some time before its overthrow, that an arrangement similar to that now presented to the chamber, was in contemplation at that period.

The government of the restoration, after long opposing the claims of the Americans on the ground, that it was not answerable for the acts which had given rise to them, at length abandoned that position, and like the imperial government, allowing the possibility that some of the demands might be founded in justice, declared its readiness to examine them, if the United States would, on their part, listen to the demands which might be made on them by France.

Indeed, not only had many claims of a pecuniary nature been urged on various accounts, against the United States by French citizens, but the 8th article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, by which French vessels were to be always allowed the privileges of the most favored nation in that part of the union, still remained unattended to. By the treaty of Ghent, British vessels were to be received on the same terms as American, in the ports of the United States; and the French government thereupon claimed for French vessels the same privilege in virtue of the treaty of cession above cited. This was refused by the cabinet at Washington, which denied that the 8th article of that treaty could be so interpreted, and moreover attempted to shew that as by the constitution of the United States the whole country was under the same regulations as to commerce and navigation, such admission would be granting a monopoly, or exclusive advantages to Louisiana in the trade with France, which would be incompatible with their system of government.

At length the United States, though always contesting the principle on which our demands were made, offered to allow an important reduction in the duties on the importation of our wines.

This was the state of things when the revolution of July, 1830, interrupted the negotiation, which was, however, soon renewed, under the influence of the sympathy which that great event called up between the two nations.

The chief difficulty was as to the amount of indemnifications to be paid by France, which the United States estimated at seventy-five millions of francs. But as in this case the length of time which had elapsed, with various other circumstances, rendered it impossible to make a just estimate, all that could be done was to compound in a friendly manner, and adjust the business as fair as possible.

Both governments saw that there were political reasons which rendered an acknowledgment necessary; that the two nations were in a great measure united in feeling, and that every obstacle to a more intimate and a reciprocal intercourse, ought to be removed.

The American claims urged every year in congress, and constantly alluded to in the messages of the president, were at length considered by the people of the United States, rather as a political question, than one of mere private pecuniary interest. The government of the United States was under obligation to press the demands, and that of France could not refuse to notice them; above all, since the Americans had declared their willingness to do justice to the complaints on our side. Under these considerations the treaty of July 4th, 1831, was concluded, and the ratifications exchanged at Washington on the 2d of February last.

By this treaty, the claims of Americans were admitted to the amount of twenty-five millions of francs, being just one-third of the original demand; and of this sum one million and a half is to be employed in satisfying the claims of French citizens on the American government.

The United States, on their part, in lieu of the privileges secured to our shipping in the ports of Louisiana, by the 8th article of the treaty of cession, have consented to a modification of their tariff, in favor of French wines, which for ten years succeeding the 2d of February last, are to be admitted at duties lower than those imposed on other wines.

Finally, France admits the long staple cottons of the United States on the same terms with the short staple.

Such are the principal provisions of a convention which was absolutely indispensable; and which, terminating all causes of irritation on either hand, gives place to those sentiments of amity, which are so natural in the relative situations of the two countries, and to which our glorious revolution has made an accession.

It is true that this treaty adds another charge to the budget, but the sum is employed in acquitting a debt, the justice of which cannot be denied; good faith was interested in the admission, and true political considerations required that the arrangement of the affair should not be deferred. Moreover, the provisions are not exclusively to the advantage of the United States; the engagements are reciprocal, and the rights of French citizens to whom the American government was in debt, are secured by it.

Ever since the exchange of the ratifications, the United States have faithfully observed all the stipulations relating to the lowering of duties on French wines. We, on our part, have begun by admitting their long staple cottons on the same terms with the short staple. We have now to fulfil the financial part by paying the sums agreed upon as indemnification, not only to the Americans, but also to French claimants of the United States. For this purpose we have the honor of submitting to the chamber the following

BILL.

Art. 1. For carrying into effect a treaty between France and the United States, concluded on the 5th of July, 1831, and ratified at Washington on the 2d February, 1832, by which France engages to pay the sum of twenty five millions of francs, in six annual instalments, with interest at four per cent. on the whole sum payable at each annual period, the minister of finance is hereby authorised to add to the budget of each year from 1833, to 1838, inclusive, the sum stipulated for such payments, according to the 2d article of said treaty.

Art. 2. The minister of finance is, therefore, authorised to receive a credit for 5,166,666 francs 66 centimes each year, to wit: 4,166,666 francs 66 centimes as the amount of the first sixth of the whole sum, and one million as interest.

Art. 3. The sum of 1,500,000 francs which the government of the United States engages to pay to France in lieu of the claims of French citizens against it, shall be received in annual instalments of 250,000 francs each, with the interest; being reserved out of the annual sum which France engages to pay to the U. States, and put to the credit of the minister of finance, for the acquittal of claims of French citizens against the United States.

The above report and bill were ordered to be printed and laid before a committee.

NEW NATIONAL BANK!

From the New York Mercantile Advertiser and Advocate.

"OUTLINE OF A PLAN FOR A NATIONAL BANK." A pamphlet under the above title, with incidental remarks on the bank of the U. States, is now in circulation in this city. It emanates from a meeting convened on the 20th of February, 1833, for the purpose of receiving a report from the committee of a former meeting, to whom was referred a plan for a new national bank.—Preserved Fish resumed the chair, and Henry W. Hicks was again appointed secretary.

A committee composed of Isaac Bronson, George Griswold, Daniel Jackson and John Bolton, presented the report containing the outline, which commences with some strictures upon the present bank of the United States.

We annex the principal features of the plan as they are laid down in the pamphlet before us, believing that in this manner one of the objects of the committee, at least, will be best promoted, namely, that of inviting discussion.

1st. That a bank of the United States be established by a new act of incorporation, for the term of twenty years with a capital of thirty-seven and a half millions of dollars, whereof ten millions to be subscribed by the government of the United States, and twelve and a half millions by the several states, in the ratio of their electoral votes, (subject to modifications introduced into section 11th), in a stock bearing four per cent. interest, payable half yearly, and subject to the restrictions hereinafter specified. The remaining fifteen millions of capital to be subscribed by individuals or corporate bodies, and paid for in money.

The stock in which the subscriptions of the government and the states are to be made, to be irredemable during the existence of the charter, and inalienable as regards the bank except with the consent of the government, under circumstances of imperious necessity, and then only in hypothecation, for money borrowed for the term of one, two or three years.

The bank stock subscribed by the general and state governments not to be sold during the existence of the charter.

The dividends of bank stock owned by the general and state governments, and the interest on the 4 per cent. stock, in payment of their bank stock to be made payable at one and the same period, at the bank.

The excess of dividends over the interest payable by the U. States and the several states, may be considered an ample substitute for bonus to the former, and for taxes on the part of the latter.

2. The United States to appoint eight directors, and the states to elect ten directors, but not more than two of those appointed by the United States, nor more than one of those elected by the states, to be residents of the same state.

The money stockholders to elect twelve directors, each stockholder being a citizen of the United States, to vote in person, and no votes by proxy to be allowed, excepting those of trustees, guardians, executors and administrators, who may delegate their power to one of their associates—and excepting also corporate bodies, who may authorise one of their officers or a director to vote on their behalf. At the annual election, one-fourth of the directors elected by the government, and by the money stockholders who shall then be in office, to retire from the board; and of the directors elected by the states, two to go out of office the first election, three the second, two the third, and three the fourth election.

Stockholders residing out of the state in which the bank is located, may lodge their votes at an office, on a certain day to be specified, or may forward the same by mail, addressed to the cashier of the bank under a sealed envelope, on which shall be written the number of shares which they respectively hold, bearing their own signatures written across the seal of said envelope. The votes thus sealed, if lodged in the offices of the bank, to be forwarded by the cashiers thereof, accompanied by a statement and a list of the stockholders and number of shares then on the books of the respective offices, and which are not to be opened until the close of the polls at the bank.

Each subscribing state, in which an office is established, may appoint two directors of such office. Other directors of offices to be appointed by the board of the bank.

At the first meeting of the board of directors, (after an election), a president, a vice president and an executive committee of five members be appointed for the term of one year, of which committee the president and vice president should also be members ex-officio.

The president and vice president of the bank to be re-eligible as directors; the office of president, however, not to be held by the same individual two years in succession, but to be filled by the vice president or a member of the executive committee.

3. The bank to be located in New York.

4. An office of discount and deposit also to be established in the same city, for the management of its local business, with a specific capital assigned therefor.

An office of discount and deposit to be established in each state, but it shall not be obligatory on the corporation to place an office in a non subscribing state, unless required by the government of the United States so to do.

The directors of the bank to have the same, but no other control, over the office in New York than is exercised over other offices.

Capitals to be assigned to each office, and varied at pleasure.

5. The notes or bills issued by the bank to be made receivable at any and all the offices in payment of debts due the bank or offices, and also in payment of government revenue.

6. No note or bill to be issued under twenty dollars. Cheques or drafts not to bear the similitude of current bank notes.

7. No note or bill having more than ninety days to run to be discounted, either directly or indirectly, nor any loan to be made for a longer period than ninety days by the bank or any of its offices; and every note, bill or other obligation to be bona fide paid as they respectively become due; nor is any renewal to be granted unless the essential interests of the bank should require it, and then only with additional security, and by the affirmative vote of three-fourths of the board.

8. The whole amount of profits to be divided half yearly, excepting only a reasonable sum to provide for losses; but the fund thus reserved not to exceed two millions of dollars at any one time.

9. The bank not to charge over the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on loans or discounts, not to deal in foreign exchange, but to have this privilege in domestic bills of exchange and in gold and silver bullion.

10. The amount of discounts and loans not to exceed forty millions of dollars; but, if from the aggregate statements of the bank and its offices, it be at any time found that this sum has been exceeded, the excess in that case to be reduced within ninety days.

11. The stock of the bank appropriated to any one state not to be less than 200,000 dollars, whether entitled by its number of electors to this amount or not; but after assigning this minimum to the states that may be thus restricted, the remainder of the twelve and a half millions to be apportioned among the other states according to the provisions of the first article, and the capital may be increased, on the admission of each new state into the union, to the extent of $200,000, if desired by such new states.

12. If the capital assigned to an office be more than double the amount of bank stock appointed to the state in which such office is located, the excess may be taxed at the same rate as state banks in the same state.

13. The bank to render the same services to government in the collection and distribution of its funds, and on the same terms prescribed and provided for in the charter of the existing bank.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 17—VOL. VIII.] BALTIMORE, JUNE 22, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,135.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The president, and his suite, at the date of our last accounts, had reached Rhode Island, and would soon arrive in Boston. He has been every where treated with the highest marks of respect—and, generally, such as ought to be conferred by the people and received by their own elected chief magistrate; but, in many instances, acts have been committed disgraceful to freemen, and insulting; as we believe, to the dignity of the presidential office—and, probably, also, disgusting to general Jackson.

We shall, in due season, offer a brief history of the president's tour. The accounts are lumbered with so much stuff that we have not leisure just now to throw away the rubbish.

The secretary of state has returned to Washington. The vice president joined the president's suite at New York, and proceeded eastward with him. It is said that the president, on his return, will stop at Saratoga Springs, and visit Albany, Harrisburg, &c.

¶ The very great importance of the proceedings had in England concerning negro slavery in the British West Indies, has induced us to give the speech of Mr. Stanley, (long as it is), in extenso—that the views of the ministry may be clearly understood, as well as the facts on which they rely for the support of these views. This subject, in our opinion, is deeply interesting to all the people of the United States; and, if the scheme of emancipation shall be carried out, it will have a material effect on the relations and business of the northern and southern parts of our union.

We have in type the elaborate opinion of the circuit court of the United States, for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, lately pronounced by judge Baldwin, in the case of an assault, &c. made to prevent the arrest and carrying off of a slave. It is of great length—but the points made are so clearly and powerfully stated, and the law so decidedly established, that we shall incur the expense of a supplement to present it entire to our professional friends, and all others who have a general interest in the questions determined.

¶ It appears by the "Globe" that an attempt was made to rob the mail, near Bladensburg, when on its way from Baltimore to Washington, on Tuesday night last. The canvas bags, which contain only newspapers and pamphlets, were cut out of the rear boot of the stage, and some of them broken open, but abandoned by the robbers. The letter mails are either placed in the forward boot, or in the body of the coach—generally in the latter.

A reward is offered for the depredators.

THE CHOLERA. It was officially stated, on the 1st inst. that no dangerous or contagious disease prevailed at Key West.

The brig Ajax, from New Orleans for Liberia, with 150 emigrants (chiefly manumitted slaves), was lately compelled to put into Key West, because of the cholera. She lost three persons when only two days out, and of the whole about 50 had died.

The Pittsburg Gazette of the 11th inst. notices the death of two raftsmen, by cholera. They arrived from below.

The disease seems to have nearly ceased at Wheeling.

Some deaths still happened at Nashville.

Lexington has been severely visited by the cholera. Deaths, June 2nd—2; on the 3rd—13; on the 4th—14; on the 5th—9; on the 6th—5; on the 7th—6; on the 8th—30; and on the 9th, 10th and 11th about 30, daily! This is terrific! Up to the 11th the whole number of deaths, at Lexington, were estimated at 200!

Speaking of the disease, the Lexington Reporter of the 8th says: "We have never witnessed such anxiety, such alarm, such a panic as the countenances of the citizens generally evinced, on Wednesday and Thursday last. It would be far beyond our powers of description, to give to those who did not witness it, even a faint idea of the sorrow and gloom visible in every countenance. The stoutest hearts seemed to quail before the relentless destroyer, that was stalking among us unseen, giving scarcely an intimation to the persons whom it had selected for its victims, before prostrating them upon a dying bed. No one pretended to claim an immunity from its grasp, and no one knew at what moment he, or some of his family, would be one of its victims. All seemed to be seized with an awful dread. We heard an old veteran say he had been in many a hard fought battle; he had heard the sound of cannon and musket balls passing through the air; he had seen the dead and dying strewn around him, and heard the groans and shrieks of the wounded; but never had he felt such an awful dread of impending danger, as he felt during the four days ending yesterday."

The fatal cases of cholera at Maysville, Ky. up to the 12th June, were 41—an awful number for that place, which was also deserted by nine-tenths of its population.

Cases have also happened in Washington, Georgetown, Versailles, Bardstown, Shelbyville, Simpsonville, Lawrenceburg, Paris, Flemingburg, and many other places in Kentucky.

Private letters received at Charleston from New Orleans, give the most horrible account of the ravages of the epidemic among the negroes on the plantations in that vicinity. On one plantation it is said, there had been upwards of one hundred deaths.

The Baton Rouge (Lou.) Gazette of May 25, states that in fifteen days, during which the cholera had prevailed in that place, the deaths were about twenty, white and black.

Ohio. Bridgeport (opposite Wheeling) had a population of about 200 persons, more than one-half of whom instantly abandoned their homes on the appearance of the cholera; and it is stated of the 70 or 80 who remained, 50 were attacked, of whom eighteen died in one day! The details are truly awful. In one instance, a man and his wife were found dead, in the same bed.

Some cases are reported at Steubenville.

The cholera has made its appearance at Galena and Dubuque's mines. At the latter place it was very fatal, as most of the miners were living in tents, and were without the necessary means of curing the disease.

The health of Natchez appears nearly restored, but the accounts of cholera in its neighborhood are unfavorable.

Two deaths by cholera, of a father and son, have happened at Charlestown, Indiana.

Alabama. Cases have appeared at Montgomery.

The New Orleans Argus of June 6 says—The cholera has broke out in Fort Gibson; the number of deaths are ten out of fifteen cases. It has also reappeared in the parish of St. Mary's, both among the white and colored population; but has proved fatal only to the latter class. It is also in Lafayette, and raging to a great extent in Rapides, especially among the slaves. We also understand that it has again visited Covington, (parish of St. Tammany), and many slaves are daily falling victims to it on the coast. We have heard of one planter who has lost forty-four.

Many of the most respectable and worthy citizens of the west have been swept away by the cholera—which, especially at some places, spares neither age, sex, nor condition.

LATEST ACCOUNTS.

Louisiana. Deaths at New Orleans, by cholera, on the 7th June, between 40 and 50.

One planter at Franklin lost 45 slaves in 48 hours—another 150!—and he, with the rest of his slaves, fled, leaving the dead unburied.

Mississippi. The cholera has appeared at Jackson, the capital of this state.

Alabama. Some fatal cases have happened at Mobile, but, up to the 7th of June, no great alarm existed.

Florida. Several deaths have occurred at Appalachicola.

Missouri. The cholera was bad at Palmyra and New London, about the 4th instant.

Pittsburg. One case, which originated in the city, happened on the 11th inst. A paper of the 14th says that no other had yet occurred.

Key West. All the deaths on this island were of colored persons.

Nashville. Only 2 or 3 deaths a day at the last accounts. Mr. Feelman, of the banking house of Yeatman, Woods & Co. died on board the steamboat Mount Vernon on the 12th inst. on his way to Philadelphia, after 30 hours illness.

Louisville was healthy on the 13th.

Maysville, (Ky.) An extra from the office of the Eagle, dated June 12 says:

"Maysville, at this moment, presents a scene that finds a parallel nowhere in the annals of her previous history; nine-tenths of her population have left the city, and of those who still linger within the vicinity, anxiety and dejection are depicted in every countenance, and each one looks as though the next hour was that allotted for his destruction."

Lexington, Ky. As above stated, the disease at this place, has been terrific. For several days, the deaths were 30 a day—though the population had become very small. A number of the most respectable of the citizens had died.

The following is the latest accounts from this town—

Lexington, June 12.

"I do assure you we have seen and heard enough since I wrote you, two days since, to strike terror to the strongest nerves; even the physicians wore such awful countenances, that it was enough to confound and terrify the weak and timid. Nearly all the physicians are completely prostrate, and many of them now in bed; surely there never has been such mortality in any place of the same number of inhabitants. Since nine or ten o'clock this morning, it is admitted by every one, almost, that the disease is subsiding; and since that time until the present, say 5 o'clock, P. M. I do not think that there has been a single new case, (I mean a violent one); there are but few left in the place to have it, nearly all that could go to the country have been gone some days; many of whom have died. There are not enough well persons left to take care of the convalescent and inter the dead. I have been told there were twelve or fourteen uninterred at one time this morning, at one of the grave yards. It is useless for any one to attempt to guess how many have fallen. Three hundred would probably be a reasonable computation. On yesterday and to-day, it has been impossible to get coffins or rough boxes inaded sufficiently soon to put them away."

Another letter of the same date, says—there seems to be an abatement of the cholera to-day.

CHEERING! "Blessed are those who find consolation!" An exceedingly large amount of distress prevails in the British agricultural, as well as in the manufacturing districts. To relieve the fears of the landholders and cultivators, the house of lords has promptly refused to consider a motion to modify the corn laws; and, to encourage the manufacturing and working classes, the prospect of an open trade with India and China is held out; on the presumption that scientific power will not be used in the former, and that the latter may be persuaded to exchange her "natural productions" for "British productions of science and art." The latter is a very pretty scheme! And, if China will suffer the labor of one person in Britain to purchase the fruits of the labor of twenty persons in China—there is no doubt that Britain will wonderfully prosper. But there is an "if" in the way of this project, and we "guess" that it will not be easily removed! "Bell's Weekly Messenger," however, administers "consolation" with more reason in the following paragraph:

"One thing is in operation, which, within a very short interval, will totally, we think, alter the present aspect of their affairs, and raise them to a degree of prosperity of which they have little notion. We speak of the mitigation and gradual removal of the American tariff, and the admission, nearly duty free, of British manufactures into the ports of the United States. We feel persuaded, that an immense market is here about to open to the merchant and manufacturer of England; and, therefore, as regards this class, we entertain very strong and confident hopes that their state of difficulty and distress will be but temporary."

There is one thing, nevertheless, which the "Messenger" ought to have thought of. How are the Americans to pay for British goods under the present British tariff? What have we more to export which Britain will receive? Is not the consumption of ALL our chief "natural productions," except cotton, virtually prohibited, or so severely taxed that they cannot be used freely? If, as Mr. Jefferson once said, it is the policy of America to have her "workshops in Europe,"—is it not the policy of England to have her corn fields and pastures in America?

On the subject of the new tariff the "doctors differ." The "Boston Gazette," a few days since, spoke of the late law as infusing fresh life into the manufacturing interests—but "Bell's Messenger" calculates on obtaining nearly the whole of the American market, because of that law!

The "Gazette" is mistaken, as we believe—because of the fact, perhaps, that present security to the manufacturers held out in the law, has given fresh life to present manufacturing establishments; but we know that it has checked, and, in some instances forbidden, the erection of new ones—and we know also that certain great manufacturers are looking to a retirement from their present business, and are already making some arrangements for that purpose. The "Messenger," however, is also mistaken. The market for English goods in the U. States, as now interfered with by our own productions, may not be essentially affected for *six years—except in the increased demand for goods with the increase of our population, and in the want of proportionally increased domestic manufacturing establishments—as just above suggested. And the reduced amount of protection afforded, may be made up to proprietors in the equally reduced amount of wages paid to our working people. England cannot go lower in wages—but we may. It is the latter, however, that we have most solemnly protested against. We never will place the labor of American citizens on a par with that of British paupers—if it can be avoided. It is the truth—that vast numbers of the English "operatives" are, in part, supported by their parishes—and hence, in many instances, the greater cheapness of English manufactures.

But there will be a re-action. The free laboring people of the United States will have a mutually "free trade," or a mutually restricted trade. ONE OR THE OTHER! We shall endeavor to be content with either—but one or the other we must ever insist upon.

EX-LIEUTENANT RANDOLPH AND GENERAL JACKSON. The "miserables," of whom we have more than once spoken, seem determined to keep up a public excitement, because of an individual outrage committed on the person of the president, by Mr. Randolph. The real, or affected, attempts to arrest the latter, without the District of Columbia, have been generally considered as a grasping at a power less tolerable than the assault itself, or as the essence of all that is ridiculous in the annals of crawling sycophancy. There is no present authority to arrest Mr. Randolph, out of the District—and the fuss that has been made about it is contemptible. The moral sense of the community is against all such proceedings of private individuals, on the persons of public agents, for public acts—and if this, superadded to the local laws, is not sufficient, we have no other alternative than to surround the president, members of congress, and other public officers, with a mercenary guard, armed with sabres or ball-charged muskets. It has been the glory of our country, that every good citizen felt himself to be a constitutional peace officer, and also a soldier—if capable of bearing arms, and not conscientiously opposed to the use of force. Is this glory to fade away, and the moral power of the republic be transferred to the keeping of indiscriminating "fighting machines"—because that one case has happened in which a president of the United States was personally assaulted, with the intent, only, of inflicting an indignity upon him—an intent as impotent as its entertainment was unjustifiable; and which altogether failed of its purpose, through the sound judgment of all men? The person of general Jackson was slightly injured, and his personal feelings rightfully excited; but the fiat of the whole public is—that such an act cannot attach an indignity to a president of the United States.

The "Alexandria Gazette" of Tuesday last has the following:

"The motion of the district attorney for the issuing of an attachment against J. H. Pleasants, esq. editor of the Richmond Whig, was yesterday argued before the circuit court at great length, by the district attorney, F. S. Key, esq. and Walter Jones, esq. on behalf of Mr. Pleasants: present, judges Thruston and Morsell. The opinion of the court was given by judge Thruston, ordering the attachment to be issued; stating, at the same time, that it was a subject of much delicacy and doubt—that he entertained doubts, but that, being called upon at this time to make up an opinion, he had so decided. On motion of Mr. Jones, it was then ordered, that the attachment be accompanied with a recital of the grounds on which it was issued. The attachment is made returnable to the court the first Monday in October, being the first day of the next term of the court."

And the same paper of Wednesday, observes—

"It will be recollected that the day on which Mr. Randolph committed the assault upon the president, the grand jury were in session. That body, immediately and properly, presented this breach of the laws and disturbance of the public peace. Mr.

* It was this period of time, which, perhaps, more than any thing else, induced Mr. Clay to introduce the bill—pressed as he was by other considerations, to which it is not necessary now to allude. If, after six more years of experience, the right and duty of the government to protect the manufactures of the country, shall be questioned, and the administration remains adverse—the glorious times for England, anticipated by the "Messenger," may be enjoyed. "There is many a slip between the cup and the lip"—and, perhaps, even the south may feel the necessity of that protection which is at present eschewed. Stranger things have happened!

Randolph, however, had made his escape from the presence of the marshal of the District, the president's secretaries, a coterie of his personal friends, and Mr. Silas E. Burrows; and this fact, together with an impression that some difficulty would occur by an attempt to arrest him in Virginia, as well as (some have maliciously supposed) as a desire to make the most of the business, created a necessity for a hold step on the part of those concerned. Accordingly, it was at once announced, and rumor says officially announced through the Globe, that a "PLOT"—a "CONSPIRACY"—had been hatched here by a "BAND OF RUFFIAN CONFEDERATES;" that this assault was the fruit of this "conspiracy;" that Mr. Randolph was excited to the deed by these "ruffian confederates," and afterwards preserved, protected, and aided in his escape, by the same "BASE CREW." The district attorney himself, determined to support these charges, entered at once into the subject with great zeal and ardor, and laid before the grand jury his attempt to do so, with the avowed design of indicting certain persons in aiding or assisting in the assault, or in assisting the escape of the assailant. For a month the grand jury have been patiently and laboriously engaged in an examination of all the facts which the district attorney has been able to lay before them. The failure of Mr. Pleasants, the editor of the Richmond Whig, to obey the subpoena of the court, rather abruptly terminated the examination; and the grand jury were on Monday discharged, and the court adjourned over. Mr. P. was summoned here to give up the name of the writer of an extract of a letter, which appeared in his paper, detailing an account of the assault, containing such terrible expressions as these—"I and a friend accompanied Randolph to the boat," &c. &c. Mr. P. respectfully denied the power of the court to bring him to the District at the same time making oath that he is entirely ignorant of any "plot" or "conspiracy" whatever, and that the extract of the letter referred to was handed to him by a gentleman of Richmond, and inserted as a matter of news, &c. &c. at once showing that his evidence, if obtained, will be entirely unimportant.

"As far as we can learn, the evidence adduced only proves what is known already to the public, and no more. It is certain that the whole attempt to make out a conspiracy has, so far, proved a miserable abortion. That Mr. Randolph was accompanied to the wharf by his uncle—that to prevent his being murdered by the umbrellas, sticks, swords, &c. of the valorous gentlemen who surrounded the president, a gentleman present did shove him from the boat to the wharf—that he walked away in sight of those who saw the assault, and were bound to have taken him—that he went up to the hotel deliberately, and as deliberately mounted a horse and slowly rode away—is all true and fully proved; and if this shows a conspiracy—a base plot—a combination of confederates—why, all honor to the district attorney for the marvellous discovery!"

So stands the case at present. The court, we think, would have better rejected the application for an attachment, than expressed its doubt of a power to issue one—unless with a view of hearing an argument on the case, when the attachment shall be returned, and thus bring certain important questions to their final judgment; for we take it as granted, that Mr. Pleasants will resist the attachment—and, if taken by force, will appeal to the laws of Virginia; and, by a writ of habeas corpus, be discharged. What then?

As a simple violation of the law, the attack on general Jackson, cannot be considered a higher offence than would have been an attack on the person of his polite porter—the man who opens and shuts the great door of the "White House." Had Mr. Randolph been arrested within the District—the law, as enforced against Houston, because of the assault and battery which he committed on Stanberry, would have operated on his case, so far as the court had jurisdiction in that matter—and no further than as if between two of the humblest private inhabitants of the District. Yet, while there is a law intended to render the persons of members of congress "sacred," because of words uttered in debate, the courts have nothing to do with the administration of that law—the judgment belonging to the house of congress whose dignity is supposed to have been violated: but there is no special law which renders the person of a president more sacred than is that of any other man; and, before the court, general Jackson and Mr. Randolph would stand upon the same footing, as private individuals of the District. In England, such an assault upon the person of the KING

*We know nothing about the nice points, and twists and turns, of the law—and, perhaps, may only shew our own ignorance in expressing a regret that Mr. Pleasants appeared, by counsel, in the case; but he knows more than we do about such things—and is not a person that will easily give up any portion of his political rights. It was entirely proper, we apprehend, that he should have made the statement which he did—but further than that we cannot believe that he ought to be questioned; nor can we admit such an inquisition over the press as seems about to be attempted.

would be HIGH TREASON—but there is no king in the U. States! We have no "life guards," to protect the persons of our presidents—nor government-priests to direct their consciences! The first is supposed to be in the hearts of the whole people; and the second belongs, or ought to belong, to our presidents, only, according to the dictates of their own judgment.

We certainly think that Mr. Randolph, if legally arrested, ought to be punished—severely punished, because of various circumstances attending the affair; but still, it is only a case of assault and battery—and we would not have any thing more made of it, except in the force of public opinion, which indignantly rejects all such violence. And if others were associated with him in making the assault and battery, they, surely, are also under the same liabilities; but the laws of the land may not be set aside, and new laws made, for this special occasion.

THE DRY DOCKS, at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and Gosport, Virginia, are among the noblest works of the kind in the world. They are now both finished, and we soon expect a particular account of them. On the 17th inst. the Delaware, ship of the line, was floated into the dock at Gosport, and, by aid of the steam engine, pumping out the water, she was soon left dry, and in a proper state for repairing her bottom. This dock has fulfilled the best hopes of its builders. That at Charlestown is of the same size and construction, and also finished—for the reception of "Old Ironsides," or the Constitution frigate; which, perhaps, has been a few days delayed, that the president might witness her introduction.

A NEW LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE, constructed by Mr. R. L. Stevens, was lately placed on the Camden and Amboy rail road, and works beautifully. The rate of going has not yet been settled, but the greatest curves have been passed at the rate of forty miles an hour, because of certain improvements made in the axle trees. The rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour, it seems, is attained without any seeming effort. The capacity to generate steam has, also, been much improved; and, from the experiments made, it is hoped that anthracite coal may be used for that purpose. These are great things.

There are three engines now on this road, and six or seven more will soon be ready for use, when horse-power will be entirely dispensed with.

THE LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE, called the Pennsylvania, invented and patented by colonel S. H. Long, of the United States army, has been fairly tried and approved on the Germantown rail road.

Recent experiments have shown that the engine is fit to draw thirty-two tons, easily, on a level road, at the speed of fifteen miles an hour.

The whole weight of the engine is four tons and a half, the boilers evaporate two hundred gallons in an hour, in which time they require the consumption of something less than two bushels of anthracite coal, the only fuel used.

The wheels are made of wood, each with an iron tire of three parallel concentric circular bands, cheap in price, but very substantial, strong, lasting and efficient.

Col. Long has employed himself, for some time past, on experiments for the application of the heat produced by anthracite coal to the production of steam for locomotive engines; and has succeeded in a degree above the most sanguine expectations with which he started. With his arrangement of the furnace and the flue, anthracite may be used, for raising steam, more advantageously than the best pine wood. It sends forth no sparks to burn or alarm passengers careful of their dresses; and emits no disagreeable or pernicious vapor; and it enables the director to travel without the encumbrance of a tender, as the fuel and the water are both carried on the engine.

[Philada. Daily Chron.

A "CONSIDERABLE" BUSINESS. The produce of the Great Falls manufacturing company, at Somersworth, N. H. the six days ending the 31st ult. was 140,000 yards cotton shirting, 30 to 38 inches wide, of yarns Nos. 26, 33 and 40; and 3,900 yards broadcloth entirely finished. The capacity of the woollen establishment, exclusive of carpetings, is 600 yards broadcloths per day.

THE GIRARD ESTATE. In the select council of Philadelphia, the following report was received on the 13th inst:

Office of the board of commissioners of the Girard estate, June 11, 1833.

At a meeting of the board held this day, the treasurer of the Girard trust informed that on the 25th May, 1833, the executors of Stephen Girard filed an account at the register's office, and communicated the following extract therefrom, which the board ordered to be transmitted to councils.

Gross amount paid over by executors	$4,030,384 20
Commissions allowed for trouble on
$2,777,863 66, 2½	69,446 68
Commissions allowed for trouble on
$1,886,756 14, 5	95,337 80
Balance due to the estate	470,451 40

From the minutes. MORGAN ASH, Secretary.

The estate and fund are accumulating rapidly. The interests, and revenues, are large; and, if well managed, will, of themselves, accomplish great things.

Mr. N. Gevelot has been engaged to make a statue of Mr. Girard—as he was—for 9,000 dollars.

The ground for the great college has been broken, and the building will go on rapidly.

[The councils of Philadelphia have instructed the commissioners of the Girard estates to take measures to contest the charge made for commissions by the executors of Stephen Girard, on their accounts filed in the register's office, which in the opinion of these councils is excessive.]

THE CLIMATE. On the 9th of June the temperature, at Quebec, was rising 70 degrees. A severe squall came from the north-west, and the next morning the ground was frozen, and ice formed an eighth of an inch thick.

The St. Alban's [Vt.] Repository, of the 13th inst. remarks that on the Sunday previous, the snow was several inches deep on the mountains in that region. This was on the same day of the month in which the great snow storm of 1816 there occurred.

At Utica, N. Y. on the 11th inst. brisk fires were necessary, within doors, and surlouts and cloaks without.

TEXAS. We have been favored with a copy of the constitution of the state of Texas, which commences as follows:

"In the name of God, Omnipotent Author, and Supreme Legislator of the universe! We, the people of Texas, being capable of figuring as a state in the manner contemplated in the second article of the decree of the general congress of the nation, of the 7th of May, 1824, DO ORDAIN THE FOLLOWING CONSTITUTION, and do mutually agree with each other, to form ourselves into a free and independent state of the Mexican confederacy, by the name of the STATE OF TEXAS."

This constitution was adopted in convention at San Felipe de Austin, on the 13th April last—54 members present: William H. Wharton, president, and Thomas Hastings, secretary. It contains 106 articles—and the provisions which regard life, liberty and property, have the same general principles as those of the several states of the United States—indeed, many of the articles are mere copies from our own, the people of Texas being nearly all Americans. Officers are required to take an oath "to support the constitution of the United Mexican States, and of this state," &c.

THE REV. MR. AVERY, since his acquittal by the jury, has been also unanimously acquitted by the Methodist conference, sitting at Boston, not only of the charge of murder, but of having had any improper connexion with Sarah M. Cornell; but yet it seems, and in Boston, a large mob collected round him in the street, using harsh language, and menacing personal violence; but the sheriff happened to be in the neighborhood, and dispersed the crowd; and the Providence Gazette of Friday says—"Yesterday a coffin came floating up the river. It was picked up by a boatman, who, having examined it to his satisfaction, shouldered it and carried it away. It attracted no small amount of curious beholders; and to add to the wretchedness of the affair, the lid of the coffin was marked with the name of the rev. Ephraim K. Avery."

Such proceedings are to be deeply regretted. The decision of the law must be respected by every good citizen. All else is from a spirit of "nullification."

And again—The Newport Republican says, we understand that the jury believe that Mr. Avery was proved guilty, but that the proof was not so strong as to preclude the possibility of a doubt, or the hundredth chance of his innocence, agreeably to the saying of the law—"It is better that ninety-nine guilty persons should go unpunished for their crimes, than one innocent man should suffer."

COLONIZATION. At a meeting of the friends of the American colonization society, held in New York on Monday evening, the sum of eleven hundred and twenty-eight dollars was collected.

The Alexandria Gazette says—"We yesterday saw a letter from the venerable James Madison, expressing, in the warmest terms, his interest in the American colonization society, and enclosing a donation of fifty dollars, to be applied to the funds of the society."

MASSACHUSETTS. Election of members of congress. The votes in the Boston district were—for Mr. Gorham, (N. R.) 2,304; Mr. Lyman, (J.) 1,320; Mr. Walker, (anti-mason), 429, and 52 scattering. The first was elected.

In the Essex North district—for Mr. Osgood, (J.) 3,277; Mr. Cushing, (N. R.) 2,894; and 202 scattering. So the first was elected by a small majority. He was supported by the anti-masons—generally.

In the Norfolk district, lately represented by Mr. Dearborn, there is again, "no choice"—Mr. D. again had the greatest number of votes. The votes were—for Mr. Dearborn 2,290—Mr. Jackson, (anti-mason), 2,006; Thurber, (Jackson), 577; and 11 scattering.

THE INDIANS. We found time to visit Black Hawk and his accompanying Indian chiefs, and the Prophet, at Congress Hall hotel.

We went into the chamber, and found most of them sitting or laying on their beds. Black Hawk was sitting in a chair, and apparently depressed in spirits. He is about 65 years of age, of middling size, with a head that would excite the envy of a phrenologist—one of the finest that heaven ever let fall on the shoulders of an Indian.

The Prophet has a coarser figure, with less of intellect, but with the marks of decision and firmness. His face was painted with red and white.

The son of Black Hawk is a noble specimen of physical beauty—a model for those who would embody the idea of strength. He was painted, and his hair cut and dressed in a strange fantasy.

The other chiefs had nothing particular in their appearance to distinguish them from other natives of the forest.

The whole of the deputation visited the water works yesterday, and subsequently were taken, to the Cherry Hill prison, and shown the manner in which white men punish. The exhibition of arms and ships at the navy yard, led the Hawk to remark that he suspected the great father was getting ready for a war. [U. S. Gaz.]

RAILWAY IRON FOR AMERICA. We learn that a most respectable mercantile house in this town has lately received an order to send to America iron for the use of the extensive railways now forming in that country, to the amount of £90,000. [Liverpool Times.]

THE CHAINS OF POLAND. The administrative council of Warsaw, by a decree dated March 1st, has regulated the weight of the chains by which Polish prisoners are to be fettered. All male convicts are to drag seven pounds weight of iron—women six.

MR. WEBSTER arrived at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 5th inst. in the steamboat "Daniel Webster" from Buffalo, and left that place on the following day, for the interior of that state. On the 10th instant, he was at Columbus, the seat of government of Ohio. He proceeded thence, southward, next day. At all places he has visited, says the Zanesville Republican, Mr. Webster has been treated with the respect due to his talents and services, without reference to party politics.

DUTIES ON WINES. The following letter from the treasury department, addressed to a house in New York, is important to wine dealers:

Comptroller's office, 4th June, 1833.

Gentlemen—The secretary of the treasury has referred to me your letter to him of the 27th ult. in which you submit the following questions for the decision of the department.

"Are the duties on wines to be reduced on the 4th March, 1834, to one-half their present rates, and a return duty to be allowed on those then on hand, or instead thereof will the progressive reduction contemplated by the tariff act of 2d March apply to wines? In the latter case will the wines in bond on the 4th March, 1834, be entitled to the first reduction of duty?"

In reply, I have to observe, that the duties on such wines as are now in bond, and shall remain so until the 31st December, 1833, and on such wines as may be imported before that day, and shall at the time of importation be deposited under control of the proper officers of the customs, and shall remain so until after that day, will have to be regulated by the provisions of the 1st section of the act of 2d March, 1833, to modify the act of 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports, and accordingly if such duties exceed an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. a reduction thereon will be made, at the time of withdrawing the wines from the public stores, equal to the tenth part of such excess. Respectfully,

Jos. ANDERSON, comptroller.

To Messrs.——New York.

DUTY ON LINENS. Treasury instructions to collectors, by which the difficulties heretofore existing are said to be settled: List of Linens to be admitted at an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. under the act of 14th July, 1832.

COTTON AND WINE. In the British house of lords, May 9. Lord Auckland, on moving that the house go into committee on this bill, shortly explained its object.

Lord Ellenborough said when the duties were imposed, in 1831, upon cottons, it was proposed to include East India produce of that description, but he objected to it; and, on inquiry into the probable effects the imposition of the duty would have, that intention was abandoned. What he now ventured to suggest was that even the small duty on cottons coming from the East Indies should be given up, as he was persuaded it would have a very beneficial effect; for when the duty was lowered, the importation from that country had improved both in quality and quantity.

The earl of Ripon said he should be one of the last persons to oppose any thing which might be supposed beneficial to the importation of produce from India, but he really could not concur in what the noble lord had stated. The duties on East India produce—such as indigo, lac, and other articles, with the exception of sugar, which formed another consideration on other grounds—were next to nothing; and so far as an increase of their consumption depended, he was induced to believe no such effect would follow. He must therefore oppose the suggestion made by the noble lord.

Lord Ellenborough thought there was another duty worthy consideration, which underwent an alteration at the same time—viz: in 1831—he meant the wine duty. So far from that duty being favorable to the revenue, it had produced, if he might so term it, a loss of £5,000. The consumption had not increased, as was argued would be the case, nor had the revenue benefited thereby. He thought, therefore the subject was deserving the attention of ministers with a view of alteration.

The marquis of Lansdown said that with respect to the article of wine, the subject had not had a fair trial, for last year, owing to the prevailing disorder which was spread throughout the country, the light wines were not drunk. He defended the soundness of the policy of his majesty's ministers in the course they had pursued, both with respect to the alteration in the wine duties, and the duties on cottons, and printed cottons.

Lord Auckland said that during the last three months there had been an increase in the importation of wines, and that last year the falling off of the duties arose from there not being so great a demand for light wines, but the stronger description of wines had increased in the quantity imported.

The bill then went through a committee.

"DEAD LETTERS. In the general post office at Washington, there is one department for the examination of dead letters, which has a superintendent and five clerks."

The above paragraph, which we find in circulation in the newspapers, reminds us to say, that the number of dead letters returned to the general post office, and there examined, &c. amounts to the enormous number of six hundred thousand annually. This branch of the post office is under excellent regulations. Every thing of value is carefully preserved, to be restored to its owners, if they can be found. [Nat. Int.]

NAPOLEON, by his will made at St. Helena, left to his son his arms, which he thus described—"My arms, namely, my sword, the same which I wore at Austerlitz, the sabre of Sobieski, my poniard, my entlass, &c."—M. M. Bertrand, Marchand, and other companions of Napoleon's exile were appointed depositaries, and were to transmit the objects deposited in their hands to the son of Napoleon on his attaining the age of 16. When young Napoleon became of age he was laboring under a mortal disease, and died before he could receive his father's legacy. The objects are still in the hands of the depositaries, who have thought proper to take counsel's opinion as to what they are to do in order to be legally disengaged from responsibility. M. Patory, an advocate for the royal court of Paris, has drawn up an opinion, in which he proposes the following three questions—"Do the arms of Napoleon belong to Maria Louisa, that is to say the Austrian? Do they belong to the father's family at Rome? Do they belong to the French nation? The opinion of M. Odillon Barrot, Paillet, and Philip Dupin, in conformity with that of M. Patory, is, that the arms of Napoleon are national property, and that the state has a right to claim them, to be deposited in a public establishment. [N. Y. Standard.]

MELANCHOLY CONDITION!

From the Georgia Telegraph.

The summer is a season of leisure with a great many—and from a spirit of liberality, they are in the habit of travelling about and seeing the country. From the state of Georgia alone, not fewer than 1,000 come every year.* These cannot spend on an average less than $500 a piece, making a total of $500,000 a year, drawn from that state, and paid to her neighbors. No wonder that the south is every day growing poor, and the north much richer, when the odds is so much against it. Now if this exchange were mutual, I would recommend a frequent intercommunication. But it is not the fact. Who ever goes to the south to spend seasons? If a visit is made there, it is to collect money. You have travellers enough from the north—such as they are—but they carry no money with them. They either go to peddle, to beg, or to dun! In all of which capacities you see a plenty.

Let us look to the various ways in which the north fleeces the south, besides the tariff:

Spent for pleasure as above named,	$500,000
100 Medical students each year, at $600	60,000
20 Law do. do. 600	12,000
20 Ministerial do. do. 400	8,000
100 Females	30,000

Northern shoes and boots.....	1,000,000
Saddles and bridles, ...	100,000
Carriages and harness.....	80,000
Leather.....	10,000
Ready-made clothing.....	100,000
Watches, clocks and jewelry.....	100,000
Household furniture.....	100,000
Paper.....	100,000
Newspapers.....	10,000
Books.....	20,000
Medicine.....	10,000
Homespun.....	10,000
Calicoes, &c.....	100,000

Besides what is paid for northern beef, butter, cheese, potatoes, garden seeds, pork, horses, mules, &c. amounting to a sum almost beyond calculation.

You may say I am getting warm on the subject—and so I am. I cannot help getting warm every time I think about it. I shall curtail my tour of one-half its length, and return to Georgia as speedily as possible, where I shall study economy by confining my expenditures as far as practicable to my own state.

*Why do they? why should they?

Ed. Reg.

[The preceding appears to be extracted from the letter of some full-blooded Georgian, who was "fleeing" his own state by spending his own money elsewhere.]

Q3—Truly—this is a frightful picture; but it falls far short of the reality! Only 2,300,000 dollars enumerated. The cheese and garden seeds, and the et cetera, (which include "wooden nutmegs" and "horn gun-flints") however, by the aid of a lively imagination, may make the whole sum three millions. But that isn't near enough—to settle the "balance of trade!"—for Georgia exports a great deal more than that value to "the north;" and we should like to know why the rule which the "Georgia Telegraph" applies to the north is "abominable," "roughish" and "rascally," when applied, by "the north," to England?

In the last year, we imported 34,848,562 dollars worth of goods from England, of which "the north" (and the west) consumed at least three-fourths, or say, 26,000,000. The whole export to England, of domestic products, in the last year was valued at 26,632,068

Deduct—Cotton	21,262,900
Tobacco	2,519,596
Rice	419,682
		24,002,178

Leaving only 2,629,890 for the value of the exports of the north and the west to pay for the 26 millions worth of British goods consumed by them!

Isn't "what's good for this goose good for the gander?" If there is a balance of trade against Georgia, in her relations with the north—what sort of an argument may be made why Georgia should "cut" these relations, which the north may not also use with respect to England? Won't the "rule work both ways?" Is a rule of right in the south, a rule of wrong in the north? Try again. This "pistol has missed fire," or "kicked its owner over;"—no matter which.

THE CHEROKEES.

From the Charleston Courier.

The Cherokee council assembled at Red Hill, on the 13th ult. to take into consideration the propriety of accepting the offer of the general government, recently made them for their claim to lands on this side of the Mississippi, was generally attended on the part of the intelligent portion of the people, and very numerously attended by the common Indians. They remained in council several days, upon this all important subject, and have at length dispersed without agreeing to the liberal proposition of the general government, which should have been by all means so very desirable to them. This result is attributed, by the Auraria (Geo.) Herald, from which the particulars are taken, to a chief, named John Ross, who, it would appear, possesses much influence over the Indians, and is very unfavorable to the general government, and to the people of Georgia in particular. Many of the most enlightened chiefs are said to have advocated the acceptance of the proposition, and it is to be regretted that the "sons of the forest" should have suffered themselves to be swayed by one who has more probably acted from personal motives, rather than the advantage of those whom he was advising.

The Milledgeville Federal Union, states that the Indians have only postponed making a treaty, until the meeting of congress, and to prevent any unnecessary delay after that time, an exploring party is to visit the Arkansas country during the present summer; and remarks, "we believe that our Indian controversies are rapidly approaching a harmonious and satisfactory close"—but from the confident manner in which the Herald asserts that the council has broken up, and its being nearer the place at which that body assembled we are inclined to believe it has given the more correct statement.

From the Cherokee Phoenix, May 18th.

It will be recollected in 1821, the rev. H. Clauder missionary of the Moravians, stationed in this vicinity, with a flourishing school, and a prosperous church was arrested by the Georgia guard, and ten days given him to remove without Georgia, which he was compelled to do; and after leaving a valuable improvement he returned to the society in Salen, N. C. Mr. Clauder was again sent out by the society to Spring Place to supersede the rev. G. Byhal, and received the appointment of post master at that place. This appointment placed him under the protection of the general government, and seemed to secure his residence as a missionary there, without the molestation of the Georgia authorities. But it appears that the learned Georgians are wretchedly behind the Roman notions of justice, they have not the "perpetual will of doing right;" they surveyed the Cherokee country, placed Mr. C. in a lot with a respectable Indian, drew for it, then granted by the governor, and the worthy missionary with his post office commission, was driven off from a valuable improvement by the drawer, utterly destroying two missionary stations in the Cherokees of the United Brethren.

The national government have a character to sustain, and it is with that government to see her own citizens protected from the persecution of usurpers.

Again: At Ellijay, an industrious Indian had by his steady habits, improved his premises to be of considerable value, when it was drawn by one of the lottery gamblers in Georgia. The fortunate holder of the ticket applied to the governor for a grant which was given him, on his assurance that there was no Indian occupant on it. The fortunate drawer gathered up his all, including some two or three pistols, and moved to the Cherokee country, loaded his pistols, entered the possession of Ootaw-lunsta, pointing one at him, and drove the innocent Cherokee from his well cultivated field, and he was without a home the last account we had.

The Cherokees are doomed to suffer.

The Washington Telegraph, contains a letter of Judge Clayton, of Georgia, respecting the negotiation which the executive of the United States pursued last winter with the Cherokee delegation in congress. The judge makes the following statements:

"The administration believed, and had so given out, that there would be no difficulty in procuring a treaty, and public opinion seemed to be settled in that expectation, and gratified at the prospect of such an issue. The first intimation of a contrary result came from the secretary of war himself, and that on the evening before congress adjourned. On that evening, being Friday, and the day after the passage of the force bill, Gov. Cass came to the capitol, and sent in for one of the members from Georgia. His message was delivered to me; I immediately waited upon him. He commenced by observing, that he had called to request an interview with the Georgia representation, at his office, on the next morning at 10 o'clock, and then said, the object of it was to consult us as to the course necessary to be pursued in relation to the treaty with the Cherokees. He stated, he considered the government had been trifled with by their delegation; that after giving every reasonable indication of their intentions to treat, they had strangely and suddenly broken off the negotiation. He remarked that several propositions had passed between them from time to time; and that, finally, the Indians asked to know what the government would give for their lands, in a round sum, and they would go off on their own 'hook,' as they expressed it. He said he replied, two millions and a half of dollars. They took time to consider the offer, and on yesterday morning, Thursday, he stated, they called to inquire if the president would give no more. He answered, perhaps the president would give a little more, rather than the treaty should fail; they rejoined, that unless he would give a great deal more, there was no use for further negotiations. To this remark, which he said surprised him very much, he replied, 'meet me at the president's to-morrow morning, Friday, and we will ascertain what additional sum the president will give you.' They promised to do so, but to his astonishment they had failed, and had addressed him a note, requesting to know when it should suit the president to admit them to take leave of him. Now, said he, we have some idea of offering three millions for their land, and I wish to know whether your delegation will advise the measure. I answered without hesitation, that I would—nay, if necessary, he ought to give more. For though it was too much, yet it was a property we ought to have had long ago; our citizens had, and were daily acquiring it under a late disposition of it by the state, were going into the possession of it, and as we could never consent, let the consequences be what they might, to have that possession disturbed, I did think, for the sake of peace, and the adjustment of a much vexed and exciting question, that the land could scarcely be purchased too dearly.

"I promised to meet him next morning, and accordingly did so, finding none other of our delegation there but Judge Wayne. I repeated what I had said on the evening before, in which Judge Wayne concurred, and he said he would draw up a written communication to that effect, and obtain the signatures of the whole representation, which I approved, and had no doubt it would meet with the similar approbation of the rest of the delegation. I heard no more of it, congress adjourned next evening, and the members separated. I afterwards understood that three millions of dollars had been offered by the government, and that the Indians had proposed to submit the offer to a meeting of the nation, some time in this month; if they would agree to take it, there would be a treaty."

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

The recent election of a president of this company having excited considerable attention, we are induced to record the votes given, &c. as we find them stated in the "National Intelligencer."

For president.
John H. Eaton	5,054	C. F. Mercer	3,430
For directors.
William Price	7,360	Edward Lucas	4,627
J. J. Abert	7,810	A. Stewart	3,834
W. Gunton	8,821	F. Thomas	3,017
W. Smith	10,281
P. Janney	10,180
R. H. Henderson	5,643

The first six elected.

The vote for Mr. Eaton was made up of the following parts:

The United States	2,008 votes.
The corporation of Washington	2,008 votes.
Individual stockholders	1,038 votes.

For president, the proxies of the state of Maryland (Mr. Forrest and Mr. McCulloh) were divided; and so were those of the corporation of Georgetown. The votes, therefore, of both these interests were lost.

Had these two latter interests been voted upon, and the vote been (as expected) for Mr. Mercer, it would have added to his vote;

For Maryland	1,290 votes
Georgetown	508 votes and would have elected him by a majority of 182 votes. The aggregate vote for Mr. Mercer was composed of the following particulars:

The state of Virginia	570 votes.
Corporation of Alexandria	508 votes.
Individual stockholders	2,362 votes.

Of the votes of individual stockholders, therefore, Mr. Mercer received 2,362 to Mr. Eaton's 1,038.

"The directors attempted to be put in by political influence, were signally defeated.* It seems as if Mr. Mercer was the only sacrifice upon which a majority could be brought to act together.

"In the election of directors it will be seen that Mr. Smith and Mr. Janney received seventeen hundred votes more than the joint vote for president. This was caused by the votes of Maryland and Georgetown not being divided in their case, and the aggregate thereof, being 1,798 votes, being given in their favor."

"The list of directors, however, is an unexceptionable one, and some of them have much practical experience in the business of the canal company."

"At an adjourned general meeting of the stockholders of this company, held on a subsequent day, at which were represented the United States, the state of Maryland, the state of Virginia, the corporations of Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown, and a majority of the individual stockholders, the following resolution, proposed by Mr. McCulloh, on behalf of the state of Maryland, was adopted:

"Resolved, That the thanks of the stockholders of 'the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company are, in the opinion of this meeting, due to CHARLES FENTON MERCER for the zeal, ability, care and fidelity, which he has displayed in discharging the duties of the office of president of this company; and that, in consideration of the attention bestowed and expenses incurred by him, whilst rendering many services to this corporation that did not pertain to that office, the president and directors be, and they are hereby authorised and directed to pay to him the sum of five thousand dollars, in addition to his pay as president."

"This resolution received an unanimous vote, except the corporation of Georgetown, who preferred a different sum for the extra allowance, but concurred in the spirit of the resolution.

"A motion was then made, from the same quarter, to raise the salary of the president of the company, to begin at this date, from two to three thousand dollars; and also to establish the office of superintendent general, or engineer in chief, to the canal. These propositions were, after considerable debate, postponed to August next, to which time the general meeting was then adjourned."

—An unanimous vote, with such acknowledgments of services rendered by general Mercer—immediately after such a dismissal of him! It partakes strongly of the absurd, or the ridiculous.

WATER WORKS.

PHILADELPHIA AND WILMINGTON.

From the Delaware Journal.

The subjoined view of the Fairmount water works, which reflect so much credit upon the spirit and enterprise, and contribute so essentially to the comfort and happiness of our neighbors of Philadelphia, is taken from the Philadelphia Herald. The writer has certainly not laid too much stress upon the importance of these works: for among all public improvements, there are none which philanthropists or economists can view with more approving regard, none which more justly and call for liberal and munificent expenditure, than those which have for their object the supply and distribution of an abundance of pure and wholesome water to the inhabitants of a large and populous city. It is not in a spirit of mere vanity, that we introduce here a notice of the water works of our own town; but because our attention has been called to the subject by the annexed statement, and because, too, we feel a justifiable pride in doing honor to the enterprise, the discernment and skill which have, in this respect, placed Wilmington on an equality with any other town, we believe, in the world. The water works constructed in this place, in 1827, are remarkable for their simplicity, their excellence and efficiency—and when we consider that they were constructed for a population of 7,000, it will be admitted, that there is no vain boast in claiming for them all the credit which has been given to Philadelphia for those water works upon which she so justly prides herself, and which, embracing the city and precincts, supply a population probably of 150,000.

The present water works in this place, have cost about 65,000 dollars.

Iron pipes. There have been laid since 1827—28,371 feet, or nearly 5½ miles.

Fire plugs—62.

Amount of water and mill rents, at the present time, $4,350. About $40,000 had been expended for the introduction of water, before the present works were constructed; making the whole expense incurred by the town for this purpose, about 105,000 dollars.

The machinery by which this city is now supplied with water, consists of a mill situated on the Brandywine, which cost 28,000 dollars, from which the water is impelled by a forcing pump, through a line of pipes, 2,123 feet in length, to the reservoir at the summit of the town, 109 feet above the level of tide water. This reservoir consists of two basins, each 83 feet by 78, and 10 feet in depth. They contain about 11,000 hogsheds, or eleven millions of gallons of water. It requires forty hours to fill the reservoirs, which contain an average supply of a week or ten days—the usual consumption being from 140 to 160,000 gallons a day. The mill is rented at $750 per annum, and the reservoir is filled at the expense of the lessees. From these works, Wilmington is furnished with a copious and ample supply of the purest water—ample either for comfort, luxury or security against fire—inasmuch, that we repeat that, in all these particulars, it yields to no other town upon earth.

FAIRMOUNT WATER WORKS.

Philadelphia has never been wanting in a proper spirit where objects of real utility were to be gained. The most conspicuous of her public improvements, is the Fairmount works.

We have only leisure to present our readers with the following outline of the operations of this truly magnificent work. At a future period we propose filling up our sketch.

The increase of revenue from water rents in 1832 over 1831, was as follows:

City	$2,928 00
Northern Liberties	1,250 00
Spring Garden	1,829 25
Southwark	762 25
Moyamensing	394 50

Total 385,501 feet—or 72½ miles.

Fire plugs. The number of fire plugs in the city is—375

Northern Liberties	117
Southwark	84
Spring Garden	66
Moyamensing	8

Total 650

The dam across the Schuylkill at Fairmount is 1,416 feet in length, and six feet six inches above high tide.

Fourteen thousand eight hundred and ninety-two families and factories are supplied with water—and the daily consumption is at present about 32,000,000 gallons. This quantity will shortly be increased upwards of thirty-five millions of gallons per day.

The cost of the present works amounts to one million two hundred and seventy-nine thousand eight hundred and thirty-four dollars. The whole amount actually expended by the city of Philadelphia for the introduction of the Schuylkill water, from 1799 to the first of January, 1833, exceeds two millions sixty-three thousand dollars.

From the United States Gazette.

The following was the increase of water rents in 1832:

City of Philadelphia	$2,928 00
Northern Liberties	1,250 00
Spring Garden	1,829 25
Southwark	762 25
Moyamensing	394 50

The following are the water rents of the city for 1832:

City	$46,610 25

Southwark	7,413 25
Moyamensing	394 50

$77,567 75

The estimate of expenses

25,986 52

Balance

$51,581 23

It should be borne in mind, that the estimate of expenses for the year, include the cost of laying iron pipes, which is a means of increasing the revenue.

The whole amount chargeable to salaries in connexion with the water works, is only $3,240 00.

COFFEE. A London circular of 13th April says—Coffee is gaining favor; coloury sorts have advanced from the lowest point to 5@6s.; St. Domingo and Java sorts are saleable; Brazil, being abundant, is rather neglected. The importations of coffee from 1st January to 31st March are about as follows—

	In 1832.	In 1833.
To Hambro	7,600,000 lbs.	2,175,000 lbs.
" Bremen	828,000	616,000
" Amsterdam	2,251,000	2,229,000
" Rotterdam	4,170,000	1,465,000
" Antwerp	1,321,000	1,596,000

" London all sorts	4,426,000	4,622,000
	27,011,000	19,056,000

Presenting a falling off in the imports of eight millions, the stock of coffee in London is less by 12,000 bags foreign, and 17,500 bags East India, than on the 1st January, in consequence of heavy exports to the above continental ports, which has swelled the imports at those places, probably three or four millions more than they otherwise would appear; the falling off in the imports is therefore nearly twelve millions, from which deduct three millions detained since.

BERMUDA papers to the 21st inst. have been received at New York. The value of the imports into the Bermudas in 1832, was £97,354 sterling, of which £49,219 was from the United States. The amount of exports was only £25,287—of which £2,882 was to the U. States.

CALCUTTA. The debts of Messrs. Alexander & Co. have been ascertained by the special assignees to amount to 34,400,000 rupees, and the assets to 17,500,000, exclusive of balances considered doubtful or bad, amounting to 29,830,000, a part of which may probably be recovered. The inhabitants of several districts, in the vicinity of Madras, are suffering from famine and disease.

PUBLIC DEBT OF GREAT BRITAIN. A paper recently laid before the British house of commons, on a call for the information, contains some curious particulars as to the number of the holders of the funded public debt of Great Britain, and the amount held by each. It appears that there were about 279,000 persons having property in the public securities, of whom only 71 drew dividends of £2,000 and upwards. There were 103 holding in trust for societies and corporations, but only 71 as individuals. The number drawing less than £200 per annum was 263,000. To this 279,000 might be added, about 250,000 who had property in the savings' banks. There were therefore 540,000 families whose property was invested on the credit and faith of the country.

LONDON BEGGARY. The number of vagrant beggars now in London is supposed to exceed 40,000. The number of paupers relieved in London in one year was 116,416. The money raised by the poor rates was $1,016,020 96; being 13s. 5½d. sterling per head on the population.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, PARIS. The foundation stone of the first Protestant Episcopal church ever built in Paris, was laid on the 23d of April, in the rue d'Agnesscau, Faubourg St. Honore, by the right reverend bishop Luscombe, who was attended by the rev. Dr. Pritchard, the rev. G. Lefevre, S. Brereton, W. M. Bevan and W. Wood. Several of the French Protestant pastors, and a large number from the departments, who had assembled in Paris to attend the anniversary of the French Protestant Bible society, were present.

THE NORTH HOLLAND CANAL is 32 feet deep, 120 feet wide, and extends from the point of the Y nearest Amsterdam as far as the Helder, a distance of 16 leagues. No steamboats are allowed to ply upon it; but when a ship of war or other large vessel has occasion to pass it, it is towed by horses, to the number perhaps of twenty on either side, and lest it should not be obedient to the helm, ropes are also attached to the ship's quarters, which are held by men on the towing paths, to keep the vessel steadily in the centre, where the water is deepest. The locks are fifty feet wide and 220 feet in length; they are four in number—two ascending and two descending.

LAW—IN ENGLAND. At the Salop assizes a special jury case was tried, in which the question turned entirely upon the identity of a horse valued at £20. The plaintiff obtained a verdict for that sum. The law charges are expected to amount to between £500 and £600. Mr. Justice Taunton, in addressing the jury, congratulated the county of Salop on the extraordinary wealth it possessed, which permitted it, while other parts of the country were complaining of destitution and embarrassment, to throw away vast sums in bringing a host of witnesses to decide a matter of £20. The horse was brought into court, and underwent a careful examination by the jury!

WHISKEY—IN SCOTLAND. The quantity of whiskey consumed last year in Scotland was 4,861,515 gallons; being about 700,000 gallons less than for the year before, and about 1,200,000 less than for the year 1830. We know not whether this great falling off be occasioned by smuggling, by temperance societies, or by the distress of the manufacturing population. The export from Scotland to Ireland was 470,000 gallons only, and to England 2,360,000. We fear that the giant smuggler is again abroad.

EXCISE OFFICERS (Scotland.) There are 16 collectors of excise, whose salaries amount to £6,950. Eighteen collectors' clerks, salary £2,590. 74 supervisors, salary £14,000, and 794 officers, &c. salary £74,788 17s. 9d.

EDINBURGH. The Scotsman announces that the corporation of Edinburgh is £700,000 in debt, and on the verge of bankruptcy. It seems that the project of selling the town churches has been seriously entertained by some of the leading members of the council.

PARIS. According to the reports of the police of Paris for 1832, there was arrested during the year 77,548 individuals, of whom 26,653 were women; 25,702 drunkards were placed in confinement, 10,291 of them being women. The magistrates inflicted punishment upon 23,458, women, and committed 3,656 persons to take their trials before the tribunals. In 1832 there were 4,719 persons arrested more than during the preceding year.

IRISH POOR. It appears from a parliamentary paper just published, containing an account of the Irish poor shipped under passes from Liverpool, from 1824 to 1831 inclusive, that the total number shipped from that port were as follow: In 1824, 2,481; 1825, 3,028; 1826, 6,428; 1827, 6,055; 1828, 4,349; 1829, 5,086; 1830, 5,679; 1831, 5,863; making a total, during those eight years, of 38,969 persons; of which number, not less than 23,770 were shipped under passes from Liverpool and other places in the county of Lancaster, and 8,723 from Middlesex.—The total charge for passing these 38,969 paupers was £14,253.

GOLD AND SILVER COIN. It appears by an official statement from the [British] mint office, that for twenty years previous to the year 1810, there was coined at the mint, gold to the amount of £21,493,640 and silver to £12,216; and for a period of twenty years subsequent to 1810, the gold coined amounted to £45,387,423, and the silver to £9,149,411.

RENTS. The last Edinburgh Review says—"It would not be difficult to shew that the entire landed rental of England and Wales, is, at this moment, rather under than above thirty millions."

CHINA. The first specimen of an anglo Chinese Kalendar and Register has been published in China for the year 1832. According to this authority, the population returns of the celestial empire, in 1813, amounted to 362 millions; of which number the capital, Peking, alone is said to contain five millions.

ENGLISH EXPORTS! A cargo of three hundred and fifty young widows and spinsters was lately sent from London for the supply of Van Dieman's Land. They were decently clad, and well provided for.

The earl of Egremont has chartered a fine ship, at his own expense, for the purpose of sending emigrants to Canada, from his own estates and their neighborhood.

One hundred and fifty of the tenantry of the earl of Derby have been shipped for Canada, in one vessel.

Such things seem about to become of frequent occurrence.

The state of society may be gathered from the following:

On the 27th April, two families, consisting of eighteen individuals, were provided with the means of emigrating to Canada by the parish of Debden. The circumstances attending their departure caused deep sympathy for them in the neighborhood where they lived. The fathers of the two families were agricultural laborers, greatly respected for their sober and industrious habits, each had served the same master upwards of twenty years, and so generally was their determination to leave the country regretted, that their stay was entreated by all who knew them. They, however, refused to listen to all entreaties, and determined to quit their native land, assigning as a reason that at that time twenty or thirty young men were walking about in the parish in a state of idleness, not being able to find employment, and they therefore saw no prospect of a livelihood for their children.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH BISHOPS. The ministry of England have proposed to fix the income of the archbishops of Ireland at £10,000. The French chamber of deputies has just fixed the stipends of the archbishop of Paris, the Catholic primate of France, at 25,000 francs, or exactly £1,000.

BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS—MAY 14.

COLONIAL SLAVERY.

Mr. Stanley presented 15 petitions praying for the immediate abolition of slavery, and then upon his motion the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole house upon the subject of negro slavery.

Mr. Stanley then proceeded to address the committee, and commenced by expressing his confidence that the committee would not fail to extend to him a large share of kindness when they reflected that, after having been for only a short period in the office which he had the honor to fill, it devolved upon him, in the discharge of his official duty, to bring under the consideration of parliament a question of unparalleled magnitude and importance, involving greater interest perhaps than any question which had for many years been submitted to any legislature. This question also was surrounded with difficulties of a peculiar nature, owing to the time at which it was brought forward. In the safe and satisfactory solution of the question were involved not only a maritime commerce amounting to 250,000 tons of shipping annually, and a revenue of between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000—not only the interests of a vast body of proprietors resident in the colonies and this country, whose very existence depended upon the issue of the question, but also the temporal interests of between 700,000 and 800,000 of our fellow subjects, and of their descendants throughout generations yet unborn. This was not all—it was impossible not to perceive the influence which the successful, or unsuccessful, issue of the mighty experiment now about to be tried must have upon millions of foreign subjects. Those were difficulties enough to appal any man who ventured to bring the subject forward. In the situation in which he was placed, all that he could do was to consider what course he could pursue which would achieve the most good, at the smallest risk of evil. The government was placed between two conflicting parties—one having a deep pecuniary interest in the question, intimately acquainted with the subject, connected with the colonies by social ties, and at present laboring under embarrassments which rendered them doubly jealous of any measure which might affect their interests. On the other hand, a universal and extended expression of feeling pervaded the country, and there never was a time when the determination of the people was more absolutely or more irresistibly expressed, because it was founded on that deep religious feeling, on that solemn conviction of principle, which admitted of no palliative or compromise, and which pronounced itself in a voice to which no minister could be deaf. The time had gone by when parliament could decide the question whether slavery should or should not be perpetual; the question now to be decided was, what was the safest, the speediest, and most effectual mode of procuring its final and entire abolition. They were mistaken who thought that the deep feeling of the necessity of the utter extinction of slavery was a feeling of yesterday; that it was a momentary enthusiasm, which if opposed would die away; it was the same spirit which fifty years ago pressed upon parliament, and compelled it, in spite of alleged national interests, and in defiance of all the arguments that could be urged in favor of commercial and prudential considerations, to decree the abolition of the trade which supplied negroes from the coast of Africa. If any body would take the trouble to look back to the language of the great men who labored so successfully to effect the abolition of the slave trade, they would find that though the question was then separated from that of the abolition of slavery, the former was considered only as the preliminary step to the latter. Perhaps he might be forgiven if he called the attention of the house particularly to the language of those distinguished men who in former days, to use the words of Mr. Canning, "attacked only the outworks of the great fortress, yet undoubtedly looked forward with a certain conviction in their minds, that the destruction of those outworks would lead to the fall of the citadel itself." In 1792 Mr. Burke published his celebrated letter to Mr. Dundas, in which he exhibited a plan which he called a negro code, and which he apologized for not having exhibited to the public 12 years before. That letter contained this passage—"I conceive that we should not look for the origin of the trade to the place in which it began, but to the place of its final destination. I therefore was and still am opinion that the whole work ought to be taken up together, and that the gradual abolition of slavery in the West Indies should go hand in hand with any thing which may be done with respect to the supply of negroes from the coast of Africa." Mr. Burke's code embraced the abolition of the trade and provisions for the final extinction of slavery in the colonies. In the debates of 1806 and 1807 Mr. Fox, Mr. Wyndham and Lord Grenville, though they disconnected the questions of the abolition of the trade and the extinction of slavery, evidently looked forward confidently to a future period, when the latter object would be effected. Mr. Fox said "the abolition of the slave trade will lead to the abolition of slavery in the West Indies." Mr. Wyndham said "that he wished for nothing more at present than the abolition of the slave trade, but he did not hesitate to say that when the proper period arrived, and the consent of other powers could be obtained for its abolition, slavery itself ought not to be suffered to exist amongst the institutions of any civilized state." Lord Grenville, on bringing forward his motion in 1807, said "that the first step from slavery to freedom was effected by the slaves becoming predial or attached to the land, and that from thence they ascended to liberty. I look forward to the period when the negroes of the West Indies, becoming laborers, will feel an interest in the welfare and prosperity of the country to which they are indebted for protection, and will be called on to share largely in defence of the islands in which they reside." He had read these extracts in order to show to the house that the feeling which now pervaded the country was of no temporary description, and that the imperative cry for the abolition of slavery was founded on a deep and settled conviction that it was consistent with religion, justice and also with sound policy, that this disgrace should not be suffered to remain part of our national system. Parliament had frequently confirmed the principle of the abolition of slavery. In 1823 Mr. Canning proposed his memorable resolutions, as an amendment to the motion of Mr. Buxton, which motion was, to all intents and purposes, similar in scope and principle to that which ministers were then about to submit to the consideration of parliament. Those resolutions received the unanimous support of that house, and they declared that parliament looked confidently forward, through the local legislatures adopting efficient measures of legislation, to the final termination of the system of colonial slavery too long in existence. They had more than eleven years' experience of the effect upon the colonial legislatures of that emphatic expression of the wishes and voice of parliament and the mother country, conveyed in the tone of friendly admonition, and strengthened by the voice of authority, and what was the result? The colonial legislatures were deaf to the voice of friendly expostulation, they seemed to set at defiance the voice of authority. They had doubtless, in some instances adopted regulations since 1823, calculated to ameliorate the physical condition of the slave, but it was vain to look to any of their enactments which on the face of it proposed to itself the termination of the system of negro slavery. Now it was important to bear in mind that without the hearty co-operation of the legislature, acting on what Mr. Burke emphatically called "the executory principle," it was idle to seek for the termination of the slavery system, unless through the means of the home legislature. The words of Mr. Burke were worth quoting. "I have heard," said he, speaking in 1790 of what the colonial legislatures had done, (in reference to the improvement of the condition of the negro), "they have done little, and that little is good for nothing, because it does not carry with it the executory principle." But to return, to see how far the colonial legislatures carried executory principle into effect in relation to the resolutions of parliament of 1823. In the course of that year Lord Bathurst, as colonial secretary, communicated to the crown colonies the wishes, intentions and determinations of parliament, with a view to their adopting such internal regulations, and effecting such modification of their existing domestic usages, as would attain the end contemplated by the mother country—namely, the total abolition of slavery, and the converting the negro into the condition of a free laborer. In the official circular of Lord Bathurst it was particularly stated that it was expected that immediate steps would be taken by the local authorities towards the abolition of the Sunday market, and the better observance of the Sabbath, for the admission of the evidence of slaves—for their manumission—for sanctioning slave marriages—for preventing slaves from being separated from their families—for the abolition of corporal punishment at the hands of the master or overseer—and for the establishment of slaves' savings-banks. The resolutions of 1823 were followed up by an order in council in 1824, which, in addition to these intentions of the legislature, added the establishment of a protector of slaves, specified the right of the negroes to possess property under certain conditions, and to demand his manumission upon certain terms, pecuniary and of police, even against the will of his master. How, then, were these resolutions of parliament in 1823, backed by the imperative command of an order in council, in 1824, received by the colonial legislatures? Not a colony, without a single exception, but scornfully rejected them, (hear, hear); not one colony but disdainfully refused to obey the suggestions and determination of parliament and the mother country. (Hear.) Well, matters thus remained—that is, the colonial legislatures persisted in setting the voice of parliament at defiance, till 1826, when Mr. Canning, the subject having been again brought under their consideration, expressed on the occasion his deep regret, and the deepest anxiety, and he, (Mr. Stanley), would add the deepest indignation, at the remissness of the colonial legislatures, in adopting the resolutions of 1823, and acting upon the order of council in 1824. Mr. Canning, however, did not adopt a harsh tone, though far from being satisfied with the result of the measures of 1823 and 1824. He did not call upon parliament to immediately adopt such measures as would bring the "contumacious opposition" of the colonial legislatures to the test, but thought that "a respite"—more time, ought to be extended to them for reconsidering their proceedings; and as a "test of their sincerity" to carry the determinations of parliament into effect, he proposed that certain draughts of bills should be sent out to them for their adoption. This respite Mr. Canning proposed avowedly as a "test of the sincerity" of the colonial legislature previous to calling upon parliament for its effective aid towards punishing its "contumacious opposition." Mr. Canning never for a moment questioned the right of parliament to thus effectively interfere with the colonies; but merely considered that right as an arcaneum imperii—a constitutional sanctuary, that should only be brought under the public eye in extreme cases. Parliament acted upon Mr. Canning's suggestions, and accordingly eight bills were sent to the colonies to be there legislatively and executively carried into effect, as so many means to the great end which the mother country had so much at heart—the final termination of the entire system of colonial slavery. What was the result? Not a single colony condescended to adopt a single bill out of the entire eight, (hear, hear); and the colonial legislatures raised their voices in lofty indignation at our interference in what they declared to be their exclusive business and concern. This took place in 1826: he was then addressing parliament in 1833; and up to that hour neither the voice of friendly expostulation nor of authority had produced the least alteration in the contumacious conduct of the colonial legislatures—not a single step had been taken by any of them with a view to the extinction of negro slavery. (Hear, hear.) Briefly, then, the account between the colonies and the government stood thus—

1823—Resolutions of Mr. Canning, which led to Lord Bathurst's circular: suggesting—

1. Abolition of Sunday markets.
2. Admission of slave evidence.
3. Sanctioning marriage.
4. Abolition of taxes on manumission.
5. Prevention of slave separation.
6. Regulation of punishments.
7. Establishment of savings-banks.

Strong remonstrances from the colonies.

1824—Order in council.

1. Added establishment of protector.
2. Prohibited Sunday labor.
3. Allowed slave property.
4. Compulsory manumission.

Recommended to legislatures and unanimously rejected—

(Hear, hear.)

1826—March 1st. Mr. Canning.

Test of sincerity.

Eight bills sent out and rejected by all but Nevis.

1828—Sir George Murray.

Two circulars-general.

Entirely disregarded—(Hear, hear.)

1830—Order in council, specifying some points, and declaring others to be necessary, as duration of labor, food, clothing, &c. Also disregarded—(Hear, hear.)

Undoubtedly some of the colonies had gone through the form of carrying the outline of the shadow of some of the bills into effect; but all had studiously avoided the substance, particularly in that important particular, the appointing as a protector of slaves some gentleman wholly unconnected with the colonies, having no property in slaves, and therefore no interest opposed to their moral and political improvement; and, in fact, merely instituted some partial modifications of their own domestic regulations as a mere pretext, by means of which they might elude the real intentions of the legislature. (Hear, hear.) The whole thing was on the face of it a mockery, an insolent mockery, of the wishes and feelings of the mother country. (Hear, hear.) It was true that in one or two of the colonies, as a substitute for the efficient office of protector of slaves, there was appointed what was called a "council of protection." But who constituted that council? Were they persons having no interest in the continuance of slavery, because deriving no profit from it? No, far from it; this "council of protection" of the rights and interests of the negro was composed of magistrates, (two being a council), themselves the possessors of slaves, and therefore having a direct unequivocal interest in the continuance of the present system, and as having this direct and unequivocal interest, imbued with all the prejudices and sinister feelings of slave proprietors. (Hear, hear.) In thus showing the mockery of the wishes and determination of parliament, perpetrated by the colonial legislatures, he did not mean to slur over the few beneficial regulations which one or two of them had made in reference to Sunday markets, and the observance of the Sabbath. They did not, however, by any means, even in this item fully comply with the expressed wishes of the mother country, but certainly evinced a readiness to act upon the spirit of the recommendation respecting the Sabbath. But how was it with respect to the other recommendations of the order in council of 1824? It would be evidently impossible for him to go through the details of all these recommendations—though he was prepared to show that all the colonial legislatures had slighted and set at nought the recommendations of parliament, if any gentleman was anxious to examine the question minutely, so that he would confine himself to the more prominent ones—those involving some principle which might serve as a "test of their sincerity" to promote the views of the mother country. He would begin with the recommendation respecting corporal punishment. The order in council explicitly laid it down that no slave should receive more than a certain amount of corporal punishment (39 lashes) in one day; that female bodily punishment should be abolished altogether, and that a registry of all punishments, crimes, &c. should be kept by the master and overseer, to be submitted to the protector of slaves, who was then to make his report to the colonial secretary. How were these recommendations acted upon by the colonial legislatures? Here, at least, was a definite and tangible test of their sincerity. Here were recommendations, one of which especially came recommended by every principle and feeling dear to humane nature, so that if there existed, on their part, the slightest disposition to co-operate with parliament in the amelioration of the condition of the negro, here was a graceful opportunity. If there was any one recommendation which appeared more than another to the manhood, the humanity, the honor of the colonial legislatures, it surely was that of the abolition of the corporal punishment of female slaves. (Hear, hear.) It was with a spirit, God knew, not of bitterness, but of deep regret and sorrow, that he had to state that up to that very hour not a single colony had abolished the practice of the corporal punishment of female slaves. (Loud cries of "hear.") In some of them, it was true, certain restrictions had been imposed, but in those very restrictions the principle of the right and justice of the punishment was distinctly recognized; and in others, where some regulations respecting the decency of the sex were adopted, the practice was unequivocally maintained. Talk of improving the social habits of the negro as a means and essential condition of his political improvement—talk of developing and cultivating his moral faculties, in the face of this monstrous abomination (cheers)—talk of inducing a habit of respect and reverence for the laws, of teaching him to behold in his white master a guardian, a moral guide, an intellectual instructor, while his wife, daughter, or sister, was at the mere mercy, the wanton caprice, of some overseer, who might any moment inflict on that wife, daughter, or sister, degrading bodily punishment on her bare person (continued cheers)—talk, he repeated, of their improving the negro as a moral being and as a subject of the laws, while they themselves perpetuated a practice, the test of barbarism, of fierce brutal savagery—that test which separated the civilized man from the barbarian—the inhuman treatment of women (great cheering)! How could a negro with such degrading and demoralizing facts staring him in the face, improve as a moral being, and a member of political society? (Hear, hear.) The supposition was a mockery—a cruel insult. (Cheers.) Connected with the subject of the corporal punishment of the negro, he would refer them to the regulations of the Jamaica legislature. He had stated that 39 lashes were the maximum of bodily punishment that could be inflicted upon one slave in one day; but what was this without some check or restraint upon the person who might inflict this restricted amount of punishment? They had the evidence of a gentleman (whose name he did not then recollect) who had been himself an overseer, that he "might inflict 39 lashes if he liked, merely for looking at him in the face." (Hear, hear.) Was this the way to teach the negro to respect the British laws, to prepare him for the immunities of a British subject? Was it thus that he was to be enabled to take his stand amongst the human race? Was it thus that he was (to quote the words of Mr. Canning) to be taught—

"Celumque tueri

"Jussus, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus?"

How—how, he would ask, in the name of common sense and common humanity, could it be expected that the moral eye should be trained to the contemplation of moral beauties while the physical eye was daily outraged by the sight of the sufferings and degradation of their negro fellow-beings? He did not himself believe that this arbitrary power of inflicting bodily punishment on the negro was wantonly abused by the master, but he must deprecate its very possibility, and still more must he loudly condemn the mockery of redress which was held out to slaves who might feel themselves unjustifiably punished. Was the committee aware of the means which the negro had of redressing himself if wrongfully punished? He might go before two magistrates—not, mark, a protector of slaves, having no property in slaves nor interest in the continuance of the abuses of the present system—but two magistrates, themselves slave proprietors, and therefore interested in publishing slave delinquency and slave contumacy. If these two disinterested gentlemen agreed that the slave had established his case, and could substantiate it before a jury by valid evidence, they permitted him forthwith to go before a jury; but if the slave could not bring forward what these gentlemen conceived to be valid evidence, he was encouraged to seek for justice at the risk of being again flogged if he failed in his evidence. (Hear, hear.) And this was, in cruel mockery, called "the slave's redress against the cruelties of his master." This was his encouragement to seek for the protection of the law against a slave proprietor! (Loud cries of "hear.") But even that was not all. Suppose on the other hand, that the slave had established, by evidence, a case of cruelty against his master; what was his redress now in Jamaica? Why, he was sold to some other tender proprietor, and the proceeds were handed over to the cruel master against whom he had, at such risk, obtained a verdict. Then, again, with respect to negro property, though the order in council of 1824 distinctly specified the right of the slave to enjoy property, under certain defined circumstances, the several local legislatures so multiplied restrictions and qualifications that the order in council, so well intended and sound in principle, was in most of the colonies altogether nugatory and inefficient. He had forgotten to state that some of the colonies had facilitated, or rather removed obstacles in the way of negro marriage; but the regulations on this head were chiefly of a physical character, and the negro entered the marriage state without being made previously aware of the moral and religious obligations of the state of wedlock. The next point he would call their attention to was that of slave evidence, in reference to which the proceedings of the colonial legislatures were characterised by the same spirit of scorn and mockery that he had been pointing out in relation to the recommendations and order in council of 1823 and 1824. The order in council prescribed that the evidence of slaves should in all cases be admissible in courts of justice, care being taken, as in the case of infants and persons of imperfect intellect and education, that the negro (a full grown infant to all practical intents) should be thoroughly examined, and proved to understand the obligation of an oath and the effects of his evidence, the onus of disproving his competency being thrown on the party against whom he sought redress. How was this just and wholesome rule followed by the colonial legislatures? In but two of them (as we understood the right honorable gentleman) was slave evidence admissible at all, and in none against his master, or against a white. (Hear, hear.) Even against a fellow-slave a certificate of a magistrate or a clergyman, according to circumstances, was necessary to his being permitted to give evidence.

He had stated that a slave could not give evidence under any circumstances against his master—(loud cries of "hear")—nor in any capital case against a white man.—(Hear.) Now, in the name of common justice, and our common nature, how could it be justified that evidence might be given which would bring a negro to the scaffold, and yet refused against a white man even in a civil case? Either the evidence in the former case was valid, or it was not. If it was, why should the white master be beyond its reach; if it was not, why should the fellow slave be its victim? He had stated that, as a general proposition, no slave evidence could tell against a white man. There was an exception, which, however, but strengthened the rule—a negro's evidence would be received against a white man in any case in which a white might be alleged to co-operate as an accomplice with a black in any resistance of a master's oppression; but in no other case save one, involving an attack upon another white, was a slave's evidence admissible. And this, again, was justice, and teaching the slave to reverence the law, and to revere the white man as a moral guide.—(Cheers.) The negro was taught, and painfully made to feel, that though his evidence might hang a brother slave, it could not affect a white man's property to the extent of a shilling, and yet he was discontented with the tender mercies of this white protector! Was not the whole system, he repeated, a cruel mockery?—(Hear, hear.) The last point on which he would comment, in relation to the order in council of 1824, was the manumission of the slave—a principle which alone protected him against the effects of despair by gilding the horizon of even of his blackest fortunes with the bright beams of hope, and the expectation of days of freedom, ease and independence. The order in council laid it down that the slave should be entitled to demand his manumission on the payment of a certain sum to his master. In all the colonies, with the honorable exception of the Bahamas, this order in council was very partially effective; though he admitted in some of them improvements and facilities had been adopted with respect to the fees on manumission, but in none (save the Bahamas) was the slave's right to demand his manumission, on the payment of the stipulated price practically recognized, the power and discretion being entirely vested with the master. Having thus briefly touched upon the various heads under which the orders in council of 1824, and the resolutions of parliament in 1823 and 1826, were applied to the West India colonies, he would leave it to the house to judge for itself how far those colonies had manifested a disposition to carry the wishes and determination of the mother country into effect, confident that there would be but one opinion—namely, that if ever there was a case which justified the exercise of the paramount authority of parliament, it was when, as in the present case, every means of friendly remonstrance and authoritative warning had been exhausted in vain. (Hear.) He would here read a passage bearing on this point from a speech of Mr. Canning, delivered in 1799, in answer to sir William Young. "The hon. baronet contended that the colonial assemblies, and not the British house of commons, were the agents most proper to be employed. But what was the hon. baronet's argument? 'Trust not the masters of slaves in what concerns legislation for slavery!—However specious their laws may appear, depend upon it they must be ineffectual in their application.—It is in the nature of things that they should be so.' Granted," said Mr. Canning in reply. "Let, then, the British house of commons do their part themselves! Let them not delegate the trust of doing it to those who, according to the hon. baronet's testimony, cannot execute that trust fairly. Let the evils of the slave trade be remedied by an assembly of free-men, by the government of a free people, and not by those whom the hon. baronet represents as utterly unqualified for the undertaking, nor by the masters of slaves! Their laws, the hon. baronet had avowed, could never reach, could never cure the evil. So that, according to the hon. baronet's argument, if there had even been no doubt upon the face of the papers upon the table, of the sincere intention of the colonial assemblies to carry the wishes of this country into effect—if there had been no doubt that the termination of the trade was the object for which the regulations (such as they may be) were intended—if there had been no doubt that these regulations were, in fact, calculated for the purpose—if the assembly of Jamaica had professed as distinctly its anxiety to terminate the trade, as, in point of fact, it had expressed its resolution to continue it—still, according to the hon. baronet's argument, no trust could be reposed in these professions and appearances. There was something in the nature of absolute authority in the relation between master and slave which made despotism, in all cases and under all circumstances, an incompetent and unsure executor even of its own provisions in favor of the objects of its power." Could any language be more applicable, or sentiments more appropriate to their present purpose of abolishing slavery, than these words of Mr. Canning in reference to the abolition of the slave trade? If, in 1799, Mr. Canning thought parliament justified in interfering in its paramount character, surely the experience of 34 succeeding years did not invalidate that paramount authority? He did not pretend to then enter minutely or discuss gravely the constitutional question where the right of parliament to interfere in the internal regulations of the colonies began, or where it terminated. He knew of no law or boundary line which restricted the united parliament, save such as it imposed for the time being itself; and he left it to those (if such there were) who held that parliament did not possess the paramount right of interference, to point out in what charter of what colonial assembly was there an exception to this imperial legislative control—and to show by reasons and argument that a delegated authority could or should exceed in its power and privilege the delegating authority to which it owed its existence. It was true that in 1778 parliament did formerly restrict itself in reference to the internal regulations of such colonies as had a colonial legislature, but that was not an abandoning of its paramount power so to interfere, but suspending or rather delegating it under certain expressed conditions, and for a definite purpose. It did not even then cease to interfere in the regulations of trade in those colonies, and on no occasion which called for its internal interference did it hesitate to exercise its authority. It acted on the principle of internal interference in 1700, (as we understand), when a commission was sent out to the colonies to try cases of piracy and robbery on the high seas, which commission superseded all the local tribunals, including their local legislatures, under the penalties in the event of their attempting to interfere with the working of the commission. Then in 1733 a petition was presented in that house from merchants trading with Virginia and Jamaica, complaining that the local legislatures of those colonies had exempted slaves, houses and other property from executions for debt. It would be impossible to cite a case more strongly involving the principle of paramount legislative interference in the internal affairs of our colonies than this petition.

The board of trade tried at first to induce the colonial legislatures themselves to abolish those exemptions; but they failing, an act was passed the 5th of Geo. II. which declared houses, slaves, &c. to be liable like other colonial property, to executions for debt. He felt unwilling to trouble the house by citing instances of the interference of the mother country in the internal affairs of the colonies, but could not avoid referring them to the doctrine laid down on this head by Mr. Otis, the president of Massachusetts, in 1765. The right hon. gentleman here read a passage from the manifesto of Mr. Otis, to the effect that "the mother country possessed the right, and was bound to exercise it, of interfering in the regulation of all its colonies and dependencies for the good of the whole—that she alone was the judge of the propriety and time of this interference—and that from her final determination there was no appeal." (Hear, hear.) He could not be charged with having confined himself to the precedents of England after this declaration of an American. But here he thought it right to observe that many hon. members permitted themselves to be led away by an assertion frequently urged by the more zealous advocates of what was called the planters' interest. It had been said by these gentlemen that if the colonies had been left alone, and to their own internal government, all would have gone on smooth and well between the master and the slave—that both would have been happy and prosperous, but for the perpetual agitation of the question of negro slavery in this country, which had so tainted West India property as to seriously lower the planter's profits and thereby tend to the injury of the slave. Now, no man was more sensible than he was of the depth of distress in which West India property was just now placed, as no man was more aware of the strong colors in which that distress had been portrayed by the holders of that property themselves. He did not mean to accuse these representations as being exaggerated, and highly colored for the occasion, and therefore would receive the picture as they themselves had drawn it, prepared, however, to maintain that it had no connexion whatever with the proceedings of parliament since 1823, to which he had just called their attention. The right hon. gentleman here read a statement put forth by the West India interest, from which it appeared that the mass of West India property was mortgaged, and that the mortgagees were afraid to foreclose, lest they should become, unhappily, themselves proprietors of West India property. Now, he repeated, he did not mean to deny the truth of this statement; all that he begged to direct the attention of the house to was the period when it was issued. What then, was that period? Was this picture drawn of the state of the West Indies since 1823? Was this a picture of the state of the colonies since the abolition of the slave trade in 1807? Was it a picture of the ruin entailed on the property of the West India planters by the efforts of the abolitionists to suppress the slave trade, and put an end to the system of slavery? Did it refer to a period subsequent to 1823? No! This picture of unmitigated distress—of annihilated credit—of ruined hopes—and of the impossibility of continuing the cultivation of the soil, referred to the high and palmy days of the slave trade, and was contained in a report of a committee of the house of assembly of Jamaica, dated November, 1804. (Hear, hear, hear.) Such was the account given at that time of the condition of the West Indian colonies, by the very class of men who now declared that all their distress was owing to one single cause—the fanatical agitation in the British parliament, which threw a taint on their property in 1823. (Hear, hear, hear.) Equally strong evidence had been given before the committee of the house of commons, proving that the West India property had always been liable to sudden and extreme fluctuations; speculations had been embarked in with the utmost recklessness; which had been the cause of the greatest embarrassment to the planters, who acting upon the notion of the necessity of continuing slavery, had only increased their distress by the means which they adopted for their own relief. It was thought important to continue the exportation of sugar, and the consequence was that the quantity exported, which in 1803 was 1,430,000 cwt. was in 1831 raised to 3,787,000 cwt. One cause of the distress of the West India planters was, that possessing the monopoly of the English market, they had gone beyond its wants; and they could now no longer obtain such a price as would repay them for the cultivation of their estates. The amount of sugar imported at present exceeded the amount of consumption by 1,000,000 cwt. annually. (Hear, hear.) The consequence of this enormous excess of supply over the demand was, that the monopoly was, as respected the planters, a dead letter; and the price of the produce in this country was necessarily regulated by the price of the same article in the European markets. Nothing therefore could effectually relieve their distress short of enabling the consumption of that country to come up to the produce of the colonies, or of reducing the amount of production in the colonies to the amount of consumption in this country. New soils and new lands had been brought into cultivation, and the consequence of this was, that additional expense was thrown on the cultivators of the old soils. To meet their engagements, and to enable them to pay their debts, they were compelled for the same amount of money to raise a still larger amount of produce. The increased amount of produce diminished the price which the article bore, and thus running continually in a vicious circle, one embarrassment led to expedients to give temporary relief, which, in the course of events had only the effect of doubling the evil. (Cheers.) It was not his intention to have gone into this part of the question, but he was led to notice it in consequence of the assertion, which was so frequently made, that the distress of the planters was the fruit of agitation alone, and not the necessary result of the state of slavery, and the system of cultivation, he would not say adopted willingly by the present proprietors, but forced upon them by circumstances. But supposing that agitation were the cause and only cause of the present distress among the West Indian proprietors, he turned round again and asked "where is your remedy?" It was very well to say "we will exclude from the island all knowledge of what passes elsewhere," but he would tell them that they could not do that. (Hear, hear.) They could not prevent the voice of the country being heard within the walls of that house; they could not prevent the debates within those walls from being read throughout the country; they could not prevent the report of those debates spreading far and wide; they could not prevent the knowledge of what was going on in this country from reaching the colonies themselves, and from penetrating into the minds of the slaves, aggravated by the incautious comments and language which they found applied to those debates. If, therefore, they wished to stop this agitation, and put an end to this danger, their only course was to advance. (Cheers.) They must remove the cause of agitation and of complaint, the voice of which was now heard, and would continue to be heard as long as the house of commons did not, in accordance with the wishes of the country, take decided and effectual measures for declaring that the system of slavery should cease. (Cheers.) If he should be told that the course he was taking was unsafe, and that, indeed, there was no course he could pursue which was not full of danger to the colonies and this country, he would reply, that of all the dangerous plans that could be adopted, the most likely to entail ruin and destruction on the colonies and the mother country, was the system, now happily impracticable of standing still at the present juncture, instead of at once acting fearlessly and decidedly. (Cheers.) This was not the only case in which the best mode of avoiding difficulties was boldly to face and grapple with them, and in which a timid attempt to shrink from the danger they were afraid to meet, and appalled to look at, only aggravated the reality of that danger, and rendered it impossible for them successfully to cope with it. (Cheers.) Various objections had been raised against any precipitate and hasty measure; indeed, against the taking of any steps for the conversion of the slave population into a population of freemen. In the first place, it was said that the effect of any such measure would be greatly to diminish the amount of production, and to render the cultivation of sugar impracticable. The colonies would consequently be thrown up, and the planters involved in absolute ruin. Now, as far as the amount of the production of sugar was concerned, he was not certain that it would not be for the benefit of the planters and the colonies in the end, if that production, were in some degree diminished. But the question for the members of that house to consider was, whether, looking at the statements which he should have the honor to lay before them—and he should state facts and figures which could not be denied—they would encourage and support a system by which this extent and amount of production was kept up.

He would cautiously abstain, as far as the nature of the case allowed—at least such was his intention—from using any irritating expressions, or of availing himself of any popular topic of declamation, his object being to have this question deliberately and calmly discussed, rather than to excite the feelings of the house by statements of individual cases, which would prejudice the general question, and only tend to an acrimonious discussion; and he trusted that every gentleman who followed him in the debate would so far do justice to the subject under consideration as to abstain from quoting individual cases. (Hear, hear.) But it was his duty to lay before the house papers with respect to the production of sugar, the labor exacted to produce it, and its effect on the population, which he believed would produce such a strong impression as to induce the house to believe that the time was now come when, for the sake of humanity alone, they ought to step in for the purpose of limiting and regulating the extent to which the slave was at present called on to labor. (Hear, hear.) He held in his hand a comparative statement, with reference to six West India colonies, showing the decrease or increase of the slave population, and the amount of the production of sugar within those islands during the same period. The account was extracted from an official statement in the triennial registry, and was, therefore, open to no objection on the score of inaccuracy. Allowance was made in it for every importation and exportation, and for every manumission; it gave the apparent, and also the real increase and decrease, during three periods of three years—namely, from June 1823 to June 1826; from June 1826 to June 1829, and from June 1829 to June 1832; and likewise the average amount of the slave population and of the production of sugar during the same periods. He ought, however, to state, that with respect to the last period all the returns had not yet been made. He found by this document that, with two exceptions, and even they bore out the statement—in all those islands there had been a gradual increase in the production of sugar, and a corresponding gradual decrease in the amount of the laboring population. (Hear, hear.)

In the island of Jamaica the average quantity of sugar annually exported was, for the first period 1,358,448 cwt. for the second, 1,389,576 cwt. and for the third, 1,410,626 cwt. The number of the slave population was, during the first period, 334,393, and during the second, 327,464. The return of the number in the third period had not yet been completed. The island of Demarara afforded a frightful proof of the destructive effects which the amount of labor compelled from the slaves had on the population. In that island the quantity of sugar exported during the three periods was, respectively, 652,336 cwt. 662,655 cwt. and 806,120 cwt. while the slave population had constantly decreased during the same periods. In the first the number was 72,722; in the second, 71,005; and in the third only 67,741. (Hear, hear.) Thus in the last period 67,741 slaves produced 806,120 cwt. of sugar, while in the first 72,722 slaves were required to produce 652,336 cwt. (Hear.) In Barbice the slave population amounted in the first period to 22,074 in the second to 21,246, and in the third it had decreased to 20,831; while the exportation of sugar during the corresponding periods amounted to 58,655 cwt. 64,230 cwt. and 94,312 cwt. showing a frightful increase in the production compared with the amount of the population. (Hear, hear.) The account with respect to St. Lucia, showed a similar result. The number of the population the first period was 13,909; during the second, 13,860; and during the third, 13,687; while the amount of sugar exported was, during the first period, 77,976 cwt. during the second, 87,410 cwt. and during the third, 88,778 cwt. In these four islands, therefore, the amount of the negro population had fallen, while the amount of production had gone on continually increasing. (Hear.) He had mentioned that there were two exceptions, and these were the islands of Trinidad and Barbadoes. In the former there had been a trifling increase in the population as well as in the amount of production; but it must be taken into consideration that there was a great influx of free laborers into this island from the Spanish main. With respect to Barbadoes, the amount of sugar exported during the first period was, 320,795 cwt. and during the second 290,456 cwt. while the population was during the same periods respectively 79,648 and 81,347. He therefore conceived that he had proved as plainly as could be done by figures, that whenever there was a forced increase in the production of sugar, whether occasioned by the distress of the planters, or by any other cause, it was necessarily attended by a sacrifice of human life, and a diminution of the slave population. (Hear, hear.) He could not help reading another statement with respect to Demarara, which placed in a more striking view the frightful effect which this forced increase in the production had on human life. The statement to which he alluded pointed out the age, quality and strength of the slaves, on whom this great mortality had fallen. He might perhaps be told that the decrease which had taken place in the slave population was the not yet-recovered-from effect of the stoppage of the slave trade. But he found in this document that there was a decrease in the number of children under ten years of age, which could only be accounted for in one way—the increased labor and diminished productiveness of the parents. As compared with 1817, there was a decrease in the number of slaves under the age of 40, of 23,644; and between the ages of 30 and 40, the time at which labor was most severe, the present population, as compared with its amount in the same year, had experienced a diminution of 11,653; while, on the other hand, an increase had taken place in the number of the slaves, who had passed that age, and were considered unequal to any great labor. He did not think that he need add anything to this statement, (hear, hear), but if it were necessary for him to do so, he could refer to returns, which had been carefully examined, and which showed the decrease of population on cattle farms to be 2 per cent. among unattached slaves, $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on coffee farms, 3 1-10 per cent. and on sugar plantations $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. (Hear, hear.) On cotton plantations there had been no decrease, but an increase of 1 6-10 per cent.

He had now shown that increased production was accompanied by decreased population: that the decrease of population fell heaviest on those classes from whom the severest labor was exacted; and he had now only to show the mode in which this labor was exacted by the increased severity; the recorded punishments in Demarara were 17,359, the number of slaves being 60,599. In 1830, the number of slaves had decreased to 59,547, while the number of punishments had increased to 18,324, and the number of lashes inflicted in that year was no less than 194,744. In 1831, the population had still further decreased to 58,404, but the punishments had increased to 21,656, and the number of lashes amounted to 199,507. (Hear, hear.) Now, let the house bear in mind, that this was the official record of punishment, not including the punishment inflicted by judicial authority; or on reference to magistrates, because there existed no return of this latter sort, but inflicted in one of the crown colonies, under the improved system, and under the check of the record. (Hear, hear.) It was a return given by the masters of the slaves themselves, of the extent of despotic and irresponsible punishment, inflicted by their own authority, amounting in one to almost 200,000 lashes. (Hear, hear.) Without desiring to impute any cruelty to the planters, he called on the house to consider what must be the amount of unrecorded punishment in colonies where the same protection was not afforded the slave, as in this comparatively free colony of Demarara, and what the extent of unredressed injustice, and of bitter oppression; and he was sure that the house would not refuse to interfere, and to interpose its supreme authority between the oppression of the slaves and what Mr. Canning called "the abstract love of the cart-whip." (Hear, hear.) They were told that it would be impossible, under any other system, to render slaves industrious; thus, all their legislation proceeded on a mistaken notion; that they knew not the condition of the colonies, and that they were absolutely ignorant of what those gentlemen pleased to call the "negro character." He conscientiously believed that any man who chose to take the pains of informing himself upon the subject, might form a better and clearer idea, because a more unprejudiced one, of the "negro character," than those men who had passed their lives in the West Indies. (Hear, hear.) The latter individuals made this palpable mistake: they attributed to the character of the negro those faults which necessarily resulted from the moral degradation of slavery. He believed that it might be proved, that the negro under proper inducements, would be found neither less inclined to be industrious or to accumulate property than those whose lot it was to wear a fairer skin. (Hear, hear.) But they were told with an air of triumph, to look at the manumitted negro; and they were asked to point out, if they could, twenty instances of manumitted slaves engaged in field labor. In reply to this objection he would ask another question; and he called upon those objectors to produce him twenty instances of field laborers who had been manumitted. (Hear, hear.) The fact was, that the manumitted slaves mostly belonged to one class, and that not the class of field laborers. Within a period of ten years, commencing in 1817, there had been 14,163 slaves manumitted, and hardly an instance could be produced of a field negro among the number. (Hear, hear.) Two-thirds, if not three-fourths, were females, a fact which spoke for itself; for it was not difficult to understand to what class of females they belonged, and what inducement the planters had to liberate them as well as their children. (Hear, hear.) If it could be proved the manumissions occurred only among domestic slaves, mechanics and tradesmen, it was not extraordinary that no case could be discovered of their applying themselves immediately on their manumission to the most degrading and fatiguing occupation of field labor. (Hear.) The fact of the case, then, destroyed the inference which was sought to be drawn from it. (Hear, hear.) If an instance was shown of a manumitted field slave who would not work, he would then admit that a prima facie case was made out by those who asserted the incapacity of the negro for freedom; but if this argument was good for any thing—if it was to be considered conclusive, it was an argument against the abolition of slavery within any definite period—not merely within the next 10 years but within the next 100 years. (Cheers.)

It was said that the slaves were at present unfit for freedom, because they had no domestic ties, and no habits of industry; and that they would be utterly ruined if thrown on the world to act for themselves. Continue them, then, it was said, in a state of slavery until they were fit for liberty. His answer was, that they would be kept in a state of unfreedom; that they would be debared from acquiring industrious habits and the ties of family; and they would be told that they must on those accounts remain in a state of slavery. (Hear, hear.) It was also said that they were unfitted for a participation in the blessings of liberty because they had no education, no religious feelings, but were ignorant and brutal. If this charge was just, on whom did the guilt fall? (Hear, hear.) Who was to blame that the negro was still ignorant, if so he was, and that he lacked industrious habits? Was it not those who regarded him from the childhood to the grave, and from generation to generation, as a mere laboring animal, who took no pains to cultivate his mind and raise his moral feelings; nay, more, (and he spoke it to the shame of a Christian age and a professedly Christian country), who were permitted to deprive the negro of the means of religious instruction, because they feared it was incompatible with the maintenance of a state of slavery. (Hear, hear.) But assuming that religious instruction was inconsistent with the continuance of slavery, would that house shut out the light of gospel truth, and stifle education on purpose that at all hazards and at all risks the system of slavery might be preserved? (Cheers.) He believed that from the state of most of the colonies belonging to other countries they might draw a lesson of deep censure to themselves. In the Catholic colonies the greatest attention had been paid by the priesthood to the religious instruction and education of the slaves. In some of these colonies it was a regulation that no man should be at liberty to keep a slave, unless he could prove that he had taken pains to instruct him in the principles of the Catholic religion. Had any such system prevailed in the English colonies. (Hear, hear.) He had no wish to touch on any point of an irritating nature, nor to refer further to the obstacles which had been put in the way of the spread of religious instruction in the colonies; but this he would say, that that house would ill discharge its duty if it did not put forth its authoritative declaration, that throughout all the possessions of his majesty the benefit of religious instruction, and the free choice of religious worship, should be left undisputed to all classes of the king's subjects. (Cheers.) In contradiction of the assertion that the habits of voluntary industry were denied by nature to the negro, he begged to refer to the evidence given before the committee by Mr. Lovell, himself a man of color, and originally, he believed, a slave. [The right honorable gentleman here read a short extract from the evidence of Mr. Lovell, to the effect, that a number of liberated negroes in Antigua had worked for themselves with great industry, had accumulated some little property, and purchased dwelling houses.] He would also appeal in support of his argument to the experience of a gallant admiral in that house, who knew, from personal observation, that free labor in Barbadoes had been attended with a similarly good result. Dismissing St. Domingo from his consideration, because he did not think, when the peculiar situation of that island was looked to, arising out of the revolution which occurred in that place, it could be fairly taken into the argument, though he could state that sugar was cultivated to a great extent even there; he would afford to the house the only practical example which the world allowed of the emancipation of a slave population effected on a large scale, and with comparatively entire success. Since the plan of government had been before the country, he had had an opportunity of conversing with the vice president of the republic of Venezuela, who had been a protector of slaves in the Caraccas, on the subject; and he learned from that gentleman that in 1821, Bolivar having determined on adopting a general system of emancipation, a council was formed of persons of high station, to purchase, according to a tariff of value, the freedom of slaves out of funds raised from a tax on the property of persons dying intestate. They first of all liberated those who had borne arms in the cause of their country, next the aged and decrepid, and afterwards they preferred such as were remarkable for industrious and moral habits. In 1821 there were 100,000 slaves in Venezuela, and at the present moment there were only 25,000. The effect of the manumission, he was told, had been most happy. The freed slaves were industrious and felt no degradation in associating with those who had not yet gained their liberty; while on the part of those there was no jealousy, because they felt that their hour of freedom was approaching surely, though perhaps slowly. The freed slaves had no reluctance to engage in agricultural employment; and the consequence was, that the agriculture of the country was increasing in prosperity every day. He was also informed that sugar cane which before was not cultivated, was now produced in great abundance; and that rum was exported to the neighboring islands, and to the British possessions of Trinidad, and sold in the Trinidad market, under the name of the best Jamaica rum. (Hear, hear.) Having stated what he conceived to be the circumstances under which the question was now placed—the circumstances which rendered it impossible for us to stand still, and which also made it impossible for us to proceed onwards without incurring some danger, the events which had recently taken place in the colonies, the repugnance of the colonial legislatures to take any effectual measures, and the necessity which existed for parliament's proceeding cautiously and gradually, but firmly and resolutely, to the complete and final attainment of the one great object, which the country now had at heart—he meant the ultimate extinction of colonial slavery—having stated all this he would now proceed to lay before the committee the means by which, in his opinion the great transition from slavery to freedom might be effected with the most certainty and the least danger. He would preface the statement which he was going to make by observing that the vote to which he should call upon the house to come that evening, would not, of necessity lead any member to acquiesce in all the details of the plan which it would be his duty forthwith to submit to their consideration. Those details would sketch the outline of the proposal which it was now his business to make to the house, but which in its future progress would be susceptible of much modification and amendment. He held, that in a plan of this kind, embracing objects so important and so various, there was an absolute impossibility that any government could devise a measure which in all its parts should be unexceptionable—which should not be liable to many great and grave objections, and which should not be capable of receiving many amendments from the advocates of the different interests which would be affected by it. He thought that by submitting it to their calm and dispassionate consideration, and by endeavoring to reconcile the conflicting interests and claims to which it was likely to give rise, they would be enabled to accomplish the hallowed object of extinguishing slavery in every country which owed allegiance to the British crown. The honorable member for Weymouth, in the year 1823, had made a proposal to this effect—that, after a period to be limited by law, the children of all slaves born in the British plantations should be declared free. That was the extent to which the proposal of the honorable member for Weymouth then went. He stated that that was all he wanted, that he asked for nothing more—that it would be the consummation, the full consummation, of all his wishes. He had even gone so far as to declare that that proposal, if carried, would secure the speedy extinction of slavery. The memorable expression which the honorable member for Weymouth had then employed, was this: "I call upon you not to go back, but to abstain from going forward—call upon you not to retrace your steps, but not to advance them—I call upon you to make no further slaves, and I demand that every child, hereafter born of slave parents in any part of the British dominions, should be entitled, from the hour of his birth, to all the rights and privileges of a freeman." Now, to the entire and full extent of what the honorable member for Weymouth, in the year 1823, declared to be the consummation of his wishes, his majesty's government were now prepared to go (hear, hear); but under certain limitations, which they had devised to avoid the danger which was no less distinctly than eloquently pointed out by Mr. Canning, in the speech which he delivered on this question in the year 1822. Mr. Canning argued—"What! will you consent to place the future generation in a situation so much more enviable than that in which you place the present generation? Will you consent to elevate the child by the degradation of the parent? Will you, as it were, invert the feelings which ought to subsist between the parent and the child, by saying that the child shall be entitled to its freedom from the hour of its birth, but that the parent shall be condemned to the hour of his death to a state of hopeless, irremediably, irretrievable slavery?" The house on that occasion, felt the force of the argument which Mr. Canning addressed to it, and left both parent and child in the same degraded and degrading state of slavery. He (Mr. Stanley) trusted that the house would also feel the force of that argument now, but in a different point of view. He trusted that it would feel that it was not safe to stand still, either for the present or future generation (hear, hear); and that it would say to the planters, "you must not only declare the children born hereafter of slave parents to be free, you must also manumit the existing generation." (Cheers.) But while he would in this manner provide freedom for the existing generation—while he would thus provide that the young negro should be born a freeman, and that the old negro should not feel himself condemned to the horrors of irremediably slavery—he would not at once, by one hasty act of legislation, remove all the shackles by which the slave was at present bound. He would not fling him from a state of unrelieved and unmitigated slavery into a state of absolute and unrestricted freedom, for which his past habits and his past feelings had rendered him totally unfit. But in saying this, did he mean to say that the slaves were to remain as they now were for 1, 3, 5 or 10 years, and that then they should be free unconditionally and without reserve? Perhaps he might see more danger in that course than other gentlemen did; but certainly as at present advised, he was not inclined to adopt it, for he thought that a period in which the slave was left in such an undefined, unlimited and uncertain condition, would be a period of anxious irritation to all parties—that it would be a period of great excitement, and probably of much danger, above all, that it would be a period of unmitigated authority on the part of the master, and of determined and irresponsible disobedience on the part of the slave. (Cries of hear, hear.) He proposed what he considered to be a middle, and, therefore, a safer course, which, while it got rid at once swoop of all the restrictions which had been woven by the colonial legislatures to fetter the rights which they professed to give, would leave the negro at liberty to benefit by the exertion of his own talents and his own industry—would give him an incentive to regularity and assiduity, and would afford him an opportunity of forming those habits of frugal labor, of which at present he stood much in need. He proposed that every negro should from that day—or perhaps he ought to have said from the day in which this act should be passed—be entitled forthwith to claim to be put in such a situation as would entitle him hereafter to claim all the rights and privileges of a freeman—a situation in which he would no longer bear about him any taint of a servile condition—in which he would be released from all dread of irresponsible corporal punishment—in which he would be in the full enjoyment of all his domestic ties and comforts—in which he would not be compelled to see his nearest and dearest connexions insulted by the whip, or by the threat of the whip—in which his evidence would be received in all courts of justice, either for or against his employer, as freely as that of any of his majesty's subjects—in which his right to property, acquired or bequeathed, would be full and undisputed—in which he would enjoy every privilege of a freeman, subject only to this restriction, that he should be under a contract to labor for a certain time industriously for his present owner, who would then only be his employer. (Hear, hear.) Perhaps it would be as well for him (Mr. Stanley) to meet here the objection—"How will you deal with the multitudinous restrictions with which the colonial legislature has fettered the slave?" He would sweep away all those restrictions at once by declaring the negro a freeman. From the moment he was declared a freeman, the restrictions which applied to him as a slave would cease to apply to him in his capacity of a freeman. The negro, being no longer a slave, would be entitled to contract marriage—his evidence would be indisputable—his right to property would be admitted—he would be entitled to seek the religious instructor he liked best—and, in a word, as he (Mr. Stanley) had said before, he would enjoy every privilege of a freeman, upon the condition of consenting to labor for a given time upon a particular soil.

He could not believe that if the matter merely stood thus, this proposition could be considered such an infraction on the freedom of labor as would hold out a temptation, even to the sturdiest advocate of unqualified emancipation, to hesitate in giving his assent to the boon of freedom, coupled as it was with these restrictions; for any man of common reflection must see, that under this system slavery must in a few years vanish from the king's dominions. He called upon the house to contrast the condition of the agricultural laborer in this country with the condition in which the negro laborer would be placed under this new system. In England the agricultural laborer worked hard for a pittance which, God knew, was scanty enough; he was distracted with cares for the subsistence of his wife and family; he labored diligently and hardly, in order to earn a sum which was barely sufficient to provide him with food and clothing. Now what was the condition in which the resolutions which he held in his hand would place the negro laborer? He would be made to enter into a contract, by which his master would be bound to give him food and clothing, and such allowances as were now made to him by law, or to give him in lieu thereof a pecuniary allowance. For this consideration he would be called upon to work for his master three-fourths of his time, leaving it to be settled between them whether that should be for three-fourths of the week or of each day. The remaining fourth of his time he would be at liberty to transfer his labor, if he so thought fit, elsewhere; but if he were inclined to give it to his master, his master would be obliged to find him employment according to a fixed rate of wages. One of the great difficulties which environed this question was, how they were to fix this scale of wages for free labor? How could any man in this country fix a rate of wages which would be applicable—he would not say to all the islands, but—to any two of them? Could the house say that it would fling this question loose to the world—that it would leave the negro to work or no, as he pleased, and to satisfy himself, as a man easily could in a tropical climate, with a bare supply of the necessaries of life? In some of the islands it might be difficult to obtain even that; but in those where the quantity of land unoccupied was as great as the fertility which distinguished it, the wants of men living in a tropical climate would be so few, that it would be impossible, under a system of free and unrestricted wages, that the state of society, as it now existed, should not come to an entire cessation. (Hear, hear.) But it had been asked, whether the wages so given would be a sufficient inducement to the negro in the present state to give himself up to continuous labor for so many years? Now he had already told the house that he did not give the slightest credit to what he so often heard said about the negro character; but he did give credit to what he had heard about the slave character. He knew, too, the effect of a tropical climate—he was aware how far it went to damp exertion and to paralyse activity—but he likewise knew the effect of slavery, and that it was calculated to promote this idea, that as the greatest of human curses was labor, so the height of human bliss was relaxation from labor. To remove the slave suddenly from labor, and to place him in a situation in which he would be called to provide for nothing more than the necessities of life, would be to extinguish labor—would be to extinguish civilization—in a word, would be to fling before the negro population the desire to recur again to savage life. He contended that some restrictions in that measure were necessary, not only for the security of the master, but also for the welfare of the slave. (Hear, hear.)

He appealed boldly to the house, and asked honorable members whether there was any thing unreasonable in such a stipulation as that which he had just described—a stipulation which led gradually, but certainly, slowly it might be, but still surely, to the unrestricted freedom of the slave. (Hear, hear.) Then he had been asked how was this scale of wages to be fixed? This was undoubtedly a point of some difficulty, as there was no criterion by which to settle it. Refer the question to the planters, and they would say that the rate of wages should be according to the outlay in procuring for them the necessary articles of food and clothing. But that he denied to be a true criterion; and yet you had no free labor to compare slave labor with, or to regulate its prices by. (Ironical cheers.) The noble lord cheered; but he should be obliged to the noble lord to point out to him where free labor existed in our West India colonies, and, when he had pointed it out, to prove its existence. He, (Mr. Stanley), was convinced that at present there was not that demand for free labor in any of our slave colonies which could form any certain regulator for the amount of wages which ought to be paid to a free negro. He could devise no better mode than that of compelling the planter to fix a price on the laborer at the time of his apprenticeship, and by enacting that the wages to be paid by the master, should bear such a proportion to the price fixed by him that for the whole of his spare time, if given to the master, the negro should receive 1-12th of his price annually. In this way the master and the slave would both act in reference to each other. If the master fixed a high price for his negro, he would have to pay him high wages in proportion to that price. If he fixed a low price, then, upon the payment of that price by any other person on his behalf, the negro would be positively and absolutely free.

The proposal, then, which he had to make to the house was that the apprenticed laborer should give up to his owner, 3-4ths of the profits of his labor, in consideration of the food and clothing which he received from him; that he should be at liberty, if he so thought fit, to give his labor elsewhere; but that if he gave it to his master, whose interest it would be to receive it, he should receive for it an amount of wages proportional to the price set upon it by his master. The government had therefore divided the price for his freedom into so many instalments that at the end of twelve years all the price put on the slave by the master would be paid to the master out of the proceeds of the slave's industry. (Hear, hear.) In what condition, then, was it that the planter stood at the moment? He obtained for the next 12 years three-fourths of the labor which he now possessed in the slave from the apprenticed laborer; for the remaining fourth he would, if he employed it, have to pay certain wages. He might not choose to employ it; but then, if such was his determination, he lost the labor of his apprentice, and if nobody else engaged it, he was bound in law to make the loss good. Under these circumstances, he put it to the house whether it was not strictly in order to allude here to the loss which this alteration would occasion to many of the West India proprietors. Was it fitting that upon them and upon them alone should be thrown the loss accruing from the destruction of a species of property into the legality of which he would not at that moment enter, but of which he would say that it had been repeatedly sanctioned by the imperial legislature? It was exceedingly difficult, in the present condition of West India property, to get any safe criterion by which to judge of its value. He knew an instance of an estate which now produced £1,400 a year, and on which there was a mortgage of a sum between £4,000 and £6,000. Some years ago there was a mortgage of £10,000 upon it, which had been diminished by payments out of the rents of the estate to the sum he had just mentioned. The house would scarcely credit him when he told them that that very estate had recently been sold for a sum which would be covered by the proceeds of the first year from it.

He admitted that the insecurity of West India property had had a great and palpable effect upon the exchangeable value of it in the money market, and that when West India property was brought there now, it was at a depreciation truly frightful. Now, let the house look for a moment at the profit derived at present from West India property; and on this point he was speaking from the returns of West India property to the board of trade. On examining those returns, the house would find the net profits arising from the sale of sugars. The planters had told the house the cost of raising a hoghead of sugar, the number of hogheads which they imported annually, and the price of each hoghead, as ascertained by the Gazette. Now, from these data, it would appear that the net profits arising from the cultivation of sugars was £1,300,000 a year. The house had not equal data for calculating the net profits upon rum and coffee; but taking them to amount to £230,000 or £300,000 a year, the total net profits of W. India property would amount to £1,500,000 a year. Now, his majesty's ministers proposed to advance to the West India body a loan to the amount of ten years' purchase of this annual profit, or in other words a loan of £15,000,000. It would remain as a question with parliament in what manner and upon what condition that loan should be repaid to the country. It would also remain with parliament to consider whether it would require the repayment of that loan, or would convert it into a gift, according to a plan which it might hereafter become his duty to submit briefly to the house. Parliament might consider that sum equal to one-fourth of the proceeds of the slave's labor, and with that sum, and the other three-fourths of his labor, he would at the end of twelve years have received a just compensation for the price of his slave, and for all the expense to which the slave might have put him for food and clothing.

It was only right, however, to state, that during that time the planter would have to pay interest upon his loan, and to that amount he might perhaps be considered a loser. Now, he thought that it would not be denied that this remuneration must be borne either by the produce of negro labor or by the revenue of England. It could not be borne by the planters, for that would neither be fair nor just; it must, therefore, be borne by one of the two alternatives to which he had already alluded. Upon one or other of them, beyond all question, the choice of parliament must rest. There might be gentlemen who thought that you ought not to take any thing from the profits of the negro so long as he continued a slave. In that opinion he could not concur. He thought that taking a portion of their wages from them now, for the purpose of purchasing their freedom hereafter, would induce them to lay by some part of their earnings afterwards when they became free, would teach them habits of prudence and forethought, and would materially tend to their moral improvement. He thought such a plan much better than saying to them, "You shall work three-fourths of the day for your master, and your master's advantage; but for the remaining fourth, which belongs to you, you may work or not as you please, for in either case food and clothing will be provided for you." He believed that he had stated, in as much detail as was then necessary, the principal features of his plan with, perhaps, one single exception. That exception was, that it might be necessary to add to the provisions of the bill that of which the want had rendered all former enactments null and void—he meant that it might be necessary to give to the executive some discretionary power. It might be necessary to distribute through the chartered colonies what already existed in the crown colonies—namely, stipendiary magistrates appointed by the crown, uninfluenced by the local assemblies—free from local passions and prejudices—who would discharge equal justice to the rich and the poor, the black and the white—who would watch over and protect the negro in his incipient state of freedom, and who would aid and direct his inexperience in forming a contract which might have so material an effect upon his future life.

There was one other object to which he thought that the protecting care of this country ought most specially to be extended. He would call upon the house to aid the local legislatures, or even to proceed without the aid of local legislatures, in establishing in the colonies schools for the religious and moral education of their inhabitants. (Hear, hear.) They were now going to emancipate the old negro upon certain conditions, after the lapse of a certain fixed period of time; but they were also going to emancipate the young negro immediately, and without any conditions. (Hear.) From the present moment, then, continued Mr. Stanley, your responsibility begins. Into their minds you must implant wholesome principals as the basis of wholesome habits. You are placing them in the rank of freemen, it is your duty to qualify them for holding that rank honorably, virtuously and beneficially. You are bound not to throw them upon the world oppressed with the idea that the lot of man is labor from his cradle to his grave, and that he must die with no other hope and with no other consolation than that he has come to the end of a weary and laborious pilgrimage. (Cheers.) You must embue them with such principles as will ensure the performance of their duty here—as will teach them the necessity of moral restraint to secure their happiness hereafter—as will instill into them the purest motive of action—as will fit them for freedom in this world, and as will enable them to leave it, not as the brutes, who perish without hope of immortality. (Hear, hear, hear.) I have now gone through the details of the proposition which his majesty's government had deemed it their duty to submit to your consideration. I know the difficulties, the almost insurmountable difficulties, which it will have to encounter in carrying it into practice. I know the disadvantages under which I bring it forward at this particular crisis; but I still bring it forward, in the confident hope, that in these resolutions—the germ is sown which will soon ripen into perfect fruit, which, when matured by the fostering care and protection of persons wiser and better qualified than myself, will secure to the country, to the colonies, and to all ranks and classes and colors of his majesty's subjects, that from this day forth there will be a virtual extinction, in the dominions of Britain, of all the horrors of slavery; and that in no distant period, by no uncertain operation, but by the action of this machinery, every trace which mars the face of freedom will be erased and blotted for ever from our laws and institutions. (Great cheering.) There are those who first started this mighty question, and broached its god-like principles, who have not lived to see the triumph which is reserved for it in these days. They labored in their generation strenuously and vigorously for that fulfilment which we are now about to accomplish—they were satisfied with the foundation which it was their fortune to lay, and they trusted that it would be strong enough to support the glorious superstructure which is now about to be reared upon it. Like the prophets of old, they hailed the day star from on high, and exulted in that prospect, which they saw through a glass darkly, and not as we do, face to face. It is not however, without feelings of the deepest and most heartfelt satisfaction that I recall to your recollection the fact that one man, the most religiously inspired, the most conscientiously influenced of all who labored in the dawn and the rising of this great and glorious cause—Vilberforce (great cheering) still remains to witness the final consummation of that important triumph to which his early energies were devoted, and to exclaim, like the last of the prophets to whom I have before alluded, "Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace." (Great cheering.)

I have now only to offer to the house my humble apology for having detained them so long on this subject. I will conclude, after thanking them once more for the patient attention with which they have listened, by expressing my sincere and earnest hope that the counsels of the house, under God's gracious Providence, will be so guided and directed, that England may now, a second time, set to the world the bright and glorious example of a commercial nation holding commercial advantages light in the balance when compared with the dictates of humanity, and justice and religion—that we may see the extinction of slavery gradually and safely, but completely and entirely accomplished; and that by moderation of language, and reconciliation of conflicting opinions, we may be induced to forget the extreme wishes we may have formed on either side, and thus show to the world the proud example of a deliberative assembly vindicating its character for moderation and decision in the line which it adopts—a line which, in my conscience, I believe to be honorable to the nation to which this assembly belongs, and which I consider is the surest pledge of the successful issue of the experiment on which we are now about to enter—(great cheering.) The right honorable gentleman then moved the series of resolutions which appeared in our paper of Saturday last.

Mr. Stanley then said, that he was too well aware of the importance of these resolutions to call upon the house to come to a hasty decision upon them. It had been with the greatest reluctance that he, as a member of the government, had been obliged to announce to the West India interest that he could not accede to their proposition to defer the statement which he had just made beyond to-night, but after the publicity which had been given to this plan in all the public journals, he felt that it was almost impossible not to let the government have an opportunity of stating the grounds upon which it had gone, and the principles on which it had proceeded. Having made his statement, he had no wish to call upon the house for an immediate vote; on the contrary, if any gentleman should propose that further time be given for their decision he should have no objection to the proposal.

Lord Howick, after some preliminary remarks, in which he referred to his painful situation in being compelled to state an opinion adverse to the plan, expressed his views of the subject and said that the resolution which purported to give to the slave the essentials of freedom, was an attempt to dupe the house with words. He then commented upon the distinction between the slave in his present, and the apprentice in his future condition, and thought that as it was made compulsory upon him to work three-fourths of the time for his master, he would still remain, to that extent at least, a slave. He also adverted to the provision respecting corporal punishment, and was of opinion that merely restricting the number of lashes that might be inflicted, would not better the situation of the slave, for, as in Demarara, what was diminished in number, would be increased in intensity. There were many other topics discussed by his lordship, and he sat down amidst loud cheering.

Sir Robert Peel, Lord Althorpe, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Stewart and Sir R. Vyvian made remarks on the subject, but they principally related to the period to which the further consideration of the subject should be postponed, which was fixed for May the 30th.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 18—Vol. VIII.] BALTIMORE, JUNE 29, 1833. [Vol. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,136.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The present number contains twenty-four pages—eight extra being added to get in judge Baldwin's opinion, without interfering with the usual run of matter. In the present want of exciting subjects, we shall endeavor to give value to this work by the record of useful things.

¶ The article concerning the introduction of slavery into the British colonies, presented on behalf of the West India committee, sitting in London, is highly interesting. John Bull was once pleased to regard slaves as "merchandise." He much encouraged a trade in men—but now abuses those who hold the property which he forced on their fathers, calling them bad names, and so forth.

¶ Our latest accounts left the president at Boston, so much indisposed, that, on Monday last, it was thought necessary to bleed him freely, and prohibit the entrance of all persons into his chamber, except his immediate attendants; but it was hoped, on Tuesday, that he might leave his apartment on the following day. The fatigue and excitement to which he had been exposed were too much for him—indeed, it was hardly to have been expected that he could have kept up so long. Those immediately about him should insist upon his being placed more at his ease. It is not a trifling matter to pass through the various ceremonies, and dense crowds of persons, which attend the president in his tour.

The reception at Boston was consistent with the general character of the people of that city. It was neither uproarious nor sycophantic—nor did it partake of that rude party exclusiveness which has disgraced some other places; and it seems that the president was delighted with the manly and kind tokens of respect that were paid him, so long as he could partake of them. As was predicted, he will leave New England with new feelings—and be assured that political opposition has no effect upon the people of that country in their respect for the chief magistrate of the nation—nor the least influence over that courtesy which is due to distinguished visitors.

The president was too ill to witness the docking of the Constitution frigate—though he earnestly desired it.

THE SLAVE QUESTION. We have intended, several times, to notice the proceedings of the "nullifiers," in their wicked attempt to cause a new excitement in the south, on account of the slaves—as though some deliberate plans had been laid in the north to unsettle their property in them; for which purpose they have earnestly seized upon the most trivial circumstances—and, because of the acts of a few intemperate individuals, desire to make another "calculation of the value of the union!" We have laid aside a variety of papers on this subject, and, perhaps, shall use some of them—to shew the miserable shifts to which these desperate men are reduced to maintain notoriety, and keep themselves from sinking altogether from the public view; for they well know that, for several reasons, the whole south is alive to every question concerning negro slavery—and, on that interest, may be rallied into an united action, if fearful of the interference of the north. But, independent of a regard for constitutional principles, it is manifestly the pecuniary interest of the north that slavery should not be disturbed in the south—and if the "Yankees" are as mercenary as the nullifiers have described them to be, there is no possible ground to suspect any movement in the north, on this subject. It is true, that almost every reflecting person on this side of "Mason and Dixon's line," regards slavery as a mighty evil, a great curse—as many tens of thousands on the other side of that line regard it—but they as universally believe that there is no right in them to meddle in this matter, and that the entire jurisdiction over the case rests with the several states, individually.

We have not time to enlarge on this subject, just now—and would only refer our readers to judge Baldwin's Vol. XLIV—S16. 19.

opinion, and the decision of a Pennsylvania jury, in the case of a fugitive slave—and the correspondence between Messrs. Bolton and Webster, inserted in subsequent pages.

THE CHOLERA. We continue our melancholy notices of the progress of this extraordinary disease—but with as much brevity as is consistent with a general record of its fearful and fatal doings.

Pittsburgh. The sanitary board announced 3 cases of cholera, at Pittsburgh, in their report of June 22. It was supposed they would all prove fatal. No new cases had been reported. [The Gazette of the 25th mentions 4 or 5 deaths—in which, perhaps, the three cases just above mentioned are included, and says—The hospital report, dated Monday morning, 9 o'clock, states that no case of cholera asphyxia had been presented there during the last 24 hours.

Wheeling. The cholera had nearly disappeared from this place, at the latest accounts.

Kentucky. The cholera seems to have nearly abated in most of the towns of this state in which it appeared, after committing terrible ravages in some of them.

It is computed that about 350 persons died of this disease at Lexington, only—the entire population of which was only about 4,000 at the time of its desolation, 2,000 having fled. Among those who perished were many of the most respectable people, male and female. Indeed, in this city it seemed to pay no regard to age, sex or condition. Our latest date is of the 19th—and the cholera is spoken of as having nearly disappeared. It had carried off 23 persons in the lunatic asylum, and, in one instance, ten others of one family.

The P. E. bishop of Kentucky, and Mr. Peers, president of the Transylvania university, and the theological students, exerted themselves manfully at Lexington, in attending upon the sick.

A letter from Sherburne's Mills, dated June 15, says, "There is great excitement here about cholera. Many persons fled to the mountains, and left their crops and every thing standing, should the excitement not cease in a week, the crops will not be cut. Flemingsburg has suffered greatly, indeed there has been in town and vicinity near fifty deaths since Sunday morning; there has been as many as twelve deaths in one family of only fourteen persons."

Georgetown has suffered severely. After a few cases at Winchester, the town was nearly abandoned. One case at Mount Sterling. There were 10 deaths out of 11 cases at Millersburg—because that the physicians fled from the place. Fredericksburg and Springfield have been visited. Flemingsburg had suffered much,* as well as Lawrenceburg, with Stamford, parts of the Green River country, &c. In the village of Eliza, in Fleming country, where there are near a hundred houses, there was not a single living soul to be found, and three dead bodies were left unburied.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Maysville, Ky. dated the 14th.

"We have just returned from the country, where we have been since the first inst. The stores are still shut, and not more than one-tenth of the inhabitants in town. We are among the first in. The cholera is raging through the country—there had been several deaths around us. I hope the disease has left our city—we have not had one case to date. Four families within a stone's throw of us, lost nineteen in two or three days."

At Bardstown the disease was awfully fatal—in one family of 16, there were 9 deaths—seven colored and two of the gentleman's children. It was sometime before persons could be found who had courage to enter the dead. The sisters of charity, attached to the Nazareth and Loretto stations, hastened to attend the sick, and one of them died a martyr. The rev. Wm. Byrnes, principal of St. Mary's seminary, died after 7 hours illness.

There is a report that 3 cases happened at Frankfort, on the 20th.

Ohio. During the week ending the 15th, there were 15 deaths in Cincinnati; but we have not heard of any since. A few cases had happened at Steubenville, but the health of the town was fully restored.

It is said that 11 deaths took place in Gallipolis in one day! Alabama. A few cases have appeared at Mobile and Montgomery, &c.

Tennessee. The cholera had nearly ceased at Nashville, but was spreading through the country, and especially fatal to the slaves. There had been 34 deaths in Pulaski, and this small town was abandoned—all the stores closed, &c. The disease was active at Memphis. Five convicts died in the penitentiary.

Mississippi. Many persons, chiefly colored, were dying at Natchez, and in its vicinity—also at Port Gibson, and there were yet a few cases at Vicksburg, and at Jackson.

*Two of the physicians had died, and the other two were not expected to live—at the last accounts.

Louisiana. In the first six days in June, there were 179 interments in the Catholic burying ground, and 34 in the Protestant—total 211, at New Orleans. The excess in the former is partially accounted for in the greater cheapness of graves!—two dollars, only, being charged, whereas in the latter six are demanded. One report of the deaths on the 7th is 59; another 61. On the 10th—71—from the 1st to the 11th, inclusive, 555.

On the 8th there was a favorable change of the weather, and new cases of cholera less numerous. Among the deaths was that of the rev. Mr. Hull, the Episcopal minister. The "Bulletin" of the 13th speaks of the disease as being on the decline, and reports 55 deaths. This is the latest date that we have.

The general population of New Orleans is from 40 to 45,000—but many of the inhabitants had left their homes. The cholera has been chiefly fatal, this season, to emigrants and slaves.

A letter from Mobile dated June 14, says—"The cholera is raging in New Orleans, and is attended with more malignancy and fatality than it ever was, in any known part of the globe, not even excepting the jungles of India. No premonitory symptoms attend the disease. The first warning a man has, who may be in perfect health, is, that he is dying. A man, a few days since, actually died standing up: he felt faint and unwell, reached a fence, which he grasped, and then died, his hands cramped to the rails, which held him up after death.

Fatal cases have appeared at New Iberia, Martinsville, in the parishes of St. Mary, Lafayette, and Rapides. At some places, the crops had been abandoned, great numbers of the slaves having died. But the disease here, has generally yielded to medicine, if properly attended to. In the parish of La Fourche Interieure, one planter lost 83 out of his 200 negroes—others have lost one half, some a third, &c. The crops of these will also suffer.

Missouri. Mr. Buckner, of the senate of the U. States, and his wife, have died of the cholera in Cape Girardeau county, with some of his slaves. There were other deaths in the neighborhood.

A St. Louis paper of June 8, says—"With the deepest regret we announce the sudden death by cholera of Mr. John Newman, attorney at law, of this place. The deceased was yesterday walking in the street, and this morning, between 7 and 8 o'clock, he was a corpse.

The disease was subsiding at Palmyra.

Canada. One of the rigid quarantine regulations adopted at Quebec, provides that the concealment of sickness on board of vessels, or giving false answers on that head, shall be felony, punishable with death, without benefit of clergy.

Cuba. The Boston Gazette of Saturday gives the following extract of a letter dated Matanzas, June 5th.

"You can have no idea of the gloom that prevails here in consequence of that dreadful scourge, the cholera. In the cities it has nearly ceased, but in the country its path is marked with desolation and ruin. On an estate having 100 slaves, every soul perished. Another with 60 lost 55. A slave ship lately landed 400 miserable wretches, of whom all but three died. Eight negroes were taken down on an estate 18 miles from this town, a few days ago. The proprietor, Mr. S., an Englishman, an old acquaintance of mine, immediately came to town to our house. His servant was taken down after he got in, and died in the yard under my window. The old gentleman returned to his estate the day before yesterday, where he found 38, out of 69, dead. He was immediately seized himself, when a black boy was despatched to us with a note stating that his master was dying. The boy had scarcely delivered the note, when he staggered, fell on the floor, and in a few hours was a corpse. The old gentleman is dead and the estate entirely deserted. This is a picture of many other estates."

A postscript to a letter from Havana of the 8th inst. states that the government had then resolved to suspend the granting of clean bills of health.

A letter from Havana, under date of 11th instant, states that the cholera is still prevailing in that city, and is again making dreadful ravages at Guaneabacoa, about two leagues distant. In the lower grounds and along the rivers, both in that vicinity and Matanzas, the colored population were said to be literally mowed down.

MR. WEBSTER partook of a public dinner at Cincinnati on the 19th inst. and, on being complimented in the 6th toast, delivered a speech—a copy of the report of which may be expected in the next REGISTER, with a regular account of the proceedings on that occasion. All parties united to honor the distinguished visitor, and all seem to have been highly gratified with him. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Webster feelingly stated, that the health of the country and the lateness of the season, with the earnest remonstrances of his friends, had imposed on him the necessity of proceeding no further at present; but declared his intention, at a future day, to penetrate the great Mississippi, and make himself well acquainted with the west, &c. On the 20th, Mr. W. started on his return homeward.

MR. WHITE. We much regret to learn, that E. D. White, esq. one of the representatives of Louisiana in the last congress of the United States, and who was a passenger in the steamboat Lioness, with Mr. Johnston, and others—has died of his wounds. He, also, was a most worthy and excellent gentleman.

BLACK HAWK and his party left New York, some days ago, on their return home, via the Hudson river, the canal and lake Erie to Detroit, and thence to the residence of their tribe beyond the Mississippi. They will, no doubt, make an imposing report to their brethren of the hundreds of thousands of persons who shall have presented themselves to their view, and of the many strange things which they have seen in their journey. The runnings after the chief and his party, by vast numbers of persons—must not have a little surprised these savages: but the American people are great lovers of "sights"—and mighty fond of seeing, and being seen, in huge masses—no matter on what occasion. Even a hanging-match has brought 20 or 30,000 of them together! It is said, that some men ran the risk of being trampled under the horses' feet, at New York, that they might "touch the hem of the garment" of the president—and added, that several of the ladies of that city, admiring the noble form and handsome face of young Black Hawk, warmly kissed him! That was, indeed, sufficiently near "going the whole!"

On the arrival of Black Hawk at Albany, in the steamboat, thousands rushed to the river to receive him! The press was so great that he could not land for an hour! At last, he doffed his blanket, and was smuggled on shore, and passed through the solid mass, without being recognized! The chief and his party were immediately sent off on the rail road, to relieve them from the immense crowd of noisy persons who desired to shake hands with him, or lay hold of his blanket! Such things are not very creditable to our people.

A series of articles called "Randolphiana" has lately had a great run through the papers, and we meet with the following in the New York Gazette—

Blackhawkiana. One day last week after our "red brethren" had risen from a dinner table to which they had been invited, they retired to an anti-room to seek repose. Among the gentlemen present was one who requested an introduction, for the purpose of having a religious conversation with the sons of the forest. Young Hawk, sometimes called Tommy Hawk, had just thrown himself on a sofa, when the object of the visitor was made known to him through the interpreter. He smiled, and saying, "I lazee—I lazee,"—covered his head with a blanket, and fell asleep.

THE NEW TARIFF. From the Baltimore Gazette. The Boston Commercial Gazette, in speaking of Mr. Clay's adjustment of the tariff question, says that it "has given new life to the manufacturing interest. Instead of being a death-blow to the manufacturers, it has induced them to enlarge their plans of operation in every direction." If this be the fact, it is evident that Mr. Clay could not have foreseen the operations of his own bill, since he introduced it with reluctance, and merely as an alternative to the utter destruction of the manufacturing interest. Nor could it have been understood by Messrs. Niles and Carey, who would not so violently have deprecated any measure tending to "give new life to the manufacturing interest."

The "Boston Gazette" was, always, severely anti-tariff. It is true, that, at present, many of the old manufacturing establishments are in full operation and doing a fair business—but not many new ones are making, and we do know that a large number of the manufacturers are looking to a stoppage of their wheels, at a future day—especially the makers of iron; unless in a greatly reduced price for wages. Present prospects may be changed. A thorough "reform" in England would do much to help us. If the working people there lived as ours do live, and, we hope, always will live, we should not feel alarmed at the idea of making liberal exchanges with them. But God forbid that the freemen of the United States shall be reduced to paupers, to uphold the theory of "free trade"—which, when the term is used by Englishmen, as supported by their practice, is as superlatively impudent as scandalously false. It is as if Nell Gwynn, of the 2d Charles, or Mother Jordan, of the present 4th William, of England (fruitful mothers of dukes and other lords—"Corinthian capitals of society!") had lectured boarding school misses, not yet in their teens, on the beauties of chastity!

THE TARIFF LAW. It seems that "the enemy" has been put "at fault" by the treasury construction which follows:

A sample of goods made of doubled and twisted worsted yarn, manufactured into a stout twilled cloth, resembling kersey, having been forwarded to the comptroller of the treasury for his decision as to what rate of duty it should bear, the following decision has been received.

Treasury department, comptroller's office, June 17, 1833.
Sir: I have received your letter of the 4th inst. enclosing one from the public appraisers, accompanied by a sample of a coarse article with black stripes in it, said to be composed entirely of worsted yarn, in relation to the duty payable on which, a question, it appears, has arisen.

Ever since worsted stuff goods have, by law, been placed at a lower rate of duty than other manufactures of wool, it has uniformly been decided that the term was to be considered as embracing only such articles as had in the known commercial sense, and in the usage of trade, acquired the distinct appellation of worsted stuff goods—namely, bombazetts, calimancoes, wildbores, shalloons, &c.

I do not consider the article in question, as coming under that denomination. Respectfully,

JOS. ANDERSON, comptroller.

James N. Barker, esq.

The treasury constructions have caused a good deal of grumbling among certain importers. Take the following as a specimen:

From the Journal of Commerce.

I am satisfied, Messrs. Editors, that the importing merchants in the United States will feel much obliged to the treasury department, as soon as it is positively known that they have finished changing the construction of the tariff acts. Every week do we hear of some new decision, some new construction, and some new interpretation of the intentions of congress, keeping the mercantile community, or those immediately interested, in a state of agitation and uncertainty, as to the rate of duty on any particular article. I presume every one is aware, that the treasury department can only interpret the law and the intent of the framers; consequently when congress declares that after a certain period certain articles shall pay such rates of duty as they may deem proper, and some time after the treasury department decides that articles hitherto classed under a different rate, were intended by congress to come under a per centage of duty more favorable than they were previously, I contend, that the benefit of a reduction of duty should extend to these articles from the time of the approval or passage of the acts of congress making these reductions, and not from the date of the treasury circular, some 6 or 8 months after announcing that the department has decided it was the intent of congress that the articles were to be admitted to entry at a different rate of duty than heretofore, which may be some 15 or 20 per cent. less than the importers had been paying from the passage of the acts until the date of a treasury circular with different instructions.

A recent circular from the treasury decides that under the tariff act of 14th July, 1832, which was to go into effect after the 4th March, 1833, linen cambrics and handkerchiefs shall pay but 15 per cent. duty, instead of 25 per cent. which has until some time last month been charged on the article. Why was this construction not given in time, in order that this description of goods might be placed in the custom house stores prior to the 4th of March, for the return duty? Or why will not the department give orders at this time to the collectors to have a return duty allowed? I had on hand (and have now) before the 4th March, a large lot of linen cambrics which the treasury has decided were honestly entitled to a reduction of 10 per cent. duty; yet as such decision was not made till after the time prescribed for depositing merchandise for return duty within the custom house stores, I am to be debarred of the actual intentions of congress. Pray, whose fault was it? Surely not mine; and yet I must suffer for it, as my neighbor can now import the article, and by reason of paying a less duty, considerably under-sell me. Under all these circumstances, I cannot but believe that the collectors will be instructed to refund the difference of duty on this and such other articles as were entitled to a reduction on the 4th March, but owing to a delay in fixing the construction of the law, were not deposited in the custom house stores at that time.

PEARL STREET.

COFFEE. We have seen an elaborate calculation published to prove that the annual consumption of coffee in the United States is ninety-one millions of pounds a year. The maker of this calculation, probably, has a considerable quantity of the article—on hand!

Official documents should be preferred—when to be obtained! It is true, they do not, in all cases, present perfect facts; but they are the best evidences that can be offered; and, in the instance before us, must be regarded as pretty close approximations to the "whole truth." The treasury tables for the three last years have the following aggregates:

	Imported—lbs.	Exported—lbs.
1820	51,488,248	13,124,561
1831	81,757,386	6,056,629
1832	91,722,329	55,251,158
	224,967,963	74,432,348
Deduct exports	74,432,348
	8)150,535,615

Average 50,178,538½

And so the actual annual consumption is 50 millions of pounds, or 41 millions less than the calculated consumption.

But—it may be said that great allowances should be made because of smuggling. Some small parcels were smuggled when the duty was 5 cents per lb.—but the quantity was not then large. In 1831 the duty was only two cents, in 1832, reduced to one cent, and now no duty is payable. In 1831 and 1832, the inducement to smuggle was not equal to the risk, and the amount illegally introduced had no sensible effect on the quantity consumed. We therefore think that from 50 to 55 millions of pounds is fully equal to the consumption of the United States.

It may be well here to remark, that the duty on coffee has not had any seeming effect on its price—and, of course, no great influence over its consumption. In 1820, '21 and '22, the duty was 5 cents, and the average price 27 cents; but in 1829, '30, the duty being the same, the average price was 12½ cents. In 1831, the duty being two cents, the price was 12½ cents; in July 1832, duty one cent, price 13 cents; at present, July 1833, free of duty, and the average price of all the qualities about 13 cents. So that now, when there is no duty, the price is ½ cent per lb. more than it was in 1829, '30, when the duty was 5 cents.

"FREE TRADE!" We have omitted to mention, that, on the 14th ult. earl Fitzwilliam offered a resolution in the British house of lords, with a view of mollifying the CORN LAWS, which was taken up, and negatively without a division. So much for "reform"—and to "relieve commerce of its shackles!"

But some free trade is going on. Jonathan smuggles a few hundred dollars worth of tobacco into Ireland, in return for the millions worth of English goods which John Bull smuggles through the American custom-houses, and otherwise; and it is said, that British cotton lace to the value of more than a million of pounds sterling, is smuggled into France—and a million's worth of French silks smuggled into England. Here is the "quid pro quo."

VALUABLE IMPORTATIONS! It has too often happened, that, just after the arrival at this port of a ship laden with passengers from Germany, many of our citizens were worried into an ill-humor by the streams of beggars which beset them. Twenty, or more, have often applied to us, in one day, for pecuniary aid—which, though quite as much accustomed to furnish as any of our neighbors, has been universally refused in such cases, as a protest against the practice, and because of a serious belief that the encouragement of it, in one instance, was the fruitful parent of others, holding out inducements for fresh cargoes of beggars. For we have known several cases in which persons were seeking charity, from house to house, in regular succession, who had on hand considerable quantities of gold!—and are clearly of opinion, that the success of one party of such degraded and ungenious beings, has invited others into the same vicious conduct. But in the last week there arrived in Baltimore 800 or 1,000 Germans—healthy and clean and well clothed persons, evidently of the laboring classes, but manifestly sober and decent and industrious individuals. It is not easy to place a money-value on such emigrants. These are men and women to "make the wilderness blossom as the rose," being generally in the prime of life—and they will make rapid additions, and, in a geometrical ratio, to the population and wealth of our country—to which we bid them a hearty welcome.

A powerful emigration is going on from Germany—and, in the present year, we are told that it consists of the valuable classes, of which those present are specimens. We have received several cargoes of passengers in the present week—and others are expected.

PRODUCTION OF SUGAR. Louisiana has a soil sufficient, south of 30 deg. 40 min. north latitude, to yield 300,000 hogsheads of sugar, of 1,000 lbs. each, and (of course) 40 gallons molasses to each hogshead. Were seasons regular, as much may be produced in South Carolina, the Floridas, Alabama and Georgia, and ere long the south west may furnish 500,000 or 600,000 hogsheads. But whilst rice and cotton command more remunerating prices, this estimate cannot be realized. We speak only of capability.

Supposing us to extract from a suitable soil half a million of hogsheads at five and a half cents per pound, they would yield $27,500,000; two-fifths to be deducted for cost of production. Then add the amount of forty gallons molasses per hogshead, or 2,000,000 gallons, at twenty-three cents per gallon—$460,000.

As it is, the exports of Louisiana produce, of all kinds, exceed those of South Carolina, who boasts of ~~her~~ eight millions. Let us labor, then, to develop our resources.

Sugar is now very scarce in this market, and in great demand.

NAPPING HATS BY STEAM. The invention of man appears to have no bounds, since Fulton discovered the utility, and applied to the purposes of navigation the power of steam, the improvements that have been made in the arts and sciences are almost incredible. We stepped into a hat manufactory a few days since, and were surprised and gratified to see in successful and admirable operation a new patent machine for napping hats, carried on by steam. The beauty and superiority of the work is admitted by all who examine it. On inquiring wherefore hats napped in this manner are preferable to others, we were informed that it required extremely hot water to bring the article to perfection, and that this is accomplished much better through the agency of steam than in any other manner, it having been ascertained that steam applied in this way is five times as hot as boiling water.

THE DRY ROT. The Hudson frigate, which was built in 1826, and which has made but one cruise, is decayed to such an extent that she is not worth repairing.

The discovery and adoption of a cheap, safe and efficacious preventive of rot, would save millions to both England and the United States.

THE RAIL ROAD AND THE CANAL. The Frederick Herd of Saturday, furnishes the following interesting information:

Pursuant to a previous agreement, the presidents of the two great companies, respectively accompanied by a committee of the directors, assembled in this city on Wednesday last, for the purpose of carrying into effect the arrangement entered into some time since for the passage of the rail road around the Point of Rocks, &c. and it gives us great pleasure to state that the best possible feelings prevailed on the occasion, both parties manifesting a desire heartily to co-operate to promote mutual interests. The arrangements which have been entered into have not been fully communicated to us; but we have been assured that all obstacles which heretofore prevented the prosecution of the works have been removed beyond the possibility of collision. Sincerely do we congratulate the public upon this desirable result, and hope that the liberal spirit which has been manifested, may add to the energies of both companies, and that all private feelings may be merged in a desire to promote the public good.

UTICA AND SCHENECTADY RAIL ROAD. The following are the sums subscribed at the respective places at which the books were opened for the capital stock of this company. The aggregate exceeds, it will be perceived, fourteen millions of dollars!

New York	- - - - -	$5,276,000
Albany	- - - - -	3,257,100
Utica	- - - - -	4,300,000
Schenectady	- - - - -	1,541,500

$14,374,600

[The capital of the company is only two millions.]

BOSTON. Three rail roads are now making from this city, and will, very soon, be completed—to wit:

To Providence 40 miles; to Worcester 43 miles; to Lowell 25 miles.

These roads pass through or lead to certain of the most populous and important parts of the state; and may be regarded as mighty labor-saving machines.

PASSENGERS. On Sunday evening and on Monday, no less than 1,922 passengers arrived from foreign ports, at the New York quarantine ground.

THE MISSIONARIES. The release of Messrs. Worcester and Buttler, by the governor of Georgia, appears likely to create much excitement in that state, and to become a leading question in the ensuing contest for governor, on the part of the "Troup republicans" against the other republicans.

AMERICAN NANKEN. We have before us a beautiful specimen of American nankeen, made from nankeen colored cotton, raised by Mr. Forsyth, of Georgia. The nankeen cotton was first raised in the south, eight or ten years ago, but was not then thought much of—as is the case with all new articles, it was with difficulty that persons could be found to try it. Mr. Forsyth has persevered until he has been able to induce the manufacturers to work up the raw material, and thus bring the article fairly into market. The specimen before us, a piece of seven yards, is really beautiful; somewhat darker colored than the India article, and much superior to the miserable imitations from the English loom and dye shops. It being of the natural color of the cotton, it does not fade by wear and washing; and we are informed that Mr. Forsyth thinks the strongest mineral acids will not extract the color. This may be correct, but all vegetable colors disappear under the action of chlorine—and we shall take an early opportunity to test the fastness of the color of this article by the use of the chlorine, and other chemical agents. Mr. Nathaniel F. Williams, merchant of this city, agent for the sale of the nankeen, to whom we are indebted for an opportunity of examining it, informs us that a friend of his had accidentally got a large spot of ink on a new pair of pantaloons, which he considered had spoiled them. Mr. W. advised him to apply a little lemon juice and salt to the spot, and expose it to the sun, which was done, the ink extracted, and the color of the cloth remained unchanged.

We have thought it important to the interests of the southern cotton planters, that a knowledge of the value of this nankeen cotton cloth should be disseminated, as the manufacture of nankeen will add to the consumption of the raw material. No one will ever wear the imitated article when they can get the genuine one. The color of the common imported nankeen disappears on the first washing, and clothes made of it are, therefore, very soon laid aside. We recommend a trial of this nankeen, and also the culture of the cotton, as an important object of attention to our southern friends.

[Am. Farmer.]

§3—It is an objection to this valuable product of our fields and workshops, that it has the same width, and is otherwise put up in imitation of the Chinese article—because that the width and length of the pieces are unfriendly to an economical use of the goods: but we join the "Farmer" in expressing a decided opinion that the American nankeen is very superior even to the best Chinese, for firmness of texture and durability of color.

We have accidentally learned that, when certain contracts shall have expired, the American nankeens will be made of the cassimere width; and, we hope, sold by the yard, like other goods, instead of the piece—rendering its use more economical to consumers, without interfering with the profits of producers, but greatly increase their sales.

LAW—Infancy. A person recently was brought to trial in New York for an amount of $154 59, for goods bought by him to supply his own business as a grocer, and pleaded "infancy" as a bar to recovery!

The judge charged the jury—"That it was a fraud for a person who had the appearance of an adult to commence business and then set up infancy in payment of his debt; yet so was the law if he was an infant. The proof being conclusive as to the fact of infancy, notwithstanding his large whiskers, the jury found a verdict for the defendant."

"RANDOLPHIANA." A series of sprightly articles have appeared in the "New York American," detailing conversations with the late Mr. Randolph, intermixed with several brief letters from him to the writer—who was on quite easy terms, as it would appear, with that extraordinary man.

Some of the matters of fact stated in the Randolphiana have been contested—on which the "American" pointedly says:

"In reference to the contradictions, we feel called upon to say, that if there is any inaccuracy or misstatement, it lies not at the door of the writer of the numbers. What he delivers he received: we vouch for his veracity, as in the first number we promised. For that of Mr. Randolph we did not assume, and certainly do not feel called upon to vouch, nor in any way to defend the probability or consistency of his sayings and doings."

From the National Gazette. The Lynchburg Virginian asks if it be possible that John Randolph, of Roanoke, fraternized with "the great bug-bear federalist," the editor of the National Gazette? Mr. Randolph was intimately connected with greater bug-bears of the kind, during the war with Great Britain. He was of the "Royal George" mess at Georgetown; gave Rufus King a preference over all other politicians; lived and acted with Hanson and Grosveaur, and fraternized, almost exclusively, with the principal adversaries of the administration. His speeches against the war were received and reprinted in Great Britain as the strongest testimony in her favor. Mr. Stevens, the author of War in Disguise, edited one of them on that account, &c.

[33]—The less that is said about the "democracy" of Mr. Randolph—the better for his memory. There was no more democracy in his practice than "Tippon Sultan" displayed; he was as haughty as "the proud duke of Somerset," who felt his dignity insulted because that his wife playfully touched his cheek with her fan.

REFORM. The Dover (N. H.) Enquirer states that Joseph Hammons, lately a representative in congress, has received the appointment of postmaster at Dover, in room of B. H. Palmer, "Nortonized." The most exceptionable feature of this appointment is, that Mr. Hammons is not a resident of Dover, but of Farmington, and has not yet, owing to indisposition, been able to return to his own state from the seat of the general government. He has entered on the duties of his office, however, though absent, by deputy. [Nat. Int.]

MAINE. From the Boston Mercantile Journal. On the 19th ult. at Bangor, the public sale of six townships of the commonwealth's land in Maine, took place according to advertisement. Our correspondent, under date of that day, says:—"There has been an immense concourse of people from all quarters, and the sale was conducted with great interest. The result was as follows:

Choice.	No.	Aeres.	Pr. acre.
1st	3, 4th range, W. branch	22,080	$3 56
2d	W. on Moosehead lake	13,588	3 16½
3d	3, 3d range, W. branch	22,080	3 07
4th	A. 2d range	11,165	3 13½
5th	B. 2d range	22,080	3 40½
6th	(to be selected this day)		3 8½

All purchased by Mr. Ralph Huntington, of this city. Amount of sales—1. $78,604 80; 2. $43,617 43; 3. $67,785 60; 4. $35,002 27; 5. $75,182 40. Total of five townships, $299,402 75.

DEAF AND DUMB. The report of the American asylum for the deaf and dumb, at Hartford, (Conn.) has lately been published. We learn from it, that the present number of pupils is 130; those who have left the asylum 216; total number of pupils from the foundation, 446. Of these, 111 have been supported by their friends, the rest by the states of New England, except Rhode Island. The report states furthermore, that the directors being convinced that the body and the heart, as well as the intellect of the young require a systematic training, as early as 1822 opened a workshop for the scholars, and adopted such other plans as they thought conducive to the great objects of education. The result has been, as they observed, that they "have found bodily activity and soundness of health promoted by labor; that induces confidence in their own powers, independent of character, cheerfulness in study, and hope in overcoming difficulties. It keeps youth from contracting idle habits while at school; and diminishes their exposure to temptation."

DICKINSON COLLEGE. Under an arrangement made with the full consent of the present board of trustees of Dickinson college, at Carlisle, Pa. the buildings, land, library, apparatus and other property of that institution, have been transferred to a joint committee of the Baltimore and Philadelphia conferences of the Methodist Episcopal church, acting in behalf of those bodies. This transfer has been made, from a laudable desire on the part of the present trustees, to place the college again in a flourishing situation, and with a belief and confidence that, in the hands of the Methodist society, it may be made eminently serviceable in promoting the cause of education and literature generally. By a joint committee a new board of trustees, consisting of Methodist ministers, Methodist laymen, and gentlemen not members of the society, in equal numbers, met at Carlisle to organize on Thursday, the 6th of June. Those appointed on behalf of the Philadelphia conference were—

Rev. Samuel Harvey, rev. Jos. Lybrand, rev. Charles Pitman, rev. Joseph Holdich, Dr. M. Anderson, J. B. Longacre, esq. Richard Benson, esq. John Davis, esq. Dr. J. M. Keagy, John Antes, esq. Thomas A. Budd, esq. Benjamin Mathias, esq. Samuel Parker, esq. Dr. J. Higgins, — Hicks, esq. Dr. J. Roberts.

Baltimore conference, as far as heard from.

Rev. S. G. Rozel, rev. Jacob Guest, Dr. Samuel Baker, Dr. Theodore Myers, Charles Warfield, esq. John Phillips, esq. Wm. M. Biddle, esq. rev. Alfred Griffith, Dr. Thos. Bond, Dr. Thos. Sewell, Dr. Ira Day, John P. Dulaney, James Dunlop, esq. Charles McClure, esq.

Both committees also joined unanimously in the nomination of the hon. John McLean and bishop Emory as ex-officio members of the board.

Arrangements will be immediately made by the new board for re-opening the college under the direction of able and experienced professors, and on a basis which will ensure the permanent usefulness of the institution. [Carlisle Herald.]

WHEELING. In copying an article from some other paper, we carelessly accepted a statement that the population of this thrifty and rapidly growing town was about 3,500. It is about twice that amount now—being 5,211 in 1830.

THE GREAT RAFT ON RED RIVER. We understand that an official communication has just been received at this place from capt. Shreve, the enterprising agent of the government for removing obstructions to navigation from the Mississippi and some of its important tributaries, stating that, within the space of twenty-six days, he had succeeded in removing twenty-six miles of the great raft on the Red River. Captain S. entertains the hope of being able to extend steam boat navigation up that river, 80 miles, before the close of the present season; and expresses great confidence in his ability, with the means at his control, aided by a moderate sum, to remove the entire raft within a short time. [Washington Globe.]

[A later account says that sixty miles of the raft had been cleared, at the expense of only about $14,000, and a perfectly good navigation made so far. It was believed that the whole work might be soon completed.]

NEW YORK STANDARD. From the Pennsylvanian. We find the following droll announcement in a copy of the New York Standard sent us by a friend.

The friends of the New York Standard are informed that its publication will be discontinued after the 30th instant. The subscriber does not feel called upon for reasons. JOHN I. MUMFORD.

June 14th, 1833.

Yet further! The following strange article is from the "Standard" of Monday last—

"I do not yet see cause to regret or alter my notice, of the 14th inst. I have served my party faithfully and devoted myself in all honor to private friends; and shall regret to be compelled, like Samson, to bear away the pillars and involve myself with others, who may force me to the act, in a common ruin. It was and is still improper for me to give the reasons for this determination in regard to an establishment which now yields $11,000 per annum clear profit; but they who know me know full well that I will not see the Standard perish without a struggle, nor ever see it pass into the hands of the enemy. I HOLD THE POWER, AND I WILL EXERT IT to right the party and myself. JOHN I. MUMFORD.

June 24, 1833.

Another notice. From the New York Standard of the 26th inst. "The causes which induced the notice of the 14th instant, announcing the intended discontinuance of the STANDARD, have so far ceased to operate as to enable us to state to the friends of the paper that it will not be discontinued, but will be carried on with increased efficiency. We are gratified to be able to announce this fact."

THE LONGITUDE DISCOVERY. We find, by a communication in the Cincinnati Republican, that the longitude is at length discovered. Captain Benjamin Jones Shain, of Cincinnati, a native of Delaware, has constructed a mathematical figure, from which he says that he can ascertain a ship's longitude at sea, by first having the latitude, the bearings of an object, and the assistance of some nautical tables.

POST OFFICE WIT. A few days since we received the following epistle, according to the rules of the post office department, "in such cases made and provided?"

Dover, N. H. post office, 14th June, 1833.

Sir—Pursuant to an instruction of the postmaster general of the United States, I have to inform you that the "New Bedford Gazette," addressed to the N. H. Palladium, is not taken up, but remains dead in this office. I am, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

B. F. GUPPY, assistant P. M.

"Reason—The Palladium ceased publication in August last—the publisher is since dead—his wife is dead, and it is a dead concern altogether." [N. Bed. Gaz.]

UNITED STATES DEBTORS. It may be a friendly service to those who were indebted to the United States previously to the 1st of January, 1831, and who are unable to pay the same, to remind them that the acts of congress for their relief will expire in the month of March next; and as the proofs and exhibits in such cases usually require much time in their preparation and arrangement, it may be expedient for them to give early attention to the subject, lest by casualty or the pressure of other concerns, the opportunity of relief may be lost by procrastination.

THE EDITORIAL PLURAL UNIT. As the following passage from the prefatory note to the Melange is very short, we shall transcribe it, although Pascal's hit at editors will probably naturally give the greatest umbrage to those to whom the satire is the most applicable:

"We have heard it intimated that there is something of ostentation or egotism in the use of this said plural unit, which is confined to monarchs and editors; but we conceive the reverse to be the fact, and we shall adduce in defence of the practice, the authority of a celebrated satirist. Pascal ridiculed those egotists who said 'my book,' 'my commentary,' 'my history,' and observed, that to say 'our book,' 'our commentary,' 'our history,' would be much better, since there is in them much more of other people's than their own."

CATHOLICISM IN THE UNITED STATES. From the Memoirs of American Missionaries, published by Pierce & Parker, under direction of the Andover society of inquiry, we learn that the Roman Catholic population of this country is estimated at 800,000, the number of congregations at 784. There are ten dioceses, or bishoprics; an archbishop resides at Baltimore.

The Boston diocese comprises all New England, but only a Catholic population of 20,000 (half of which are in Boston and vicinity) 18 priests and 23 congregations. Of the latter 6 are in Maine and 9 in Massachusetts.

"Here are eight or ten colleges, besides many academies and other literary institutions, entirely under the control of the Catholics; as many theological seminaries; and more than twice that number of convents or nunneries."

"In Baltimore they have several charity schools; St. Mary's free school and orphan's asylums, where the children of the poor and orphans are early brought under their influence. Several hundred children are in these schools, which are under the direction of the sisters of charity."

St. Mary's college, also in this city, has a theological department, and eight of the nineteen instructors are ecclesiastics. The course requires seven years. The library contains 10,000 volumes. Students, 150.

At Georgetown, D. C. is a jesuit college with the same number of students, 20 instructors and 8,000 volumes in the library. There is a college at Mobile, at New Orleans and Jackson, in Louisiana; one at Bardstown, (Ky.) with 150 students; one at Cincinnati; two in the St. Louis district, including one with 160 students in that city. The most splendid cathedrals are in St. Louis, Mobile and Baltimore. The latter city is styled the Rome of the United States. It contains 20,000 Catholics, five splendid edifices, a public Catholic property of a million of dollars, and a convent, and a nursery for blacks, besides the college. The cathedral is the most magnificent and largest temple in the union, having cost over $300,000, exclusive of ornaments, &c. The ground plan is 190 by 117 feet, diameter of the dome 77, and height 116 feet; two towers, at each wing, 120 feet high.* The congregation numbers 6,000, and is the same with whom Carroll worshipped. There are 67 priests in this diocese, besides those connected with seminaries, of which there are 14 in all. In the Cincinnati district the Catholics are said to be "rapidly increasing." In the St. Louis and New Orleans districts are more than 100 priests.

BRIEF NOTICES.

A second instance has happened at Albany of the dismissal of one of Mrs. Bradstreet's suits, because the jury could not agree. This lady claims a considerable portion of the city of Utica.

A Scotch paper notices an old woman living at Glasgow, who is 130 years of age. She never took a doctor's drug in all her life, nor was a lancet ever applied to her frame. She is perfectly free of affections of the chest, and, during the last century of her life, she has been a perfect stranger to pain, and her pulse does not exceed 70. Her grandfather died at the age of 129, and her father died in the 120th year of his age.

The editor of the Wyoming Herald, thus notices the copper mine recently discovered in Luzerne county.

"The mine is opened about twenty yards in length, and four feet thick; the ore is imbedded in grawacke, and in appearance is very extensive. A specimen of the ore, and also of the copper made from it, was a few days since shown to us, and we were assured that the yield is fifty per cent. If so, it is of itself 'a mine of wealth,' and will add much to the universal resources of the county, already rich in minerals, and all it wants to convert it into the solid metal is 'capital.'"

After the frolic was over, they numbered the slain, and found them to exceed four hundred and fifty.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Paris papers to the 16th May inclusive.

FRANCE.

The duchess of Berri has named her illustrious baby Anna Maria Rosalie, and insists that she has a husband, count Hector de Lucchesi Palli, second son of the viceroy of Sicily—which some believe, and some do not, is the father of her child. She was about to be sent to Palermo. She is said to have expressed a wish to be sent to America, supposing that her family will not receive her kindly.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The state of affairs between these kingdoms is rather warlike—but neither dare fight without leave.

SPAIN.

A letter of the 5th of May, from Tarragona, mentions an insurrection among the country people about Reus, three leagues from that town, occasioned by the instigation of the monks. Several villages had united and taken up arms. Their banner bears the inscription:—"long live Charles V. and death to the queen!" Of all the villages, Alforge and Pevoleda, have displayed the greatest violence.

But the queen is reported to be again pregnant, to the great annoyance of the Carlists, and yet may have a male baby for a king!

PORTUGAL.

Letters from Lisbon state that the Mignelite army is constantly diminishing in consequence of desertions, and that the squadron destined for Oporto is detained in the Lisbon roads, being unable to leave for want of sailors. Arrests are continually taking place, and there are now more than fifteen thousand prisoners of state, shut up in the neighboring prisons. Numbers of these unhappy people daily perish by hunger.

RUSSIA.

A letter from St. Petersburg, dated 25th April, states, that gen. Orloff has been ordered to proceed to Constantinople to take command of the Russian land and sea troops there, and has been accredited also as extraordinary ambassador. Hence it has been naturally concluded that the war will be continued. All the numerous disposable regiments were concentrated on the Turkish boundaries. Prince Baskewitch has prepared a plan of military operations against Ibrahim. A conscription of troops has been ordered in Poland—four out of every 1,000 inhabitants of the district.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

The intelligence from Constantinople is six days later than before received, extending to the 23d of April. The Augsburg Gazette of the 12th of May gives the following, of that date, as received by express from Constantinople:

"The negotiations with Ibrahim pacha are broken off, and preparations are making here to resume hostilities. Ibrahim pacha has received orders from his father not to renounce Adana, and he refuses to evacuate Natolia, until the sultan shall have made this concession. But the latter refuses to comply with the demand of the Egyptians, and has declared, that having given sufficient proofs of his forbearance, he retracts all his former concessions. Thus the sultan regards as null and void the proposals made to effect an arrangement, after the arrival of the auxiliary army from Russia. He wholly relies on this power, contrary to the expectations of admiral Roussin. It was supposed by many that the porte only negotiated to gain time; this opinion, however, appears not to have been entertained at head quarters at Koniah, or by the French embassy.

"It will now be a cause of regret to the Egyptians that the real intentions of the porte were not ascertained sooner; for Ibrahim pacha will scarcely venture to attack the Russian camp, and in case of a further loss of time, he will find it difficult to maintain his ground. The main army of the Russians will reach Constantinople about May 15th, and will, it is said, immediately commence offensive operations. The most intimate friendship now prevails between the Russian and Turkish authorities, and the sultan is most attentive in supplying the Russian troops with every thing necessary. There are now 14,700 Russians in the camp at Scutari, and to-morrow they will be joined by 400 Turkish artillerymen. Russian officers have been sent to the Dardanelles to put the castles into a state of defence. Thus the war appears to begin again with new vigor. The capital enjoys perfect tranquillity, to which the presence of the Russians no doubt contributes greatly."

The above account is substantially confirmed by a letter of the same date, received at Vienna, which says—

"Ibrahim imperiously demands the cession of Adana and Tarsus, and threatens, not only not to quit Kintais, but again to advance. The sultan somewhat reassured by the daily arrival of the Russian troops, and encouraged by the envoy of the czar, avoids all new concessions, and gives himself up with the greatest confidence to the Russians. If then Ibrahim persists, we may expect a renewal of hostilities."

An insurrection took place in the island of Cyprus, favorable to Mehemet Ali, but the island soon returned under the dominion of the grand seignor.

MEXICO.

The reported resignation of the presidency by Santa Anna is not true. He was inducted into office on the 16th of May, and in his speech to the congress declares—

"That the only and sacred object of his life has been to secure to the Mexicans the full enjoyment of those rights which constitute public felicity, to destroy the triple yoke of ignorance, tyranny and vice. That the moment for securing repose has arrived, and that he would never cease from seeking this result, which humanity and philosophy have promised from the last revolution. He declares that the exercise of the public power shall not be in his hands, the instrument of vengeance and oppression. That education, the vital element of the prosperity of nations, shall receive the first care of his government, in order that the nation may be worthy of its elevated rank and prepare the existence of a people that shall exult in the memory of its benefactors. My political intercourse, he adds, with the nations that live in peace and harmony with us, is upon the basis of the most strict reciprocity—just, impartial and unalterable. Peace is a blessing to the human race, and shall be preserved so long as the national dignity permits."

In sending you the statement herewith, I vouch for the facts, but after all previous experience of such matters, it would appear very possible that the crop may reach the quantity of 1,100,000 bales, and improvable that it should be so small as 1,000,000. The unusually bad state of the roads, during the last winter, and in the spring, may have detained some 50 or 30,000 bales more of the cotton than I have allowed.

AMERICAN IRON.

Many of the readers of the REGISTER will recollect, that, when discussing the tariff question some time ago, we made some important explanations as to the different qualities of iron, and used certain pointed remarks, because that Mr. Hayne, of S. Carolina, and Mr. Tyler, of Virginia, had ignorantly adopted some scandalously false statements which had been made concerning the duties payable on iron, regard being had to the quality of the domestic and foreign article. It is not worth while to review the facts; but the truth is, that the British iron, which these gentlemen spoke of, as compared with American iron, to shew the "excessive" duty paid on the former to protect the manufacture of the latter, was, and is, altogether a different article—as different as negro cloths manufactured from old clothes, are from domestic cloths made out of the wool of "native" American sheep; as the following interesting article extracted from the (Philadelphia) "Pennsylvanian" of the 25th ult. will shew:

Interesting experiments on the tenacity of iron. We witnessed on Thursday afternoon, in one of the apartments of the Franklin institute, a series of very interesting experiments on the tenacity of iron, conducted by Mr. Johnson, a scientific gentleman, attached to that establishment.

It seems that during the last few years, the frequency of steamboat explosions on the waters of the Mississippi, and the consequent destruction of life and property, have turned the attention of congress to the subject, with a view of arriving, by experiment, at some result calculated to abate the evil, so far as legislation can interfere in so valuable a purpose.— Some years ago, a western member introduced a resolution, which passed congress, authorising the secretary of the treasury to expend a stipulated amount in constructing machines to perform a series of experiments on the tenacity of iron, or other metals, used in the construction of steam boilers. A scientific gentleman of this city, was selected for the purpose; and a machine was constructed to conduct the experiments, which is now in successful operation in an upper apartment of the institute.

We learn from those qualified to judge, that this machine is far more complete than any thing of the like nature, either in England or France. The experiments made upon the tenacity of iron in both those countries, have been meagre and unsatisfactory, compared to what has already been achieved in this city.

It is impossible to convey to the reader any satisfactory description of the machine in question, which is a model for neatness, accuracy and despatch. It is constructed too, in such a way as to make experiments on the metals under any degree of temperature, from that of the atmosphere up to 500 degrees above zero in Fahrenheit. In this equal applicability of the apparatus to iron in a cold or warm state, it possesses a decided advantage over any experiments yet made either in this country or in Europe.

One of the most remarkable and interesting laws of nature, which have already grown out of these experiments, is the fact that the tenacity of good iron is increased by the application of a degree of heat under 400 or 450 degrees. The popular belief has been, that iron heated to that degree, is rendered less strong; or, in other words, its tenacity is impaired in a ratio equal to the heat applied. Such is now ascertained not to be the fact, within the limits of zero and 450 degrees.

On the occasion referred to, we witnessed the experiments made on several bars of American iron, manufactured in different parts of the country. One bar, in particular, of Tennessee manufacture, was submitted both to the hot and cold process in succession, and it exhibited a tenacity equal to that of any iron manufactured in the country. To express it in scientific language, it ranged from 59,000 to 64,000 pounds to the square inch, increasing under a degree of heat varying from the atmosphere to 450 degrees; for the heat under 450 degrees gives it invariably a small additional tenacity.

On inquiry, we found that this iron was the manufacture of the Cumberland iron works, situated on the Cumberland river, 100 miles below Nashville, in Tennessee —a large iron foundry, consisting of a rolling mill, two blast furnaces, two forges, &c. &c.

The records of a number of experiments on Juniata, Pittsburgh and other iron, were shown us, and, with some exceptions, the best Pennsylvania and Tennessee iron exhibit the same qualities. The iron of Connecticut is also remarkable for its tenacity, but we understood that New York iron had not yet been submitted to experiments. One remarkable fact we were made acquainted with. It is this: the most ordinary American iron is equal to the best British—and the best American is equal and frequently superior to the best Swedish or Russian that can be imported. These facts are encouraging to American science and art.

We understand that these interesting experiments are conducted in the afternoon of every Thursday and Saturday, and are open for the inspection of the lovers of science and the useful arts.

An extremely valuable report of these experiments is now preparing to be presented; through the secretary of the treasury, to the next congress.

CURVED ROADS AND LOCOMOTIVES.

The invention spoken of in the following communication, (says the Baltimore Gazette), is not new in principle—it is a part only of the combination claimed to be invented by Mr. James Wright of Columbia in Pennsylvania, for the purpose of causing rail road cars to pass with equal facility on curved or straight roads, for which Mr. Wright obtained a patent in September, 1829. A vibrating axle was also necessarily a part of the invention of Mr. Ross Winans, in the construction of carriage wheels of reduced friction, for which he obtained a patent in October, 1828. The right of Mr. Stevens might therefore be questioned if he were to obtain a patent for using a vibrating axle on a rail road car.

From the United States Gazette.

Mr. Editor—I was yesterday in crossing New Jersey, compelled to stop by the way and was so much gratified with the operations of a locomotive engine on the Camden and Amboy rail road, that I avail myself of your columns to make it known to the public.

This engine I understand is the second one completed for this company by Mr. Stevens, with improvements on the English engine imported by them. Six or seven more it is said will be added in a few weeks, when this species of power will be used on the road. This engine though only put up on Monday and never before worked on a road, yesterday run from Amboy to Bordentown in the most admirable manner. The distance from Hightstown to Bordentown was performed at the rate of 18 miles an hour, the speed was occasionally increased to thirty miles and could evidently have been very much accelerated.

My object however in noticing it is to call public attention to an invention by which all difficulty from curvature in rail roads are overcome, and the advantage is so obvious, that one is astonished in looking at it that the idea has never before occurred to those interested in the subject. The difficulty from curves in the line of a rail road has arisen from the axle of the wheel of the carriage being stationary—their tendency to a direct line and the consequent increase of friction from the action and lateral pressure of the flanges of the wheel upon the edge of the rail. In carriages drawn by horses the draughts has a tendency to remove the difficulty by inclining the carriage to the direction of the line which is pursued by the horse. It was necessary to overcome it altogether to enable a carriage to run as free on a curve as on a straight line. By the improvement alluded to this desideratum is attained.

I am no mechanic but perhaps can make myself sufficiently explicit to be understood, the improvements consist simply in a change in the mode of attaching the axle to the carriage. The boxes instead of being stationary in the frame of the carriage, work upon a sliding plane so as to admit of a change in the position of the wheels. The ends of the axle run in a strong frame work which is projected in front of the carriage and is there attached to the axle of two smaller wheels, as the carriage is propelled forward these guide wheels follow the direction of the track, and always preserve the parallelism of the carriage wheels with the rails. I witnessed several experiments on the most severe curves on the line. The result was uniform and the success complete. The flange never touched or run near the rail. It was manifest on an examination of the wheels at Bordentown that this had been the case throughout, although the curves had purposely been passed at the highest speed of the engine. I understand that this was but a repetition of prior experiments made with another engine on a carriage of the same construction with which a train of ten cars, besides the tender and a weight (exclusive of the carriage) equal to 340 passengers was propelled without the slightest impediment over all that portion of the line from which any difficulty could be anticipated.

I presume a patent has been, or will be obtained by Mr. Stevens to secure the right to this valuable invention.

BOSTON INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND.

Boston, June 1, 1833.

Hon. T. H. Perkins—

DEAR SIR: Mr. Prescott having laid before the trustees of the New England institution for the education of the blind, your proposal to convey to that corporation your estate in Pearl street, provided the sum of $50,000 should be raised from other sources in the course of the month of May; they immediately proceeded to take measures to comply, if possible, with this condition, and thus secure to the institution the benefit of your munificent offer.

The undersigned were appointed a committee on the part of the board, to prepare a circular and solicit subscriptions. The period within which the sum required was to be raised has now expired, and the committee having performed the duty assigned them, beg leave to present you the following statement:

Amount of subscriptions in the city of
Boston	$33,310
Salem	1,150
New Bedford	1,000
Hartford, Conn.	1,300
Nett proceeds of ladies' fair, Boston	11,400
“ “ “ “ Salem	2,957
	$51,117

An additional amount has been subscribed in New Bedford, Springfield and Worcester, but as the subscription papers have not been returned, the committee are unable to state it precisely.

In laying before you, sir, this gratifying result, the undersigned had great pleasure in acknowledging the ready and efficient aid afforded them by their fellow citizens in general. They are under particular obligations to the committee of gentlemen who volunteered to take charge of the subscription paper, to whom the community is greatly indebted for their exertions. The proceeds of the ladies' fair amount to nearly a fourth part of the whole sum. Considerable as is this contribution, the manner in which it was obtained constitutes its highest value. The enthusiasm with which our whole population repaired to Faneuil hall on that occasion—the touching nature of the appeal—the associations of the place, and the propriety and good taste of the arrangements, combined to render the scene in a remarkable degree interesting and impressive.

These circumstances altogether, convey, sir, the most acceptable tribute of thanks that can be offered to you, since they furnish conclusive evidence that not only the inhabitants of Boston, but our fellow citizens of the neighboring towns, and of other states, enter fully into the motives which prompted you to this splendid act of beneficence.

The committee feel that they can add nothing to this unequivocal expression of public sentiment. They can only thank you in behalf of their associates, for the generous aid you have extended to this charity, and assure you that they will endeavor to make such use of it as shall deserve the approbation of yourself and the community. Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

EDWARD BROOKS,
JOHN D. FISHER,
WM. P. MASON,
WM. H. PRESCOTT, } committee of trustees.

Boston, June 9, 1833.

To Messrs. Edward Brooks, John D. Fisher, Wm. P. Mason, Wm. H. Prescott, a committee of the trustees of the New England institution for the education of the blind.

GENTLEMEN: I received your letter yesterday on the subject of the "New England institution for the education of the blind," by which I am informed that upwards of fifty thousand dollars have been raised by the trustees in aid of that institution. In the confidence that this condition, annexed to the donation of my estate in Pearl street, would be met by the public in the month of May, I executed a deed of the estate and lodged it in the hands of the hon. William Prescott and William H. Gardner, esq. to be delivered when they were advised that the sum named had been subscribed; who will deliver the deed to you upon application.

Hoping and believing that all the good anticipated by those who have subscribed to this interesting establishment may be realized, I am, gentlemen, respectfully, your obedient servant,
T. H. PERKINS.

[The deed above referred to has been delivered to the trustees, and consequently the elegant edifice which has long been the residence of the liberal donor, is now the property of the institution.]

DOCKING OF THE DELAWARE.

From the Norfolk Herald.

The docking of the Delaware 74, took place, agreeably to previous notice, on Monday morning, [17th June] in the new dry dock at Gosport. The arrangements previously made were carried into effect with the utmost precision—no accident nor oversight caused a moment's delay; the huge floating castle was accurately adjusted in the centre of the dock, presenting a grand spectacle to the thousands of spectators who surrounded her. Presently the steam engine for pumping the water from the dock was set in motion, and the noble ship settled down till her keel rested on the blocks. Then commenced the work of applying props to either side, to preserve her level; and successive rows of these were affixed as the water was drawn off, until at last she was left "high and dry," standing fast and upright in the position in which it was intended to place her, and fixed with as much accuracy as if she had been lifted and placed there by a giant hand. The operation consumed the remainder of the day, and yesterday the dock was literally dry.

Thus has this stupendous work been completed, and the anxious and interesting operation of applying it to its intended purpose happily accomplished, under the direction and superintendence of its scientific and skillful engineer, col. Baldwin, to whom too much credit cannot be given for his successful consummation of so arduous, responsible and difficult an undertaking. In viewing the work as it now appears, in its perfect state, the mind is excited to admiration by its magnitude and beauty; and the practical evidence which it presents of its great utility, will convince any one who has an idea of the expense of "heaving down" a seventy four, that however great the cost of this work may be, it is economy in the end. The Delaware was copped twelve years ago, but will require it again, we should judge, before she can go to sea. Some brenches have been made in her old copper (which appears to have not been of the best quality) through which that destructive enemy, the worm, has perforated her planks, and in several small places eaten its way entirely through them.

A vast concourse of spectators were present to witness this novel and interesting scene, of whom a large proportion were ladies, from Norfolk, Portsmouth, and the neighboring country. We must do justice to the gallantry as well as science of col. Baldwin on this occasion; he had set apart the second story of the engine house, which commands a full and near view of the dock in front, and erected galleries, covered with sails and decorated with evergreens, on each side of the dock, for the exclusive accommodation of the ladies.

The doors of the hospitable mansion of commodore Warrington, commandant of the navy yard, were thrown open on the occasion, and the worthy commodore gave a hearty welcome to all who called to partake of the ample store of refreshments which he had provided for their entertainment.

As the ship passed into the dock, a salute was fired by the U. S. frigate Java, (receiving ship) under the command of lieutenant Fitzhugh, which was anchored off the navy yard, and splendidly decorated with the flags of all nations. Commodores Rodgers and Morris, commissioners of the navy board, were present at and for some days previous to the docking of the Delaware.

It is to be regretted that the time announced in the papers for the docking, was anticipated, by which the great mass of visitors were disappointed in their ardent desire to see that part of the exhibition—though, in truth, there was nothing remarkable in it—nothing more than hauling a vessel into dock, which may be seen every day. We learn, however, that the circumstance was accidental; the tide served before the hour appointed for the ship to go in, and we are told (though we knew it before) that "time and tide wait for no man." Our readers may be assured that the dock with the ship in it, as we said before, "high and dry," is much better worth seeing than the ship passing into the dock, or after she was docked, previous to pumping out the water.

Captain Henry E. Ballard, appointed to the command of the U. S. ship Delaware, arrived here yesterday morning in the steamboat Columbus, from Baltimore.

The Delaware is called a 74—but capable of throwing as great a weight of shot as a British ship rated at 100 guns. She is, however, much less than the Pennsylvania, and perhaps some others of our heavy ships.

DOCKING OF OLD IRONSIDES. That splendid structure, the dry dock at the navy yard in Charlestown, commenced in June, 1827, and lately finished, was opened yesterday morning at 5 o'clock to receive the frigate Constitution. The veteran Isaac Hull had the command of the ship, and, with his speaking trumpet in hand, trod the dock, as well he might, with a proud spirit. On board the frigate, were the vice president, the secretary of the navy, the secretary of war, hon. Joel R. Poinsett, of South Carolina, his excellency governor Lincoln, his honor the lieutenant governor, and many distinguished strangers, who are now the guests of the city. At half past 5 a salute was fired from a battery in the yard, and the gates of the dock were opened. In about 25 minutes the gallant ship was safely lodged within, and the hundred horse power engines immediately commenced pumping out the water, the Columbus 74 paying a grand salute to the occasion with her long thirty-two pounders.

After the entrance of the Constitution into the dock, com. Hull delivered three canes to the secretary of the navy, made of the original timber of the ship, which he stated were intended for the president, gov. Lincoln and Mr. Poinsett, of South Carolina.

Mr. Woodbury observed that he felt much pride in being selected as the individual to deliver the presents to the distinguished personages for whom they were designed. It added to his proud satisfaction to do the act on the deck of a ship that had accomplished so much for our national character, and which was so justly a public favorite. So far as it was in the power of man to preserve a vessel which was an emblem of this mighty republic, and from whose bond of union it derived its name, he hoped that it would be done.

He regretted deeply that the indisposition of the president prevented his being present on the occasion, and he would therefore place in the hands of the vice president the gift designed for the chief who was richly entitled to the appellation of "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The presents were then placed in the hands of the respective gentlemen, who returned their thanks in an appropriate manner.

Commodore Elliott, it will be recollected, commanded the naval station at Charleston during the last winter, and had ample opportunity to witness the noble stand taken by Mr. Poinsett against the nullifiers and in defence of the federal constitution.

The gift to this eminent patriot could not therefore have been otherwise than gratifying. In making his acknowledgments, he said that he was proud to be a citizen of these United States, and he was also proud that he was a native of South Carolina. Though some of the leading politicians of that state had pursued a course that was at war with the existence of the union, he was happy in having an opportunity to say, that their voice was not the voice of the people.

Commodore Hull gave his orders on board in true sailor-like character. To his remark that he was not at home in making speeches, commodore Elliott replied, "No matter, my friend—make your speech as short as your fight, and all will be satisfied."

[In two hours after the entrance of the ship, she rested upon the stone blocks prepared to receive her, and, in a short time, the dock was dry.]

MILITARY ACADEMY AT WEST POINT.

Report of the board of visitors to the general examination of cadets of the United States military academy, in June, 1853.

To the secretary of war:

The board of visitors who have been invited to be present at the general examination of the cadets of the United States military academy, in order that the war department may be correctly informed of the condition and management of the academy, have attended the examination of all the classes and are perfectly satisfied with the progress made by the cadets in the several departments of their studies in which they were examined.

At the request of the superintendent, a committee appointed by order of the board, assigned the subjects to each individual of the class, in order to avoid all suspicion of the examining professor having adapted the subject to the capacity and attainments of the cadet, so as to exhibit an appearance of greater proficiency than the class really possessed.

The first class was examined in military and civil engineering, in mineralogy, rhetoric, ethics and constitutional and national law, and in infantry and artillery tactics; and in each of these departments exhibited proofs of their application and attainments, and of the zeal, capacity and industry of the professor and assistants. The cadets of this class will leave the academy well fitted to fulfil the great objects of the institution, viz. to introduce into the armies of the United States all the modern improvements in the art of war, and the high state of discipline which distinguishes the best armies of Europe, to disseminate throughout our country a knowledge of military tactics and engineering, so as to furnish the means of rendering our militia as well as our regular army an efficient arm of defence in time of war; and to provide officers properly instructed and fully capable of superintending the construction of fortifications for the permanent defence of our maritime frontier, and of works connected with the internal improvement of the country.

The cadets of the second class were examined in chemistry and natural philosophy, and showed a degree of proficiency very creditable to the professors and assistants, who have been charged with their instruction in these departments. The board would here remark, that in their opinion it would be expedient to establish a permanent professor of chemistry. The important discoveries made and still making in this department of science, and its application to the useful arts, as well as its connexion with the means of preserving the health of the soldier in camps and barracks render it important that it should be taught in this academy, and it is obvious that it requires great application, experience and long practice to teach a science which must be illustrated by experiments made before the pupil. It is believed to be difficult to acquire the art of instructing youth in any department of literature or science; but it is especially so in those which require skill in demonstrating the theories and principles by experiments. Instruction in such branches ought not to be entrusted to officers liable to be frequently removed.

The third class were examined in mathematics and French. There is no institution that we are acquainted with where this department of science in its higher branches is more thoroughly taught than in this academy. The high attainments and unwearied industry of the professors and assistants together with the great application and capacity of the cadets of the third class were exhibited throughout the course of this examination in a manner highly satisfactory to the board.

The examination in French was very creditable to the teachers and cadets of this class. They appeared to be well instructed in the grammar of this difficult language, conjugating the regular and irregular verbs very correctly, and they translated it into English with great facility, which is all that is deemed requisite: the principal object of this course being to enable the cadet to consult the best French authors on military science.

As there are at least 160 students to be taught in this language, it is believed by those best acquainted with the subject, that another teacher in this branch ought to be added to those already employed.

The fourth class were examined in mathematics and French. The cadets of this class evinced a degree of proficiency in the elementary branches of mathematics highly creditable to the gentleman who is charged with this department of their studies. Whatever may be the talents and application of the student, he cannot make any proficiency in this essential department of study, which may be considered as the foundation of all military education, unless his studies are directed by a person not only profoundly versed in the science, but possessed of great experience in the art of instructing youth; and the board would take this opportunity of remarking that to remove such an instructor from the academy for the purpose of substituting another, who, whatever his talents and acquirements may be, does not possess the same experience and practice in teaching, cannot but be prejudicial to the interests of the academy, and would be unjust to the cadets.

The government expects from them, especially in the department of mathematics, a degree of proficiency, which they cannot obtain without the assistance of competent instructors; and they may be exposed to be turned back as deficient, or to be dismissed as incapable of going through the course of studies in the academy, because the instructor provided for them is incompetent or inexperienced.

The board is induced to make these remarks from having had before them a late order of the commander in chief, containing regulations sanctioned by you, which, if applicable to this academy, would seem calculated to affect very materially the instruction of the cadets. It appears to them that the regulations requiring all officers, who have not served with their regiments for three years to join their respective corps, as it will remove nearly all the assistant professors from the academy, would be attended with very great inconvenience at any time; and at this period, when the superintendent, who has so long presided over this institution, with such signal ability and success, is about to retire, such a change would seriously embarrass his successor. This embarrassment will be increased by the effect of the regulation, which takes from the superintendent the power of nominating the officers to be detached for that service. He is supposed from his situation to be better acquainted than any one else with the acquirements and moral character of the graduates, and as the responsibility rests with him, it appears but just that he should have the power of selecting his assistants. It is deemed important, that the course of studies should be steady, and keep pace with the improvements which daily take place in the progress of science. This would be impracticable if the assistant professors were frequently changed and selected from officers who had graduated prior to the introduction of the improvements now taught in this institution throughout every department of science. Indeed it would appear advisable that the professors and assistant professors, who have evinced so much capacity in imparting instruction to youth, should be offered every inducement to remain by being permanently attached to the institution, and receiving some additional allowance for services materially affecting the future character and efficiency of the army, and which, if they were rendered in any literary institution in the country, would command much higher pecuniary rewards. The board attended the battalion, light infantry, and artillery drills, and had every reason to be satisfied with the instruction of the cadets in their field exercises. They were present likewise in the laboratory when the cadets exhibited their proficiency in pyrotechny, and they subsequently saw them throw shells, and fire at the target with light and heavy pieces of artillery; all which they executed with a precision rarely equalled, and not surpassed in any school of practice in Europe.

This is the more remarkable from the state of the pieces used for practice. They are very defective, and the board recommend that the several pieces of ordnance which are required for the instruction of the cadets by their able and scientific instructor, should be furnished of the best quality and most approved constructions.

Much credit is due to the officer charged with the instruction of the cadets in this department. He has compiled a practical treatise on military pyrotechny, and translated an excellent elementary treatise on the forms of cannon and various systems of artillery, and another on the theory and practice of gunnery, from the French of professor Persy, of Metz; all of which, with numerous plates illustrating the subjects, have been published in the lithographic press in the academy.

The cadets are encamped two months in every year, and during that period are instructed in all the duties of the soldier in active service, in the use of instruments, and in the application of the different branches of science necessary to a knowledge of their profession; whether this practical course of the application of science to the purposes of military and civil engineering may not be usefully extended is worthy of consideration.

The library of the academy contains a very valuable collection of works adapted to the peculiar objects of this institution. It is rich in works on military science and on civil engineering, and contains a valuable series of military history and the best geographical and topographical maps of the states of Europe to illustrate this important study. It is true that in works on polite literature it is as yet rather deficient, although the selection has been very judicious; but however desirable it may be to augment the number of volumes on miscellaneous subjects, the real object of the institution must be kept steadily in view, and it will continue to be the duty of the superintendent to purchase, in preference to all others, books relating to the sciences taught in this academy, and to supply the necessary works on architecture, chemistry, geology, mineralogy and moral science, in which the library is still very deficient.

The philosophical apparatus and astronomical instruments are of the best kind and of the latest invention, but many more are required fully to illustrate the course of natural philosophy.

The building which contains the library and philosophical apparatus is both unsafe and unstable, and the rooms are so small and inconvenient as not to admit of the necessary arrangement and display of them for useful purposes. Many instruments of the philosophical apparatus, which are delicate in their structure and uses, and require to be very nicely and accurately adjusted, are exposed to be injured by the constant and violent shaking of the edifice, and the finer astronomical instruments cannot be used from the same reason and from want of space. A large telescope is placed in a detached building entirely unsuited to its uses.

For these reasons and from the intrinsic value of the books and instruments, the board recommend the erection of a fire proof building with an observatory annexed to it.

Upon a careful and minute examination of the public buildings of the academy, it has been found, that they are inadequate to the purposes of the institution, and are not only badly constructed, but entirely too limited to afford comfortable or proper accommodations for the cadets who are lodged in them.

A number of cadets are from necessity crowded into a small room, which must produce a prejudicial effect upon their studies, their morals and their health. That they have been exempt hitherto from the diseases which are engendered in confined and crowded apartments, is due altogether to the admirable system of internal police and strict attention to cleanliness, which distinguish every department of this institution.

There is besides a want of accommodations for the assistant professors; and the quartermaster, paymaster and adjutant are without offices. For all these purposes nearly fifty new rooms are required. The board would recommend, that the superintendent be instructed to furnish a plan of a building capable of uniting all the accommodations required by the officers and cadets now at the academy, and of being extended whenever the government may think it expedient to enlarge this institution, and render it proportionate to our vast territories and rapidly increasing population; and that whenever it may be thought proper to erect the building now called for, it may be so constructed as to form part of an edifice hereafter to be completed with more extensive accommodations.

On examining into the fiscal concerns of the academy, the board had every reason to be satisfied, that great economy has been exercised in the administration of this department of the institution, and cheerfully bear testimony to the order and regularity with which the books are kept, and the receipts and disbursements accounted for, as well as to the integrity and judicious economy with which the finances of the academy are administered.

There are several subjects, the importance of which is fully understood and acknowledged by the superintendent and academic staff, but which are not taught in this institution for want of time. In military and civil engineering, it is thought that the following might be introduced with great advantage to the cadets: A course of applied mechanics on the investigation and description of some of the most usual machines employed in the construction of public works. Some practical exercises in the field, such as laying out and throwing up some of the works of a campaign which are most ordinarily used; batteries, trenches, cavaliers, the manner of conducting saps, the construction of gabions and fascines, &c. &c. and a course of topography as applied to military reconnaissances; indeed, such is the vast importance of this branch, that a new department, embracing the whole subject, could not fail to be very advantageous to the military student.

In the department of natural philosophy, many important practical illustrations might be advantageously introduced. At present, the experimental part of the course is principally confined to the illustration of such facts and general principles as may be established by experiments exhibited in the presence of the entire class. These illustrations are attended with the most beneficial effects, as they serve to make a very forcible impression on the mind of the student, but they are alone insufficient. It is frequently important that the student should not only be acquainted with the name and use of an instrument, but that he should be able to employ it himself. This can only be done, when sufficient time is allowed for each student to make frequent use of such instruments under the immediate direction of the professor.

This deficiency is particularly felt in the course of astronomy, where an intimate acquaintance with the use of instruments, and the habits of submitting the data furnished by observation to the process of calculation, are essentially necessary to enable the student to apply his theoretical knowledge to useful purposes. The instruction in practical astronomy is altogether too limited. The time which can be devoted to this object being scarcely more than sufficient to permit the professor to make the students acquainted with the objects of the few instruments in the possession of this department. This is certainly a great defect; important lines are frequently required to be established as boundaries between states and territories of neighboring nations, where the accurate use of instruments is of the last importance, and the cadets of this academy ought to be practically taught to use them with perfect correctness.

The principles of strategy or grand tactics might be taught with advantage.

It is true that there is no work treating of those subjects which is sufficiently condensed and at the same time perfectly unexceptionable in its principles and illustrations; but the same industry and talent which have furnished text books in other departments of military science, might be employed for this purpose with great success, and furnish a series of lectures embracing a definition of the technical terms employed and of such general principles as admit of the clearest and most exact illustration.

It appears always to have been desirable that cavalry tactics should be taught at a great national military academy. This branch has hitherto been totally neglected; but it has become more essentially necessary since this arm has been added to the regular army of the country. The service of cavalry and horse artillery ought to form a part of the practical instruction of this academy, and the board respectfully recommend this subject to your consideration. As the cadets are now occupied sedulously every hour of the day in the prosecution of the studies now taught in this institution, it will be necessary, if these subjects are deemed of sufficient importance to be added to the present course, that the term of the academic study should be extended—or that the qualifications required on entering the academy should be made much greater than they now are. They are now lower than is required by any literary institution in this country, and no doubt the frequent dismissal of those young men, who cannot keep up with their class, arises principally from this cause. Parents ought to be informed of the great advantage their sons would derive the first year of their course of this academy by being well grounded in the classics, in arithmetic and algebra, and in the rudiments of the French language.

The manner in which the cadets are furnished with clothing; was a subject of inquiry by the board, who were satisfied that this was done in the most economical manner. Their mess room was inspected while the cadets were at their meals, and the board were satisfied that the steward fulfilled his contract faithfully, and supplied the tables with abundance.

An inquiry having been made into the manner in which the cadets are supplied with the class books and stationery, the board are satisfied, after a careful investigation, that the cadets are supplied with all such articles at a lower price than they can be purchased in New York and in the most convenient, just and economical manner; and that the arrangement made by the superintendent in this particular, is marked by the same prudent economy, order and intelligence, which characterize the management of the institution.

The board having learned that the present superintendent of the military academy, whose health has suffered from his close attention to the affairs of the institution, has, by his own solicitation, been called to the performance of other duties, cannot forbear to express the very high sense they entertain of his merit and services during the long period of his command of the station.

To the knowledge acquired with this view by col. Thayer, the military academy of the United States owes its present admirable organization; and to his zeal, capacity and unwearied attention to his duties, is to be attributed the high state of discipline and improvement of the institution. To his exertions we owe in a great measure the success of this establishment, the extensive usefulness of which needs only to be understood by the nation to be fully appreciated.

Independently of serving to disseminate over the vast territories of the United States, knowledge of a description which cannot enter into the usual course of studies in other academies, and furnishing the means of rendering much effective our army and militia, of securing our frontier and improving the communications throughout the states, it is calculated to elevate the moral state of the military profession in our country, the importance of which to the general interests of the nation, cannot be too much insisted upon.

The annals of history prove, that success in arms is one of the most faithful sources of personal popularity, and in a country where the soldier is still a citizen, and may be called upon to share in the civil government, or rise to the highest honors of the state, the standard of study and discipline cannot be too high, which develops his talents and forms his character. The same annals show that at the close of successful wars, the liberties of a country depend in a great measure upon the character of its armies—at such a period the fortunate soldier possesses power, and great and probably well earned popularity, and if his character is not so elevated by nature or education as to lead him to prefer the solid fame of having preserved the liberties of his fellow-citizens to the glitter of false ambition, and to sacrifice all personal views of aggrandizement to the good of his country, he may plunge the state into anarchy or rivet upon his fellow citizens the chains of despotism. If ever the liberties of the states of Europe shall be recovered, it will be effected through the improved condition, character and education of their officers and soldiers; and while we indulge the hope that the liberty of these states rests upon too firm a basis to be overthrown by the ambition of those who compose our armies, it cannot be concealed that if they were not instructed, their ignorance and depravity might seriously endanger the peace of the country.

The board have observed with some regret, that the old works in the neighborhood of the academy have been in some instances, disturbed. They ought, in their opinion, to be preserved as monuments of the glorious struggle, which secured our independence. The contemplation of such memorials cannot fail to have a beneficial effect. They are calculated to inspire all Americans with sentiments of exalted patriotism, and to remind them of the extraordinary efforts and great sacrifices made by our forefathers to achieve the liberty and independence of the country—and cannot fail to lead them to form virtuous resolutions and to reflect, that as heirs of the immortal fame of their ancestors, they are bound to emulate their glorious career, and preserve their bright inheritance with the same inflexible courage and undeviating purpose.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

We copy the following neat abstract from the Baltimore "American."

The fifth annual report of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company occupies one entire page of the ample sheet of the National Intelligencer of yesterday. It is an important and valuable document, but entirely too long for republication in this paper. We can only furnish an abstract of the principal statements, as to the progress of the work, its condition and prospects, and the finances of the company.

The prevalence of the cholera in the valley of the Potomac during last summer retarded the works, but notwithstanding that obstruction, the most costly part of the new line above Harper's Ferry, (14 miles in length), has been completed, bringing 26 miles more into use, which were formerly without water, so that by the first of July boats may enter the canal from the bed of the Potomac above Harper's Ferry falls, or from the Shenandoah, in the midst of them. The works above the falls have proceeded with like diligence.

The force employed on this part averaged, for the five weeks preceding the 18th of May, 2,700 laborers, 655 horses, mules and oxen, and the powder employed in blasting rock, 7,000 pounds a week. The entire force on the canal, for the same period, was 4,460 laborers, 1,048 horses, mules and oxen, and an average weekly consumption of 10,000 pounds of gunpowder.

The work done since the 1st of May, 1832, has cost $915,211 89, of which $753,019 26 was expended above the Point of Rocks, and $162,102 63 below. Of the latter sum $53,107 35 was expended in the city of Washington, and $21,220 72 at the Little Falls dams. This excludes cost of superintendence, land purchases, condemnations and incidental expenses.

The amount necessary to be done before the first of October next, in order to fulfil the contracts, and complete the line of 102 miles of canal and 15 miles of still water navigation, the report states in the following form, dating from the first of May last. At that time there remained to be done,

For the line of canal, in Washington,	$11,740 23
For that between the Point of Rocks and the head of Harper's Ferry falls,	94,545 00
For that above these falls, and below the ferry at Shepherdstown, inclusive of the lock just let,	82,537 00
And for that above Shepherdstown,	513,958 22

Making the total amount, $702,815 51

Some of these are stated as incidental works, the construction of which may be deferred.

To this sum must be added $12,500 for another lock opposite to Shepherdstown in compliance with the conditions of the Virginia subscription. The board has determined to transfer the locks above, to a point below and increase the canal four miles, diminishing the still water navigation that much, and thus add $100,000 to the cost of the canal. These sums, ($100,000 and $12,500), added to the aggregate above, give $815,315 51 as the estimated expenditures to be made between the first of May last and first of October next, to fulfil the contract. Nearly the whole line below Shepherdstown will be finished by the first of August, and the report anticipates that a concentration of all the force on the line above that point, would finish it in due time.

The amount of expenditures for the year ending May 1st ult. was $821,392 74 in the following proportions:—For construction, $754,573 87; engineer department, $19,453 30; pay of officers, $6,935 50; lands $27,655 79, besides incidental expenses. A large amount, not included in the above, is retained by contractors as security for diligence and fidelity in the contractors.

The sums required from May first to October first, are stated as follows: The estimate of cost of construction as stated above is $815,351, which, added to the retained amount due contractors, is, exclusive of April estimate and the retained money of the month of May, &c. $900,000

To which add for these items, engineer allowances, expenses, &c. 206,000

Total sum required $1,106,000

To meet this the resources are:—cash, 508,532 62
Uncalled for and uncollected stock 616,571 92

Amount to be received from the rail road company, above the cost of graduating road, &c. 170,000 00

$1,295,104 54

The report thus shows a surplus of $189,000, after completing 117 miles of canal and still water navigation. Upon the fulfil of this surplus, considering it applicable to the extension of the eastern division of the canal to Cacapon, they have directed the necessary location and survey. This sum is to be used to prepare the necessary dams and aqueducts in part, during the succeeding autumn.

The estimates for the remaining 75 miles of the eastern section of the canal are the next general head, preliminary to which the report enters into several statements to show the economy with which the work has been prosecuted. They show that exclusive of six miles below tide water, 100 miles of the canal, three of tow path beneath a cliff of rocks, and 11 of slack water navigation, have been made at an expense of less than $32,000 per mile, and that 42 miles above Harper's Ferry have cost, including land purchases, condemnations, and every thing but contingent expenses, less than $25,000 per mile.

At this latter sum is estimated the cost of the remaining 75 miles, making a total of $1,850,000—of which the pecuniary resources of the company, making due allowance for unavailable stock, do not at present supply more than $150,000; leaving, consequently, $1,700,000 to be hereafter provided.

To supply this deficiency, ultimately, much reliance is placed on the water rights granted by the charters of Virginia and Maryland, but any application to that resource is advised against, until the final issue of "the legal controversy, respecting its just extent, now depending, in the supreme court of the United States, and the issue of such efforts as the friends of the canal in Maryland, may make, to liberate the recent grant of that state from those restrictions which prevent it from being responsible, in terms to the preceding act of Virginia."

It is recommended that for the present, loans should be sought for on the future exercise of these rights, and confident expectations are expressed of future subscriptions by Maryland, Virginia and the United States. The compliance of the canal company with conditions annexed to the subscription of Virginia, and their acceptance of the compromise law of Maryland, in favor of the rail road company, are urged as giving them claims to further favor.

The report further contemplates the aid of the United States in the employment of the army, to tunnel the Alleghany mountains.

The tolls for the last year were $22,625 55, and the whole sum received from the commencement of the work $88,989 28.

The rest of the report consists of some speculations upon the future productiveness of the canal after it shall have reached the coal region, and a history of the compromise with the rail road company, in which the following paragraph occurs:—

When the canal shall have been completed, as the undersigned now confidently trusts it will be, without further embarrassment, while the rail road car is seen pursuing its rapid course to the south, and the canal boats steadily urging their course to the west, the line of about twelve miles for which these great works are brought in contact, by the late compromise, will dwindle into a point, not of collision between embittered rivals, but of union between generous friends, seeking, by different means, a common object—the public good.

THE LATE COL. WM. MACREE.

COMMUNICATED BY ONE WHO KNEW HIM WELL.

William MacRee was a native of Wilmington, N. C. the son of capt. G. S. MacRee, of the continental line of that state. In the year 1803, at the age of 14 he was accidentally met by the late and venerated chief of the engineers, col. Williams, who, discovering in him an ardent and inquisitive mind, procured for him a cadetship of the military academy. In two years, MacRee was commissioned in the engineers.

At the commencement of the late war, he had obtained a majority in that corps. The war roused his genius and brought it to notice. His talents had been usefully employed at various points of the union, between Georgia and Canada. The annals of the frontier war at Niagara show that to MacRee's military genius and valor, gen. Brown, with just magnanimity, ascribed much of the best success of the army.

Peace found the virtuous and modest MacRee rewarded with brevets. In the following year the government associated him with the then major (now colonel) Thayer, in a mission to France, to collect the records of European military science and experience, for the use of the military academy; which service was most ably performed. In the year 1819, col. MacRee retired from the army to private life, from whence the government and individual states sought to draw his talents for prominent stations, which he modestly declined—finally accepting the surveyor-generalship of Missouri, &c. In the discharge of the duties of that troublesome and thankless office, preparatory to again retiring to privacy, his career in this life was arrested by cholera, in the 46th year of his age, at St. Louis, in May, 1833.

Colonel MacRee was distinguished by a highly cultivated mind, strong reasoning faculties, and a safe judgment; to which were united the talents of a general and the virtues of benevolence. His society was eagerly coveted; his conversation was most interesting. His retiring modesty and deference to others, made it difficult to draw him forth; but when the growing interest of a topic had excited his attention, his eloquence became alike attractive and instructive. Educated by and for the nation, at an institution where sectional and personal objects are lost in a patriotic devotion to the whole union, entire and free, MacRee was never known to be a member of any political party.

From early youth his department was ever grave and dignified; his personal attachments few, warm and steady.

PATENT RIGHTS—LAW CASES.

From the American of May 31.

We have received for publication the following detailed notice of the trial of the case which has occupied the U. States circuit court for this district during the last three weeks:

James Wright, vs. the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company. This case terminated on Wednesday, after a laborious investigation of twenty-five days. The plaintiff, in September, 1829, obtained a patent for the combination of the conical form of the edges of the wheels, and the vibratory motion of the axles, to make a rail road car travel with equal facility on straight and curved roads; and the action was brought for an alleged invasion of the patent right by the defendants. The only question was, whether the invention of the combination had been known and used, within the meaning of the act of congress, prior to the date of the plaintiff's patent: for, if so, his patent was void. To prove such a use and knowledge, the defendants offered in evidence—that the Winans' friction wheel, patented by the inventor, in October 1823, and the use of which they had purchased, could not be applied to the coned wheels in use on rail roads, at the date of the patent, without producing, as an inevitable consequence, the combination of cone and vibration, identical in principle with that claimed by the patentee: and that it had been so applied, anterior to the date of the plaintiff's patent. It was also proved, that the cone, on the edges of rail road wheels, was well known, and used, in England, as facilitating the turning of curves, long before the date of the plaintiff's patent, and the defendants contended, that a recovery, therefore, by the plaintiff, would deprive them of the use of a right, purchased in 1823, although the earliest date of the discovery of Wright only went back as far as the 1st day of September 1829, and although the originality and merit of Winans' invention was undisputed. Independent of this, however, the defendants offered evidence to prove that in January 1829, Winans went to England to perfect his friction wheel, and in March, 1829, applied it to the coned wheel cars, on the Liverpool and Manchester rail road, using the flanges on the outside, with the wheels loose on the axles; that after one or two trials he reversed the wheels, fastened them to the axles, to see how the cone would act; and thus, his friction wheels necessarily, having the vibration, produced the combination of the cone and vibrating axle; that, seeing immediately the success of the combination, he proceeded to make the calculations necessary to ascertain the cone that would be required for curves of 400 feet radius, the limit on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and in the month of June, 1829, built a car, with wheels coned for curves of 400 feet radius, with which various experiments were made to his satisfaction, to see among other things how its increased play would do on a straight road like the Liverpool and Manchester road, during the month of July, 1829. That this car was sold after the experiments made with it, was shipped to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, on the 25th of July, 1829, and reached the United States on the 22nd of September, 1829, and in the spring of 1830, as soon as rails were laid down for flanges on the inside, the car, thus imported, was put on the road, answered all the purposes contemplated by Mr. Winans, turned the curves by means of the cone and vibration, and was used until the wheels, which were cast of soft metal, not chilled, wore out on the coned part: That the same car, with wheels of the cone and cylinder form, like those at present used, (and whose operation was proved to be the same in principle with the wheels sent out by Mr. Winans) was employed upon the road for a long time afterwards: That the cars now used were the same in principle with the car last mentioned, the only difference being in the form of the cone on the triad. That when the car was sent to the United States its properties to turn curves by the combination were communicated by Mr. Winans to the Messrs. Brawins and others, in Liverpool: That in the month of August, 1829, Mr. Winans employed an English solicitor to prepare a specification of his inventions, a copy of which specification was produced in court, and witnesses were examined to prove that it contained a description of a self-adjusting car, acting upon the principle patented by the plaintiff in the September following. Upon the evidence here stated, the defendants conceived that they had proved, that the plaintiff was not the first and true inventor of the combination, in the meaning of the patent law, but that it had been known and used before the date of his supposed invention; and various prayers, having reference to this question, were offered to the court. With regard to the court's decision upon these, no opinion is intended to be expressed, as it will be brought before the supreme court on appeal. The verdict of the jury, in favor of the plaintiff, was for $2,100, a sum just sufficient to authorise an appeal. Had it been less than $2,000, no appeal could have been taken; and the rail road company in any future suits, it is possible, would have been prevented from disputing the plaintiff's title, and limited to the ascertainment only of the amount of damages.

From the Portland Courier.

The patent baker case. This was an action for damage brought by L. Dobson, of Connecticut, against Campbell & Mills, of Bangor, for making and vending double reflecting bakers, for which said Dobson had a patent right. It occupied about a day and a half before the United States circuit court, in this place last week, and excited a good deal of interest. The case was managed on the part of the plaintiff by Messrs. Greenleaf, Fessenden and Debois, and for the defendant by Mr. Sprague.

The plaintiff proved his patent right, and also proved by depositions that defendants had made and vended two or three thousand of the bakers.

The arguments of the counsel were able and ingenious, and the charge of judge Story as usual learned and interesting. The jury after being absent a short time, returned with a verdict of 120 dollars for the plaintiff. And the law in such cases allowing triple damages, the plaintiff recovers 360 dollars and costs.

Massachusetts superior judicial court, Bristol county, April term, 1833.

E. G. PERKINS vs. JAMES STEPHENS.

Mr. P. the plaintiff in this case, is an engraver of celebrity in the city of New York, and Mr. Stephens, the defendant, is the topographical engineer of the state of Massachusetts.

The nature of the action and the evidence produced on the trial by the plaintiff, elicited an intense interest.

The defendant offered no testimony.

The action was to recover the value of a copper plate engraved by Mr. P. called the "Village Coquette," deposited into the hands of a third person, from whom it was obtained by Mr. S. in a fraudulent manner, who caused a large number of impressions to be taken therefrom, having erased the name of Perkins.

After an able charge from judge Wilde, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff $300 and costs.

Warren for plaintiff; Baylie for defendant.

PENNSYLVANIA CANAL DEBT.

More than half the amount of this debt is in the hands of foreigners; but the list is a very motley one. We copy the following names from the Harrisburg Telegraph. It shows that foreigners have great confidence in the government of that state and of the country; and that while we enjoy such confidence capital will be abundant.

The whole amount held by foreigners is $9,301,712 out of $16,463,661, or upwards of one half of the whole. Among this curious list we notice the following:—His royal highness Charles, sovereign duke of Brunswick, $52,500; the most hon. Francis Seymour Conway, marquis of Hertford, 21,200; John Marshall, of Leeds, 38,700; do. 23,500; sir Charles Richard Blunt, of Heathfield Park, Sussex, 20,000; count de Exceville, of Paris, 7,500; R. I. Thompson, of Kirby Hall, Yorkshire, 26,600 93, admiral Fellows, of Portman square, London, 12,000; Mr. Henry Fellows, of Ramsay Abbey, Huntingdonshire, 25,000; Wilhelmina Philipina Van Tuyl Van Scootcken of Amsterdam, sum not stated; right hon. William Alexander, of London, 17,500; Samuel Gurney, of London, 25,000; John Hey Peget, of Totteridge, England, 18,878 47; Mr. Shiershaux, of Leeds, 7,604 70; gen. Thornton, of Herfordshire, 14,000; Abiel Tucker, of St. Thomas, 20,000; Candelaris Yardi de Bell, of St. Jago de Cuba, 27,800; Louis Albert de Brancas, duke of Cereste, 500; Madame Louisa Paulina de Castellux, countess de Damas, of Paris, 32,900; major general John Maister, of Marwick, England, 91,000; the hon. Anne Rushout, of Winstead, Essex co. 20,000; Andrew Service, of London, 32,353 56; Alexander Sanderson, of Castle Sanderson, county of Cavan, Ireland, 20,000; Emanuel Victor Pauray de L'Auberliedzerre de Quinsol, of Paris, 20,000; Gowan and Mera, of London, 97,400; Josefa Espenosa de Guesta, of Mexico, 5,380 67; Thomas Catterell, of Birmingham, England, 17,614 38; William Death, of Herts co. 24,000; Pierre Maria Di Duriex, of South Wales, 6,531 41; William John Jaech Hurry, of Great Yarmouth, 6,480 26; Richard Bolus Hall, of Wye, 21,600; John Hall, of do. 16,800; John Bacon Sawny Morritt, of Rokeby Park, Yorkshire, 23,000; Mrs. Ana Redfern, of Birmingham, 25,653 23; Helene Francove Ferte

Guillaume Favre, of Geneva; Ann Selonia Farrer and lieutenant-col. William Fawcett, of Bath, England, 25,000; Johannes de Veer and Philip Disk Thompson Milton Spirt, of St. Eustatia, 15,000; Charles Louis count de Vogere of France, 4,500; Robert Peel, esq. of Park Crescent, Portland Place, London, 39,000 Philip Louis de Peyronnet Baron de Saint Marce, 6,700.

The whole list is a very amusing document; some of the names are in the highest degree unique and odd, worthy of a place in a new dictionary of proper names.

Will not some of the "reformers" speak to this? What—the canals of "democratic" Pennsylvania digged by foreign money—the money of dukes and lords, and knights and squires, in England, France, and elsewhere! It is a "burning shame" that foreigners should hold stock in the bank of the United States, though they have no control over the direction of its affairs—but poor Pennsylvania, how deeply must she be under "foreign influence!" Will not some recent "blue light federalist," but now "wool-dyed democrat," propose, at the next sitting of the legislature, to pay off the canal debt, for the sole purpose of getting rid of royal and most noble and right honorable, and honorable foreign creditors?

LAW OF PENNSYLVANIA.

An act to abolish imprisonment for debt, and for other purposes.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, That the cost on appeals hereinafter entered, from the judgments of the justices of the peace and aldermen shall abide the event of suit, and be paid by the unsuccessful party as in other cases. Provided, That if the plaintiff be the appellant, he shall pay all costs that may accrue on the appeal if in the event of the suit he shall not recover a greater sum, or a more favorable judgment than was rendered by the justice. And provided also, That if the defendant, either on the trial of the cause before the justice or the referees, or before an appeal is taken, shall offer to give the plaintiff a judgment for the amount which the defendant shall admit to be due, which offer it shall be the duty of the justice and of the referees to enter on the record, and if said plaintiff or his agent shall not accept such offer, then in that case, if the defendant shall appeal, the plaintiff shall pay all the costs which shall accrue on the appeal, if he shall in event of the suit recover a greater amount than that for which the defendant offered to give a judgment, and in both cases the defendant's bill shall be taxed and paid by the plaintiff, in the same manner as if a judgment had been rendered in the court for the defendant.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act of assembly as is altered or supplied by this act, shall be and is hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the jurisdiction, right, title, property and interest of the commonwealth, over, in and for the territory now in possession of the government of the United States, and occupied as an asylum, situate in the township of Passunk, county of Philadelphia, is hereby ceded and conveyed, together with all the buildings and appurtenances thereunto belonging, to the government of the U. States; Provided always, nevertheless, That the cession hereby made shall continue in force as long as the same territory shall be used by the government of the United States for the purpose of a naval asylum, and that nothing herein contained shall exonerate said property from taxation; Provided further, That all process, civil and criminal, of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, shall extend into and be effectual within the territory hereby ceded, as if this law had not passed; Provided also, That this act shall not prevent the opening of streets, lanes or alleys, which have been laid out, or are authorised to be laid out, through said property.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no person shall be imprisoned for any debt or sum of money, due on contract, contracted from and after the fourth of July next, where the debt demanded, is less than five dollars and thirty-four cents exclusive of cost.

Approved April 9, 1833.

NEGRO SLAVERY.

From the Savannah Georgian.

The nullifiers, driven with disgrace from the stand they occupied, disappointed in enlisting the sympathies and gaining the favor of the people of the southern states, have prematurely, rashly, madly, agitated the subject of slavery, as a last desperate effort to cause them to make a common cause against the north. They have imputed to the people of the north, a settled design to interfere with our domestic policy, which exists no where but in their teeming imaginations and rich fancies. In vain have the most respectable presses at the north repelled the accusation with indignation, in vain have they assured their brethren of the south, that the ties of affection and interest between them are too strong to be lightly and unadvisedly severed. With this disclaimer, shall we say the wicked and detestable efforts of such wretches as ————* show a settled policy on the part of the north? Shall we by discussion give to their arguments a consideration which their intrinsic value never could give? The efforts of fanatics cannot be entirely prevented by the sensible part of the community, but let us not impute to the many the designs of the few. We regret that this subject ever should have been started, and we regret still more the manner in which the Calhouns presses in and out of the state, have treated it. It is too plain that they are endeavoring to foster prejudices and create fears which they may turn to their own political aggrandizement.

*The names of the persons here inserted are not worth preserving, and we have dashed them out. Ed. R. & G.

Mr. John Bolton, who is well known to this community as a man of the most sterling integrity and the purest patriotism, and who has always continued to feel and to manifest the most lively interest in the welfare of Georgia, having seen the discussions going on in the southern newspapers, felt desirous of ascertaining if there really was a just foundation for the accusations brought against the north. He accordingly addressed a letter to the honorable Daniel Webster, who is recognized on all hands as the head of the federal* party at the north, and whose opinions therefore may be fairly assumed to be those of the party at large. The letter of Mr. Bolton will explain his patriotic motives in writing it. We take great pleasure in laying before our readers the answer of this distinguished statesman. These letters have been obligingly furnished us by a friend.

Mr. Bolton to the honorable Daniel Webster.

New York, May 16, 1833.

Hon. Daniel Webster,

DEAR SIR—It cannot have escaped your observation, that warm discussions are now going on in many of the southern papers, and much agitation is felt or feigned in a portion of the south, on the subject of slavery, and of imputed designs at the north against the security and value of that species of property.

I have been so long and closely connected with Georgia, that I am perhaps more watchful than most others in this quarter of such discussions as these, and having reason moreover to apprehend that, at this particular juncture, the tendency, if not the deliberate aim and purpose, is to excite universal uneasiness and distrust in the slave-holding states, and by consequence, to foment jealousies and heart burnings against the non-slave-holding states, which designing politicians may turn to mischievous account; I have felt desirous since our conversation this morning of obtaining an expression in writing of your views, as to the power of congress on the subject of slaves and slavery, and also as to the existence of any wish or design on the part of northern men, to interfere in any way with the security or regulation of that species of property.

My immediate object in thus seeking to obtain a written expression of your opinion on these subjects is, that I may communicate it to a distinguished friend of mine in Georgia, who shares in my solicitude in relation thereto, and through him to the public at large.

I am, dear sir, with great respect, and esteem, your obedient servant. (Signed) JOHN BOLTON.

Mr. Webster's answer to Mr. Bolton.

New York, May 17th, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR—I have received your letter of last evening, requesting me to state my opinion of the powers of congress on the subject of slaves and slavery; and of the existence of any wish or design, on the part of the northern men, to interfere with the security or regulation of that species of property.

My sentiments on this subject, my dear sir, have been often publicly expressed; but I can have no objection to repeat the declaration of them, if it be thought by you that such a declaration might, in the smallest degree, aid the friends of union and the constitution in the south, in dispelling prejudices which are so industriously fostered, and in quieting agitations so unnecessarily kept alive.

In my opinion, the domestic slavery of the southern states is a subject within the exclusive control of the states themselves; and, this, I am sure, is the opinion of the whole north. Congress has no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them in any of the states. This was so resolved by the house of representatives, when congress sat in this city in 1790, on the report of a committee, consisting almost entirely of northern members; and I do not know an instance of the expression of a different opinion, in either house of congress, since. I cannot say that particular individuals might not possibly be found who suppose that congress may possess some power over the subject, but I do not know any such persons, and if there be any, I am sure they are few. The servitude of so great a portion of the population of the south is, undoubtedly, regarded at the north, as a great evil, moral and political; and the discussions upon it, which have recently taken place in the legislatures of several of the slave-holding states, have been read with very deep interest. But it is regarded, nevertheless, as an evil, the remedy for which lies with those legislatures themselves, to be provided and applied according to their own sense of policy and duty. The imputations which you say, and say truly, are constantly made against the north, are, in my opinion, entirely destitute of any just foundation. I have endeavored to repel them, so far as has been in my power, on all proper occasions; and for a fuller expression of my own opinions, both on the power of congress, and on the groundless charges against northern men, I beg leave to refer you to my remarks in the debate on Mr. Foot's resolutions in 1830.

I am, my dear sir, with much true regard, your obedient servant, DAN'L WEBSTER.

BRITISH COLONIAL SLAVERY.

From the John Bull.

The following documents, copies of which have been transmitted to each member of the legislature, are submitted to the consideration of the British public:

W. India committee rooms, 60, St. James' st. 1st March, 1833.

The acting committee of West India planters and merchants respectfully invite your attention to the enclosed statement, exhibiting the case of a large class of your fellow subjects who are wholly unrepresented in the British legislature.

The West India colonists do not propose to vindicate the system of slavery, but they consider that (to use the words of lord Stowell) "if it be a sin, it is a sin in which the country has had its full share of guilt, and ought to bear its proportion of the redemption."

The colonists themselves are ready to bear their share of any national sacrifice which may be required for the purpose of cautiously substituting a better system, if such should be the national determination; but they mean to shew by the accompanying paper, that Great Britain is herself responsible for the establishment and actual existence of colonial slavery—that with the view of extending the market for her African trade, she passed laws and made grants of land expressly enjoining cultivation in the colonies by slave labor; and that thus through the instrumentality of her subjects all eagerly contending for participation in the traffic, she gradually peopled the West India colonies with slaves, and received the value of them in money, consequently that any measure of the legislative interference tending to impair or endanger the value of property so acquired, must either be accompanied by adequate compensation, or give a death-blow to that confidence in the national faith and character which has hitherto been the sole support of private property in this country.

But without reference to the just claim of the planter to compensation, there are other considerations which ought to suggest caution to the statesman and the philanthropist, when dealing with the question of slavery.

It will be admitted that, under any changes of system the continuance of active cultivation in the colonies by Europeans is not only of vital importance to the interests of the mother country, but indispensably necessary to the desired object of raising the negro in the scale of society. While, therefore, it remains unascertained by actual experiment that the negro will give continuous labor, and for reasonable wages, as a free man—and while the weight of evidence and experience discourages the expectation of his willingly consenting to do so—there must be the greatest danger that any hasty change of system, unaccompanied by regulations calculated to insure the slaves becoming an industrious peasantry, and to teach them the duties and obligations of civil society, would lead to the immediate destruction of the colonies, and throw the black population into a state of barbarism.

That you may be enabled to judge of the effect which such a calamity would produce on the interests of Great Britain, as well as of the irresistible impulse it would give to the slave trade, in which foreigners still persist, the committee beg leave to remind you that the present annual gross revenue derived from West India produce is seven millions; the value of British manufactures annually consumed in those colonies is four millions and a half; and the number of ships employed in the direct trade nine hundred and fifty, or two hundred and forty thousand tons—exclusive of an extensive cross trade constantly maintained between the colonies and British America. Also, that the British colonies at present supply nearly one half of the sugar imported into Europe.

THE ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF WEST INDIA SLAVERY.

One very important question now about to occupy the attention of parliament, is that which relates to the emancipation of the negroes. In whatever way this may be effected, much injury must necessarily fall on the West Indian proprietors. To bearing their share of the national loss, they make no complaint; on the contrary, they are most willing to do so. But in opposition to any scheme of emancipation which may propose to make their property the subject of hazardous experiment, without previously providing certain and adequate compensation, they earnestly seek to draw your attention, as a member of the legislature, to such facts as will enable you to judge how far the establishment and maintenance of slavery has been the guilt of the West India proprietors, or of the British nation.

In 1585—the slave trade was instituted in the reign of queen Elizabeth, who personally took a share in it. At that time the West India colonies did not exist.

In 1682, Charles II. granted an exclusive right in the slave trade to queen Catherine, the queen dowager, the duke of York and others, who formed themselves into a trading company, they undertaking to supply the West India planters with 3,000 slaves annually. In the same year that monarch issued a proclamation inviting his subjects to transport themselves to Jamaica, agreeing to allot lands to every individual who would go to reside in the island, and signify his resolution to plant there.

The slave trade continued to be fostered during the reigns of Charles II. and James II. but still under a monopoly.

In 1679, petitions from the manufacturers in Great Britain of woollen and other cloths, and the makers of various articles necessary to the slave trade with Africa, were presented to parliament, alleging that the trade was cramped by being in the hands of an exclusive company, and praying that it might be opened.

In consequence of these and similar petitions to the house of commons, a committee of the whole house, in 1685, resolved, "That for the better supply of the plantations, all the subjects of Great Britain should have liberty to trade to Africa for negroes, with such limits as should be prescribed by parliament," and by statute 9 and 10 William III. c. 26. the trade was accordingly laid partially open, the preamble of that act stating, that "the trade was highly beneficial and advantageous to the kingdom, and to the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging."

The manufacturers of Great Britain, however, were still dissatisfied with the restrictions imposed upon the trade. They continued to ply the legislature with petitions to give greater latitude to a traffic, by which they exchanged their goods for negroes and sold these negroes to the West India proprietors.

The house of commons adopted their arguments; they declared, by a report from a committee, in 1708, "That the trade was important, and ought to be free and open to all the queen's subjects trading from Great Britain." By another report in 1711, that "the trade ought to be free in a regulated company, that the plantations ought to be supplied with the negroes at reasonable rates, that a considerable stock was necessary for carrying on the trade to the best advantage, and that an export of £100,000 at least in merchandise should be annually made from Great Britain to Africa."

From this period, 1711, until 1729, the demands of the manufacturers for a more unrestricted trade continued to be the subject of parliamentary investigation and dispute.

It was found that the trade could not be conveniently and extensively carried on without forts on the coast of Africa; and such was the appetite of the British nation for the slave trade, that, in 1729 a committee of the house of commons passed the following resolutions:

1st. "That the trade should be open." 2d. "That it ought not to be taxed for the support of forts." 3d. "That forts were necessary for securing the trade." And 4th. "That an allowance ought to be made for maintaining such forts."

These resolutions were agreed to, but the 3d with an amendment, that the forts should be maintained "as marks of the possessions of Great Britain," instead of "for the purpose of securing the trade." At the same time, the house was informed that his majesty recommended that provision should be made for the support of the African forts.

At length, in 1749, the statute 23d Geo. II. c. 31, was passed, which removed all obstruction to the operations of private traders, declaring "the slave trade to be very advantageous to Great Britain, and necessary for supplying the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging, with a sufficient number of negroes at reasonable rates."

While the British public had been intent on breaking down the partial monopoly of trading in negroes, which had existed among themselves, they had on the same principles been equally intent on setting up a monopoly against foreigners, and on excluding all but British subjects from participating in a trade pronounced to be "so highly beneficial to the kingdom."

1689. In answer to a case referred to the judges for their opinion by the crown on the alien contract, they report—"In pursuance of his majesty's order in council hereunto annexed, we do humbly certify our opinions to be, that negroes are merchandise; that it is against the statute of navigation made for the general good and preservation of the shipping and trade of this kingdom, to give liberty to any alien to trade in Jamaica, or other his majesty's plantations, or for any shipping belonging to aliens to trade there, or to export thence negroes, &c." And the certificate is signed by lord C. J. Holt, justice Pollexten, and eight other judges.

The proclamation of Charles II. had invited British subjects to settle in the West India colonies, and offered them lands on condition of their being planted.

A reference to the patents by which land was granted, will show what was meant by the proclamation.

The following patent may be found at length in the appendix to the report of the house of lords, dated August 1832, on the state of the West India colonies, p. 1198.

1690. "William and Mary, by the grace of God, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come: know ye that we, now and in consideration that Christopher Senior, esq. hath transported himself, together with his servants and slaves, into our island of Jamaica in pursuance of a proclamation made in the reign of our royal uncle, king Charles II. and for his better encouragement to become one of our planters there, &c. do give and grant unto the said Christopher Senior, his heirs and assigns forever, a certain piece of land," &c.

RIGHTS OF PROPERTY IN SLAVES.

From Poulson's American Daily Advertiser.

Caleb Johnson, } In the circuit court of the U.
vs. } States for the eastern district
John Kinderdine, and others. } of Pennsylvania.

The jury impelled in the above case have unanimously instructed their foreman to request judge BALDWIN, to permit the able, clear and lucid charge delivered by him in the above case, to be published. They make this request from a sense of duty, believing that the publication will be salutary to the best interests of the community, and that the charge is replete with the soundest constitutional principles, applied to one of the most important and delicate subjects that can be presented for examination before the judicial tribunals of our country.

JAMES McALPIN, foreman.

Caleb Johnson vs. Isaac Tompkins, and others.
CHARGE OF BALDWIN, J. TO THE JURY.

The facts of this case are not complicated, and there is not much contest about those which are material to its decision.

That Jack was a slave for life, the property of Mr. Johnson, absconded from the service of his master, to this state, and had been for some time in the employment of the Messrs. Kinderdines. That Mr. Johnson and others of his party, came to the Billet on the evening of the 20th October, 1822, being Sunday, with the intention of taking him, which they made known; went to the house of Mrs. Kinderdine, which they entered peaceably, took Jack without disturbing the family, put him in the wagon, and put hand cuffs on him. After some altercation at the gate, with Mr. Issachar Kinderdine, they proceeded on their way to the Billet; that near the Horsheim meeting house, a crowd of from 20 to 30 persons had assembled. Mr. Kinderdine attempted to take hold of the horses of the plaintiff in order to stop them in the road, but desisted on the threat of Mr. Withington to blow out his brains if he stopped them. That on their arrival at the Billet, the crowd had increased, Mr. Johnson had received a severe blow on the head, from some of the crowd, near the meeting house; the traces of the wagon were cut; the Jersey party were ordered to go forth with to judge McNeill's, under threats of force if they would not go peaceably. After some time they went, attended by a crowd variously estimated from 30 to 60, and returned after a short time to the Billet, under the charge of a constable, they were detained all night under guard, without being permitted to retire to a lodging room; taken next morning to Justice Tompkins, brought back by the constable to the tavern, where they were detained all Monday by the constable, and watched during the night by him and some of the defendants. Mr. Withington had escaped on Monday night; came to this place, procured bail and counsel; and on Tuesday morning the plaintiff and his party were liberated, on giving security for their appearance at the next court, in Montgomery county.

They were indicted for kidnapping, under the act of 1820, tried and acquitted; Mr. John, Issachar and Sarah Kinderdine were witnesses for the prosecution; Jack was present at the trial, but was not examined; counsel were employed to assist the prosecuting counsel, to whom Jack paid, through Mr. Ellis, 30 or 50 dollars. In January 1823, Mr. Johnson took Jack home, under a warrant from Judge Jones, and detained him as a slave till about two years, since when he manumitted him; Jack is now free, and residing in Princeton.

These facts are not contested.

On one side the plaintiff asserts certain rights under the laws and constitution of this state and of the United States, what they are we shall state to you plainly and explicitly, and whether they justified the plaintiff and his party in the course they pursued. The defendants deny these rights, by what authority you have heard and must decide; they assert in themselves certain rights, but from what source we are not informed—they profess to have acted from motives of humanity and benevolence—from the admitted facts their conduct towards the Jersey party could not well have been governed by such motives. How far they operated to influence their conduct for the benefit of Jack, we can ascertain from another uncontested fact, that on Sunday night, Mr. Johnson offered to manumit him and pay all the costs of the proceeding—the manumission was drawn up by Dr. Hill, and executed in his presence, but the proposition was rejected by Mr. John Kinderdine, and the Jersey party was prosecuted as you have heard, while no concern was taken in Jack's freedom. His part in the trial seems to have been confined to the payment of the wages earned by him during his elopement, or put into his hands by others, to counsel thus hired to prosecute his master, without any complaint of hard usage to Jack.

That the plaintiff has been grievously injured by some one; that he has been restrained of his liberty and severely prosecuted as a felon, are also admitted facts. If it has been done by the defendants or any of them, it becomes a most interesting case to the parties, as well for the question involved as the extent of the injury inflicted and damages claimed.

It is not pretended that the plaintiff committed any breach of the peace in entering the house, taking Jack, securing him into the wagon, or in carrying him to the Billet—the only alleged outrages are the threat to Mr. Issachar Kinderdine at the gate, (which Joseph Kinderdine did not hear, though standing by the side of the wagon near his uncle and aunt—and who, though in the house when Jack was taken out, heard no noise)—and the threat in the road when Issachar had seized, or was about seizing the horses by the head. The defendant's witnesses all concur in stating the conduct of the plaintiff and his party, with these exceptions, to have been quiet and civil throughout all the occurrences till their liberation on bail.

The plaintiff appeals to the laws and constitutions for the assertion of his rights, and redress of his injuries; the defendants instruct their counsel to appeal to other laws and rules, which they contend justify all their acts; they do not attempt to mitigate or palliate their conduct as having been committed under any mistake; they offer no evidence of Jack's right to freedom, or of an infringement of any of their rights by the plaintiff or his friends—they stand out boldly and manfully on their rights, as a justification, disavowing damages, or making any excuse or apology for what they had done, down to the moment of submitting their case through their counsel to you. The plaintiff is denounced before you as a felon, ruffian and kidnapper, though he voluntarily manumitted Jack after all he suffered, and though there cannot now be even a pretence that he was free in 1822. The witnesses for plaintiff are said to be perjured, although you will probably concur with us in thinking, that the only material difference between their statement and that of the defendant's witnesses, is in relation to the threats made use of to the Jersey party before going to Judge McNeill's. The plaintiff's witnesses say the threat was to tie and take them if they would not go voluntarily; the defendant's witnesses say the threat was to use force to take them, a difference, in our opinion, of no importance, for it mattered not how the force was threatened to be applied. Mr. Withington and Skillman are called old soldiers, practised kidnappers, used to the trade, because they had sometime before taken; from the same neighborhood, a runaway slave of the father-in-law of Mr. Withington, who returned voluntarily, and expressed himself glad they had come for him. You thus see that to this moment their spirit does not relent, they have no respect for the verdict of a jury of their neighbors in their own county, given on the evidence of the defendants themselves, nor for the law, which, after a verdict of acquittal, pronounces the parties accused to be innocent of the offence charged.

This view of the case makes it interesting to us and to every one. It is time to know whether the acts which have been done by the plaintiff have made him a felon, whether he is yet to be called one in a court of justice, after an acquittal by a jury, or if in any, or what respect is due to the verdict of a jury in Pennsylvania, in repelling the imputation of an infamous crime. If Mr. Johnson is yet open to the epithets so freely bestowed on him, there can be no end to prosecutions, and no protection by the laws.

Another matter must be settled, whether the owner or claimant of a fugitive slave, who comes into this state under the authority of its laws, its constitution, the law and constitution of the United States to reclaim his property, is under any obligation to submit the evidence of his right to any person who makes the demand, to do it in the public highway in the evening or at night, before an assembled crowd in a road or at a tavern. And if any man has a right to demand the papers and other evidence of the claimant's property in a fugitive, he has the same right to judge of their sufficiency, whether the plaintiff could be compelled to go before any particular judge or justice to prove his property, and if he failed in his opinion to make out his right, was to be bound by it, and to be considered and treated as a felon for having seized his slave; deprived of his liberty, refused a bed; and compelled to go from place to place, without any legal arrest or warrant. Finally he is compelled to undergo a vindictive prosecution for arresting a fugitive, proved by his own admission to be the plaintiff's slave till he was 30, and his subsequent right to freedom resting on his naked assertion not only not attempted to be supported, but contradicted by the most incontestable and uncontested evidence. Look at the conduct of the judge, and the reasons he gave; the plaintiff had no bill of sale to himself from Ranley, and yet the judge saw the receipt of the purchase money paid for Jack; he was called Jack, without any further description, and the judge said the plaintiff might take up any black man by the name of Jack; yet Jack stood before him acknowledging his identity as the same slave who was sold by Mr. Berrian to Ranley, and by him to Mr. Johnson. Is this, gentlemen, the law of Pennsylvania, and are such the rules by which property is held in this state; if they are, who can be safe when the evidence before Judge McNeill was held to be insufficient; this is a question which comes home to every man. Who can show a better right to personal property than a purchase, the receipt for the money, fourteen years peaceable possession, and the public acknowledgment of Jack confirming it.

Here is a specimen of the security for the rights of property, when the law of the land is disregarded; and the security of the personal liberty of our citizens when individuals take the law into their own hands, to be administered by their opinions of justice, natural right, social law, public opinion, humanity and philanthropy. It does not indicate the laudable zeal to release the free from bondage, but rather to make the slave free, and the freeman a slave.

Such are the questions involved in this case which comes before us not on a mere inquiry into the injury done the plaintiff, or the compensation to which he is entitled from the defendants; but on an issue of right by the law of the land; on which we shall give our opinion most explicitly as we are in duty bound to do; the facts of the case are for your decision.

It has been thought best to do it in writing, that our opinion may neither be misunderstood or misrepresented, so that the opinion of the supreme court may be laid upon it, and I hope that the party dissatisfied with it, may take it before them for their revision, in order that the whole law may be definitely settled and known. What then is the law, and with whom is the right of the case, you will be able to ascertain from the evidence you have heard, and the opinion which we have formed; Judge Hopkinson concurs in the general results which will be stated to you; there has not been time to submit to him the detailed view taken of the subject.

On a question of slavery or freedom, the right is to be established by the same rules of evidence as in other contests about the right to property—7 Cr. 295.

It is an universal principle that possession of property, quiet and undisturbed, is evidence of ownership, and that possession cannot be disturbed, unless by one having a better right.

The burthen of proof rests on those who attempt, or claim the right, to take property from the possession of another, or to interfere with his control and disposition of it.

The evidence of the property in this case is uncontradicted. That the mother of Jack was the slave of the late judge Berrian, of New Jersey; that Jack was born shortly after the death of Mr. Berrian, in 1791 or 2; that he was a slave of the estate sold or allotted to Thomas Berrian, one of the children and heirs, at a very early age; kept by him as a slave till 1807, when he was sold to Perez Ranley, for 300 dollars, who in the same year sold him for the same price to the plaintiff, with whom he remained for 14 years, before he absconded from his service.

Jack admitted his original slavery, but alleged that by the will of Mr. Berrian, he was entitled to freedom at 30. The will has been produced, but has no such condition or direction, and no evidence has been offered to support Jack's assertion, which must therefore be taken as not only unsustained, but directly contradicted and false, and his identity was admitted.

The original bill of sale to Ranley has been produced, and the sale by him to the plaintiff, proved by the production and proof of the receipt for the purchase money, which is as effectual for the transfer of personal property, as a deed or regular bill of sale, all which is required in such cases, is evidence of the sale, which may be by parol as well as writing, or inferred from long and quiet possession—1 Dall. 169.

The plaintiff has therefore given abundant evidence of property in Jack to entitle him to recover; were it on a trial of freedom, the judge was entirely mistaken in saying that a bill of sale to the plaintiff was necessary, or that the papers produced to him, connected with Jack's admission, were not sufficient proof of his being a slave, and the same person who was sold, and in the possession of the plaintiff. He was not bound to disprove Jack's assertion, but those who denied the right of Mr. Johnson, were bound to prove it true—yet long as this controversy has subsisted, and interesting as it has now become, no attempt is made to support this assertion, on the belief of which, or under color of which the defendants has acted from the time of their first interference between Jack and the plaintiff. The ownership of Jack being thus clearly made out, he must be deemed to be the property of Mr. Johnson, over which he has the same control as over his land or his goods. It is not permitted to you or us to indulge our feelings of abstract right on these subjects; the law of the land recognizes the right of one man to hold another in bondage, and that right must be protected from violation, although its existence is abhorrent to all our ideas of natural right and justice.

As a consequence of this right of property, the owner may keep possession of his slave—if he absconds he may retake him by pursuit into another state, and may bind or secure him in any other way to prevent his second escape—he may arrest him by the use of as much force as is necessary to effect his recapture; he may enter peaceably on the property or into the house of another, taking care to commit no breach of the peace against third persons. But it is no breach of the peace to use as much force or coercion toward the fugitive as suffices for his security—as without such force no slave could be retaken without his consent. The master may also use every art, device or stratagem to decoy the slave into his power—odious as these terms may be in their application to an unlawful act, they ought to be considered as far otherwise when used for a lawful and justifiable purpose. It is every day's practice to detect counterfeiters, and those who pass counterfeit money, by employing persons to purchase it from them—it is necessary for the purpose of public justice that such and similar means should be resorted to, or criminals would escape detection—they are neither immoral or illegal.

Jack's escape was by fraud and art, practised to his master's injury, and he is forbidden neither morally or legally from reclaiming his property by circumventing and defeating the fraud of the slave. To deny to the owner of property the use of such means to recover it, would make his right an empty and barren one, by taking from him the means of enjoying it—it was the mode least calculated to alarm or disturb the family. This right of a master to arrest his fugitive slave, is not a solitary case in the law; it may be exercised towards a fugitive apprentice or redemptioner, to the same extent, and is done daily without producing any excitement—an apprentice is a servant, a slave is no more; though his servitude is for life, the nature of it is the same as apprenticeship or by redemption, which though terminated by time, is, during its continuance, as severe a servitude as that for life. Of the same nature is the right of a parent to the services of his minor children, which gives the custody of their persons. So where a man enters special bail for the appearance of a defendant in a civil action, he may seize his person at his pleasure, and commit him to prison; or if the principal escapes, the bail may pursue him to another state, arrest, and bring him back by the use of all necessary force and means of preventing an escape. The lawful exercise of this authority in such cases is calculated to excite no sympathy; the law takes its course in peace, and unnoticed, yet it is the same power, and used in the same manner, as by a master over his slave. Had Jack been the apprentice of Mr. Johnson, or he had been the special bail of Jack, he would have the same right to retake him as he had by being his owner for life—the right in each case is from the same source, the law of the land. If the enforcement of the right excites more feeling in one case than the other, it is not from the manner in which it is done, but the nature of the right which is enforced—property in a human being for life. If this is unjust and oppressive, the sin is on the heads of the makers of laws, which tolerate slavery, or in those who have the power in not repealing them; to visit it on those who have honestly acquired, and lawfully hold property, under the guarantee and protection of the laws, is the worst of all oppression, and the rankest injustice towards our fellow-men. It is the indulgence of a spirit of persecution against our neighbors, for no offence against society or its laws; for no infringement of the rights of others, but simply for the assertion of their own in a lawful manner.

If this spirit pervades the country; if public opinion is suffered to prostrate the laws which protect one species of property, those who lead the crusade against slavery may, at no distant day, find a new one directed against their lands, their stores, and their debts; if a master cannot retain the custody of his slave, apprentice, or redemptioner, a parent must give up the guardianship of his children, bail have no hold on their principal, the creditor cannot arrest his debtor by lawful means, and he who keeps the rightful owner of lands or chattels out of possession, will be protected in his trespasses.

When the law ceases to be the test of right and remedy—when individuals undertake to be its administrators by rules of their own adoption, the bands of society are broken as effectually by the severance of one link from the chain of justice, which binds man to the laws, as if the whole was dissolved. The more specious and seductive the pretxts are under which the law is violated, the greater ought to be the vigilance of courts and juries in their detection; public opinion is a security against acts of open and avowed infringements of acknowledged rights—from such combinations there is no danger—they will fall by their own violence, as the blast expends its force by its own fury. The only permanent danger is in the indulgence of the humane and benevolent feelings of our nature, at what we feel to be acts of oppression towards human beings, endowed with the same qualities and attributes as ourselves, and brought into being by the same power which created us all; without reflecting, that in suffering these feelings to come into action against rights secured by the laws, we forget the first duty of citizens of a government of laws—obedience to its ordinances.

Those who are looking only to the oppression which exists, but in their own imagination, may make their own philanthropic feeling the standard of right and wrong, but it must be remembered, and impressed on every member of society, that no man can consider that to be injustice which the law declares and protects as a right, or an act to be oppressive which the law has provided as a remedy for its infringement. The impression may be honest, the feeling laudable, and the motive virtuous in the abstract, but the law forbids its action on the property or persons of others. The history of this cause affords a striking illustration of the dangerous effects of these feelings being suffered to influence the conduct of even the best members of the community. The fair character and high standing in life of the defendants in this case, may be a guaranty to the public against any intentional infraction of the peace and good order of society, but one incident in the cause shows the contagious effect of bad example in the higher orders of society on the lower. John Chester felt authorised to take and act his part in the transaction, more humble indeed than that of his superiors, but not less efficient in its furtherance of the object, by cutting the traces of the wagon; where John would have stopped in the use of his knife, had its employment in another way been likely to effect the liberation of Jack, is difficult to say, and would be invidious to conjecture, it suffices to refer to it as a salutary lesson—the case is full of them.

The opinion of judge Washington, in Hill vs. Law, meets our entire concurrence. "That if a man should honestly believe that the person claimed as a fugitive did not in fact owe service to the claimant, he could not in his defence allege ignorance of the law, and that such matters were unfit for the inquiry of the jury. That it was sufficient to bring the defendant within the provisions of the law, if having notice either by the verbal declarations of those who had the fugitive in custody, or were attempting to seize him, or by circumstances brought home to the defendant, that the person arrested was a fugitive or was arrested as such."—4 Wash. 329. The case must be decided by the facts in evidence, and will not be influenced by the defendant's belief or knowledge of them in any other way than in mitigation of damages, if you are satisfied that they were really ignorant of Jack's situation and they believed him free.

From the full investigation of its merits, which has now been had, all doubts of the slavery of Jack as the property of Mr. Johnson, by fair purchase of his right to his possession and custody, and to retake him wherever he was found, have wholly disappeared, and the defendants by confiding in his naked assertion of being free, have seen the bad effects of trusting to the fabricated stories of fugitives from service. In opposing his reclamation by his master they acted at their peril; he was in pursuit of his right—he entered peaceably into the house where he found his slave; he arrested and secured him in the wagon without any breach of the peace. There is no evidence of any cruelty practised on Jack, or of any complaint of hard usage; he appears to have made none, nor to have called for any assistance from any one, even after some of the defendants had come to the wagon; their interference was purely voluntary. The first inquiry then is, was it justifiable?

The slave was arrested on Sunday it is true, but no law prohibits a man from protecting or reclaiming his property on that day, 5 S. & R. 301. Working on Sunday is no breach of the peace, 1 S. & R. 350, when done without noise or disorder. A justice of the peace has no right to enter on the land of another on Sunday for the purpose of obtaining evidence of a breach of the Sabbath against the will of another. He ought to summon the offenders the next day, and proceed against them in the usual manner, 351. If the service of process on Sunday was illegal except for a breach of the peace or felony, the defendants could not arrest or detain the Jersey party without process or legal authority for any other cause.

The slave, it seems, was seized in the twilight or night, but that did not justify the interference of the defendant to rescue him, or obstruct the plaintiff in removing him;—the putting of irons upon him is of itself no justification of the infliction of any violence upon the plaintiff. If it was an act of unnecessary severity, it would be a circumstance for which you would make a proper allowance in assessing damages as one which would mitigate the conduct of the defendants, by the excitement which it would be apt to produce. Whether however it was a measure of prudence or of cruelty not called for by the circumstances in which they were placed, you will probably be able to ascertain to your satisfaction from the facts, that the defendants appear not to have directed the irons to be taken off till the Messrs. Kinderduin had given their recognizance before Justice Tompkins for his appearance, and the attempt made by John Chester and the other black man at the Billet to take them off, may not improperly be considered as some evidence of the necessity of their imposition.

If in these or any other particulars, Mr. Johnson or his party made use of any unnecessary or wanton violence towards his slave, he became amenable to the laws, but not to the defendants; he was not bound to regulate his conduct by rules they might think proper to prescribe, or to suffer them to be the judges of his rights; he acted at his peril in arresting Jack, and they at theirs in interposing any opposition.

If you believe the evidence the plaintiff has established his right to arrest Jack—proof of his slavery and owing service to him absolves him from the risk he run in seizing him—but the same fact which absolves him makes the defendants liable if they have done any act not warranted by law by which the plaintiff has suffered an injury. It is contended that they had a right to arrest the plaintiff and his party when in the act of committing, attempting to commit a felony, or doing an act which might amount to a felony and prevent its commission thereby; and such is undoubtedly the law.

There may be an arrest without warrant by a public officer, or a private person, who sees another commit a felony—or if a felony is known to have been committed, the person committing it may be pursued and arrested;—and when there is only probable cause of suspicion a private person may without warrant at his peril make an arrest, 6 Binney, 3, 18—19.

A constable may arrest without warrant for a breach of the peace in his presence, and commit the offender to jail for safe keeping, so may a private person for felony, or on an affray which has taken place in his presence, or where an arrest is made on suspicion, 8 S. & R. 49, 50. Such is the law of Pennsylvania, which secures the peace of the public, but the law does not stop here; it does not leave the citizen at the mercy of peace officers or individuals—they make the arrest at their peril—in the emphatic language of the late chief justice Tilghuan. "I say at his peril, for nothing short of proving the felony will justify the arrest," 6 Binney, 319—and the present chief justice in declaring the right of the constable to arrest in such case says, "There is no danger to the liberty of the citizen in this, for if the arrest and detention be improper, the prisoner can have instant redress by the writ of habeas corpus, and the constable may be punished by indictment or subject to damages in an action of trespass," 8 S. & R. 50.

The law is the same as to the plaintiff; "at the common law a master had a right to take up his runaway servant, and for this, as for any other lawful purpose, might enter peaceably into any house, unless forbidden by the owner. Any person with authority from the master might do the same. The domestic authority of masters and parents must be supported as essential to the peace of society, and contributing to a due subordination to the authority of government. Addison's Rep. 325, the acts of assembly do not give, but only enforce this right.

If the person arrested is not a servant or slave, or the person making the arrest has not the authority of the master for so doing, he is in either case liable for the illegal arrest.

You will therefore consider the law as settled, that where an arrest is made without a warrant from a proper officer, the person making the arrest is liable in damages to the party arrested, if he is innocent of the offence with which he is charged, and for which he has been arrested—though the person arresting may have honestly believed the other guilty; though there was ground for suspicion, or probable cause for the arrest, he is liable to an action for the arrest, unless actual guilt appears. These circumstances will weigh with a jury in reducing damages, but as the arrest turns out to be illegal, it cannot be justified; the reason is obvious, though the public peace requires the speedy apprehension of offenders against the law, it does not authorise the imprisonment of the innocent; from this rule there is no exception, where the arrest is without warrant. If a lawful warrant is directed to an officer, or a private person, and he does not exceed or abuse the authority it confers, he is liable to no action, though the person who is described in the warrant, and arrested, is wholly innocent of the offence charged; this is also an incontestable principle of the law. So that while innocent men are protected in their liberty against arrests, by officers or private persons, on their own authority, the latter are equally protected in the execution of lawful process. In the one case they act at the peril of the party arrested being guilty, in the other the law absolves them from any responsibility. This law is the same if a constable seizes a person as a runaway servant, by order of one claiming to be his master, he is liable to an action if the person arrested is not his servant; but if he apprehends him on a warrant from a magistrate no action lies against him.

You will then apply these rules of law to the case before you, and inquire whether the plaintiff, and those acting under his authority, committed any felony or breach of peace, in seizing, securing and carrying Jack to the house of Marple, in Hathorough. The record of their acquittal is conclusive evidence of their innocence of the offences charged in the indictment preferred against them at Norristown, either jointly or severally—you are bound to consider them each and every one as not guilty of any of the matters charged as a felony or offence under the act of assembly, of March, 1820, or the common law. Independently of this acquittal, if Jack was the slave of the plaintiff, neither he nor the others of the party could be guilty of kidnapping, under that or any other law of the state. So long since as 1795, the supreme court unanimously decided that it was no offence, under the seventh section of the act of March, 1788, for a master to arrest his slave forcibly, and carry him out of the state; that the law was intended, and only applied, to carrying a freeman out of the state into bondage, 2 Dallas, 236.

The law of 1820, section 1st, on which the plaintiff was prosecuted, was copied from the law of 1780, and must receive the same construction; its re-enactment, with the full knowledge which the legislature must be presumed to have had of its judicial exposition by the supreme court, which had remained unquestioned for twenty-five years, without any alteration, is to be considered as not intended to alter, and as not altering the law on the subject. The rule thus established by the legislature and courts of the state, is the rule for our decision both by the 34th section of the judiciary act, and the uniform decisions of the supreme court of the United States; it need not therefore, be regarded with any jealousy as opposed to the laws, policy or feelings of the state, or the people thereof—neither do we think it necessary to add any reasons to those given by chief Justice McKean; 2 Dallas, 236, which has been read by counsel.*

*NOTE 1. Charge of the court to the jury.

The severity of the punishment to be inflicted in case of a conviction, (a punishment the same, in its nature, as is inflicted for the most infamous crimes), ought certainly to induce the jury to deliberate well, before they determine, that the act committed by the defendant constitutes the offence, which is the object of the law. The extravagant operation and extent of the doctrine, on which the prosecution is maintained, ought also to awaken the most serious attention, for it has been contended in effect, that should a traveller bring into this state a negro or mulatto slave; nay, should a tradesman of Pennsylvania have a negro or mulatto indentured servant, who being sent on an errand, loiters away his time in tipping and debauchery, the master cannot forcibly seize and carry the delinquent to another place, either beyond or within the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, without incurring the penalties of the act of assembly: if it is intended afterwards to keep and detain the negro or mulatto as a slave or servant. Is it rational to conceive, that any legislative body would have destined for such an act, so grievous a punishment? Again: It has been alleged that the law has made no difference and therefore, that the court can make none, between a freeman and a slave, provided the injured party is a negro or mulatto. But is it possible that any individual of common sense, that any assemblage of enlightened men should so confound the nature of things, should so pervert the principle of justice, as to suppose, that it is as criminal for a master to carry off his own slave with the intent to retain him in slavery, as for a stranger to carry off a freeman with the intent to sell him into bondage? Can these actions merit the same degree of punishment?

It is evident however that such enormities are not imputable to the legislature of Pennsylvania. By the 10th section of the act for the gradual abolition of slavery, (1 vol. Dall. edit. p. 81.) persons merely sojourning in this state have a right to retain their slaves for a term of six months, and the delegates in congress, from other states, foreign ministers and consuls, enjoy that right as long as they continue in their public characters; the succeeding section likewise expressly provides that absconding slaves shall derive no benefit from the law, but that their masters shall have the same right and aid to demand, claim and take them away that they had before. This act of assembly and particularly these provisions are not repealed by the supplemental act on which the prosecution is founded. Then we find that any traveller who comes into Pennsylvania upon a temporary excursion for business or amusement, may detain his slave for six months, and the previous law, (recognised by act of assembly during that term), authorises the master to apprehend the slave, and entitles him to the aid of the civil police to secure and carry him away. By a regulation of this kind, the policy of our own system is reconciled with a due respect to the system of other states and countries, while an opposite construction would render it impossible for any American or foreigner to pass with a slave through the territory of Pennsylvania.

We have laid down the law to be, that bail may arrest the principal; this, too, we have done in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of this state. "In the relation in which the several states comprising the union stand to each other, the bail in a suit entered in another state, have a right to seize and take the principal in a sister state, provided it does not interfere with the interest of other persons who have arrested such principal." 2 Yeates, 264.

Special bail may take up the principal when attending court, or at any time he pleases. "It has been quaintly said, that the bail have their principal always on a string, and may pull the string whenever they please, and render him in their own discharge."—1 Yeates, 125. S. P. 3 Yeates, 37. The court refer to and adopt the law as laid down in England, in the same words, in 6 Mod. 231, in which it is added they may take him even on a Sunday, "and confine him till the next day, and then render him."—It is therefore the common law of Pennsylvania as well as of England.

We have also stated the law to be that apprentices, redemptioners, slaves and servants who abscond from the service of their masters, may be apprehended wherever they may be found—this we have done not only on the authority of the courts of Pennsylvania, but of its various laws.

By the act of 1770, yet in force, a fugitive apprentice may be apprehended by a warrant from a justice, and committed to jail till he will consent to return to his master, or give security to answer his complaint. Purdon, 42. This act was extended to redemptioners in 1830. If any person harbor him without giving notice to his master, he shall pay 20 shillings a day—Purdon, 42, 3—and the apprentice to serve 5 days for each day's absconding—Purdon, 829.

The act of March, 1780, which declared all issue of slaves born after that day to be free, unless registered according to its provisions, puts negro and mulatto servants, till 23, on the same footing as servants by indenture—1 Dall. 839-40, sect. 4.

The reward for taking up runaway and absconded negro and mulatto servants and slaves, and the penalties for enticing away; dealing with, or harboring them, are also the same as in the case of servants bound for four years—Sec. 9, p. 841.

It was "provided that this act, or any thing it contained, shall not give any relief or shelter to any absconding or runaway negro or mulatto slave or servant, who has absented himself, or shall absented himself, from his or her owner, master or mistress, residing in another state or country—but they shall have like right and aid to demand, claim and take away his slave or servant as he might have had in case this act had not been made—Sect. 11, p. 842.

This section remained in force till 1836—it was therefore applicable to this case in 1832. It is all important, as evincing the spirit, policy and feeling of the state to be utterly opposed to the relief or sheltering of absconding or runaway slaves or servants from other states, or considering the masters who come to reclaim them as kidnappers, ruffians, or felons, fit objects for ignominious punishment in penitentiaries. On the contrary, it expressly declares that they shall have right and aid, to demand, claim and take away his slave or servant—and in order that the meaning of this part of the law should not be misunderstood, that the benevolent objects of the legislature, as declared in the preamble, should not be perverted to purposes forbidden by the law, it puts the master on the same footing as to carrying his slave out of the states, as if the law had never been passed. This is language which cannot be misunderstood.

It is due to the character of the state that its own laws at least should be respected in courts of justice, by all who are

It has been said that the words slaves, or servants, which are used in the other provisions of the supplemental act, being omitted in this section, it must be inferred that the legislature intended to protect the slave or servant, as well as the freeman from the outrage contemplated; but, in our opinion, that very omission shows the fallacy of such a construction, for if the legislature designed to protect freemen and not slaves, they could not in any other way more effectually manifest their meaning. In short, the evil apprehended was that of forcing a free negro or mulatto into another country and there taking advantage of his color to sell him as a slave, and for such an offence the punishment denounced by the law would be justly inflicted.

Upon a review of the facts, likewise, we find occasion to regret that the prosecution should have been conducted with a zeal which rarely appears in the prosecution of the highest criminal on the strongest proof. There is not, however, a title of evidence to establish the charge that the defendant seduced the negro, or that he even spoke to him in Pennsylvania where the action of seduction must be committed to vest the jurisdiction in the court. Nor can it be fairly said that he caused the negro to be seduced, for the advice given to general Sevier was merely the advice of a friend, which could not surely merit the ignominious punishment of the law, and which was not in fact adopted, as the negro was forcibly, and not by seduction, sent out of the state.

But, upon the whole, we were unanimously of opinion, as soon as it was proved the negro was a slave, that not only, his master had a right to seize and carry him away, but that in case he absconded or resisted, it was the duty of every magistrate to employ all legitimate means of coercion in his power for securing and restoring the negro to the service of his owner, whither-soever he might be afterwards carried.

concerned in its administration—it is our most solemn duty to enjoined it on you to take the law of the land as you see it in the statute books, and enforce it according to its provisions. Remember too that this law is that act, which has been the pride of Pennsylvania, as one of the most noble and glorious emanations from the spirit of the revolution, as declared in the preamble, which has been read to you with the most touching force and eloquence.

But you must not take the spirit of the law according to the impulse which operates to rouse the feelings of counsel in the cause of their clients; look on it, examine its enactment not only with a watchful eye, but if you please, in the plenitude of philanthropic zeal in the cause of oppressed humanity. To relieve the oppressed, rescue the free from bondage, to punish those who violate the rights of man and humanity, to protect our fellow man from injustice, and to secure to all alike the benefit of the laws, are the imperious duties of jurors. In obedience to such dictates, we call your attention to the laws for the gradual abolition of slavery in Pennsylvania.

The two first sections are the preamble.

The third declares that no child hereafter to be born shall be a servant for life or a slave. The slavery of children in consequence of the slavery of their mothers, is forever abolished.

The fourth has been noticed.

The fifth directs slaves to be registered before the first of November, 1780.

The seventh directs negroes to be tried for crimes and offences like other inhabitants.

The tenth declared all unregistered slaves to be free, except the domestic slaves of members of congress, foreign ministers and consuls, and persons passing through or sojourning in the state, not resident in it, and seamen not owned in the state or employed in ships belonging to the inhabitants of the state. This is the substance of the abolition act.

The eleventh excepts fugitives, as has been noticed.

This law was explained and amended by the act of March, 1788, which declared all slaves brought into the state by persons residing, or intending to reside in it, to be immediately free—prohibits the taking of the slave out of the state with intent to change his place of residence, or selling him for such purposes, directs the registry of the children of slaves, and punishes kidnapping.

In the spirit of these laws the legislature passed "an act to incorporate a society by the name of the Pennsylvania society for promoting the abolition of slavery, and for the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African race." No society was ever founded for nobler objects, or more deserving of public encouragement and approbation; but it was no part of the design or objects of this benevolent society to protect or rescue runaway slaves from the claims of their masters. It was provided in their charter, that their by-laws, rules, orders and regulations enacted, or to be enacted, be reasonable in themselves, and not contradictory to the constitution and laws of the state. Acts of assembly, pp. 218, 223, A. D. 1789.

So far as has come to our knowledge or information, this society has acted on the philanthropic principles of its institution and none other, never interfering with the rights of property, as secured by the laws; they have not infringed the condition of their charter, but pursued their legitimate objects with untiring zeal. If they have been perverted by any honorary member, like Mr. Ellis, by contributing money to employ counsel to prosecute a master for lawfully seizing and taking away his runaway slave, we are well convinced that it has been equally repugnant to the feelings and practice of the members of the society, as it would be to their charter.

These laws remained unchanged till 1820, when an act was passed on the subject, the provisions of which need not be particularly recited—the proviso in the second section is however important, "Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as a repeal or alteration of any part of an act of assembly, passed 1st March, 1780; or of any part of the act of 29th March 1788, except the 7th section which is repealed."

This is the section which prescribed the punishment for kidnapping, and was copied, except as to the punishment, into the first section of the law of 1820.

By the law of 1788, the punishment was a fine of £100 and confinement at hard labor not less than six or exceeding twelve months, until the costs be paid. 2 Dall. 559.

By the law of 1820, the fine was not less than $500, or more than $2,000, to be deemed guilt of a felony and sentenced to undergo a servitude not less than seven or more than twenty-one years, confined, kept to hard labor, fed and clothed as is directed by the penal laws of this commonwealth, for persons convicted of robbery. Purd. 653.

The punishment of the first offence of robbery is a servitude of not less than one or more than seven years, and for a second offence not exceeding twelve years. Act of 1829. Purd. 821.

On the first conviction of murder in the second degree the punishment is servitude for not less than four or more than twelve years; for the second offence, confinement for life. Act of 1829. Purd. 648.

The penal laws of Pennsylvania are just, mild and humane; her penal code is admired not only in this, but in all the civilized nations of the world. Here punishment is graduated in proportion to the enormity of the offence, and cruel punishments are expressly forbidden by the constitution, as well as excessive lines. Art. 9, sec. 13, and by the 8th amendment to the constitution U. S.

That offence must be dark and black indeed, which is, in the view of the legislature, so much more heinous than highway robbery or wilful murder. Can you believe that it was their intention to subject the man who arrested his own fugitive slave by force, with the intention of conveying him to his home in another state, to a punishment greater in a threefold degree than the most aggravated highway robbery, and for a time exceeding by nine years the utmost term of servitude, which a court could, for the first offence, inflict on the vilest murderer whose forfeited life may have been spared by the mistaken humanity of a jury.

Would a wise, just or humane body of men pass a law which would put on a level the man who reclaimed his own property by lawful means, and the wretch who would drag a freeman into bondage, and arrest as felons of equal grade, a respectable farmer from an adjoining state, with the sordid habitual trafficker in human flesh—the lawful taking of one's own property, with the stealing of a human being.

When the punishment of kidnapping was only a fine of £100, and the extent of confinement only one year, the supreme court declared that such enormities were not imputable to the legislature of Pennsylvania; we should do them great injustice not to rescue them a second time from the imputation, when the fine is greatly increased, and the servitude extended not only to seven, or twenty-one times the extent, but directed to be as a felon, and highway robbery; law, justice and humanity combine to repel an idea so dreadful. The great and benevolent act for the gradual abolition of slavery did not abolish the distinction between bond and free negroes and mulattoes, the free man and the absconding slave, the master who brought his slave here to reside, and the master who came here in pursuit of one who absconded from him; and when you are invoked to respect the legislation and spirit of the state, you will remember that this consists in obedience to its laws, which expressly declare—that they give no relief or shelter to runaway slaves from other states—that their master shall have a like right, and aid, to demand, claim and take them away, as if the law for the abolition of slavery had never been passed; and remember too, that this law is expressly declared not to be changed or repealed by the law of 1820, under color of which the defendants claim the right to consider the plaintiff as a felon for doing the very act, for which he had a right to aid, help and assistance by the abolition act, and by which the runaway slave was denied relief or shelter within the state.

While the abolition act put free blacks on the footing of free white men, and abolished slavery for life, as to those thereafter born, it did not otherwise interfere with those born before, or slaves excepted from the operation of the law; they were then, and yet are, considered as property—slavery yet exists in Pennsylvania, and the rights of the owners are now the same as before the abolition act—though their number is small, their condition is unchanged. The rights of the owners of fugitive slaves to take them to their homes in another state, were as perfect in 1822 as they were before the revolution—these rights are defined by the abolition act in the most plain, explicit terms, without any condition imposed on their exercise. The right was complete and perfect, if there existed between the person seizing and the person seized, the relation of owner and slave, or master and servant, the master or owner might take away his slave or servants to another state or country where he resided, without the consent of the negro, the person with whom he lived, the neighborhood, or the order or warrant of any magistrate. The law was his warrant, his authority, in the execution of which the master had a right to aid, and it is by this law that the rights of the parties in this suit must be tested in this case. If Jack, therefore, was the slave or servant of Mr. Johnson, he was no felon, kidnapper or ruffian, the act of seizure was lawful; and if the defendants, or any of them, beat, assaulted, arrested or imprisoned him, or any one acting by his authority, the act was illegal, without the lawful warrant or authority of an officer of the law.

Had the defendants any such authority?

In inquiring into the laws of Pennsylvania, on the subject of the rights and liberties of its citizens, and those of other states, a court who is to decide and instruct a jury upon them according to the law of the land, is not at liberty to overlook that law which is supreme. If the constitution of this state or the union prescribes rules for the conduct of officers in relation to arrest for crimes or breaches of the peace, we must obey them according to their terms, meaning and judicial exposition, without regard to opinions or treatises delivered or published elsewhere; an examination of rules to be deduced from such sources does not suffice for the faithful discharge of our duties; we at least must search for that law which we must respect and obey, as well as enjoin on your observance.

The 8th section of the 9th article of the bill of rights in the constitution of Pennsylvania declares, "that the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers and possessions, from unreasonable searches and seizures—and that no warrant to search any place or to seize any person or things, shall issue without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation."

The 4th amendment to the constitution of the United States declares, "that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized."

The supreme court of this state have decided that a warrant for forgery issued by a president of the court of common pleas, on the ground that it appeared to the judge, from common report, that there was strong reason to suspect the party charged to be guilty, and that he was likely to depart and retreat to parts unknown, before the witnesses could be summoned to appear before the judge—to enable him to issue a warrant on oath was illegal on the face of it, and a constable not bound to execute it. 3 Binney, 43-4, Purd. The first order issued by judge McNeill was to John Kinderdine, without oath, affirmation or any probable cause whatever—on the mere statement made by him, the particulars of which the judge has been unable to recollect, so as to even state them at the trial for our information—if instead of a verbal direction to bring the Jersey party before him, he had issued a warrant for the purpose, the legal result would have been the same.

Being in direct violation of both constitutions, utterly wanting every requisite prescribed, this order was, as every warrant or written authority from the judge would have been, utterly illegal, null and void to all intents and purposes—affording no justification to Kinderdine, to execute it or to any one in assisting him—any act done under such an order is as illegal as if none had been given, and for any injury done to the person or property of the plaintiff, or the others of his party, an action would lie as well against the judge as all those who acted in pursuance of that order, whether it issued to bring the parties before the judge to prove the plaintiff's property in Jack, or to answer for a crime or any offence against the laws.

The liberties of our citizens do not depend on such a tenure as an admission of the legality of this order would imply, nor are constitutional provisions for their protection, to be deemed such solemn mockeries as we should make them by justifying the conduct of the defendants in pursuance of it.

You will therefore consider every act done by them or any of them, every assault or offer of force, arrest, confinement or restraint of the personal liberty of any of the Jersey party, under or by virtue of the order of judge McNeill, as wholly without authority of the law and in direct violation of its most solemn provisions.

We now come to the second order of the judge.

The judge tells us that he took it for granted, from seeing the justice and constable in company, that the Jersey party were in their legal custody, and in consequence of such belief, he suggested the propriety of committing the negro to the county jail, and binding over the other party to prove their property, if they had any. If you believe the statement of the judge, there can be no difficulty in deciding on the merits of this part of the transaction, taking it in either way. As a compulsory proceeding on the Jersey party to compel them to prove the property in Jack, it was without any authority of law as utterly void as the former order. If it was to detain, confine or arrest them on a criminal accusation, it was unconstitutional, for the want of an oath and probable cause; there is no evidence of even an accusation made against them in any specific shape, or charging any definite offence; the judge does not state that any application was made for any process to be issued by him—if he is credited, he gave no order, but only suggested, advised or recommended the course he pointed out.

You will judge from the whole evidence, what was the nature and object of the proceeding before the judge, and of what he did advise or direct. By referring to that part of the book of justice Tompkins, which has been read, it seems to have been well understood by him at least, "that it was thought advisable to commit the said Jack to jail for safe-keeping, until the said Caleb Johnson should have an opportunity to prove his property." The recognition of Mr. John and Justitia Kinderdine, taken on their return from the judge's on Sunday night, shows their understanding of the matter; the condition was to deliver to the said Caleb Johnson, whenever his claim is completely established, or deliver him up at the next court of quarter sessions of Montgomery county, &c. This was the only act of Mr. Tompkins which appears to have been done officially by him that night, of which there is any evidence, unless the setting Jack free under the recognition was intended to be an official act. As the advice or direction of judge McNeill was not pursued by the commitment of Jack, the condition of the recognition was one which the judge or justice had no power or right to impose—the proceeding at the judge's was wholly illegal, and the detention of the Jersey party that night lawless and unjustifiable.

We now come to the proceedings before the justice on Monday morning. According to the account of Mr. Roney, the constable, no witnesses were examined, no oath or affirmation was administered by the justice, or any question put to the Jersey party, except whether they had bail; they said they could procure bail if they had an opportunity—the justice said he must commit them, and took up his pen to write, the constable then said he would be forthcoming for their appearance next morning, and they returned to the Billet. Skillman gave the same account of this part of the transaction at the justice's.

If you believe this statement, it is the worst part of the transaction; with ample time to proceed deliberately in due form of law, with no crowd or confusion to prevent a full and patient examination, there was no excuse for not strictly pursuing every step required by the law and constitution. The question of Jack's slavery had assumed a definite shape by his admission before the judge in the presence of Justice Tompkins and the rest of the party; that he was born a slave, and that he had lived with Mr. Johnson as such; he admitted his slavery till he was thirty, when he alleged he was free by the will of Judge Berrian, of New Jersey. The production of this paper then was necessary to make out the truth of Jack's assertion, but it does not appear to have been called or sent for, nor was Jack called on to verify his statement on oath, though he was a competent witness against Mr. Johnson, if he was a free man or only a servant for years.

It is a very remarkable circumstance that we have no evidence on this subject except Jack's admission before the judge, that he was not recognized as a witness to appear at court; that though he attended the trial he was not a witness on the indictment, and though now free and residing at a very convenient distance to attend the trial or answer interrogatories—we do not know what he would say on oath, or what account he gave of himself on coming to Mr. Kinderdine's. The entry on the book of Mr. Tompkins describes him as there in the employment of John and Justinian Kinderdine—how long we know not, but if the money he gave to Mr. Ellis at the trial at Norristown was his own, you may presume it was a considerable time—if you take the sum according to Mr. Ellis' evidence there, it was fifty; if according to his evidence now, it was thirty dollars. Jack is now a competent witness to any part of the case—by their not producing or taking his evidence, or examining any witness to show the account Jack gave of himself, or what other reason the defendants had for believing him free, and prosecuting the plaintiff for felony, than Jack's assertion at Judge McNeill's—you and we must consider it as the only evidence for our consideration on this part of the case. Justice Tompkins appears to have acted on no other evidence of the fact of slavery or freedom, the whole prosecution rested on that fact; if Jack was free the defendants might have been guilty; if he was a slave to the plaintiff, they could not be guilty of kidnapping. There could not be probable cause for the prosecution, unless there was at least some legal evidence of his freedom made out by oath or affirmation. Jack's assertion not under oath or affirmation, was not even the shadow of probable cause—to justify the justice in committing, arresting, detaining or issuing a warrant for the apprehension of the Jersey party, or any of them. If a warrant issued on no other proof it would have been illegal even for their arrest; a commitment without warrant would have been without any authority; a verbal direction to detain or confine them was equally so.

Does the evidence of Robert Tompkins change the result?

It is your exclusive province to decide on his credibility, you may believe or disbelieve his evidence as you may think proper; but in giving you our opinion as to its legal effect we must consider it as true.

He says that John and Sarah Kinderdine were examined before the justice, but does not state what evidence was given, and no paper or book containing it was given in evidence; this removes one constitutional objection—but it leaves the proceedings open to another fatal one, the want of probable cause on which to issue a warrant or order of arrest. This witness does not state whether any of the other party was present or not. This is an all important matter. The ninth section of the ninth article of the constitution provides, "that in all criminal prosecutions the accused hath a right to be heard by himself and counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him and to meet the witnesses face to face."

The sixth amendment to the constitution of the United States provides, "that the accused shall enjoy the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and to be confronted with the witnesses."

It is therefore incumbent on the defendants to satisfy you that the parties accused before the justice, were present on the examination of the witnesses against them; if it took place before they were brought before him and was not read to them or information given to them of its substance; or if it was had after they left the office or done at any time, as a color or cover for the proceedings which took place without the presence or knowledge of the accused, it was not only utterly lawless but aggravated by being done under the pretence of conformity to the provisions of the constitution.

As to all the proceedings then of the defendants which took place either for the purpose of taking the Jersey party before the justice or judge to prove the property of the plaintiff or to establish a charge of kidnapping; we instruct you without hesitation; that they were without any warrant or authority of law, wholly unlawful and illegal.

We will now inquire whether there was any lawful course to arrest on any other ground.

If Jack was the slave or servant of Mr. Johnson, if he absconded from his residence in New Jersey to this state, he was entitled to neither relief or shelter by the abolition act, it was prohibited by law, to harbor, deal with, conceal or employ him, without notice to his master, (if known) under a severe daily penalty. The laws of the state recognized him as the property of the plaintiff which he had a right to take away from this state to his residence. The 1st section of the bill of rights in the constitution of Pennsylvania declares, "that all men have the inherent and inalienable right of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing and protecting property;" "that no man can be deprived of his liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land." Sect. 9.

"That the right of citizens to bear arms in defence of themselves and the state shall not be questioned." Sect. 21.

The second section of the 4th article of the constitution of the U. States declares "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

The 10th section of the 1st article prohibits any state from passing any law "which impairs the obligation of a contract."

The second amendment provides, "that the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

The sixth, "that no man shall be deprived of liberty or property, without due process of law."

In addition to these rights Mr. Johnson had one other important one to which we invite your special attention, and a comparison of the right given and duty enjoined by the constitution of the United States with the eleventh section of the abolition act of 1780.

"No person held to serve or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party, to whom such labor or service shall be due." 4th art. sec. 2, clause 3.

Pursuant to this provision of the constitution, the act of congress of the 12th February, 1793, was passed, not to restrain the rights of the master, but to give him the aid of a law to enforce them. This law has been read to you, together with the opinion of our respected predecessors, in the case of Hill vs. Law, to which we give our entire assent, so far as it affirms the unqualified right of the master to seize, secure and remove his fugitive slave.* Do you perceive in this any thing discordant with the feelings, the spirit, the policy, or the legislation of Pennsylvania, as manifested in the abolition act, or the one passed to amend and explain it. Do these constitutional and legal provisions give any right to the plaintiff, or enjoin any duty on others, which are not the fundamental principles of her own laws, as acted on and enforced in her own courts, as of paramount and supreme authority. If you have any doubt, here is the opinion of one of the most humane and benevolent judges who ever presided in any court, the late chief Justice Tilghman, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of this state—Wright vs. Deacon 5 S. & R. 63.

"Whatever may be our private opinions on the subject of slavery, it is well known that our southern brethren would not have consented to have become parties to a constitution under which the United States have enjoyed so much prosperity, unless their property in slaves had been secured. This constitution has been adopted by the free consent of the citizens of Pennsylvania, and it is the duty of every man, whatever may be his office or station, to give it a fair and candid construction." After referring to the constitution, he observes—"Here is the principle—the fugitive is to be delivered up on claim of his master." But it required a law to regulate the manner in which this principle should be reduced to practice. "It was necessary to establish some mode in which the claim should be made, and the fugitive be delivered up." He then recites the act of congress, and continues—"It plainly appears from the whole sense and tenor of the constitution and act of congress, that the fugitive was to be delivered up on a summary proceeding, without the delay of a formal trial in a court of common law. But if he had really a right to freedom, that right was not impaired by this proceeding—he was placed just in the situation in which he stood before he fled, and might prosecute his right in the state to which he belonged."

This is in the spirit of the law, policy and feeling of Pennsylvania, as declared by the supreme court, and if the acts and proceedings of inferior courts and judges in opposition to the rights of the owners of fugitive slaves are quashed as illegal, of what nature must be the lawless conduct of individuals, who, by an assumed authority, undertake to obstruct the execution of the supreme law of the land? The supreme court declares that the constitution of the United States, would never have been formed or assented to by the southern states, without some provision

*NOTE 2. Extract from the charge of judge Peters in Hill vs. Law.

To carry into effect the constitutional provisions on this subject, the act of congress of February 12th, 1793, was enacted. This act empowers the person to whom a fugitive from labor or service is due, his agent or attorney "to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and to take him or her before any judge of the circuit or district courts of the United States residing within the state, or before any magistrate of a county, city, &c. wherein such seizure was made, and on proof of owing service to the claimant, either by affidavit or other evidence taken before a judge or magistrate of the state from which the fugitive escaped, the judge or magistrate of the state in which he or she is arrested shall give a certificate thereof to the claimant, his agent or attorney, which shall be a sufficient warrant for removing such fugitive."

By this it clearly appears that the claimant, his agent or attorney, has the authority of this law to seize and arrest without warrant or other legal process, the fugitive he claims, and that without being accompanied by any civil officer, though it would be prudent to have such officer to keep the peace. Whilst thus seized and arrested, the fugitive is as much in custody of the claimant, his agent or attorney, as he would be in that of a sheriff or other officer of justice, having legal process to seize and arrest, who may use any place proper, in his opinion, for temporary and safe custody.

for securing their property in slaves. Look at the first article, and you will see that slaves are not only property as chattels, but political property, which confers the highest and most sacred political rights of the states, on the inviolability of which the very existence of this government depends.

The apportionment among the several states comprising this union, of their representatives in congress.

The apportionment of direct taxes among the several states.

The number of electoral votes for president and vice president, to which they shall respectively be entitled.

The basis of these rights is—"according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians, not taxed, three fifths of all other persons." So that for all these great objects, five slaves are, in federal numbers, equal to three freemen. You thus see that in protecting the rights of a master in the property of a slave, the constitution guarantees the highest rights of the respective states of which each has a right to avail itself, and which each enjoys in proportion to the number of slaves within its boundaries.

This was a concession to the southern states; but it was not without its equivalent to the other states, especially the small ones—the basis of representation in the senate of the United States was perfect equality, each being entitled to two senators—Delaware had the same weight in the senate as Virginia.

Thus you see that the foundations of the government are laid, and rest on the rights of property in slaves—the whole structure must fall by disturbing the corner stones—if federal numbers cease to be respected or held sacred in questions of property or government, the rights of the small states must disappear and the government and union dissolve by the prostration of its laws before the usurped authority of individuals.

We shall pursue this subject no further in its bearing on the political rights of the states composing the union—in recalling your attention to these rights which are the subject of this controversy we declare to you as the law of the case, that they are inherent and unalienable, so recognized by all our fundamental laws.

The constitution of the state or union, is not the source of these rights or the others to which we have referred you, they existed in their plenitude before any constitutions, which do not create, but protect and secure them against any violation by the legislatures or courts, in making, expounding or administering laws.

The nature of this case, its history, and the course of the argument call on us to declare explicitly what is the effect of a constitutional protection or guaranty of any right or the injunction of any duty. The 26th section of the bill of rights in the constitution of Pennsylvania, is in these words "To guard against transgressions of the high powers we have delegated, we declare (we the people of Pennsylvania), that every thing in this article is excepted out of the general powers of government and shall forever remain inviolate." A higher power declares this constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding," 6 art. 2 clause const. U. S.

An amendment of the constitution is of still higher authority, for it has the effect of controlling and repealing the express provisions of the constitution authorizing a power to be exercised; by a declaration that it shall not be construed to give such power. 3 Dall. 382.

We have stated to you the various provisions of the constitution of the United States, and its amendments, as well as that of this state; you see their authority and obligation to be supreme over any laws or regulations which are repugnant to them, or which violate, infringe or impair any right thereby secured; the conclusions which result, are too obvious to be more than stated.

Jack was the property of the plaintiff, who had a right to possess and protect his slave or servant, whom he had a right to seize and take away to his residence in New Jersey by force, if force was necessary, he had a right to secure him from escape, or rescue, by any means not cruel or wantonly severe—he had a right to carry arms in defence of his property or person, and to use them if either were assailed with such force, numbers or violence as made it necessary for the protection or safety of either; he had a right to come into the state and take Jack on Sunday, the act of taking him up and conveying him to the Billet, was no breach of the peace if not done by noise and disorder, occasioned by himself or his party—and their peaceable entry into the house of Mrs. Kinderline was lawful and justifiable, for this purpose, in doing these acts, they were supported by laws which no human authority could shake or question.

The power of the state was incompetent to impair the obligation of the contract or purchase from Ranley and Berrian, or to discharge Jack from the service of his master; he could not be impeded in the prosecution of his lawful pursuit, or restrained of his liberty without the commission of an offence and process of law.

Did they commit any breach of the peace?

Joseph Kinderline proves he was in the house when they entered and took Jack, he heard no noise, and did not see them enter—he informed his uncle of what had happened, came with him and his aunt to the wagon, but does not recollect what was said.

Sarah Rakestraw testifies she heard Issachar ask them to prove their property, to which they replied, to stand off, and if he resisted they would blow him through—if this witness is credited, it shows the use of language rude and rough; but it did not amount to a breach of the peace without an offer to use an offensive weapon, or proof of some act done. Had such offer been made when Mr. Kinderline was doing an act which interfered with their rights, they would have been justified in using as much force as was necessary to enable them to proceed in their lawful business—his demand of proof of property was unauthorised, if the law gave him this right he would also have the right to judge of its sufficiency; but he was acting in his own wrong in making the demand, and they were under no obligation, legal or moral, to exhibit their papers, and submit to an examination by him in the highway. A request, at a proper time and place, and under circumstances where there would be any probability of a candid and impartial attention to legal evidence, respect for the rights of property, or the laws of the land, would if refused rudely, have indicated a disposition on the part of the Jersey men extremely reprehensible, and put their refusal on a very different footing from that in which it appears by the evidence of Miss Rakestraw; though even in such case they would not have been compelled by law to show their property or authority, yet rude conduct or language would have tended much to have palliated any excitement or violence which followed a refusal to accede to a proper request. On this subject there is much weight in the remark of the defendant's counsel, that there is a social law, a law of decent respect for the opinion of others, which ought not to be overlooked in the assertion of right—but it is most certainly a gross violation of this social law, to rudely demand as a right, that which ought to be conceded only to courtesy of manner, and propriety of time, place and circumstance.

The next act of the Jersey party which is complained of, is the threat to blow out the brains of Issachar Kinderline, when he either had seized or was about to seize one of their horses by the head, for the purpose of stopping them in the road, near the meeting house. At this time there was a crowd of some 20 or 30 about the wagon, and shortly after the plaintiff was struck in the head with a stone.

Under such circumstances, a demand to prove property or to stop, was most unseasonable and improper, any attempt to stop them was unlawful, and would have justified the repelling such an attempt by as much force, and with such weapons as would be necessary to their safe passage to the Billet; what was said or done by them was no breach of the peace, or other offence, which in any manner justified their arrest or detention, 5 S. & R. 301.

It would be a severe reproach on the laws of the state if any of the acts testified to have been done by the plaintiff or his party could be deemed a crime or offence, it is our duty to say to you that in point of law they were guilty of neither; their conduct did not expose them to any other notice of the law than possibly the fine for doing worldly business by the mere seizure of Jack on the Sabbath. If that had been the only offence imputable to them by the defendants, you may be inclined to think with us that the Jersey party were not the only persons who were exposed to the penalty—it may well be doubted whether there was a work of necessity, mercy or charity, to proceed further on that day than was done by the defendants before the Jersey party and the crowd reached the Billet.

At any rate, travelling on Sunday does not fall within the legal description of worldly employment or business, or any offence within the law cognizable by a magistrate, 5 S. & R. 301—as going from Mrs. Kinderline's to the Billet.

The next inquiry is whether the plaintiff has been assaulted, beat, or imprisoned by the defendants, or either of them, and by whom. An assault is an offer to strike, beat, or commit an act of violence on the person of another, without actually doing it, or touching his person.

A battery is the touching or commission of any actual violence to the person of another in a rude or angry manner.

Imprisonment is any restraint of the personal liberty of another; any prevention of his movements from place to place, or his free action according to his own pleasure and will; a man is imprisoned when he is under the control of another in these respects, or either of them against his own will.

It is false imprisonment when this is done without lawful authority, and such imprisonment is deemed an assault in law, though no assault in fact is made; the one includes both offences, the act being unlawful. In actions for injuries of this kind, all parties who are proved to have taken any part in the assault, battery or imprisonment, are principals, and answerable for all acts done by themselves or by any others concerned in the transaction, by their order, consent, or procurement; or in pursuance and furtherance of an object or enterprise in which they have all engaged, and which is illegal. If two or more agree or combine to effect an unlawful purpose, each one of the party is civilly answerable for all acts done in or leading towards the accomplishment of the joint object, directly connected with it or naturally consequential. If the object and purpose is entered upon and commenced by the parties concerned, and other individuals, or a crowd assembled in consequence, and consummate the act or join in its execution; the original parties are responsible for their conduct, though the immediate actors may be unknown to them, or have no other concerted agreement or connection with them, than by the unlawful acts committed, intended or tending to effectuate the original object and purpose.

If a man does an unlawful act, apt or likely to do an injury to some person, and an injury is actually caused thereby, it is immaterial by what intermediate hand it is inflicted, the first wrong doer is directly answerable to the injured party as the immediate trespasser; as where a man threw a lighted squib into a crowded market house, it was thrown by one and other, till it struck a person and put out his eye—the man who first threw the squib was made answerable, 3 Wils. 407. So is the law where one man publicly and unjustly charges another with the commission of an offence or crime of which he is innocent, and an injury is inflicted on him by an excited crowd.

It is more dangerous than the squib, because more apt to be attended with fatal consequences, and no cry would be more exciting in Pennsylvania, in the most orderly community, than that of kidnapping.

You will then understand the law to be well settled, that it is not necessary to bring home to any of the defendants, the definite act which has caused the injury; the law fastens the consequences of any illegal act upon them, which they have, in any manner as before mentioned, directly or indirectly, done, brought about or caused.

Their mere presence, however, when the act is committed, does not make them accountable for it, without some participation on their part, or exciting, directing or encouraging it—there must be some evidence of their acting, or causing others to act. If they take any part you may consider any or each of them who do so, answerable for all that is done, unless you are satisfied that this interference was unconnected with the original and principal purpose.

If an illegal act is done under color of legal authority or process, from an officer who had no jurisdiction of the subject matter, or whose order or process is made or issued in violation of the law, the judge or justice, and party procuring it, are trespassers, so is the officer and all who act under him, if the process is void on the face of it, 10 C. 76, and his who procures such order on false pretences, is the most aggravated case. It is not necessary to constitute false imprisonment, that the person restrained of his liberty should be touched or actually arrested, if he is ordered to do or not to do the thing, to move or not move against his own free will, if it is not left to his own option, to go or stay where he pleases, and force is offered or threatened, and the means of coercion are at hand, ready to be used—or there is reasonable ground to apprehend that coercive means will be used, if he does not yield. A person so threatened need not wait for its actual application. His submission to the threatened and reasonably to be apprehended force, is no consent to the arrest, detention or restraint of the freedom of his motion—he is as much imprisoned as if his person was touched, or force actually used; the imprisonment continues until he is left at his own will to go where he pleases, and must be considered as voluntary, till all efforts at coercion or restraint cease, and the means of effecting it are removed.

On the part of Mr. Tompkins, it is contended that the plaintiff has failed in his action as to him, for want of the notice required by the act of assembly which has been read, Purd. 492.

This act applies to all official acts of a justice of the peace, and must be liberally construed so as to give them the full benefit of the protection intended by the notice. Though the act done is prohibited by law, and a penalty imposed, as for marrying a minor without the consent of his father, 5 Blinn. 24, or arresting a party by warrant for an act which is no offence, as travelling on Sunday, or if in the honest exercise of his jurisdiction, he judges erroneously of the legal character and consequences of an act done, and treats as an offender, a person who has committed no crime, 5 S. & R. 301-2, he is entitled to notice. On the other hand, if he acts from improper motives, in a case where he had no authority to act at all, or in the manner in which he did act, he will be deemed to have acted merely under the color or pretence of his office, and not by virtue of it, and no notice is necessary. Nor if he took any part in this proceeding without intending to act as a justice of the peace in his official character, or did or directed any act to be done, in a matter whereof he had no jurisdiction. He must be clothed with official power to do the act officially, so that he is authorised to judge and decide whether the offence charged has been committed, or whether the thing done is punishable or within his cognizance—if he judges honestly, however mistakenly or ignorantly, he is entitled to notice in all such cases, though he cannot be justified in doing the act.

But if some things are indispensable to bring his official power into action, and those things appear not to have been done, his acts are null and void, and cannot be official; as issuing a warrant of arrest in a criminal accusation, without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation—the power to do this is expressly excepted from all the powers of the government, by the bill of rights of Pennsylvania, and the amendment to the constitution of the United States.

No act can be by virtue of office, which the power of government is incompetent to authorise; it must be taken to be by the mere color of office, and no notice is necessary, whatever his motives or intentions were. It is for you to decide on all the evidence in the case applicable to Mr. Tompkins—how he acted in any of the scenes which occurred, you will consider him as any other defendant, as to all matters over which he had no official power to act, or in which he did not intend to act officially—you must find in his favor, if all his acts to the injury of the plaintiff were official.

These are points of law which furnish the rules for the decision of this case; you will apply the evidence you have heard to ascertain the facts as they bear on each defendant.

In contrasting the conduct of the respective parties, you can decide which has acted within and under the authority of the law, and which has violated it; if the evidence has made the same impression on your minds as on ours, there cannot be a doubt that the defendants have inflicted injuries on the plaintiff for which he is entitled to redress at your hands. If the rights with which he was clothed by the supreme law of the land, are to be neither respected or protected, you or we cannot be protected in its administration; our powers are derived from the laws and constitution of the state and union; his are from the same source and authority, and from one source higher than either. That power which can at its pleasure alter and rescind any of the provisions of the constitution itself, by a constitutional amendment; by that power Caleb Johnson is invested with and guaranteed in the enjoyment of rights which can be neither infringed or impaired by all the power of the state or general government so long as the supreme law to which they are subordinate is obeyed. And shall it be permitted to individuals acting under the impulse of their own feelings and passions to do what is forbidden to the legislative power of the country, with no other check on their actions than what they may call the social law of the place, or public opinion? This case illustrates the effects of indulging that false philanthropy which prostrates the law and the constitution in its zeal against slavery, as we remarked to you before, it extends not merely to make the slave free, but freemen slaves. The plaintiff and his party were denied the use of a bed, and this by zealots in the cause of humanity and benevolence. What would have been said of Mr. Johnson if he had refused Jack a place, and means of rest and sleep—and it is to sanction such philanthropy that laws are to be disregarded, not only to justify the defendants in attempting to liberate Jack, but forcing his master from place to place as a criminal, prosecuting and now denouncing him as a felon. Though he offered manumission to his slave on the first night, and has since executed it, the defendants did not then, nor do they now relent, even after the full investigation which the case has undergone.

We had hoped that they would have offered some circumstances of mitigation or excuse, which would have made the question for your decision one of mere compensation to the plaintiff for the injury he has actually sustained, without giving any thing in damages by way of public example, to prevent future outrages against the laws and the constitutional rights of citizens of the United States. We very much regret that by justifying their whole conduct, and boldly making the issue before you one of right, there is but one mode left to you by which you can meet your duty to the parties and the country.

If there are any rights of property which can be enforced, if four citizens have personal rights which are made inviolable under the protection of the supreme law of the state, and union, they are those which have been set at naught by some of the defendants. As the owner of property—which he had a perfect right to possess, protect, and take away, as a citizen of a sister state, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of any other state, Mr. Johnson stands before you on ground which no law can take from under him—it is the same ground on which the government is built. If the defendants can be justified in what they have done, we have no longer law or government—and if the personal liberty of the citizens can be thus violated with impunity, there remain to us no rights worth protecting.

The political aspect of public affairs cannot be overlooked when a court and jury are called on to decide on constitutional questions. The country has happily passed through some exciting and painful scenes, threatening its peace. No one can tell what danger may be impending over us, or how imminent it may be—but it is certain that there is much cause for vigilance in all those concerned in the administration of the law of the land, in enforcing its provisions; and by punishing all infraction, in such a manner, that it shall be in its operation, as well as in its name, supreme—the only test and standard of right and wrong.

As citizens of Pennsylvania and the United States, it now rests with you to pass upon the rights in controversy between these parties; they are of the highest importance to every man in the community, and to the whole country, as affecting its deepest concerns.

The question of damages is exclusively with you—though the defendants have not given in evidence or urged by their counsel, any matters in extenuation, we cannot help remarking that they appear to be respected in their neighborhood; they are members of a society distinguished for their obedience and submission to the laws; than whom none other is more meritorious in their clarity, benevolence and exemplary good conduct in all the relations of life. By what motives they were actuated towards the plaintiff, who never injured them or theirs in the pursuit of his property, is hard to imagine—it would seem that they were impelled by some cause not disclosed in the evidence or argument of the cause—some spirit or tone in public opinion; the temper of the times, some erroneous impressions of the policy of the law of 1820, or mistaken advice on its construction. This, however, is left to mere conjecture, as we are not authorised by the defendants to place their conduct on this footing, the case must be left to you on the question of right, according to the laws and constitution, as they have been shown to you, and on the question of damages, as you shall think the justice of the case demands.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The president, after two or three days repose, by the aid of his medical attendants, was enabled to proceed to the university of Cambridge, near Boston, on the 26th ult. where the honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by the faculty of that distinguished seminary of learning—as has been the custom on the visit of a president of the United States. After which he passed to Charlestown, where he was handsomely received and escorted to Bunker's Hill—from whence he proceeded on his tour, visiting Marblehead and Salem, &c. and arrived at Lowell, where he lodged. On the 28th he was received, in much form, by the state authorities at Concord, N. H. the legislature being yet in session—but he was a good deal exhausted, and compelled to retire from the press of the people. Here was the last place at which we had heard of him, until it was known that he passed through Baltimore in the night of the 3d of July—hastening home to Washington!

It appears that the president's health was such as to demand a rapid movement south, and one that would not be interrupted by calls made upon him, or other like demonstrations of respect—for he needed rest, and he found it on board of the steamboats and rail road cars, on his journey. Instead of going to Portland, in Maine, as was intended, he left Concord on Monday, the 1st, after breakfast, and arrived at Washington at 9 or 10 o'clock on Thursday, the 4th of July, making a journey of 474 miles, in three days, very considerably recruited. Such are the present accommodations for travelling.

The vice president and secretary of the navy, with Mr. Donnellson and col. Earle, arrived at Washington with the president.

The addresses of the governor of Massachusetts, of the mayor of Boston, and of the president of the university, are among the things which we have laid aside for record—for we regard them as fine specimens of what ought to be said on such occasions, if such formalities are deemed "necessary and proper"—of which we have considerable doubt, unless in extraordinary cases, such as the visit of LAFAYETTE—the most extraordinary man of his time, the illustrious link between the past and present generation, a man, indeed, of three generations, and great and glorious and beloved in all—the pure and unquestioned friend of all the human family—the brave, the disinterested, and the good.

We have inserted the address of Mr. Everett, and the reply of the president, at Bunker's Hill, and present a brief account of the reception at Lowell, because of the peculiar circumstances which belong to both places: for if the former be regarded as the "Mount Pisgah" from whence success in the revolutionary struggle was first clearly discerned, the latter may be respected as a splendid demonstration of the victory obtained in establishing the right to "regulate trade;" and, as our disputes with the "mother country" on that subject, caused the revolution, so the necessity of securing the benefits of the newly gained power to "regulate trade" brought about the adoption of our present federal constitution;* and the battle of Bunker's Hill will have been fought in vain, and the constitution be rendered null and void, when it is admitted that there is not power in the federal government to defend and protect the virtuous industry of the females of Lowell.

¶ The case of Mr. Pleasants, "attached" to appear at the circuit court of the District of Columbia, will interest many of our readers. If the proceeding is not retired from—important results may be expected from it.

¶ In anticipation of obtaining a copy of Mr. Webster's speech, delivered at Cincinnati, we have inserted what may be esteemed the preliminary matters.

MR. WHITE. There is good reason to hope that the report of the decease of this worthy gentleman, is not true. A New Orleans paper of the 18th ultimo still presents his name as a candidate for the gubernatorial chair of the state.

THE CHOLERA.

Maryland. A few cases have appeared on the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, above Williamsport.

Pittsburg. A few more solitary deaths had occurred in this city—our latest dates do not show an absence of the disease; but afford no present cause to apprehend it will become epidemic.

A few cases have happened at Claysville.

Kentucky. The Bardstown Herald of the 22d ult. says, that no case of cholera had yet occurred in that town, though they had been very numerous in the neighborhood.

The Maysville Eagle of the 27th says "the cholera still lingers among us, though in a greatly mitigated form."

At Flemingsburg the disease had not suffered any abatement. It was thought that one sixth of the population who remained in the town, had died. Among them the editor of the "Intelligencer" and his two daughters.

It had appeared at Paris with almost unparalleled malignity. The town was literally decimated in 48 hours—but the flight of many was prevented by disease and death. In like manner it burst out at the Lower Blue Licks, a watering place thronged with visitors. The venerable major Bedinger, a relic of the revolution, lost every white member of his family, including a married daughter, and a son, a physician, who came to attend upon the family.

The cholera had not yet ceased at Lexington—but had so much abated, that the people were returning to their homes. The list of ascertained deaths in this city is awful, the population being regarded. There died, in 20 days—186 whites, 164 blacks, and 25 lunatics in the hospital—total 375.

One white person, 6 Indians and 5 blacks, have died of the cholera, at the Choctaw college, in Scott county.

A few deaths have happened at Cythiana.

Many fatal cases have occurred in various parts of Kentucky. The disease seems suddenly to present itself, and then as suddenly retire without any known cause.

We had very alarming accounts of the breaking out of the cholera at Louisville—but it seems that up to the 25th only 10 or 12 deaths had happened, and these chiefly of persons who had been attacked on the river.

Wheeling. A letter signed by the physicians of this town (11 in number) addressed to the board of health on the 28th ult. says that no new cases of cholera had appeared in the last five days.

Ohio. Though a few cases still happened at Cincinnati, the disease had not at all assumed the character of an epidemic.

Tennessee. The cholera had ceased to prevail at Nashville on the 19th—but cases occurred in the adjacent country. It was bad at Paducah.

From the 14th Dec. 1832, when the first case was reported, to the 20th June last, there died of the cholera at Nashville, 158 persons—of whom 65 were in the last 20 days of the period given.

New Orleans. A steamboat had arrived at Louisville from New Orleans, which lost 17 of her passengers by the cholera.

There were only 23 interments at New Orleans on the 17th ult. and a strong hope was entertained that the disease was about to cease its ravages; but private letters inform us that it was still causing a great number of deaths on the plantations.

It is stated that the use of calomel, in cholera, has produced almost certain death in Louisiana, in the present season. Opium seem to be chiefly relied on, for a successful practice.

Mississippi. A. M. Scott, governor of this state, has died of the cholera.

Missouri. Cases are happening in some parts of this state. The cholera had been dreadful at Falmira. The whole population of the town was only 700—but, it is stated that 130 deaths occurred, from the 4th to the 22nd June!

Texas. The cholera has appeared in this country, but had not yet been very destructive.

Cuba. There is reason to hope that the accounts of the cholera at Havana have been much exaggerated.

Mexico. An arrival at New Orleans from Tampico, and the "Courier" says—a letter, dated Tampico the 7th, states that in the 14 days previous to the 6th, there had been 500 deaths from the disease, and on that day the deaths amounted to 130.

*To "regulate trade" was the leading point made by Virginia, in Jan. 1786, when proposing that commissioners should hold a convention, &c. which resulted in the present federal union.

This fatality we believe is unprecedented in this country. The town of Tampico is estimated to contain 3,000 souls; by some there is said to be between 4 and 5,000 inhabitants. On the 8th (the day before the Emperor sailed) there was said to have been 183 deaths. We understand that it was generally confined to the lower classes, and but one foreign merchant had died of it.

A French barque, the name of which we did not learn, lost every person belonging to her with the exception of one man.

THE REV. MR. AVERY. There seems to be a foul disposition to persecute this man—though acquitted of the heinous offenses with which he was charged, by a jury of his countrymen; and since then reinstated in the performance of his clerical duties, by a conference of his own church, after a full and deliberate examination of all the points—even some, perhaps, which the law of the land could not have reached. And because that we thoughtlessly, or inadvertently, copied a brief paragraph which insinuated that the jury had acquitted him rather on the principle that it was better many guilty persons should escape than an innocent one suffer, than because of the strength of the testimony in his favor—it is proper to recur to the subject and say, that facts have transpired, since the trial, which go entirely to relieve Mr. Avery of certain parts of the testimony which seemed to be the most decided against him.

THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST. Though equally friendly to every pursuit of the laboring people of the United States, we have naturally had the greater or more decided interest in the business of the agricultural class—for the good reason that it is, by far, the most numerous and important: and, in doing all that we could to excite manufactures of iron, and other metals, wool, cotton, leather, wood, earthen, &c. &c. the fact has always been present to our mind that a ton of iron or a bale of cloth, a pair of shoes or a ship, represented, (for each contains), a large proportion of its value in the products of the land, and of labor variously employed upon it. A bale of cloth, for an example, worth 400 dollars, made and consumed in the United States, as certainly represents an agricultural value of 300 dollars, as 60 barrels of flour exported, at 5 dollars per barrel—because of the wool contained in the cloth, and the bread and meat, &c. which have entered into its composition, through the subsistence of the makers of it. And, if the whole manufacture of woollen cloth in our country is worth $40,000,000 a year, as has been supposed, it is fully equal to an export of thirty millions worth of flour, beef, pork, &c. &c. for it matters not how the value is gained. The demand at Boston, Providence and other eastern cities and towns, for the flour of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia, much exceeds the general foreign demand—and the wheat-grower can discover no sort of difference in five dollars paid him on account of a barrel of flour consumed at Lowell, or in five dollars received because that a barrel of his flour is consumed in London. But he has this great advantage, though all are not so sensible of it as they should be, that the market at Lowell is steady—at London capricious; the first may be depended on, but concerning the second no calculation can be made; and there are other equally important reasons why the home market should be preferred which have often been urged upon the consideration of our readers, and need not be repeated on the present occasion. If the gross value of all the manufactures of iron, wool, cotton and leather, in the United States, be 125 millions of dollars a year (which is pretty near the real amount), we have the representative, in these articles, of nearly one hundred millions worth of the products of the land, and labor, excited to render the mines and the forests—the grain fields, and hay fields, the pastures and ranges, profitable—even mines of gold, without labor, have no more value than mountains of granite. The anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania might have been purchased, a few years ago, for a few cents per acre; but labor has been applied to the making of canals and roads, and the value of these fields is immense—far greater than the gold fields of the south, or southern America, or even the diamond districts of Goleonda and Brazil. And so it is—that the land holding, or agricultural interest, has, directly or indirectly, an average of two-thirds or three-fourths of the value of all the leading articles manufactured in the United States. Every steam engine employed depends on this interest for its fuel—every wagon, used in transportations, relies upon it for the supply and subsistence of horses, as well as the support of the driver of them—whose food constitutes a large part of his earnings. But if the driver were not so employed, he would probably be a producer of food; and, at least to the amount, or value, of his own consumption, interfere with the general market for food, and so depreciate its price. And what is price? It costs as much labor to make a bushel of wheat at 50 cents a bushel, as if at 200; and it is the manifest interest of the grain-grower—the farmer, to build up a market for his products. If all the people were farmers, there would be no market for grain. The foreign demand for bread-stuffs, including rice, is not equal to 2,000,000 barrels of flour a year—and what would be the price, per barrel, if every American citizen raised bread for his own family? Not one-third of what it is; for the small surpluses happening would do more than supply the whole foreign demand. And these surpluses would always exist—(times of scarcity excepted), because that the closest and best managing farmer must have some money, to be obtained through the sale of his productions; and hence the surpluses would always be pressing against one another, to reduce price. This must be clear to the understanding of every reflecting person, as well as that a money-price has only a certain relation to value. The annual subscription to the REGISTER is five dollars; but we can much better afford to send a copy of it to a new customer in exchange for a barrel of flour, than pay five dollars for the barrel of flour, in the usual course of business. The former would be the disposition of a surplus; but the latter bears directly upon the profit in possession. We have not time to carry-out the points now made; nor is it necessary with respect to those who will take the trouble to think. It is the great interest of the American community that the money-price of the products of the land should be high, and the demand steady. We would rather that the ordinary price of flour was 9 dollars then six dollars, and of cotton 15 cents per lb. than ten.* The circulation of money thereby to be caused, in extra profits earned, would enable us better to purchase three barrels of flour or three pounds of cotton-goods, at the high price, than one barrel or pound at the low one. And besides, every kind of labor would have its corresponding advance. Our doctrine will not lead to extremes. A glass of wine may be good for the "stomach's sake;" but a bottle may sicken the stomach. We would not force the money-price of the great necessities of life, but earnestly and steadily encourage the production of them, relying on competition as a balance-wheel to regulate all affairs between producers and consumers. We refer to the HOME TRADE. The intercourse with foreign countries must rest upon its own laws—restricted or free, as reciprocated by the parties; but the amount of it is small, compared with that of the internal commerce of a country. In the United States, the home trade is as from 15 to 20 to one, as compared with our foreign commerce.

These brief hints or remarks, have been caused by the reception of a letter from a plain farmer of Chenango county, New York—who, in remitting his dues for subscription, was kindly pleased to hold a little familiar chat with us—which we are always thankful to receive, though the peculiar circumstances in which we are placed, forbids a reciprocation of such courtesies, in most cases. He says—

"The advance on wool in Europe, has enabled the domestic manufacturer to give a fair price for wool this season—and, as my farm is almost wholly devoted to the raising of wool, I am enabled to enclose you — dollars. You are on the right track. It is the land and the labor on the land, that must be sacrificed by an abandonment of the protecting system. The woollen mill is precisely in the same situation to the grazier, as the flour mill to the tillage farmer. Neither could get on without the aid of the other. The flour mill will continue to grind if wheat is reduced to 50 cents per bushel—and the woollen mill will move if fine wool falls to 25 cents per lb. But to enable the farmer to furnish the wheat, he must reduce his rent and labor to one-half its present amount or cost—and the wool-grower must keep sheep at 50 cents, per annum, instead of one dollar, the present presumed fair cost of them—but the wheat cannot be supplied at 50 cents, nor the wool at 25, without corresponding reductions in the value of land and labor.

*Except on account of bad crops.

"As you are in the habit of using figures for proof, I send you the annexed calculations. I am informed that the Oriskany woolen factory will, in the current year, require 200,000 lbs. of wool. Their agents, (and others), have come into this county to lay in their stock. To supply this 200,000 lbs. of wool will require the whole clip of 80,000 sheep—2½ lbs. to the head. To support these sheep will require 530 grazing farms, 150 sheep to each, which is a large average for sheep-farmers. This is a great wool county—estimated to possess, at this time, 280,000 sheep, mostly of the fine woolled kinds, which have been increased, in consequence of the manufacturing demand, from 60,000, or thereabouts. These sheep have taken the place of the cow-pastures, and have raised the price of butter from 6 and 8 cents to 12½ and 15, cash, in any quantity. If these 220,000 extra sheep were destroyed, and their place occupied by cattle, 36,000 cows might be supported—the food of one cow being equal to that of six sheep, and their product would be 36,000 firkins of butter—but at a much reduced price, perhaps. We cannot import more than we can pay for. I think that we have now the requisite skill, and that the manufacturing interest will be as valuable as any other—as the price of flour may decline from 5½ dollars to 3 dollars. The south will then have no other gratification than in raising the price of European labor, and reducing that of northern labor to the same standard. The present general prosperity of the farming interest in this county, is entirely owing to the protection given to manufactures. There can be no mistake.

"Moses and Joshua warned the Israelites that when they were well settled and grown fat on the promised land—not to rebel, and forget their Lord and Protector. But they did forget and did rebel, and their sufferings were great—until a new generation destroyed their idols, and returned to the true faith. We must suffer—before our eyes shall be opened.

"P. S. Where a single woolen mill gives employment to half the inhabitants of a county—nearly 40,000 free persons, can it be doubted who are protected by a protecting policy?"

The population of Chenango, in 1830, was 37,404. We see it stated that the sheep in this county require 1,860 farms. At 2½ lbs. each, they supply 700,000 lbs. wool—say at only 40 cents, equal to 280,000 dollars.—Wool is the "crop" and the profit of the farmers of Chenango, generally, and a very handsome one it is—at fair prices. But the county also, fully furnishes itself with bread and meat, &c. and has many manufacturers and mechanics who keep up a lively market, at home, for the other surplus productions of the agriculturists, and supply them with many things which they need—the surpluses of all these being likewise added to the general stock of wealth, in exchanges with other parts of the country.

The preceding letter was not written for publication—but we thought that the facts set forth ought not to be lost; and hope that its author will excuse its insertion.

IMPORTANT FACTS. We have adduced hundreds of instances, at different times, to shew that duties imposed on articles imported, are not, necessarily, taxes upon consumers; and that a reduced amount of domestic duties may only increase the profits of foreign producers. On this subject the "United States Gazette" says—"It is a fact well worth the attention of the honest opposers of a protection to American industry, that the principal articles of British manufacture which are admitted at a reduced duty under the altered tariff, have advanced in price in England, so as to cost the consumer here more than when they paid a higher rate. Stuff goods of every description, of which the consumption in this country is immense and increasing, have advanced full fifteen per cent. and coarse woollens generally from 10 to 12½ per cent.

"This result is no novelty to the merchant, nor by any means unexpected by him; as an individual, the change in no manner affects his interest injuriously. The price at which he sells an article bears a regular proportion to its cost of importation. To the country at large, it makes an important difference."

THE WEST! About forty-five years ago, "Red Stone Old Fort"—the location of which is not very far from the centre of Pennsylvania, was called the "Back Woods;" and the writer of this well remembers the departure of a respected family for that place, of whom leave was taken as of persons now proceeding to the "Rocky Mountains." Next Ohio became "the west," then Indiana and Illinois, and the left bank of the Mississippi was the extreme "west." But the "Father of Waters" was leaped at a bound, and what is now the state of Missouri became the west—then Boon's Lick, and where the city of Jefferson now stands; the west was next located on the Yellow Stone, some two thousand miles from the Mississippi, but has been removed over the Rocky Mountains, and will soon have its place at the mouth of the Columbia river, on the Pacific ocean. When that happens, "the west" will no longer be heard of. In the present journey to the west, pretty near three thousand miles are passed over in steamboats.

A COLORED CONVENTION has lately been held at Philadelphia. Its chief purpose seems to have been to foster and extend an opposition to the African colonization project, now in operation; as the following resolution will shew:

"Resolved, That this convention discourage, by every means in their power, the colonization of our people, anywhere beyond the limits of this CONTINENT; and those who may be obliged to exchange a cultivated region for a howling wilderness, we would recommend to retire back into the western wilds and fell the native forests of America, where the ploughshare of prejudice has as yet been unable to penetrate the soil—and where they can dwell in peaceful retirement, under their own vine and under their own fig-tree."

It is in Africa or the West Indies, only, that the people of color can expect to possess the rights of self-government, in becoming a nation; and, without that, we regard it as morally impossible that they can obtain a much improved character or standing amongst men. The "ploughshare of prejudice" has forbidden it.

LIBERIA. From the "Liberia Herald"—"It is but a few months since we noticed the erection of two or three warehouses of good size, on our Water street, and among the improvements progressing in that part of our town, we perceive three other warehouses, belonging to Messrs. Nelson, Cheeseman and McGill, ready to receive their roofs. The great rise of property in this part of the town would astonish many across the Atlantic, who pretend to believe that land can be purchased for a mere trifle in this colony."

A "high school" was about to be established in Liberia, through the bounty of Henry Sheldon, of New York, who has given $2,000 for that purpose. Common schools are abundant; and there is a free school for recaptured Africans.

The "Herald" notices the suicide of a famous slave trader, John Ormond, of Bangoland, Rio Pongas. It is supposed that he had shipped 2,000 slaves in the last four years. It does appear as if there was an especial Providence over the affairs of the dealers in human blood. In almost every case that we have heard of, these wicked men have had their punishment in this world; and often, like Ormond, been hurried into the next, by acts of violence, committed by themselves or others.

STATISTICS. The intelligent part of the community will be much gratified with the following announcement, in the "National Gazette"—

The hon. Timothy Pitkin is engaged on a continuation of his valuable "Statistics of the United States." He will use the latest materials, and particularly exhibit the condition of our West India trade since Mr. McLane's agreement.

HURL GATE, OR HELL GATE. We learn from the Providence Journal, that the steamboat Providence met with an accident on the 24th ult. which, had she not been an excellent vessel, must have resulted in very serious consequences. "When about to enter Hurl Gate, on her way to New York, very early in the morning, the weather suddenly became very thick and dark; and from some cause she was driven from her course, and struck on the well known rock called the Hog's Back. She was under her common pressure of steam and struck the rock with tremendous force. Some idea of the force of the blow may be formed from the fact, that the best bowler chain cable, box and all, was driven with such violence against the railing, as to take the railing with it into the sea. The tables and chairs were overturned, and scattered in every direction—the crockery and glass ware were broken to pieces—the piano forte in the ladies' cabin had its legs broken off, and the passengers were thrown completely out of their berths. The scene is described as one of universal terror and confusion, but happily no person was seriously injured; indeed we have heard of no injury to any one, but capt. Thayer, and he was but slightly hurt. The boat soon proceeded on her way, and it is thought she has received little damage. No blame, we believe, is attributed to any one."

RED RIVER RAFT. From the Louisville Advertiser. The Herculean task of removing this raft is in rapid progress. A letter dated 15th May, and written on the theatre of operations, states that thirty-eight sections, embracing fifty miles of the raft, had been removed. The portions detached have been disposed of by running them into the low bottoms or down the bayous that lead from the main channel of the river in the lakes on either side. The leaning timber on the margin of the river has been taken away, and the small islands have been "unmoored" and disposed of. There is no doubt, that after the work shall have been completed, the navigation will be as good through what is now termed the raft, as it has heretofore been below the raft. The rapidity of the current has been doubled below by the work already done. The superintendent expected to continue his labors until the 25th of June, by which time the funds appropriated would be exhausted; but he felt confident of going through the first great section of the raft, and thereby extending steamboat navigation about eighty miles up the river, cutting off two-thirds of the keel boat navigation round the raft.

The party had enjoyed perfect health. The land is said to be excellent and well adapted to the cultivation of cotton. Millions of acres will be greatly improved in value by the work in progress. We only regret that the appropriation was insufficient to enable the persevering and accomplished superintendent to demolish the raft in a single season. Though it was supposed the work would take years of labor and cost a million of dollars, he will effect two-thirds of it with an expenditure of less than $22,000! The services of such an individual are invaluable.

PARIS. A table of the births and deaths in the twelve arrondissements of Paris, during the year 1832, which has lately been published, presents the following results: In the course of the year, there were 45,675 deaths, and 26,346 births; namely, 28,568 deaths, and 21,592 births in private houses; and 17,010 deaths and 4,992 births in the hospitals. Thus one-fifth of the population are born in the hospitals. Among the births in private houses there were 16,553 of legitimate children, and 4,769 of illegitimate. In the hospitals only 499 were legitimate, and 4,498 illegitimate. Thus of the total births above one-third were illegitimate children. The deaths exceed the births by 19,371; but by subtracting about 16,000 occasioned by the cholera, there remain nearly 25,000 deaths, which number corresponds with that of former years.

The 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th arrondissements lost in private houses in 1832, the 22d part of their population, whilst the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th, lost but one 34th. This disproportion becomes still greater, if, to the number of deaths in private houses we add those which took place in the hospitals, and which chiefly consisted of individuals belonging to the last six arrondissements of Paris. The arrondissements where the mortality was greatest, are the most unhealthy quarters of Paris, where the streets are narrow and the houses very lofty.

ALGIERS. The French editors are very indignant at the idea which earl Grey conveyed in the British house of lords, of a relinquishment of Algiers by France. They say—

"It is a great fault to have opened negotiations on such a question. France is mistress at home, and has no more occasion to apply to the English for the investiture of Algiers, than they had to apply to France for the investiture of Ireland. We possess this territory by more liberal and just titles than England possesses Gibraltar, Malta and the Ionian Islands. Shall, then, France be the only country in Europe that has not her right engraven on her sword?"

THE CIRCULATING MEDIUM of England, for a period of paper basis and a period of specie basis, are thus estimated in the Times.

OPIMUM TRADE AT LINTIN, in 1832. The editors of the New York Mercantile Advertiser have been favored with a statement of the opium trade at Lintin, in 1832, from which they annex an abstract of the monthly sales, and the aggregate for the year, amounting to the enormous sum of nearly fourteen millions of dollars, equal it is supposed, to the whole export of tea from China.

SPEECH-MAKING. In the vacation of parliament, the editor of the Spectator, in the hope of assuaging the speech-making fever, has amused himself in affixing to the name of each member of the house of commons, the number of times each speaker addressed the house during the last session, and the columns occupied by the printed report of their speeches. Lord Althorp, we perceive, spoke 182 times, Cobett 65, Hume 93, O'Connell 134, Sutton 46, Stanley 29, and sir Robert Peel 17. Lord Althorp occupied 59 columns, Cobett 45, Hume 55, O'Connell 107, Sutton 7, Stanley 47, and Peel 30. The whole number of speakers was 292, and the whole number of speeches made was 1,776 [N. Y. Mrs. ANN ROYALL gives us the following "taste of her quality" in a late number of her Paul Pry—

Washington gentility. In our last visit to the war department, we found from a dozen to twenty of the most shameless ruffians on earth in the pension office. The only tolerable clerk, was a negro, and he blackguarded us out of the office.

[Some one has proposed that Mrs. Royall shall be sent to England on a tour, to match Mrs. Trollope's account of the United States. It isn't worth the cost and time. But and if it were, we think that the English lady would maintain her rank, unrivalled, in deliberate ——; what we must not say of a "lady."]

CROMWELL'S ORATORY. "Trust in the Lord, and rely on your pikes," was on one occasion Cromwell's address to his soldiers on going into battle. On another occasion his general address was, "Trust in the Lord, and keep your powder dry." Equally characteristic was his remark to his fatigued soldiers, when from the range of mountains called the Galles he pointed to the fertile vales of South Munster, and said, "Soldiers of Israel! behold a country worth fighting for."

OUTRAGE ON AN INDIAN. A late number of the Apalachicola Advertiser states that three or four desperate ruffians attacked the house of col. Blunt, head chief of the Apalachicola Indians, at Iola or Bluntstown, in his absence, and having succeeded in breaking down the door with axes, plundered nearly all the personal apparel of himself and family, about $150 worth of goods, and upwards of $700 in cash. The money was a portion of the amount received by him last fall from the government, under the treaty concluded with colonel Gadsden, by which himself and Davy, the chief of Spanewatka, or Cochranstown, stipulated to remove with the people of their towns from Florida, this summer or fall.

[Had such an act been committed by Indians—what then?]

FOREIGN NEWS.

London 13th—Paris 20th May.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

In the house of commons a motion was made on the 16th of May, by Mr. Cobbett, that the name of sir Robert Peel be stricken from the list of members of the privy council, in consequence of his being the author of the bill to restrict the issue of bank notes to the sum of five pounds. He was left, however, in a marvellously lean minority—only four votes being given in favor of the motion, and 278 against it.

Mr. Thomas Attwood, M. P. had left London to preside at a meeting of the people which he had called at Birmingham, to petition the king that he would discharge his bad ministers. It was thought that the meeting would not be allowed, because of the character of its getting-up, which was inflammatory; but if held, it was supposed that many vast assemblages of the people would follow it, for similar purposes.

The duke of Orleans was present at a grand review in Hyde Park. His visit has no connection with political movements.

A Paris paper says—it is not true that a duel has been fought in London between the duke of Orleans and Louis Napoleon Bonaparte. The duke of Orleans having made use of language at a ball, which being repeated to prince Bonaparte, was thought offensive by him, the latter demanded satisfaction. Colonel Marbot having replied, on the part of the duke, that being their presumptive to the throne of France, he had more to risk in a duel than the exiles of the imperial family, it became a personal affair between M. Achille Murat and col. Marbot, who, by the way, is one of the individuals remembered by Bonaparte in his will, and who, after the death of the emperor, received, through the liberality of the great man, 100,000 francs. No meeting has as yet taken place between Messrs. Marbot and Murat, though at the departure of the post, matters were fast approaching to an appeal to arms.

The university of London is much involved in debt. Lord Liffé, who squandered one immense fortune, has, by the death of a school-fellow, come into possession of another of 2 or £300,000, which he was distributing at Rotherhithe in splendid entertainments. His personal property was lately sold to pay his bill at an hotel.

FRANCE.

The Paris Moniteur contains the following [royal] documents: In the year 1833, May 10th, at half past three in the morning, we, the undersigned, Thomas Robert Bugeaud, member of the chamber of deputies, major general, commandant of Blaye—Antoine Dubois, honorary professor of the faculty of medicine, at Paris—Charles Francois Marchand Dubreuil, sub-prefect of the arrondissement of Blaye—Daniel Theotime Pastoureaux, president of the tribunal de premiere instance at Blaye—Pierre Nadaud, procureur du roi of the same tribunal—Guillaume Bellon, president of the tribunal of commerce, and deputy mayor of Blaye—Charles Bordes, commandant of the national guards of Blaye—Elie Descrumbes, rector of Blaye—Pierre Camille Delord, commandant of the garrison of Blaye—Claude Olivier Dufresne, civil commissary at the citadel—witnesses called in by gen. Bugeaud, to be present at the delivery of her royal highness Marie Caroline, princess of the Two Sicilies, duchess of Berri—(M. Merlet, mayor of Blaye and Rognier, judge de Paix, who were also summoned, being in the country, and unable to arrive in time) We went into the citadel and entered the house inhabited by her royal highness, and were introduced into the room adjoining that in which the princess lay. Dr. Dubois, gen. Bugeaud and M. Delord were in the room when the pains first came on, and declared to the other witnesses that the duchess of Berri had been delivered, at twenty minutes before three o'clock, after suffering but a very short time; that they saw her in labor, and receiving the assistance of Dr. Deneux and Dr. Meniere, Dr. Dubois remaining in the apartment till the delivery. Gen. Bugeaud then entered and asked the duchess whether she would receive the witnesses? She answered—"yes, as soon as the child is washed and dressed."

A few minutes afterwards Madame d'Hautefort came out, by desire of the duchess, to request that the witnesses would enter, which we did immediately. We found the duchess lying in her bed, with a new-born child on her left side. At the foot of the bed were seated Madame d'Hautefort and Madame Hanster; Dr. Deneux and Dr. Meniere were standing at its head.

President Pastoureaux then approached the princess and addressed to her, in a loud voice, the following questions—"Is it to the duchess of Berri that I have the honor to speak?" "Yes." "You are positively the duchess of Berri?" "Yes, sir." "Is the new-born infant near you, yours?" "Yes, sir, this infant is mine." "What is its sex?" "It is of the female sex. Moreover, I have charged M. Deneux to make declaration thereof."

And, instantly, Louis Charles Deneux, doctor in medicine, ex-professor of clinical midwifery of the faculty of Paris, titular member of the royal academy of medicine, made the following declaration: "I have just delivered the duchess of Berri, here present, wife by lawful marriage of count Hector Lucchesi Palli, one of the princes of Campo Franco, gentleman of the chamber of the king of the Two Sicilies, domiciliated at Palermo."

The count de Baisac, and the countess d'Hautefort being asked by us whether they would sign the relation of what they had witnessed, replied, that they had come here to attend the duchess of Berri as friends, but not to sign any act whatever.

Of all which we have drawn up the present process-verbal in threefold, one of which has been deposited, in our presence, among the archives of the citadel, the two others have been delivered to general Bugeaud, governor, whom we have charged to send them to the government; and, after this had been read, have signed on the day, month and year mentioned above.

Signed—Deneux; A. Dubois; P. Meniere; D. M. P. Bugeaud; Descrumbes, rector of Blaye; Marchand Dubreuil; Pastoureaux; Nadaud; Belon; Bordes; Delord; O. Dufresne.

[The duchess would be shipped for Palermo, as soon as fitted for the voyage, in a vessel of war.]

SPAIN.

Nothing important from Spain, except that the king was to review 25,000 men, and the reception of the protest of Carlos against the female succession—with the usual supply of robberies and assassinations.

PORTUGAL.

The war between the royal forces remains as it was. Miguel's batteries had sunk two schooners laden with provisions which were entering Oporto.

POLAND.

The people, made mad by oppression, have again appealed to force, on the frontiers of Galicia, in large numbers—but they cannot hope to accomplish any good purpose. All that are able, and are willing to labor, should leave it.

Paris, 20th May. The grand council of Berne has proposals under consideration, the purport of which is, that permission shall be asked for the Poles to return to France who left that country on the news of the disturbances at Frankfort, and that, in the meantime, a specified sum shall be allowed for their support.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

The accounts from Constantinople do not agree. While some say that the negotiations with Ibrahim had been broken off, because that, by order of his father, he insisted on the cession of Adana, others say that a treaty of peace had been actually signed between the sultan and the pacha, on which account great rejoicings had taken place at Alexandria; all the foreign ships in the harbor firing a salute of 21 guns. Yet this news is doubted.

The second corps of auxiliary Russians had arrived in the vicinity of Constantinople—another had landed on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, on the line between Ibrahim and the sultan.

GG—Later news—London papers of the 22d May.

Great Britain and Ireland. The question of the expediency of the corn laws has been again discussed in the house of commons; on which the London Courier says—

"It would appear from the observations of lord Althorp in the house of commons last night, that ministers are not agreed either as to the expediency of maintaining the protective corn duties to their present extent, or as to the mode of imposing duties on the importation of foreign corn. Earl Ripon, in the house of lords on Tuesday, distinctly declared his opinion in favor of a protective corn duty; and his declaration has been generally received throughout the country, as an intimation of the intention of the cabinet not to deprive the agricultural interest of the protection which the present system affords to them. Lord Althorp last night, expressed his doubts whether the present system of corn laws did afford any such great advantage to the landed interest. From the general tenor of his lordship's observations, it is impossible not to come to the conclusion that lord Althorp is inclined to a sort of free trade in corn; and the principal reason of his opposition to an inquiry into the operation of the present system of corn laws, is, as his lordship stated, the unfitness of the time for such an inquiry."

The cotton duties reduction bill, had passed both houses and received the royal assent.

On the subject of negro emancipation, a question being put in the house of commons, to ministers, lord Althorp said that he was glad of an opportunity to state, that ministers were determined to persevere with the question with all possible despatch. The accounts from Ireland represent the state of the public mind of that country as perfectly tranquil.

The ministers appear to have a large majority in the house of commons, in support of their project concerning the church in Ireland.

The great meeting of the political union of Birmingham, called by Mr. Attwood, had passed over without any disturbance; Mr. O'Connell was present. Some strong resolutions were passed condemning the repeal of the legislative union with Ireland.

Kean, the actor, died at London on the 15th May.

At the late great meeting of the people at Spitalfields (London) some disturbances took place and a police man was killed. The following was the verdict of the coroner's jury in the case.

"We find a verdict of justifiable homicide on these grounds, that no riot act was read, nor any proclamation advising the people to disperse; that the government did not take the proper precautions to prevent the meeting from assembling, and that the conduct of the police was ferocious, brutal and unprovoked by the people; and we moreover express our anxious hope that the government will in future take better precautions to prevent the recurrence of such disgraceful transactions in the metropolis." (Loud cheering in the room.)

The coroner said—I do not know how you can say all these things on the evidence which you have heard. The only evidence which you have to show you how this man met his death was that young woman, who saw the stab given to a man, who was acting in a laudable and unoffending manner; and how any one of the jury can justify such an act, I don't understand. I hope gentlemen, you will reconsider your verdict. You are not here to try the conduct of other persons, whether in the government or police. This, in my opinion is no verdict. (cries of oh, oh.) Indeed it isn't. It was not justifiable homicide; it was either wilful murder by some one you do know or some one you don't know. (Laughter, and oh, oh, which was suppressed by the officer in attendance.)

Foreman—We have patiently considered our verdict. There have been conflicting opinions amongst us; but we have all anxiously compared our opinions—and that is the conscientious verdict of us all, patiently and carefully formed with the most anxious deliberation.

Coroner—You are called upon to say how Robert Cully came by his death, and the only evidence you have to decide upon that is that of the young woman who saw him stabbed.

Several of the jury exclaimed "we do not believe her; no, not one of us."

Coroner—And why not?

A juror—Because she was contradicted by other witnesses. She said she was two minutes talking to the policeman, and it was proved by all the other witnesses that that was impossible. She was tutored.

Another juror—She was; she was tutored by the police. She acknowledged to having been with them ever since that day. Why ask us to give a verdict against our consciences?

Coroner—You say there were no precautions. I think there were plenty of measures.

A juror—There were no measures to prevent the meeting; and the means employed to disperse it were disgraceful.

Coroner—Well, gentlemen, your verdict, is, that Robert Cully was killed with justifiable homicide?

Jurors—We do.

Coroner, (to the foreman)—Well sir, I shall strike out all the rest. [The coroner here drew his pencil across all the words that followed "justifiable homicide."]

Foreman—I cannot agree to that, sir.

All the jury—Nor any of us.

Foreman—Before God and our country—on our solemn oaths—we have given the subject all the consideration in our power; and that paper which I have handed you, contains the judgment in which we have unanimously agreed. If you strike out any part of that, it is not our verdict.

Jury—Certainly not.

Foreman—We have told you our verdict; but we would not give an act of justifiable homicide standing by itself.

Coroner—Well, as you did your duty by giving in a verdict to say that a man is justified in stabbing an unoffending man.

Foreman—If proper measures had been taken, either by reading the riot act or proclamation, or any other means, we would not bring in a verdict to justify the homicide. Therefore to let that verdict go abroad alone, would be very dangerous, and it might be thought we justified the stabbing of a policeman who was legally employed.

Coroner—I think that is the fact.

Foreman—No, on the contrary, we wish to give the police every protection.

Coroner—What you call your verdict don't sound like it; I don't think that a fair verdict.

Several jurors—We will not give any other.

Coroner—It is not a good verdict.

A juror—Well, if you will not take it, you had better dismiss us, and call another jury.

A great deal more of the controversy between the coroner and the jury is given, but we have inserted enough of it to show the whole spirit of the proceeding. The first insisted on a reconsideration of the verdict, saying that it traduced the police and the government—the jury disavowed such a design, but would render no other verdict, &c. After the verdict was recorded—

The coroner said, "Gentlemen, I consider your verdict disgraceful to you; but I thank you for your great attention to the case."

The foreman bowing, said, "We thank you, sir."

Thereupon a number of persons in the room, which was crowded to excess, exclaimed, "Bravo, jurors; you have done your duty nobly, the country is indebted to you!" was followed by the most vociferous cheering in the room. As the jury withdrew, numbers of persons pressed forward and shook each of them eagerly by the hand. In the streets, as they passed, they were cheered by name, but the police were hooted.

The jury was occupied in this case from 10 o'clock, A. M. until 11, P. M.—and very much exhausted.

The stock of wool is small, and the price high, in England, though large quantities had been received from Australasia.

A bill for the better observance of Sunday, or the Sabbath, has been negatived in the house of commons—objections being made to its details.

The motion of Mr. Cobbett, respecting Sir Robert Peel, (noticed above), was expunged from the journals of the house on 28th May. The baronet was very severe on Cobbett, and the latter very disorderly. The reports of the speeches might amuse some of our readers, but the greater part would feel no interest in them.

On the 17th, Mr. Buckingham gave notice that on Thursday, the 30th of May, he would move, as an amendment to the government plan for emancipating the slaves, the following resolutions:

"1. That every slave in his majesty's dominions has an indefeasible right to emancipation, without delay, and without price.

"2. That from and after the 21st of August, 1834, the anniversary of his present majesty's birth-day, slavery shall cease to exist in every part of the British empire.

"3. That immediate measures be taken to ascertain the actual amount of pecuniary loss that may be sustained by the owners of colonial estates, by the substitution of free labor for slave labor on their several plantations; and to determine to what extent the national funds should be appropriated to compensate all those by whom such pecuniary loss may be actually sustained.

"4. That an adequate supply of preventive police, an independent and impartial magistracy, and teachers for infant and adult schools, be sent from the mother country to all our colonies in which slavery may be abolished, the expense to be borne out of the funds hitherto appropriated to the support of our military establishments in those parts, which, on the entire abolition of slavery, may be extensively and safely reduced."

Portugal. Pedro's prospect of success are said to be brightening.

East Indies. A scarcity of food is expected. A letter from Bombay, 29th November, says—

"We have had so little rain this year, especially in the Deccan, that grain and forage have risen in price greatly, so much so, that in Poonah and other places, the native troops have plundered several of the principal grain dealers. These disturbances have occasioned considerable trouble. The natives (the poorer classes) wish government to fix a rate for grain, which probably will be done. A common laborer's pay, in the Deccan, is from three to four rupees* a month—a sepoy is seven. Grain is now selling at 3½ rupees a maund, equal to about 28 lbs. English."

Holland and Belgium. The king of the former has agreed to an indefinite armistice, on which fresh speculations of peace are set afloat.

London, May 22. It is with the greatest satisfaction that we have to announce that a preliminary treaty was signed yesterday by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France and Holland. By this convention the English and French embargoes will be taken off Dutch vessels in the ports of England and France, and the interruption of their navigation, on the part of the Dutch government, will be removed. The services of the English and French united squadrons will thus likewise be dispensed with, and the intercourse between the respective parties and Holland, placed on the same footing as before the French expedition in November last. The Dutch garrison of Antwerp, now prisoners in France, will, by the same arrangement, be sent home. The armistice between Holland and Belgium will be continued till some definite settlement or permanent separation, and till that time the navigation of the Scheldt will remain free. This convention has been agreed upon with the Dutch plenipotentiary, and was sent off to Holland for ratification yesterday.

The Polish fugitives. The following is the answer of the Polish fugitives to the council of Berne, on the proposal that they petition the government of France to be readmitted into that country:

"Consider yourselves, gentlemen, whether it is possible that we can take this step without injuring the dignity of our nation—al character, whose guardians we are. When we left France, in order to withdraw ourselves from the oppression of that government, we did not do so with a view of returning under the same yoke, if we might obtain an asylum there. We could willingly spare the noble Swiss nation the burden which the presence of a corps of 50 persons imposes on it; but we cannot return to France with the sacrifice of our honor, and to induce us again to enter France, the inhabitants of which country sympathize with us, the law which makes exceptions to our advantage must be first repealed. This is our resolution, which I hope you will approve. Accept, &c. (The signatures.)

*The rupee, for common use, may be valued at 50 cents—but its real commercial value does not average more than 47½ cents. A common laborer's pay, in the East Indies, is from 150 to 200 cents per month—finding his own provisions! How does he live?

Hamburgh, May 17. The Russian government in Poland has published an ordinance of the emperor, dated the 23d ult. by which persons accused of certain political offences including the publication of false news, are ordered to be tried before courts martial, the sentence of such courts to be carried into execution as soon as they have received the confirmation of the viceroy.

The Warsaw papers also contain an account of 25 individuals belonging to the late Polish army, who were concerned in a recent unsuccessful attempt at insurrection. Five of the party were taken by Cossacks on the frontier; one of them poisoned himself, but the other four were brought before a court martial and sentenced to death. The sentence was carried into execution on three of the surviving prisoners; with respect to the fourth, on account of his extreme youth, the sentence was mitigated into corporal punishment and hard labor.

Turkey and Egypt. There is no later news concerning the affairs of these countries.

THE LATE MR. TURNBULL.

We copy the following from the "Charleston Mercury" of the 22d ult. just as we find it—as a matter of record.

"INTERESTING DOCUMENT."

"At the late public meeting, in the course of a feeling and eloquent tribute to Mr. Turnbull's memory—after hearing testimony to the genuine kindness and warmth of heart which all, who knew him intimately, acknowledged and loved—to the pure disinterestedness of his patriotism, his freedom from all personal rancor; and the lofty purity and generous chivalry of his motives, gov. Hayne produced and read a letter, which he had received from his deceased compatriot, immediately after the appearance of the president's proclamation—a time when it was expected that those who were true to the cause of Carolina, would have to seal their fidelity with their blood. The letter is as characteristic as it is honorable, and will remain among the records of the state a proud memorial of the deceased. We have been permitted to take a copy which we subjoin:

"John's Island, 22d December, 1832.

"SIR—The state having called upon her patriotic sons, to support her in her present arduous and unequal conflict with the federal government, I beg of your excellency to order my name to be enrolled, as a private, amongst the volunteers—to enter upon any service, to which your excellency may be pleased to appoint me.

I however submit to your excellency, that my untiring zeal in a cause, than which ancient or modern history records none so mighty to save the liberties of a people, entitles me to belong to that corps to which you may assign the post of the greatest difficulty, danger and honor.

"I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration and respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

"ROBERT J. TURNBULL.

"His excellency Robert J. Hayne, gov. of S. Carolina.

"The reading of this letter, so full of the spirit of the Carolina Brutus, was received by the meeting with much emotion. The governor stated, that, knowing full well that this was no empty bravado, but a sincere offering, he accordingly assigned Mr. Turnbull to that corps, which had been chosen to form a rallying point and forlorn-hope, in case of alarm; that Mr. T. immediately came to the city, armed himself and regularly attended the drills of his corps; and he added, that he was very sure that, had a bloody conflict with our oppressors followed, and our liberties been cloven down, Robert J. Turnbull would not have survived to mourn their loss. None can doubt this, who saw how the spirit of the deceased rose as the storm thickened, and who heard his tone of proud defiance and animated confidence, when the frown of tyranny was darkest."

THE CHOLERA AT LEXINGTON.

Extract of a letter to the editor of the National Gazette, dated Lexington, Kentucky, June 16.

"On Sunday, the 2d instant, that awful scourge of God, the cholera, broke out in Lexington, and its ravages have been dreadful and desolating, beyond example—not excepting even New Orleans. It is the opinion of the best informed, that not far short of 400 have fallen victims in about 14 days—and this too with a greatly reduced population. More than one-half, probably two-thirds, fled soon after its commencement. Not the intemperate, not the dissolute, not the wretched and poverty-stricken alone have fallen, but many of our best citizens—men of wealth, of character, of solvency, of religion. No less than ten or twelve communicants in our church, and I presume a proportional number in all the rest. Many of our most worthy and respectable ladies also;—among them Mrs. Scott, relict of the late governor Scott. Thus the pestilence has seemed to take a more elevated range than it has usually done in other places. It is true, that many of the lower classes have fallen. It has been very severe upon the blacks, especially upon those who were free. They had nobody to care for them, and money would not command attendants. But, after all, no more than upon others, in proportion to their numbers.

"The progress of the disease has been frightfully rapid. Many have gone to their beds well, and have been in their graves before the next noon. The panic has been dreadful, and the more so as it was wholly unexpected. All that could fly, fled. The city authorities disappeared—no hospital for the poor provided—no board of health formed—no medical reports made or required—and now, no mode of ascertaining our exact loss. We can only guess at it by the numbers of the missing. Stores have been shut—hotels and taverns shut—public houses, printing offices, &c. all shut; and, in short, nothing open but grave yards and their premonitory—apothecaries' shops. Even butchers and bakers suspended their functions, and country people ceased to supply our market. In short, the general cry seemed to be that of Napoleon's shattered troops, at the battle of Waterloo—'Sauve qui peut.' Our physicians are either dead or broken down. Dr. Dudley alone I believe has stood it through, and is still on the alert.

Some others are trying to follow his example, a la distance. Dr. Cooke, a host in such a scene, has been unfortunately put hors de combat, by a fall. But, alas!—the most they have done is by way of prevention. The real cholera has been cured but in a few cases. They tell us, indeed, that it will yield to medicine, if taken in season. If this I understand, before the disease fairly sets in. They can cure or stop the premonitory symptoms; and this, I think, is about the whole amount. If the disease be under the control of medicine, why, with some of the ablest physicians, as I believe, in the United States, have we lost 400 citizens? If the disease be, truly within the control of medicine, have not those physicians, who have devoted themselves, day and night, to the sick, an awful responsibility resting on them still unredeemed? But I have no doubt all has been done that was possible, in a state of society so completely disorganised. The general suffering has been great, and individual suffering beyond description. No paper has been printed, or handbill issued, because there was nobody to do it. All was consternation and dismay. Some, who fled, were soon brought back on the bier—others were buried in the country. Graves could not be dug, nor coffins made, so fast as they were wanted. A number of coffins, or boxes, were sometimes put in one hole. Ten or a dozen bodies have been left in the grave yard, unburied till their turn came the next day. When we retired, at night, we could not expect, and hardly dared to hope, to meet again well. Such, sir, has been the cholera in Lexington.

"I said our city authorities had disappeared. This is true of them as a body. The mayor and col. Combs have been active. But individuals have generously, and I may add, with a godlike zeal, devoted themselves to doing good, and to the mitigation of suffering. First and foremost, on this list, is bishop Smith, of the Episcopal church, who, in body, is but the skeleton of a man, but in heart and soul, a giant in every good word and work. His whole time, day and night, rain and shine, has been devoted to the consolation of the dying, or the funeral services of the dead. From early dawn to midnight he has been constantly on his feet, or on his knees; and to me, it seems a miracle, that he is still on duty, as bright as ever! What other clergymen here have done—I have not heard. David Sayre, too, has devoted himself, body and soul, and purse, to the alleviation of misery, and deserves from the friends of humanity a brighter meed, than ever graced the brow of a monarch. Many others have followed his example. Several gentlemen too in the country have contributed generously to our relief, by sending in and distributing, gratuitously, beef and other necessities. Among these I need not name the patriot farmer of Ashland.

"But we trust, that the agony is nearly over. The cloud of pestilence, which has so long brooded over our city and burst upon it with all its fury, is beginning to recede. Only 10 or 12 deaths last night, and but few new cases. The weather is now fine, and we cannot but hope, that Providence, in his infinite mercy, will say to the torrent of desolation which has been deluging our city—thus far and no farther. But Lexington has received a shock, from which it cannot speedily recover."

WYOMING MASSACRE.

Correspondence of the United States Gazette.

New Troy, Pa. June 5, 1833.

This little village was yesterday made the scene of an exhibition of most unusual and thrilling interest. The remains of those who were sacrificed at the Wyoming massacre on the 3d of July, 1778, were disinterred preparatory to the erection of a monument commemorative to that disastrous event. On the beautiful plain where now stands the cheerful village of New Troy on the west bank of the Susquehanna, and a short distance above Wilkesbarre, was recently discovered the sepulchre where the dead had been hastily interred by the surviving settlers. The bodies had evidently been promiscuously thrown into one common grave, and as no stone had been placed to mark the spot, it had long since been lost sight of. Different individuals residing in the neighborhood, some of whom were children of the sufferers, had made repeated attempts to discover the grave, but the progress of cultivation had so effectually obliterated all traces, that every search had heretofore proved fruitless. The grave is situated in a lot adjoining the road and is slightly elevated above the surrounding country. The Susquehanna is within a short distance and adds to the picturesque beauty of the scenery, which from every point of view possesses uncommon interest. About twelve hundred dollars had been already subscribed towards defraying the expense of a monument. The workmen are now engaged in preparing a vault in which the remains are to be deposited, and it is expected that the monument will be erected on the 3d of the ensuing month, it being the anniversary of the battle.

The remains are now lying in boxes placed in an adjoining building under the care of a neighbor, Erastus Hill, and are certainly objects of great curiosity as well as interest. Eighty skulls are displayed to the contemplation of the spectator and the light of day, after having for more than half a century reposed beneath the soil on which the merciless savage left their slaughtered bodies. The limbs and skulls are variously marked. Some bones are perforated by balls, and the skulls almost invariably broken by the tomahawk; in some cases the pole of that instrument has apparently alone performed the work of death, while in others the edge has cleft through the skull in a manner that shows the enemy to have been proficient in the use of his weapon. In every instance the marks of the scalping knife are distinctly visible. On removing one particular skull, a bullet was found, almost imbedded in the bone, a little above the left ear and back of the temple. The lead is partially divided, apparently battered, by the force of the concussion, and at this moment is preserved in its original position from which it is removed without difficulty for the inspection of the curious.

Among the relics was found small portions of a garment, made of wool, on which the color, a "bottle" green, is distinctly visible.

DREADFUL SLAUGHTER—SUMATRA.

The Singapore Chronicle of the 12th of December, contains the following account of the assassinating of no less than three thousand Dutch troops and natives of the interior of Sumatra, whither, it appears, they had penetrated with the view of making reprisals upon the native princes:

"Intelligence of much importance has reached this settlement from Siac; relative to the Dutch expedition, which we mentioned on the authority of some native traders lately arrived from Campar, as having reached Gunoug Berapi in the Menanikebu country. The intelligence we allude to is of such a nature, and involves statements of such disastrous occurrences, that, on being made acquainted with it, we deemed it highly necessary to make minute inquiries as to its truth or probability, before we gave publicity to it. The result of our investigation among the several Siac people who arrived during the week, is such as to leave little doubt on our minds, of the entire probability of the statements. Our principal informant, on whose account reliance can be placed most, is the naquodah of a Siac prau, and son of one of the rajah of Siac's chief men. This person states, previous to his leaving Siac, some 10 or 15 days ago, a confidential person arrived there from Menanigebu, (a distance of about 15 days journey overland, according to some, and 10 or 12 days only, according to others) who informed the rajah in the presence of this naquodah, that the Dutch troops had been cut off by an immense number of the natives, who assembled at night and slaughtered them in a desperate amuk. The troops are said to have been stationed at three different places, Paya, Kumboh and Along Pangaung, in the divisions of Agam and Rown beyond Guong Berapi. It is stated that the Dutch, having gained over the rajah of Pageryong as an auxiliary, came into easy possession of most parts of the country; for through the influence of this rajah, the natives submitted to the Dutch, and allowed them to proceed so far inland as they did with little or no opposition. It appears, however, that the Dutch too confident of their political strength, abused the power so easily obtained, and treated the natives with such severity and oppression, by raising levies and contributions, that the latter became desperate, and having formed an extensive combination, attacked the troops at the three places above named, simultaneously, (in order to prevent a junction) and slaughtered them with their native weapons, it is believed, to a man. The number of their victims, we are told was not less than three thousand."

ACCELERATED MOVEMENT UPON CANALS.

On Saturday afternoon a trial was made, upon the Paddington canal, of the new canal boat. The object of the trial was, to show that a boat built in a different form, and constructed of other materials than the ordinary canal boat, might, by using superior horses, be drawn along the water at the rate of ten miles or more in an hour, instead of two miles an hour, the pace of the boats now in use. The day was remarkably fine. The portion of the canal more particularly appropriated to the experiment was from the third to the seventh mile from Paddington. The boat was constructed of sheet iron, rivetted hot. It was 70 feet long, by 54 feet wide, and painted green and white. The boat was provided with an awning made of white twilled cotton cloth, which had been rendered semi-transparent with oil. The awning was so set up that the top was extended over light wooden arches, which rested upon a thin upright frame of rod iron; and the sides, in the form of curtains, were made to slide at pleasure upon parallel rods placed at the upper and lower ends of the curtains. The rudder was of a single sheet of iron, of about a yard in length, and it was moved by a tiller made of about two yards of stout rod iron. Two steady hunting horses, each mounted by a lad, and the two harnessed to a towing rope of about 150 feet in length, constituted the moving power. The number of persons on board the boat was 48, including the crew, the gentlemen making the experiment, some of the principal members of the Grand Junction company, and the visitors, amongst whom were Mr. Telford, Mr. Babbage, captain Basil Hall, Mr. Hellyer and Mr. Gilt; a lady also made one of the party on this interesting occasion. Certain distances were measured on the canal bank, and marks set up at the ends of them. At each of these places, also, a man was stationed with a guaged rod in his hand, which he so held as that, upon the boat's passing, he might instantly read off the height of the wave caused by the disturbance of the water. When all things were ready on the shore, and the party had embarked, the boat was put in motion. The speed from one station to another, taken by seconds watches, showed, for some time, a progress at the rate of thirteen miles an hour. The horses, however, soon began to tire, and the speed fell to eleven, and ultimately, in returning for the third time, to ten and a quarter miles in the hour.

The experiment, as far as it goes, was attended with complete success. The motion is the easiest imaginable. The boat glides along the water so smoothly and noiselessly, that its progress is all but imperceptible to those on board whose attention is not extended to external objects. A relay of horses will be required at the end of every four or five miles. The banks of the canal will have to be edged for nine or ten inches above the ordinary level of the water with hard materials, and the towing path to be slightly sloped outwards. Improvements, no doubt, will also be made to facilitate the passing of locks, and in the mode of attaching the horses to the boat, so that the animals may exert their power upon the boat, disencumbered of the awkwardness of the direction in which, under the present form of towing, they are made to put forth their strength. SOUTH CAROLINA RAIL ROAD.

The Charleston Patriot of the 13th ult. contains a report of the financial affairs of the South Carolina rail road company, including a general statement of all the receipts and expenditures of the company since its organization, classed under their several heads. We gather from it the following particulars:

All the means of the company, including capital stock, loans and receipts for tolls, &c. have amounted to $831,499 92, and the expenditures of all kinds to $831,365 87. This sum includes the cost of all the locomotive engines (seven in number), forty-six passenger cars, and all the tenders, freight cars, &c. used on the road, negroes, horses, &c.—amounting altogether to nearly $109,000. To finish the contracts and complete the road finally, with all the engines and cars estimated to be necessary, a further sum of $73,044 08 is required; giving the sum of $904,410 07 as the gross cost of the road and all the appurtenances and contingencies. The round sum of $800,000 is for the actual cost for the construction of the road and the materials. It exceeds the highest estimated cost at the commencement of the work—the first estimate being $405,000 and the second $687,000. The excess is accounted for by the adoption of a more expensive style of work than was at first contemplated.

The current expenses of the company, for a chief engineer, commissioner, resident engineer, and two assistant residents, woodmen, &c.—is $14,340 per annum. With the exception of a superintendent, this expense will cease within the next two months.

The report proposes an increase of the capital stock of the company to $1,000,000, with a view of extinguishing all existing debts for loans, &c. and providing the funds for completing the work. Four new locomotive engines have been ordered from England, and three contracted for in Charleston, making a force of fourteen locomotive engines already in operation or in preparation. The report recommends a further increase of this power to the extent of ordering two engines monthly, until they amount to a number to be decided on in the meeting of stockholders.

A statement is made, by way of appendix, of the amount of business calculated upon, and the force necessary to transport it. The amount of cotton received at Hamburg and Augusta, each year, is from 160,000 to 180,000 bales, of which from one-fourth to one fifth is now transported to Charleston by the river and coastwise—a circuitous and tedious route. The committee think that at least three fourths will pass by the rail road, but they take as a moderate estimate only one-half, or 85,000 bales, 27,200,000 lbs.—the freight of which would amount to $123,520. The return freight being taken at an equal amount, and the income from passengers at $202,500—the aggregate income for the year is assumed to be very low at $449,540. Large allowances are then made for locomotive power, cost of conveyance, wear and tear, and interest, repairs, agencies, &c. and the whole expenses are put down at $167,400. The net annual income is thus stated at $285,140, or upwards of twenty-nine per cent on a capital of $1,000,000. Various other estimates and allowances are made, but the smallest possible income—on the supposition that the business fall short one-third—is put at fourteen per cent. The prospects of the road are thus considered highly favorable. It is a valuable monument of southern enterprise and perseverance. [Balt. Am.]

UNITED STATES DRY DOCKS.

From the United States Gazette.

MR. CHANDLER.—At this juncture it may be interesting to your readers, to peruse a correct and minute account of the great granite dry dock, at Gosport, which last week received within its bosom, the Delaware ship of the line. This magnificent national work, corresponds in every respect with the dry dock at Charlestown, Mass. which is about to embrace old Ironsides, the successful battle ship in the late war.

A trip to Norfolk in the spring of the last year, afforded the writer many an interesting excursion across Elizabeth river to the navy yard, to witness the progress of improvements at this extensive naval depot. The most novel, expensive and important undertaking, was the dry dock, then nearly completed, and built as well as the one eastward, under the superintendence of our countryman, Col. Baldwin, architect and engineer.

The cost of this stupendous work, at Gosport, was estimated at about 7 to 800,000 dollars.

It is worth millions to the naval service of the country.

United States dry dock at the Norfolk station.

The excavation for the dry dock was finished at the depth of about 34 feet below ordinary high water.

The foundation of the dock is formed of piles driven into hard stiff blue clay, at the distance of three feet from each other from centre to centre. More than 4,000 of these piles were driven. They vary in length from 15 to 30 feet, and were driven with rams weighing about 2,000 lbs. each, falling from a height of 25 or 30 feet. The piles are capped with timbers of a foot square, and laid in a direction at right angles to the axis of the dock. The spaces between the caps are filled with stones, and the whole is levelled to receive the first floor, which is of plank, and is three inches thick. On this floor, and directly over the caps of the piles, are laid timbers sixteen inches by twelve, the spaces between which are filled with brick laid in cement. Upon this, the second plank floor is laid similar to the first. This floor is about 341 feet in length and 100 in breadth, and upon it rests the masonry of the dock. The stone work of the dock rises to the height of 36 feet above the plank floor, and 5 feet above high water mark. The mouth or entrance of the dock is 60 feet in width, and at high tides, will admit a man-of-war or line of battle ship drawing 23 feet of water. The stone floor here is 6 feet thick, and is composed of 3 courses of hammered stone. The chamber of the dock, or that part in which the ship rests, is 228 feet long at the bottom and 249 feet at top, and is 30 feet wide at bottom and 86 at top. The sides and upper end of the chamber are formed of sets of altars as steps, which, as they rise, recede from the centre of the dock, thus forming level walks around the chamber for the convenience of workmen and for placing shores to support the ship. The stone floor of the chamber is an inclined plane, and the masonry is 4 feet thick at the lower, and 5 feet 3 inches at the upper end, sloping 15 inches in a distance of 205 feet, and is composed of two courses of hammered stone.

The gates of the dock which secure and close the entrance, consist of a pair of turning gates, made in a manner similar to the gates of canal locks, and a floating gate or boat which last will be placed near the entrance. The boat when placed, will present a broad side to the river, and the keel will be formed so as to fit exactly a groove cut in the bottom and sides of the inverted arch, which forms the entrance. The turning gates are placed in recesses between the floating gate and the chamber of the dock. Each gate is supported by a pintle and two rollers, which move upon iron rails laid in the stone floor of the recess. Each gate is computed to weigh from 50 to 60 tons. To move the immense weight, two capstans with gearing, are placed on each side of the dock, within the masonry, with chains attached to the gates to open or shut them at pleasure. The mitre sill or that part of the stone flooring against which the gates shut, is composed of blocks of stone, weighing from 5 to 12 tons each. To drain off the water from the dock, there are culverts formed on each side commencing at the lower part of the chamber, and terminating in a large reservoir built in the masonry across the head of the dock. This reservoir is a large chamber, of 7 feet in width, 11 feet high, and about 86 feet long, and by means of a tunnel, communicates with two large wells, sunk within the engine house. The tunnel is of an oval form, built of brick, laid in cement, and is 165 feet long, 4 feet high, and 2½ feet wide. In each of the great wells are placed 4 lifting pumps of 2½ feet diameter, and 30 feet long, and 4 chain pumps, with a sectional area of one square foot each. These pumps, worked by a high pressure steam engine of 120 horse power, it is thought will be sufficient to discharge all the water from the dock in about two hours.

The process for docking a ship is conducted as follows:

The reservoir, wells and tunnel are drained of their water, and the communication with the chamber cut off, by means of composition sluice gates, placed at the heads of the culverts. The great gates being open, the ship is warped into the chamber by means of capstans placed in convenient situations, when the gates are shut, and the small sluice gates opened, which discharge the water slowly into the reservoir and wells, till the ship's keel touches the blocks upon the floor of the chamber. Shores are then placed to keep the ship in an upright position, and the steam engine put in operation, which soon raises the dock from water and leaves the ship perfectly dry, when her repairs may be commenced.

When the repairs are finished, and the ship is to be taken out of the dock, the chamber must be filled with water, before the great gates can be opened. The chamber is filled by means of culverts, through which water is allowed to pass from the river. During the time the ship is in dock, these culverts remain closed by composition sluice gates. When the chamber of the dock is filled, the pressure on both sides of the great gates being the same, they may then be opened and the ship discharged. M.

EXCURSION TO LOWELL.

From the Salem (Mass.) Register.

Last Thursday we took a ride to Lowell, by the direct route through Danvers, Reading, Wilmington and Tewksbury. The face of the country on this route, after leaving Danvers, is generally sandy and sterile, and affords but few objects worthy of notice. The canker worm has spread devastation over this whole tract of country, and nearly all the apple trees between Danvers and Lowell are scorched and dried up. We passed a few fields of barley, of a scanty and meagre growth, and here and there a hop yard bristling up like quills upon the fretful porcupine. One object, however, was peculiarly interesting, it was a solitary crow sitting upon a rock in the midst of a sandy cornfield, looking wistfully on the lean and fallow leaves of the young corn, just struggling above the yellow and rocky soil. The houses, and fences, and out buildings were in admirable keeping with the rest of the scenery—they are part and parcel of the same picture. Farming, indeed, along here, is considered a poor business; accordingly, whenever we got to a cluster of houses we found the inhabitants had betaken themselves to the manufacture of shoes, in which they are proficient, and have even rivalled their neighbors of Lynn. Now and then we passed a cluster of neat houses, painted white, and looking very prettily as they glistened through the dark masses of foliage which hung pendant from the branches of the majestic elms. We stopped at a shoemaker's shop where the road branched off, to inquire the way to Lowell, and the man, mistaking our question, and being filled with admiration at the sight of three great white meeting-houses on a hill belonging to his village, and which stood in view, answered us, very readily, "one is orthodox, one is Universal, and the other is Baptist." We informed him, that he had misunderstood our question, and that we had inquired the way to Lowell, on this he pointed to the road before us, and we drove on. The road was now more and more sandy, till at last, rising a hill, we descried Lowell spreading out on all sides, half hid behind the trees, and half opening to our view, with its huge factories, its numerous church towers and its white dwelling-houses. We soon came to the beautiful village called Belvidere, situated on a gentle slope of land on this side of the Concord river. This village is separated from the town of Lowell, but in fact forms a part of the settlements which have grown up with the establishment of the factories. On the right hand, beyond the Merrimack which is seen winding its way through its rocky banks, whitened with foam, we see the hills rise gently and spread around, forming the outlines of a grand amphitheatre; in the centre of which Lowell is situated. These hills have been selected for the sites of villas, and several elegant dwellings have been erected, and more are going up. A bridge has lately been thrown over Concord river, connecting Belvidere with the main body of the settlements on the other side. The Concord river meets the Merrimack at right angles, and the point of land included between the two rivers has been chosen for the site of Lowell. Here, then, is a great city, teeming with an industrious population, built up within six or eight years, as if by princely power, and whose interest and prosperity are founded upon an imperishable basis; already become the second town in the commonwealth, in population and wealth, and rapidly increasing into greater importance. We shall not enumerate the factories, churches, houses, printing offices, hotels, taverns, stores, shops, &c. this has been often done, and need not be repeated.

We arrived at Lowell about noon, and put up at the American Hotel, a spacious and convenient house, fitted up in good style, and furnished with every convenience for the accommodation of travellers. We took dinner and set out on a tour of observation. We found a friend who acted as our conductor, and we were led through the factories and shewn many other things of great interest and curiosity. We continued our rambles, sometimes in the city, sometimes on the falls of the Merrimack, and then about the scenery around the Concord river, till after the evening bell rang for nine. We retired to rest at an early hour, as seemed to be uniformly the habit, and the inhabitants have good reason for doing so; for at three o'clock, the next morning, even before day light, one factory bell rang a merry peal, and as soon as the last pulsation struck upon the ear, the whirring and clanking of the machinery was heard. We looked out of the window and saw the dawn had just begun to throw its grey light over the east, and right opposite a factory lighted up and all alive and in motion. At five o'clock the great bell rung for a general turn out, and a simultaneous movement in all the factories. The girls swarmed out from all the streets and avenues which led from their boarding houses, and directed their steps towards a single point, where they became concentrated in a dense mass, at the bridge leading to the entrance of a range of factories, standing on a line on the opposite side of a straight canal which supplies the water power to each of the factories included in the entire establishment. The canal is bordered on the side next the factories, with stores for receiving the raw cotton, and on the bank next the street with rows of elms or other ornamental trees, which are enclosed and separated from the main street by a handsome fence. At 7, the great bell rang for breakfast—the great wheels were stopped again, and all became silent; the girls, men and boys poured forth from the gates, and crossing the bridge, diverged and radiated off towards the boarding-houses. In half an hour the great bell is again heard, the wheels commence their gyrations, the streets are again full of people. The same ceremonies and the same appearances take place at the dinner hour, which is half past twelve, and at half past one the bells ring again, and the afternoon operations commence. The wheels go round, the spindles twirl, the looms jerk in the thread so quick that the eye can only catch the gleams of them as they dart through the warps, while the tissue is plainly perceived growing and winding itself up on the cylinders. We took a glance at the whole establishment of a cotton mill, from the opening of a bale of raw cotton to its being drawn out into a thread, and from that to its warping, sizing, weaving, folding, packing, and finally its loading and carrying in wagons drawn by six stout horses, through the heavy sands on the Tewksbury road, down to Boston.

The ringing of the great bell at Lowell, either at three or five o'clock in the morning is certainly to some purpose. It is no play-thing to call idlers from their beds, or to disturb those who had better be abed and asleep. How silly it is for people to be talking of morning walks, and boasting of taking exercise before breakfast, and then coming home tired out, and scarcely able to worry through the tedious day. There is no such fancy as this at Lowell. It is quite another thing to hear the great bell ring there. It starts up from their beds ten thousand people in the prime of life, in the full enjoyment of health, ready and able to handle and direct the roiling and twirling and twisting and thumping which is going on every where around on the right and on the left, before and behind. There does not appear, however, any unreasonable duty imposed upon any individual. All are at liberty to come and go whenever they please. The girls come to Lowell when, and stay as long as it pleases them; and as they work by the piece, or job, the prices for which are placarded upon the doors of all the factories, the attendance is voluntary, and the wish to earn the utmost in the shortest time, induces them to a close application to business. They come from all quarters of the country, and the stage coaches, drawn by six horses, are continually occupied in bringing in and carrying out loads of well dressed, rosy country girls. We noticed groups of these factory girls, as they were in attendance upon the looms and spinning frames. They were in the freshness and bloom of life, generally of about 20 years of age. Sometimes, when half a dozen in a neighborhood had put their looms in order, they would leave them to their own exact and rapid motions, and assemble in little squads at some favorite place of resort, where there was a looking glass, at which they arranged their curls or adjusted their combs, tattled all the gossip, and found out who was who, and what was what. This is their business for the day; but after tea, which they take at 7 o'clock, they dress up for the evening, and the well lighted streets and the brilliantly illuminated stores were full of them. There was not a dry goods store nor a milliner's shop in which there were not to be seen groups of these fair purchasers. The workmen of the various factories, the builders, masons, carpenters, &c. of which Lowell is full, were also on the go. The hotels were filled or thronged about the piazzas, and in two places we observed auctioneers mounted on a stand and bawling as usual, while their ivory balls were flourishing about and glancing in the rays of the torch light, as the presiding genius of the gaping crowd. All, however, was every where orderly and respectful. There was no noise, no rudeness, no assembling at the corners, no jostling—nor did we see any constables stalking to and fro with their poles, to keep the peace. At the ringing of the 9 o'clock bell the multitude retired from the streets. We ought not to forget, that as we walked about the place, we noticed the refinements of social life, in listening to the piano, accompanied by the flute, and were quite delighted at the high degree of taste and execution of two amateur performers. We inquired of one of the crowd of listeners, and were informed that the performers were some of the head workmen of one of the factories. Indeed we found that music was a favorite amusement, and a taste for that elegant accomplishment is established in the place. We saw in a church, spacious and beautifully finished within, a large and elegant organ, lately built by those excellent organ builders, the Messrs. Hook, of Boston, remarkable for the richness of its open diapason, and the majestic power of its sub bass. The church and organ cost the proprietors 28,000 dollars. We believe there are not less than fifteen churches in Lowell, all of modern architecture, and most of them built either of brick or stone, several of which are furnished with organs.

But, after all, it is not so much what Lowell is, as what it is inevitably destined to become—a city, second to none in the State for population and importance. The immense extent of the factories already established, and the magnificent works now in the progress of erection, will lay a foundation for the industry and prosperity of a population of one hundred thousand souls. There is already a theatre in building, of wood, very spacious, and will contain an auditory not less than can be accommodated in the Tremont itself. Among the conveniences of the place, we visited a bathing-house, fitted up with much taste and elegance. It contains apartments for ladies in one division, and for gentlemen in another. The rooms were carpeted and furnished with chairs, tables, glasses, and all the accompaniments of the toilette. Below the bathing rooms there are apartments for bathing in the river, and one spacious enclosure, in which there is a basin four feet in depth, calculated for swimmers.

We saw the carpet establishment, where they were weaving Kidderminster and Brussels carpeting, rugs, &c. This is done by complicate looms not easily described. There appeared to be about twenty looms at work, each one having a different pattern, which comes out without the care or thought of the operator. The Brussels carpeting was woven in the loom altogether different from the Kidderminster, and required the aid of a boy to move some of the machinery. The operation is slow and tedious, and requires great care. The hearth rugs were of two kinds, one having on it some fanciful figures, and the other with a thick nap of variegated colors.

Buildings were going up all over the immense extent of ground on which Lowell stands, or is to stand. Buildings of all descriptions of stone, brick and wood, were ascending, and some most extensive factories, with all their accompaniments of dwellings and out-houses, were erecting in that quarter of the town bordering on the Merrimack, towards the falls. There is one very large and beautiful brick factory near the outlet of Concord river, seven or eight stories high, just finished, but not yet in operation, designed for the manufacture of broadcloths.

The great number of stores is quite surprising. They stand in rows in all the principal streets, and are of every description—dry goods stores, apothecaries, furniture warehouses, shoe stores, milliners, tailors, grocers, confectioners, &c. &c. They are spacious and beautiful, particularly those under the new Unitarian church. These have no windows, either bow windows or any other. The entire front is thrown open, and the whole interior of the shop displayed to the passengers as they proceeded along the brick side walks.

We walked over the back part of the city, (as we cannot help calling it) to look at the Herculean labors of a gang of men, cutting a deep excavation through a solid mass of granite, to make an opening for the entrance of the railway which is now building between this place and the capital. They have a pretty tough job in hand. It is no less than to cut through a solid rock about forty feet in depth, and for the distance, at a guess, of one-fifth of a mile. Upon mounting to the top of the smooth bald head of the granite mass, we saw beyond, in the line of the road, another gang of men, working their way in an opposite direction, to meet those at this end. As many teams were kept employed, carting and dragging away the fragments of rock, as could get at the foot of the excavation, and as many groups of men as could stand to work, some drilling, some tumbling down the loose fragments of the rock, some loading, and some goading the oxen away with their loads. Ever and anon, the workmen would clear out and hide themselves behind trees or among the rocks, when an explosion would take place, and the whole air would be filled with smoke and stones and great rocks flying out in all directions. Then all the gang would return and resume their work again.

LOWELL COTTON AND WOOLEN GOODS.

A late number of the Lowell Journal has the following interesting article:

The whole amount of capital at present invested is 6,150,000 dollars. The number of large mills in actual operation is 19. These mills are each about 157 feet in length and 45 feet in breadth—of brick, five stories high, each averaging from ten to thirteen feet high, thus giving opportunity for a free circulation of air. The aggregate number of spindles used is 84,000—looms 3,000. The whole number of operatives employed is about 5,000, of which 1,200 are males, 3,800 are females. The quantity of raw cotton used in these mills per annum, exceeds 7,000,000 lbs. or 20,000 bales. The number of yards of cotton goods of various qualities manufactured annually is about 27,000,000. Were the different prices united, they would reach to the distance of 15,300 miles! In this estimate is included about 2,000,000 yards of coarse mixed cotton and woollen negro clothing, in the manufacture of which about 80,000 pounds of wool are used per annum.

The quantity of wool manufactured annually into cassimeres is about 150,000 lbs. making about 150,000 yards.

The Lowell carpet manufactory is in itself a curiosity—68 looms are kept in operation by hand labor, viz: 50 for ingrained or Kidderminster carpeting, 10 for Brussels, and 8 for rugs of various kinds. 140,000 lbs. of wool in the course of a year, are manufactured into rich and beautiful carpets, the colors of which will vie with any imported. The number of yards of carpeting made per annum is upwards of 120,000, besides rugs. The operatives at present employed in all these mills receive for their labor about $1,200,000 per annum.

The Lawrence company has now but one mill in operation. One other is erected, and will be in operation in about three months. The foundation of two others are laid which will be ready to go into operation, one in 9 months, the other in 12. These mills will contain about 16,500 additional spindles for cotton, and 550 looms, and will use 2,500,000 lbs. of raw cotton annually, furnishing employment for 700 operatives. These three mills will probably be the means of adding at least 1,500 to the population of Lowell.

The Middlesex company has lately erected another mill for the manufacture of cassimeres and broadcloths, which is said to be one of the first manufacturing edifices in the U. States. It is 153 feet in length, by 46, and six stories high. Nearly 1,000,000 of bricks have been used in its construction. It will go into operation in about two months, and will contain 2,880 spindles, and 64 looms for cassimeres, and 40 for broadcloths. It will work up about 300,000 pounds of wool annually, and employ about 225 operatives.

The edifice, in which all the machinery employed in the mills is manufactured, is termed the "machine shop," belonging to the locks and canal company, and is probably the largest "shop" in the country, being built of brick, four stories high, 220 feet in length and 45 feet in width. About 200 machinists, some of them the most skillful and ingenious workmen in the United States, or in the world, are constantly employed. About 600 tons of cast and wrought iron, two-thirds of which at least are of American production, are annually converted into machinery, besides a large quantity of imported steel.

It is computed that upwards of 5,000 tons of anthracite coal are annually consumed in the Lowell manufacturing establishments and machine shop, besides immense quantities of charcoal and pine and hard wood fuel.

THE PRESIDENT—AT BUNKER'S HILL.

Address of Mr. Edward Everett, to the president of the United States, on Bunker Hill, with the president's reply.

Mr. President: I have been directed, by the committee of arrangements, on behalf of themselves, of their fellow citizens and of the vast multitude here assembled, to bid you welcome to the ancient town of Charlestown, and its famous heights.

The inhabitants of a small and frugal community, we cannot, like our brethren of the metropolis and of the other great cities, through which you have passed, receive you in splendid mansions and halls of state; but here, sir, upon the precious soil once moistened with the best blood of New England; with nothing above us but the arch of heaven, we tender you the united, respectful and cordial salutations of our ancient town.

There are many interesting historical recollections connected with this immediate neighborhood, which I will not take up your time in recounting. I will only say that on yonder gentle elevation, the first company of the settlers of this commonwealth, a little more than two centuries ago, laid the foundations of the ancient colony of Massachusetts: and upon the hill on which we are now assembled—upon the very spot on which we stand—on the 17th of June, 1775—beneath the thunder of the batteries from the opposite heights of Boston, from the vessels of war on the bay beneath us, and from the head of the columns of the advancing army of five thousand chosen British troops—while the entire town of Charlestown was wrapped in flames, and every steeple, roof and hill top of the surrounding country was crowded with anxious spectators of the dreadful drama—Prescott, Putnam, Stark and their gallant associates bravely fought, and Warren, with his heroic comrades, nobly fell, in the cause of American independence. You, Mr. Secretary Cass, may well cherish the memory of that day, for your father bore his share in its perils and its glory. Stark's regiment, where he fought, was stationed not very far from the spot where you stand.

We bid you, Mr. President, who like those our fathers, have exposed your life in the cause of your country, and more favored than they, have been permitted to enjoy the fruit of your toils and danger—we bid you welcome to the precious spot. Most of those who have preceded you in the chief magistracy—Washington, Adams, Monroe and your immediate predecessor, have trod it before you—and but a few years since, the nation's guest, the great and good Lafayette, made his pilgrimage also to the same venerable precincts. To you, sir, who, under Providence, conducted the banners of the country to victory, in the last great struggle of the American arms, it must be peculiarly grateful to stand upon the spot immortalized as the scene of the first momentous conflict.

We have thought it might not be unwelcome to you to possess some joint memorial of these two eventful days, and such a one I now hold in my hands—a grape shot dug up from the sod beneath our feet, and a cannon ball from the battle field of New Orleans, brought from the enclosure within which your head quarters were established. They are preserved in one casket: and on behalf of the citizens of Charlestown, I now present them to you, in the hope that they will perpetuate in your mind an acceptable association of the 17th of June, 1775, and the 8th of January, 1815—the dates of the first and last great battles fought under the American standard.

To designate in all coming time, the place of the first of these eventful contests, the gratitude of this generation is rearing a majestic monument on the sacred spot. We invite you, sir, to ascend it, and to behold from its elevation a lovely scene of town and country—a specimen not unfavorable of this portion of the great republic, whose interests have been confided to your care, as chief magistrate of the United States. We rejoice that you have taken an opportunity of acquiring a personal knowledge of its character. Less fertile than some other portions of the union, its wealth is in its population, its institutions, its pursuits—its schools and its churches. We doubt not you will find, in your extensive journey, that the great springs of its prosperity are in harmony with the interests and welfare of every other part of our common country.

The spot on which we are gathered is not the place for adulation. Standing over the ashes of men who died for liberty, we can speak no language but that of freemen. In an address to the chief magistrate of the United States, there is no room for one word of compliment or flattery. But with grateful remembrance of your services to the country—with becoming respect for your station, the most exalted on earth—and with unanimous approbation of the firm, resolute and patriotic stand which you assumed, in the late alarming crisis of affairs, in order to preserve that happy union under one constitutional head—for the establishment of which these streets were wrapped in fire, and this hill was drenched in blood—with one heart and one voice we bid you welcome to BUNKER HILL.

To the foregoing address the president made the following reply:

Sir: For the kind reception you have given me, in behalf of the citizens of Charlestown, and for the friendly sentiments expressed on this occasion, I return you my sincere thanks.

It is one of the most gratifying incidents of my life to meet my fellow citizens upon Bunker Hill, at the base of that monument which their patriotism is erecting; and upon the sacred spot hallowed by so many interesting recollections—a rich spot in the various national objects which it presents to view; and richer still in the associations, moral and historical which belong to it.

The earlier incidents of the revolution—the high toned patriotic declarations—the stern determination to meet the coming events, and the vigorous preparations to resist them successfully—the great battle which opened the revolutionary contest, whose full results upon human institutions are yet to be disclosed, and in which, if your sacred mount was lost, and if your devoted town was consumed, imperishable glory was acquired—the services, the sacrifices and the sufferings of this generous and enlightened state, and the memory of the renowned men she has furnished for the field and the cabinet; all these recollections crowd upon the mind, and render this one of the high places, where the American citizen will ever repair, to contemplate the past and indulge in the anticipation of the future.

And when to all these are added your moral, social, literary and religious institutions—your happy equality of condition—your charitable establishments—your foundations for education—the general diffusion of knowledge—your industry and enterprise—and when we reflect that most of this is common to the New England states, you may well be proud of your native land, and our country may well be proud of New England.

I have seen much to admire and emulate—nothing to excite regret; and if my journey be attended with no other result to myself, I shall feel amply repaid by witnessing this fair prospect of human comfort; and by finding, that, however high I had rated the moral and intellectual character of the eastern portion of the union, I had yet to learn that I had not done it justice. I do not speak of the personal kindness I have met with: I cannot. But the impression is on my heart; it will only leave me when life departs.

I accept, with gratitude, the interesting relics you have presented to me. I am sure I speak the sentiments of my fellow soldiers upon the plains of New Orleans, when I say, that to be associated with the memory of that band of patriots, who fought with Warren, when he sealed his principles with his life, is the highest need of praise which our country could bestow. I am sensible that we owe it to a too partial estimate of our services. It was my good fortune, on that eventful day, to lead an army composed of American citizens, appreciating the value of the prize they contended for, and determined upon exertions proportioned to its magnitude; and it was theirs to expel a superior force, and to preserve an important section of the union.

Accept, sir, for yourself, my acknowledgments for your personal kindness.

The following inscription was engraved on a silver plate on the box containing the cannon balls, presented to president Jackson, at Bunker Hill, on Wednesday:

"These now harmless memorials of the 17th June, 1775, and the 8th of January, 1815, were presented to general Andrew Jackson, president of the United States, by the citizens of Charlestown, on the 24th June, 1833, on his visit to Bunker Hill."

THE PRESIDENT AT LOWELL.

Boston, June 29. A gentleman of this city, who was at Lowell on Thursday, states that the parade in honor of the president's arrival, exceeded all anticipation. The president approached the place about 3 o'clock. The military escort was composed of a company of artillery, a company of riflemen, several companies of light infantry, and a procession of young females employed in the factories. The number of women in this procession was from three to four thousand. All were neatly dressed in white, with sashes of different colors to designate the different manufacturing establishments, to which each respectively belonged. They were formed four deep. The length of the procession gave occasion to a spectator to remark that there was a mile of girls. After the president and suite had arrived at the Merrimack hotel, the whole procession passed in review before him.

The manufacturing works had all been suspended during the day, and, at the request of the president, one of the mills was put in operation, that he might witness the ingenuity of the machinery, and the immense power of the water-wheels. He appeared to be much engaged, and made such inquiries as evinced that he felt a deep interest in the establishments and the progress of our manufactures. He afterwards attended a public dinner at the Merrimack hotel, where it was his intention to pass the night and proceed to Concord, N. H. the next day. He appeared to be in better health than for several days previous.

We are unwilling to let this account pass from our hands, without a few words of comment. What sentiments the scene inspired in the minds of the president and the gentlemen high in office and expectation, who attended him, we know not; but we hope that the evidences of personal, as well as national prosperity—of a high standard of moral and intellectual, as well as pecuniary independence—there exhibited, were not lost, nor the reflections to which such an exhibition would naturally lead, like water thrown upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again. There were from three to four thousand females in the procession—probably every one of them under thirty years of age. Not the oppressed, miserable, half-starved females of an European manufacturing city; but well educated, well dressed females, perfectly independent of any control from the proprietors, at liberty to return to their work when the festival should close, or to leave it and seek any other employment that may produce more money, or please the fancy better. Is such a population to be trifled with by the legislators and rulers of this country? Does not the spectacle present, in a delightful aspect, the operation and effect of our truly republican institutions? These females are not destined, like those of Europe, who labor for a subsistence, to labor forever in the same capacity. They are to be the wives of virtuous, high-minded, independent citizens—the mothers of our future law-givers, our legislators, our judges, our presidents, our instructors and our protectors. And, with this view, what should be the policy of our government? Clearly to give permanence and stability to whatever system of political economy will raise the price of labor, and augment the value and quantity of agricultural and manufacturing products. The pitiful consideration of a cent in the price of a yard of cloth should never enter into competition, in the minds of enlightened statesmen, with the welfare and prosperity, the industry and the independence of the laboring classes.

The governor's aids, who attended the president to the line between this state and New Hampshire, returned last evening, having left him in tolerable health and excellent spirits.

[Courier.]

The Daily Advertiser says—The president seemed much interested with what he saw and heard, [at Lowell] and made many inquiries respecting the number of people employed, their average wages, the amount of cotton worked up daily, of cloth turned out, &c. showing by his remarks that the subject of domestic manufactures had previously engaged his attentive observation. In order to show more distinctly the effect produced by the introduction of the power loom and extension of the cotton business for the last twenty years, a gentleman exhibited to him a piece of British cotton shirting, bought at a marshal's sale of prize goods in the autumn of 1813, at eighty-five cents per yard, cash, (Boston money or specie) and also a piece of American manufacture, of superior fabric, which now sells for fourteen cents per yard, which is considerably less than one-half what he then paid for the bare weaving of the same article by hand. The president examined the fabrics attentively, and satisfied himself as to the comparative qualities of the two pieces. At his desire, (all the works having been suspended in consequence of his visit) one of the Merrimack mills was put in operation. He visited the mill and the print works, and carefully examined the machinery and the process of manufacturing.

During his visit to the Merrimack mills and print works, the apparatus for extinguishing fires (which is probably more effective than any other similar establishment in the country) was put in motion, and the immense power of the water wheels to which they were attached was truly astonishing, covering the different buildings with water in a few minutes, by various pipes manned by the different engineers.

For the following "killing" remark we are indebted to the Boston Advocate, speaking of the shew of girls at Lowell—

"Such a regiment of beautiful soldiers was never before seen on parade, and though they carried light arms, and no artillery but their eyes, they presented a more killing force than ever Bonaparte mustered."

MR. WEBSTER AT BUFFALO.

On his recent visit to Buffalo, Mr. Webster was invited by the citizens of that place to attend a public dinner, which his engagements, and the necessity of an early departure, compelled him to decline. He accepted, however, an invitation to be present at the launching of a steamboat, to which the proprietors had given the name of Daniel Webster, and in reply to an address of one of them, made the following remarks—

I avail myself gladly of this opportunity of paying my acknowledgments to the proprietors of this vessel, for the honor conferred upon me by allowing her to bear my name. Such a token of regard, had it proceeded from my immediate friends and neighbors, could not but have excited feelings of grateful respect; and it is more calculated to awaken these sentiments, when coming from gentlemen of character and worth, with whom I have not had the pleasure of personal acquaintance, and whose motive, I may flatter myself, is to be found in an indulgent opinion towards well intentioned services in a public situation.

It gives me great pleasure, also, on the occasion of so large an assembly of the city of Buffalo, to express to them my thanks for the kindness and hospitality with which I have been received in this young but growing and interesting city. The launching of another vessel on these inland seas, is but a fresh occasion of congratulation on the rapid growth, the great active prosperity, and the exciting future prospects of this city. Eight years ago, fellow citizens, I enjoyed the pleasure of a short visit to this place. There was then but one steamboat on Lake Erie; it made its passage once in 10 or 15 days only; and I remember, that persons in my own vicinity, in order to travel to the far west by that conveyance, wrote to friends to learn the day of the commencement of the contemplated voyage. I understand that there are now 18 steamboats plying on the lake, all finding full employment; and that a boat leaves Buffalo twice every day for Detroit and the ports in Ohio. The population of Buffalo, now four times as large as it was then, has kept pace with the augmentation of its commercial business. This fast progress is a sample, but certainly is not to be regarded as the measure, of the future advancement of the city. So many circumstances incline to favor that advancement, that it is difficult to estimate the rate by which it may hereafter proceed. It will probably not be long before the products of the fisheries of the east, the importations of the Atlantic frontier, the productions, mineral and vegetable, of all the north-western states, and the sugars of Louisiana, will find their way hither by inland water communication. Much of this indeed, has already taken place, and is of daily occurrence. Many who remember the competition between Buffalo and Black Rock, for the site of the city, will doubtless live to see the city spread over both. This singular prosperity, fellow citizens, so gratifying for the present, and accompanied with such high hopes for the future, you owe to your own industry and enterprise, your favored position, and to the flourishing condition of the internal commerce of the country; and the blessings and the riches of that internal commerce, be it ever remembered, are the fruits of a united government, and one general common commercial system.

It is not only the trade of New York, of Ohio, of New England, or Indiana, or Michigan, but it is a part of the great aggregate of the trade of all the states, in which you so largely and so successfully partake. Who does not see that the advantages here enjoyed, spring from a general government, and a uniform code? Who does not see, that if these states had remained severed, and each had existed with a system of imposts and commercial regulations of its own, all excluding and repelling, rather than inviting the intercourse of the rest, the place could hardly hope to have been more than a respectable frontier post? Or can any man look to the one and to the other side of this beautiful lake and river, and not see to the other side of this beautiful plain and manifest results of different political institutions, and commercial regulations.

It would be pleasant, fellow citizens, to dwell on these topics, so worthy at all times of regard and reflection; and especially so fit to engage attention at the present moment; but this is not the proper moment to pursue them, and tending to you once more my thanks and good wishes, I take my leave of you by expressing my hope for the continued success of that great interest so essential to your happiness—THE COMMERCE OF THE LAKES, A NEW DISCOVERED SOURCE OF NATIONAL PROSPERITY, AND A NEW BOND OF NATIONAL UNION.

An address was also made to Mr. Webster in behalf of the mechanics and manufacturers of Buffalo, to which he returned the following reply:

I need hardly say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that it gives me much satisfaction to receive this mark of approbation of my public conduct, from the manufacturers and mechanics of Buffalo. Those who are the most immediately affected by any measures of the government, are naturally the earliest to perceive their operation, and to foresee their final results. Allow me to say, gentlemen, that the confidence, you express in my continuance in the general course which I have pursued, must rest, and may rest safely, I trust, on the history of the past. Desiring always to avoid extremes, and to observe a prudent moderation in regard to the protective system, I yet hold steadiness and perseverance in maintaining what has been established, to be essential to the public prosperity. Nothing can be worse than that what concerns the daily labor, and the daily bread of whole classes of the people should be subject to frequent and violent changes. It were far better not to move at all than to move forward and then fall back again.

My sentiments, gentlemen, on the tariff question, are generally known. In my opinion, a just and a leading object in the whole system is the encouragement and protection of American manual labor. I confess, that every day's experience convinces me more and more of the high propriety of regarding this object. Our government is made for all, not for a few. Its object is, to promote the greatest good of the whole; and this ought to be kept constantly in view in its administration. The far greater number of those who maintain the government belong to what may be called the industrious or productive classes of the community. With us labor is not depressed, ignorant and unintelligent. On the contrary, it is active, spirited, enterprising, seeking its own rewards, and laying up for its own competence and its own support. The motive to labor, is the great stimulus to our whole society; and no system is wise or just, which does not afford this stimulus, as far as it may. The protection of American labor against the injurious competition of foreign labor, so far at least as respects general handicraft productions, is known historically to have been one end designed to be obtained by establishing the constitution; and this object and the constitutional power to accomplish it, ought never to be surrendered or compromised in any degree.

Our political institutions, gentlemen, place power in the hands of all the people; and to make the exercise of this power, in such hands, salutary, it is indispensable that all the people should enjoy, first, the means of education, and second, the reasonable certainty of procuring a competent livelihood by industry and labor. These institutions are neither designed for nor suited to a nation of ignorant paupers. To disseminate knowledge, then, universally, and to secure to labor and industry their just rewards, is the duty both of the general and state governments, each in the exercise of its appropriate powers. To be free, the people must be intelligently free; to be substantially independent, they must be able to secure themselves against want, by sobriety and industry; to be safe depositories of political power, they must be able to comprehend and understand the general interests of the community, and must have a stake themselves, in the welfare of that community. The interest of labor, therefore, has an importance in our system, beyond what belongs to it as a mere question of political economy. It is connected with our forms of government, and our whole social system. The activity and prosperity, which at present prevail among us, as every one must notice, are produced by the excitement of compensating prices to labor; and it is fervently to be hoped that no unpropitious circumstances, and no unwise policy may counteract this efficient cause of general competency and public happiness.

I pray you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, to receive, personally, my thanks for the manner in which you have communicated the sentiments of the meeting which you represent.

IN OHIO.

Cincinnati, (Ohio), June 17. On Saturday afternoon a meeting took place at the exchange, for the purpose of making such arrangements as should be deemed proper, to express the sense of this community in relation to the public and patriotic services of the honorable Daniel Webster, who is now on a visit to this city, when Morgan Neville, esq. was called to the chair, and Bellamy Storer appointed secretary. After some appropriate and pertinent remarks from Robert T. Lytle, esq. the following resolutions were submitted by him, and unanimously adopted by the meeting:

Resolved, That it is a source of much gratification to the citizens of Cincinnati, to learn of the arrival in this city of the honorable DANIEL WEBSTER, upon his first visit to the western country; that the high qualifications, long and eminent public services, and well directed industry of that gentleman, in his private and public career, for the advancement and prosperity of our common country, entitle him to the respect and admiration of his fellow citizens.

Resolved, That as friends of the union, we appreciate, with gratitude, his efficient and zealous co-operation, during the last session of congress, in explaining and sustaining the principles of the federal constitution; and the devotion which he displayed for the stability of the union, and the perpetuity of our free institutions.

Resolved, That aside from all party and political considerations, we are happy to recognise in this distinguished stranger, the most elevated properties of the gentleman and the scholar, the jurist and the statesman; and, that as such, he merits our regard, and is entitled to our hospitalities.

Resolved, That a committee of thirty be appointed by the chairman, to wait on Mr. Webster, and invite him to partake of a public dinner, on Wednesday next, the 19th instant.

Saturday, June 15, 1833.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, as chairman of a committee appointed by the citizens of Cincinnati, inviting me to a public dinner on Wednesday. In this my first visit to the west, it has been my object to see the country, as extensively as I could, and to enjoy an intercourse with the people, free from the restraints and inconveniences, attendant on public manifestations of regard and kindness. On the present occasion, however, it seems to be thought, that what is so kindly proposed may afford an opportunity of enlarging that intercourse, and of exchanging salutations with the citizens of Cincinnati, more favorable than may otherwise be presented. With these impressions, I accept with pleasure the invitation which is given to me. I am with much true regard, your obliged fellow citizen,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Morgan Neville, esq.

Accordingly on the 19th June the dinner was given, of which the Cincinnati Gazette of the 21st says—"The dinner to Mr. Webster, on Wednesday, was what, in the language of truth, might be called a brilliant affair. Every thing passed off well. The company was full to overflowing, and no unpleasant incident occurred to mar the general hilarity. The mayor presided; the rev. Wm. Burke made an invocation to the throne of grace, at the commencement of the festivities. The dinner was a good one—abundant—well prepared—the wines—but in them I have no skill. Mr. Webster was called out for a speech at the 6th toast. It was well conceived and happy—natural in all its aspects—a little flattering to the whole west—a little more so to Cincinnati in particular—and yet, perhaps, nothing short of the whole truth. He has promised to furnish a sketch of it for publication, and we will not anticipate that sketch, by giving one from mere memory."

Mr. Barry* declined joining in the festivities, in consequence of the visitations of the cholera among his friends at Lexington very properly considering that these ought to preclude him from being one of a festive board.

Regular toasts.

2. The heads of department.
3. The federal judiciary.
4. The army and navy of the United States.

7. The patriots of the revolution.
8. The defenders of our country during the late war.
9. Our friend, fellow citizen and guest gen. Wm. Henry Harrison—identified with the warfare and settlement, prosperity and glory of the western country—the laurels which he wears have been well won, and are cheerfully accorded.
10. The press—When conducted by learning and patriotism, a national blessing; but in its licentiousness, a curse to all mankind.
11. Common schools—New England has taught us their value, in the fruits she has produced from her nurseries of science.
12. The union—"It must be preserved."
13. The state of Ohio—May the devotion of her sons to the institutions of the country, keep pace with the improvement of her soil, the increase of her population, and the enterprise of her citizens.

By Wm. H. Harrison. Daniel Webster—The true representative of the character and manners of his country. Skilled in all the labors of a farmer, (his original profession), he is able to instruct the chief justice of England in the principles of the law which are common to both countries, and to compete with lord chancellor Brougham, or any other lord, for the palm of eloquence, and in explaining the principles of "good old English liberty."

THE DREAMS OF THE POET REALIZED.

The following remarkable prediction by Barlow, in his Vision of Columbus, first published at Hartford, in 1787, must have been regarded by the generation of that day as the mere conception of a visionary enthusiast. How wonderfully has it been fulfilled by the completion of those magnificent undertakings, the Erie and Ohio canals!

"He saw, as widely spreads the unchannell'd plain,
Where inland realms for ages bloom'd in vain,
CANALS, long winding, ope a watery flight,
And distant streams, and seas, and lakes unite.
From fair ALBANIA, tow'rd the falling sun,
Back through the midland lengthening channels run,
Meet the far lakes, their beauteous towns that lave,
And HUDSON joined to broad OHIO'S wave."

CASE OF JOHN H. PLEASANTS.

From the Richmond Whig, of June 27.

ATTACHMENT FOR CONTEMPT, AGAINST THE SENIOR EDITOR OF THIS PAPER.

As we promised some days ago, we avail ourselves of the first leisure, to lay before the readers of this paper, the answer of John H. Pleasants, (drawn by gen. Walter Jones), showing cause why he should not be attached for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, in disobeying a summons of said court, to attend it as a witness. We respectfully solicit an attentive perusal of that answer, by gentlemen of the bar, and by the public at large, believing as we do, that grave principles of constitutional and municipal law, are involved in the case.

We beg leave here to annex extracts from a letter from gen. Jones, which will contribute to enable the reader along with the answer, to form a just opinion of the legality of the course pursued by the court at Alexandria—a court for whose members, as individuals, we entertain every respect.

"The attachment is made returnable to some day in August, when the solemn parade of another special meeting of the court and grand jury is ordered, for the single purpose of dealing with your refractory body, if they can get hold of it. But this, I am well satisfied, they can never do: unless you voluntarily submit, as a native citizen and settled inhabitant of our old commonwealth, to be dragged from the protection of domestic laws and institutions, into a foreign jurisdiction, to which you never were subject, and against which you are charged with no offence, but that of declining upon your native soil, the extra territorial jurisdiction of a foreign tribunal over your person and liberty. You may, certainly, if you please, submit to be thus dragged away, and compulsorily subjected to the action of laws and tribunals, within the limited sphere of whose power, nothing but their own compulsion had brought you; to whose jurisprudence you are a stranger; and from the possible abuses, or from the arbitrary principles and tendencies of which, no matter how penalty they may operate on your person or fortune, the laws and tribunals of your own state, could give you no relief—no redress, though the identical act, with the commission or omission of which you are charged, was committed or omitted, whilst you were abiding in the heart of your own state, and entitled to the protection, or subject to the censure, of the constitution, laws and tribunals of that state alone. No invidious comparison is here intended between the actual administration of the laws, or the principles on which liberty and property are secured by existing institutions in the District of Columbia and in the state of Virginia; they may be all equally excellent in theory and practice. But as no stranger can assume parental authority over a child, without the consent of the parent, so no state can exercise jurisdiction over a citizen of another state, within the territory of his own state, without some conventional arrangement between the states to that effect. And no sovereign state could be justified in reinitiating her citizens to the cognizance of a foreign jurisdiction, in the institution of whose government and laws, those citizens could have had no voice, nor the state herself any control over any possible vices or abuses, either in the laws themselves, or in the administration of the laws. If any such concession may ever be deemed consistent with the dignity or the duties of a sovereign state, it must be under some very peculiar circumstances of manifest and urgent necessity; and then the concession should be strictly guarded, by positive regulations and well defined limitations, instituted, or distinctly approved and confirmed, by the laws of the state making the concession. I have looked in vain, after an anxious and diligent search, for any law of congress that even asserts for the tribunals of this district any such authority over the citizens of Virginia; and if any such law of congress could be found, I should still challenge, with more undoubting confidence in the triumphant maintenance of my challenge, a reference to any one law, or any one act, of Virginia, whereby she has, either by express convention or any tacit implication, made any concession to congress of the power to extend the jurisdiction of the local tribunals of the District of Columbia over the territory of Virginia, or her citizens abiding in their own state. Indeed, a state rights question of portentous import arises; and one of far more interest than many that have made more noise in the country. 'Tis a little remarkable, that hitherto the states have exerted all their vigilance and jealousy to vindicate their separate rights against supposed encroachments of the general government in the exercise of its highest powers; but now, an inferior court, completely local in its institution and jurisdiction, and no otherwise distinguished from other local tribunals, but that it happened to be created by congress for the local administration of justice in a small district under the exclusive legislation of congress, and absolutely excluded, in virtue of that exclusive legislation, from the community of states, both in their federal relations, and in their separate capacities as sovereign states, this same local and inferior tribunal claims an extended jurisdiction in the states, qualifying it not only to summon, but to attach and bring to its bar by force of its own process, citizens of the states residing in the body of the states, and as completely clear of its jurisdiction, as citizenship and residence can make them.

"The decisions of chief justice Marshall and judge Barbour against the power to arrest Mr. Randolph himself in Virginia, for the assault committed by him in the District of Columbia, are conclusive against the power now assumed, to summon and attach you as a witness in the same or any similar case; and every reason that operated against the arrest in the first instance, concludes a fortiori against the summons and attachment in the other; besides other and more conclusive reasons applicable to the latter in particular."

So far gen. Jones. We doubt not that every lawyer and every man who has just views of our federal relations, and of the rights of the citizen, will agree with him; and with this argument in hand, we shall, as we feel it our imperative duty, apply for a writ of habeas corpus, in perfect confidence that the power assumed by the court at Alexandria, will be judicially vetoed.

Circuit court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria.

June 4, 1833.

A summons was issued from the clerk's office of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, directed to the marshal of the eastern district of Virginia, and commanding him to summon John H. Pleasants to appear before the honorable the U. S. States judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria, at the court house in the town of Alexandria, immediately, to testify and the truth to say on behalf of the United States before the grand jury of the said county of Alexandria.

* The P. M. general, who happened to be at Cincinnati.

June 8, 1853.

Thomas Woodward, deputy marshal of the District of Columbia (who was sent express from Washington to Richmond, there to serve a summons directed to the marshal of the eastern district of Virginia) made oath in open court that he had served the summons on the said Pleasants in the city of Richmond in Virginia, on the 6th June; and that said Pleasants said "he should not attend." Thereupon the district attorney moved the court for an attachment against said Pleasants; and being required by the court to state what evidence he expected said Pleasants could give to the grand jury for Alexandria county, the said attorney made an affidavit to the following effect:

"That he had been informed and believes that said Pleasants is the editor of a newspaper published in the city of Richmond, called 'Daily Richmond Whig and Public Advertiser'; that he hath seen in said paper a letter published, purporting to be dated 7th May, from some person in Alexandria to some person in Richmond: which newspaper is produced and annexed to the affidavit as exhibit C; that the grand jury have now before them for consideration, a bill of indictment charging R. B. Randolph and sundry other persons as having conspired and confederated together to commit an assault on the president of the U. States in the county of Alexandria: that he expects the said Pleasants can prove who was the writer of said letter: that he considers the facts and circumstances stated in said letter as tending to prove, in connexion with other facts and circumstances which he has reason to believe have been proved or may be proved before the grand jury, that there was such a conspiracy. He further states that he considers the facts and circumstances stated in said letter as tending to prove, if not such a conspiracy, yet, in connexion with other facts and circumstances of which he believes evidence has been laid before the grand jury, an illegal and improper combination to prevent the arrest of said Randolph, who is stated in said letter to have committed an assault on the president of the United States, and which assault hath been presented by the grand jury; and by preventing such arrest to obstruct the administration of justice. He further states, that it appears from the said letter that the writer thereof was acquainted with said offence of said Randolph, both before and after the same was committed; and that, for the reasons above stated, he hath considered it his official duty to have the said witness subpoenaed to give evidence, as to the writer of the said letter, to the grand jury."

Upon the strength of this affidavit (presuming, as we must, that its weakness was its strength), the court instantly laid a rule on J. H. Pleasants to show cause in court, on Monday the 17th June, why an attachment should not issue against him for not attending agreeably to the former summons.

This rule was, on the 11th June, served on said Pleasants, by the same deputy marshal Woodward, who was a second time despatched from Washington to Richmond on this most important errand.

Deputy marshal Woodward, of the District of Columbia, at the same time, served a second summons upon said Pleasants, directed as before to the marshal of the eastern district of Virginia, and commanding that marshal, in the same vague terms as before, to summon said Pleasants to appear, &c. and "to testify and the truth to say on behalf of the United States, before the grand jury of said county of Alexandria;" but with the following addition to what was required by the former summons: "and to bring with him the original of the letter, dated Alexandria, May 7, published in a newspaper called Daily Richmond Whig and Public Advertiser, of the 8th of May, 1853, under the head, 'the Alexandria case.'"

To the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria.

John H. Pleasants of the city of Richmond, in the commonwealth of Virginia, by way of shewing cause against an attachment for a supposed contempt in not obeying a certain summons mentioned in the rule of your court granted at the instance of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia—says, that if, in contemplation of law he has done or omitted to do any act, the commission or omission of which may amount to a technical contempt of the authority of your court, he is guiltless of any such offence in design and intention: for that if the said summons had been issued by the order or with the privy of the court, and if its authority to issue such process had been less questionable than it is, he conceives that his circumstances afforded a sufficient excuse for his failure to attend pursuant to the tenor of the summons—and though he was and is sincerely impressed with the opinion and belief, confirmed by the advice of eminent counsel and by a recent judicial decision of high and imposing authority to the point, that the summons was improvidently issued and void of all authority and obligation in law, and therefore he presumed that it had been issued by the ministerial officers of the court, without the direct sanction of its order or privy; or if with such order or privy, that the court, proceeding in the first instance upon ex parte suggestion, would, upon further advisement and maturer consideration, quash the procedure as transgressing the limits of its power and jurisdiction, and as being in itself irregular and unreasonable in other respects; yet from his real respect for the character both personal and official, of the court, he begs leave to submit to the court in the first instance, the circumstances which he hopes would have constituted a just and reasonable excuse for his failure to attend the court or the grand jury, pursuant to the tenor of the summons in question, even if a regular summons might lawfully run, in any case, from the District of Columbia into this commonwealth.

[The 1st count refers to domestic matters.]

2. This respondent has no personal knowledge of any crime or offence committed in the District of Columbia or any wise cognizable by your court or by the grand jury of Alexandria county: nor was there any circumstance from which the law officers of the United States could reasonably have presumed his possession of any such knowledge; but every known fact, and every legitimate supposition of facts, connected with his relative situation and circumstances—indeed all notoriety—went to raise a directly opposite presumption; namely, that he was an utter stranger to any transaction that could then have been the subject of investigation before the grand jury; and that, of the great mass of persons within the same distance from the scene of action, there was not one to whom any personal knowledge of the matter might not have been imputed with as much reason and probability as to himself.

3. The summons imports not that there was any prosecution, or other cause, actually pending before the court or the grand jury, wherein he was required to testify as a witness; names no party against whom, nor any existing litigation wherein he was so required to testify. The letter which he was required to produce, was a simple relation of the assault said to have been committed by Robert B. Randolph on Andrew Jackson, and the attendant circumstances, without the remotest allusion to any other offence committed by him or any other person; and the facts, or some of the facts stated in the letter, would of course be the subject of proof on the trial of Mr. Randolph for that act; but the indictment against him for that act, had already been passed upon and found by the grand jury—and by no possibility could it be presumed that such act was any longer the subject of investigation before the grand jury, nor was the respondent summoned to attend as a witness in that case, but only to testify vaguely upon some undetermined and indefinite subject before the grand jury. Whereas this respondent was, and is well advised, that, according to the positive law of the land, and the well established practice of criminal jurisprudence, as well in the county of Alexandria as in the commonwealth of Virginia, no witness can be lawfully summoned by any public or private prosecutor, to testify before the grand jury, but in case of a definite charge, referred in the solemn form of an indictment, or information, for some specific offence charged against some individual or individuals by name; and that the summons for witnesses in such case, should identify the case and the parties by name.

4. Neither the summons itself, nor any subsequent disclosure of its object or purposes, imports that either the letter itself or any evidence of this respondent could possibly be in fact, or could reasonably be presumed by the law officers of the United States, even competent, far less material evidence, of any one fact or circumstance tending to prove the commission of any crime or offence whatever, by any person or persons whatever, in the county of Alexandria or elsewhere.

1st. Because the letter itself is not pretended to be the ground of any prosecution against the writer thereof, for any libellous, or other criminal matter therein contained, but the contrary appears both on the showing of the district attorney, and on the face of the letter itself, where the entire innocence both of the writing and of the publication thereof, stands manifest.

2d. Because that the summons calls for the production of the letter, not as a letter written by any party to any prosecution pending before the court or the grand jury, or by any named or described individual in particular, but as a letter simply described and identified by its date, &c. no matter by whom written—no matter whether the facts related in it were derived from the personal knowledge of the writer or from hearsay.

3d. Because from the after-showing of the district attorney, in his said affidavit, it does not appear that the letter is charged, or even suspected to be written by any party to the prosecution mentioned in such affidavit; but that the production of the letter is broadly demanded, no matter by whom, or under what circumstances or upon what information soever written.

4th. Because the district attorney when he undertakes to specify the use intended to be made of the letter itself, and of the testimony of this respondent, pretends not that either the one or the other is competent, for less material evidence of any fact or circumstance affecting the guilt or innocence of any party to the alleged prosecution, or of any other individual in particular; but merely suggests, or rather conjectures some possible application of the evidence, to one or other of two cases, either the one now said to be pending before the grand jury for conspiracy, &c. or is the other already passed upon by the grand jury for actual assault and battery; and such application of the evidence its supposed in one or other of three different aspects of the case, alternately presented, as first considering the facts and circumstances stated in the letter, in connection with certain other facts and circumstances as tending to prove a conspiracy to commit an assault upon the president of the U. States; or if not that, yet an illegal and improper combination to prevent the arrest of said Randolph for his said assault; without pretending that the required evidence was at all competent, or had any tendency to fix the supposed guilt of such combination upon any party to the supposed offence, or upon any other individual or individuals in particular, but to prove indefinitely the mere existence of such a combination among unnamed and unknown persons; or lastly, that the writer of the letter, (whosoever he may chance to be), "appears to be acquainted with many material and important circumstances connected with the said offence of said Randolph, [that is his assault on the president of the United States], both before and after it was committed," and the district attorney "expects the said Pleasants, [this respondent], can prove who was the writer of the letter;" in which last aspect of the required evidence, 'tis clear that neither the testimony of this respondent, nor the letter itself is expected to be either sufficient or competent to establish, by its own specific credit or force, any one fact or circumstance whatever, but to be used as the mere means of discovering some new source of evidence that may by possibility turn out to be competent and material; but what is a still more remarkable anomaly, this indirect object is professedly sought to be accomplished by means of a summons issued in one case to answer the collateral purposes of the prosecutor in another case, by means of a summons issued in the first case of an indictment for conspiracy not yet passed or found by the grand jury, to seek a discovery of possible evidence for the trial of an indictment for an actual assault already passed on and found by the grand jury; so that after all, this respondent has been summoned to attend in person, and to produce the letter in question, upon a pending inquiry before the grand jury, whether one offence has been committed, for the mere purpose of the possible discovery of new sources of evidence operating on another case for a different offence, thereafter to be tried.

Sixthly. Because the utter groundlessness of the pretexes on which the summons is professed to have been issued is demonstrative from the contents of the letter published, and from the shewing of the district attorney in his said affidavit since it is deemed quite evident and clear, that if the writer of the letter upon being discovered and produced as a witness, were to prove every fact and circumstance stated by him in the letter, there is not one that has the remotest tendency to prove the existence of any such conspiracy, or combination, as is pretended to be the sole ground of the only indictment, yet pending before the grand jury; but that the only case wherein any matter stated in the letter could be at all material, is that of the indictment for the actual assault; and that is the precise case in which the summons was not issued; and moreover if it could possibly be deemed the proper office of a summons to compel the discovery by one witness of another witness either in the same or in a different case, it is not pretended that any such indirect method of getting at evidence finds any apology, either in the wilful suppression, or in any indirect deflection of patent evidence to prove the fact of the actual assault, because it is notorious that the prosecutor relies on the evidence of eye witnesses in abundance to prove the fact incontestably.

The real object, the true end and aim of the summons could be inferred from the tenor of the summons itself, and from the known tendency of the evidence required by it, to be no other than a wide searching inquiry into the authorship of a published letter, either for the purpose of throwing odium or suspicion on the unknown writer, when discovered, or of fishing for a new witness to facts which it was well known this respondent was no witness to prove, and whereof it was equally notorious the letter itself could not be competent evidence; and this respondent is well advised that it is no office of a summons, nor at all within the province of a grand jury, to drag a citizen from his home, and set on foot an odious inquiry into his private correspondence, for the mere chance of the discovery of other witnesses, who may possibly prove what the witness summoned cannot prove; and that the issuing of a summons for any such purpose is a manifest abuse of the process of the court.

Sixth. 'Tis the common right of the citizen to write either in the confidence of private correspondence with his friends and acquaintance, or of anonymous communications through the press to the public, any statements or opinions on public or private transactions, freely and without danger of being personally drawn in question, either before the public, or at the bar of any legal tribunal so as such writing be not libellous, or do not otherwise transgress any private rights or public duty; and it is a manifest and grievous invasion of such common right, and the most perilous abuse of legal process, to institute any official and public inquiry, to discover the contents of or the parties to such private correspondence, or the name of any anonymous author of a published piece. If there be any exception to this general immunity conceded to the authors of innocent and harmless writings, the exception must be distinctly made out by the party who sets it up, in all its circumstances; he must clearly make out a case where the absolute necessities of judicial justice require the production of the writing; a case impossible to be made out, when it is not made clearly to appear in limine that the writing if produced would be competent evidence in the cause; whereas in the present instance, there is not only the absence of any such suggestion, but every presumption to the contrary.

7th. But whatever might have been the effect of the summons if it had been in the power of this respondent to comply with its requisitions, he avers that it was not in his power to produce the original of the letter mentioned or referred to in the body of said summons; because, he says the said letter was not written or addressed to himself, but to another person, the correspondent of the writer, who showed it to this respondent, and permitted him to take an extract from it; which extract he published in his said newspaper; that upon taking such extract, he returned the letter to the owner thereof, and had it not in his possession, power or control at the time of being served with such summons or at any time since. And this respondent is not competent from any personal knowledge or of acquaintance with the hand writing of the person by whom the said letter purported to have been written, to identify on his oath as a witness, the hand writing of said letter as that of the person by whom it purported to have been written; even if he could have been required, in the absence of the letter itself to speak of its contents and to prove the hand writing.

So far this respondent has submitted the facts and the reasons upon which he conceives that he ought to be, and would have been excused for his failure to comply with the requisitions of said summons, even if a summons otherwise unexceptionable in its terms and circumstances, might lawfully run from the District of Columbia into this commonwealth, and if your court had jurisdiction to coerce the attendance of witnesses from this commonwealth. But he respectfully submits that your court possesses no such jurisdiction; and the point is now judicially decided by the two judges composing the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia; to wit: the chief justice of the United States, and the district judge: to each of whom, application was made to arrest the said Randolph, under the 33d section of the original judiciary act of the United States, for the assault which he is charged to have committed on Andrew Jackson, in the county of Alexandria; and by both of whom the warrant was refused, for reasons and upon grounds identical in principle with the question of your court's power and jurisdiction to issue summonses into this commonwealth for witnesses there residing. To the decisions of the said judges, (evidence of which, and their opinions at large, are as he understands, in the possession of the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia), and to the reason and law in the case, he respectfully refers.

JNO. H. PLEASANTS.

City of Richmond.

The above named John H. Pleasants, this day made oath before me, the subscriber, one of the Aldermen for said city, that the facts which he has above alleged, as matters within his own personal knowledge, are true, as above stated: leaving the matters of inference from the summons itself, and the affidavit of the district attorney, above mentioned, and the reasons of law and right above advanced, to stand in their own intrinsic force. Given under my hand and seal, this 18th day of June, 1833.

A copy. Signed, JNO. L. TATE.

The "National Intelligencer" having published the preceding statement, on the following day, said—

We are requested to correct and explain a mistake in that part of the statement of the attachment case, republished in our paper of yesterday from the Richmond Whig, which, quoting a letter from general JONES, states that the attachment was made returned to a special session of the court appointed for some day in August. Such, indeed, seemed to be the understanding when he left the court some time before its adjournment on the 17th June; and the counsel, not doubting the result from what passed while he was present, so informed his client. But, we understand, the court afterwards determined on an adjournment over to the regular term in October; of which he was not aware.

The "Whig" of the 1st inst. speaking of the "attachment" says—

"Virginia is a sovereign state. What is the District of Columbia? An anomaly in the condition of nations—a dependency merely, not even possessed of the right of self government. Can any or all the courts of Virginia, send their officers into that District to execute process? No. The sovereign then attempts not to exercise, lays not even a claim to a power which a county court of the dependency boldly assumes and exercises in respect to her citizens! The county court of Alexandria (for with all its high sounding titles it is neither more nor less) can bring every citizen of the state of Virginia to its bar, as witnesses, and imprison and fine them for disobedience, but the great commonwealth of Virginia cannot coerce the presence in any one of her courts, of the humblest individual in Alexandria or Washington! A fine state of things truly.

"What should be thought of the presumption of the court at Alexandria, in sending their officer into this state, to drag its citizens to their bar? The federal judges (Marshall and Barbour) declined, for want of power, to issue warrants for the apprehension of the offender, Mr. Randolph; but the county court of Alexandria, with a full knowledge of this decision, despatch their officers into this state, to bring its citizens prisoners to their bar as witnesses, in a case growing out of the very transaction! It is hard to imagine conduct more preposterous, or more at war with the ordinary rules of judicial conduct."

And in another place observes, of the judges—"We have viewed their high-handed measures in sending a deputy marshal of the District of Columbia, to serve process in Virginia, and their determination to imprison the editor of this paper for disobeying that process, no more obligatory on him than a mandate of the court of king's bench."

Fig.—The crawling proceedings had in this case will recoil on the heads of the devoted. "Where are you going, Sawney," said a gentleman when he discovered a fellow crawling through his hedge to plunder his orchard—"Boek agen, sir," was the reply.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 20—VOL. VIII.] BALTIMORE, JULY 13, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,138.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The President is said to have recovered from the fatigue of his journey, and to enjoy a pretty good state of health.

¶ Mr. Webster having arrived at Pittsburg on the 4th inst. was waited upon by hundreds of persons, and invited to a public dinner, which he declined; but consented to accept a cold collation, which was given in a grove on the 8th—about two thousand persons being present. After he had been addressed by the mayor, he made a reply of considerable length, which was listened to with the deepest attention, and received with bursts of applause. It is expected that this speech will be published.

It is stated "that, in consequence probably of the terrible ravages of the cholera at Lexington, it is not likely that Mr. Clay will visit the north, this summer, as he had intended; which will be as great a disappointment to his friends in that quarter, as Mr. Webster's rapid movement homewards has been to the people of all parts of Ohio, who were anxious to see him, and much disappointed that they had not an opportunity."

¶ A writer in the National Intelligencer, speaking of currency, says—

"Mr. William M. Gouge, whose work on banks is full of information, states, from the writings of two most able political economists, that our capitals amount to 12,000,000,000, and its productive industry at 600,000,000. Mr. Lee, of Boston, estimates capitals at 10,000,000,000, and our national income at 700 or 800 millions. Mr. Niles values our capitals at 1,066,000,000."

We quote the paragraph for the purpose of correcting a mistake. It was our opinion, in 1827, that the income, (not the "capital") of the people of the United States, was 1,066,000,000 dollars, at the then money-value of their various productions. We should now estimate the income at more than 1,200,000,000. This will allow less than 100 dollars per head, for the subsistence and clothing, and all other acquisitions of necessities or comforts, or new values annually created or obtained.

The estimated income, (1,066 millions, in 1827), had reference only to the products of labor—that is, that so much value was needful to the supply, shelter and comfort of the people of the United States—and was annually created or obtained, in the product of lands, mines, workshops and factories, in the building and repair of houses and ships, roads and canals and bridges—and the thousand other laborious occupations of men and women, whether aided by scientific or animal power, or resting on manual labor, alone.

The table prepared and published by us in 1827, was made up after much reflection and a long and close examination of all the facts which were then accessible to us; and we have since collected a great deal of information with the design of attempting a detailed statement, in which, however, no more than an approximation to the truth can be expected; but the weather must become cooler, and the editor's health a little stronger, before this design can be carried in effect. It will require many hundred references to facts, and laborious calculations—and, if satisfactorily finished, may gratify a laudable curiosity, and, perhaps, also be useful; for there is a great lack of statistical knowledge, and few are willing to seek it for themselves—though most persons are pained in possessing it.

¶ We have given more than the usual space to our selection of foreign articles, because of certain documents and papers which ought to be preserved for reference. No very important result is mentioned, unless in respect to Turkey and Egypt, between whom there is peace—but there are strong indications of momentous results; and especially, that the British government will abolish negro slavery, in their West India colonies—no matter at what hazard or cost.

¶ There are some curious matters stated in one of the following pages concerning the "wonders of the deep." A belief in the existence of sea-serpents, and of their appearance off the eastern coast of the United States, in the summer season, is almost forced upon us—by the "testimony of many witnesses."

VOL. XLIV—SIG. 22.

It is hardly possible that so many persons can be deceived—and now there is a whole family of serpents! Where is the home of these monstrous strangers?—why do they shew themselves only in one neighborhood? Have they always existed, and just now offered themselves to the view of some of those who inhabit the "crust of the earth?" "Brother Jonathan," we think, will soon grapple one of them—for he fears nothing that swims.

¶ The "York Republican" is doing a good service in publishing a complete list of all the foreigners who hold stocks of the state of Pennsylvania. We shall copy this list, as well because it is a curiosity, as in reproof of those who have dawdled so much about the stock of foreigners in the bank of the United States. "Thou hypocrite—thou seest the mote in thy neighbor's eye, but discernest not the beam in thine own eye."

THE CHOLERA.

New York. Five deaths had occurred at the quarantine ground. Pittsburg. A few solitary cases have happened since our last—but the disease did not seem likely to extend. There were 2 deaths on the 7th, but no new case, nor death, on the 8th inst.

Maryland. Cases still happened near Williamsport on the canal. Many of the laboring people had fled, and the disease had abated, as well as assumed a milder form.

Baltimore. A wild report was published in a New York paper of the presence of the cholera in this city. We do not believe that one case has yet happened. The city, indeed, is unusually healthy, for the season.

Virginia. Two fatal cases occurred 10 or 12 days ago in Richmond—but they were the first and the last.

One case only at Fredericksburg—about 20 days ago.

A good many cases of the cholera have appeared on the Kanawha. Whole number of deaths at Wheeling, from the 16th May to 23d June—153; a fifth of the population in some parts of the town! In other parts no case happened! The disease has ceased.

Kentucky. The cholera was thought to have nearly subsided at Maysville on the 4th inst. up to which time there had been 53 deaths—but has since returned.

There were a few cases yet at Lexington on the 3d inst. with fatal terminations. The disease, however, had lost its terrors, and a healthy state was speedily expected. Among those recently deceased, was Mrs. Smith, lady of the P. E. bishop of Kentucky, with other highly respected persons.

Deaths by cholera, at the latest dates, were happening at Georgetown, Shelbyville, Simpsonville, Danville, Richmond, Louisville, Cynthiana, in the Green River country, generally, Paris, Klemingsburg, Lower Blue Licks, Lancaster, Springfield, Augusta, in Mason county, Harrodsburg, Winchester, Bardstown, Frankfort, Danville, Maysville.

The cases at Louisville were chiefly in strangers. The city, in general, was healthy.

At the places named in italic the disease was bad, at the latest accounts—at some of them awful. Not a few of the most worthy and valued people of Kentucky have left us—"to be seen of men no more."

Ohio. A few fatal cases at Chillicothe. Some still occurred in Cincinnati.

Tennessee. The disease was abating at Pulaski.

Indiana. From 20 to 30 deaths at Salem, and some at Charleston.

Illinois. There had been 10 or 12 deaths at Alton.

Missouri. At Palmyra the disease was dreadful—106 deaths, an unexampled mortality. Solitary cases still happened in St. Louis—but the latest papers do not notice any deaths.

Mississippi. The cholera had abated at Natchez, but not yet disappeared.

New Orleans. On the 25th ult. there were 20 deaths. From the 1st to the 25th June inclusive, there were 1,032 interments—to wit: 764 in the Catholic, and 268 in the Protestant burying ground.

Extract of a letter from a medical gentleman in New Orleans, dated June 18.—"The cholera has completely subsided. No new cases have been reported during the last four and twenty hours. During its prevalence I have been actively engaged. Many dreadful and soul-piercing scenes have I witnessed, but the desolation and calamity achieved by this fell enemy of human existence, transcends almost any in the annals of affliction. I have seen the industrious mechanic expire in the arms of his heart-broken spouse, and torn from his innocent offspring in the course of a single night; and before his remains could be consigned to a cemetery, I have witnessed his wife and several of his infants struck down by the terrific destroyer. My heart has sickened at the contemplation of such scenes, and I have bewildered my intellect in the attempt to divine the object of the infliction of such misery."

The latest accounts give us reason to hope that the visit of the cholera was nearly at a present termination.

Louisiana, generally. The disease was fearfully destructive at St. Martinsville and its vicinity. The town had been nearly abandoned, by all who could leave it. At Rapides the mortality had been great among the blacks. A few cases at Natchitoches. Alabama. Several deaths have taken place at Mobile Point. On Amelia Island a few deaths have taken place.

Cuba. Letters from Matanzas, published in the New York Journal of Commerce, give the most distressing accounts of the progress of the cholera in Cuba. One of these letters, dated 16th June says: "We are standing upon a volcano. $3,000,000 would not supply the loss of slaves, valuing them at $200 each. Moreover, who shall calculate the number of orphans left destitute, or nearly so? Where is our guarantee that the disease is not permanently located in the island? How is confidence—utterly lost and ruined—to be restored?"

A letter of later date, however, the 25th, states that the cholera had disappeared from the city, but was spreading on several estates in the country.

An official report of the deaths by cholera in Havana and its suburbs, has been published, in which the whole number is put down 8,253—of whom 2,365 were white, and 5,070 colored population. Of the whole number there were 1,450 white males and 1,029 white females; 225 male free mulattoes, and 311 females do. 30 male mulatto slaves, and 35 female do. 983 male free negroes, 1,196 females do. 1,381 male negro slaves, 909 female do. Total—males 4,609, females 3,480.

Mexico. A letter from Vera Cruz, under date of 15th June, states that the yellow fever had carried off one-eighth of the population of that place within forty days.

Tampico lost 900 persons, in 17 days! But the disease had there suddenly stopped.

The awful suddenness of the appearance of the cholera and its fatal effects—with its quick retirement, are equally mysterious, in many instances.

A letter from Wheeling says—"Another circumstance which I consider a singular one, never having seen it mentioned as having taken place any where else, is that the martins, and even the domestic pigeons, left us during the prevalence of the disease—[cholera] they are now [14th ult.] returning, which I take to be a good omen. Was this instinct, or what other cause induced them to abandon their friends?"

"We are truly gratified to learn, says the Charleston Courier, that our fellow townsman, Dr. Thomas Hunt, has been eminently successful in his practice on col. Proctor's plantation, in the vicinity of New Orleans. Eight physicians had been successively employed, previous to Dr. Hunt's engagement, and had abandoned the place in despair, as doomed to destruction. Col. Proctor's gang consisted of 200 negroes, 85 of whom had perished before Dr. Hunt, prompt in obeying the call of humanity, reached the scene of desolation; and although every negro on the place was several times attacked by the disease, he grappled with and subdued it, with the loss of but a single patient—a triumph of professional skill perhaps without a parallel."

"THE TIMES CHANGE, AND WE CHANGE WITH THEM."

A little while ago—hardly two weeks since, it was proclaimed as the bitterness and falsehood of party, and, by some, accounted a sort of high treason, to "imagine" that the president of the United States was not in robust health; and, because of statements concerning his indisposition at Boston, that patent "democratic" newspaper, the "Albany Argus," thus reproved and dissipated all that had been said about it:

From the Albany Argus of July 2.—The health of president Jackson has been a fruitful theme of misrepresentation with a certain class of newspapers since his first election. It seems this has become a habit too firmly fixed with the Evening Journal, to be laid aside now that no possible or supposed benefit can result to the cause of assidues from the belief of gen. J's illness. The Journal of yesterday afternoon says, "The last accounts left the president indisposed at Salem." The last accounts, published in the Argus of yesterday morning, left him on the road from Salem to Andover and Lowell, having been "abroad at an early hour," visiting the East India museum, riding through the streets, and receiving the visits of a large number of the citizens of Salem.

From the same of July 3.—It will be perceived, by our extracts from the Boston papers, that the president arrived at Lowell on Thursday afternoon—that he visited the extensive manufacturing establishments, mills and print works, with very little appearance of fatigue—and that he passed the New Hampshire line, on his route to Concord, early on Friday morning. His health seems to have been re-established.

But on the 4th of July, the same paper was compelled to announce the sudden return of the president, and his rapid journey direct to Washington, as if for the preservation of his life, (and, perhaps, it was), because of the fatigue that he had undergone, and the ill health which beset him! What other result was to have been expected? Many predicted that he would not live through his proposed tour, and some few were even wicked enough to suppose that such a hope was entertained by a certain portion of his most loudly professing friends—and all reflecting men were sensible of the fatigue that he would have to undergo in the journey intended, because of the almost constant pressure of crowds of people upon him, and the continual presentation of new and exciting objects, at different places. In some, he was hemmed round about by exclusive partizans,* and held like a prisoner in bonds—and, if we ever knew Andrew Jackson, he must, in his heart, have felt disgusted with a good many gentlymanly and rude proceedings which happened in several cities, forbidding the approach of some of the most virtuous or venerable persons in the United States, and casting him into scenes of senseless noise and unreflecting obtrusion. Besides, the accident at Castle Garden bridge, in New York, by which many persons (including some of his suite), were cast into the water, amidst the rubbish of the bridge, from which he himself hardly escaped—the running away of the horses in his carriage in New Hampshire, and the dreadful mangling of three persons engaged in firing salutes in honor of him—must have added not a little to the burthens he was

* These "exclusives," in very numerous instances, were persons who had been the bitterest and most resolute of all his "enemies"—and who hoisted, and hurrahed under the "Jackson flag," only because they could not raise up one of their own. Influence and office they would have—and they obtained one or the other by supporting, as a blessing and a patriot, him whom they had regarded as a "curse," and denounced as a "murderer."

Though in the presidential election of 1824, we took no other part than that of simply placing a ballot in the box, except to defeat the jugglers who had conspired to force their candidate into the seat of the chief magistrate, against the manifest wishes of a vast majority of the people of the United States—we were not unobservant of what was going on, nor have we forgotten some things that happened, well remembering certain actors in the first!—and we query if there is more than two persons in the first- and second grade of [civil] offices at Washington, who were not, at that time, most decided, if not violent, opponents of general Jackson. The "originals" have been set aside, to make room for such as we have just alluded to. The "spoils of victory" have not been divided amongst those who "bore the burthen and the heat of the day"—the "11½ hour men" have monopolized every thing. We have nothing to complain of, or care for, in this matter—which is mentioned only to say, "tempora mutantur!"

We have spoken of the "exclusives" who made the president a prisoner. The "Yankees," in their chastened respect for the chief magistrate, had, no doubt, touched the best feelings of ANDREW JACKSON, and he saw and knew the difference between the fawnings of office-holders and office-hunters and the wild outcries of a crowd, and the sober, yet kind and generous doings of intelligent persons, who could lay aside every selfish feeling in rendering attentions to a distinguished stranger and honored guest. It is even freely said that the committee from Portsmouth, N. H. having shewn a disposition to make a thing of the president to be approached only by those whom they pleased, were dismissed, with a warm left-handed blessing from the general—and that this impertinent act had no inconsiderable influence over his prompt return. He might, perhaps, have anticipated what would happen at ALBANY—where we saw "the republican party" in all its glory, in August, 1824, at the extra session of the legislature; and, for the first time, fully understood what was the "monster party spirit," which general Jackson spoke of in his letters to president Monroe, or understood clearly that the only sure way of serving "the republican party," was to prevent the people from voting for their president!—and at that time, and by "the republican party," the pretensions of "Mr. Jackson" to the presidency were treated with sovereign "democratic" contempt.

There is reason to believe that the eyes of the "old chief" have been opened by his tour. He saw, or must have known, that at Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York, Black-Hawk and his suite, attracted the same sort of crowds which surrounded himself and his suite—and have been made well acquainted with the fact, that persons were on the stretch to use him to keep up the "monster party spirit," and promote their own mean purposes.

Another thing probably annoyed the president, in the contests of individuals to get possession of his person, and direct his movements! We have heard of things which happened, and believe that they occurred, between rival chiefs for this command, at which one might laugh heartily, if not disgusted with the presumption and rudeness of individuals concerned.

The Portland Evening Advertiser of the 2d inst. contains the following:

A letter was received this morning from Mr. Woodbury, of which the following is an extract:

Concord, 30th June, 1833.

Dear sir—I regret to inform you that the ill health of the president is such, connected with other causes, as to induce him to return directly to Washington.

compelled to bear; for the president is an aged man, and has encountered many and very severe trials of his constitution—which must, indeed, have been an excellent one. But the human machine, like all other machines, will wear out—and if it be admitted for the sake of argument, that his mind is as sound as ever it was—surely, it need not be pretended that his body is capable of supporting that pressure under which it would not have bowed itself twenty or twenty-five years ago. It is only those who have passed through a stream of anxious people, that can form a just idea of the labor and exhaustion which attended the president on his journey. We, indeed, expected that his tour would have terminated sooner than it did—because of events that had happened, but do not apprehend that we were guilty of treason on that account; for certainly, under the new character of important “things as they are,” and the prospect of things as they may be, we are not willing to “imagine” the illness or decease of general JACKSON during the time for which he has been recently elected. We wish that he may live to return to “the Hermitage” in 1836—and there end his life, when God so wills it, in perfect peace.

A few years ago, one of the universities conferred the honorary degree of LL. D. on HENRY CLAY—whose knowledge of the civil law was unanimously admitted, whose capacity, as a statesman, had been universally acknowledged for a long period of years, whose tact and talent had so often called him to preside over the house of representatives—and who might, perhaps, even against the power of party, be now elected to that place if a member of the body, because of his extraordinary fitness for the honorable and arduous station—whose rank as an orator is in the first line—if he is not, “take him all in all,” the ablest and most eloquent public speaker of the present times, whether in the United States, or elsewhere—and Dr. Clay, Doctor Clay, was said and sung a million of times, by noisy fools who affected much pride in remembering Doctor Franklin as one of their countrymen—and who obtained his title in the same way that it was conferred on Mr. Clay, and on the same principles. Well—this degree has been bestowed on ANDREW JACKSON, and it is pretty near a “treason” to call him DOCTOR! as a few have called him in reprobation of the act; because that the modesty of general Jackson’s pretensions to a knowledge of the civil law were highly creditable to him in times past, for he retired both from the bench and the senate for the reason that the duties of a judge or of a senator were unsuited to the bent of his inclination, and when a second time sent to the senate in 1822, he freely stated that the “business of legislation was not in his line.” But why not Doctor Jackson as well as Doctor FRANKLIN? Is it disrespectful to the former to place him in the rank of the latter? We should think not. But if so—the fault was in accepting the complimentary degree. When Mr. Ritchie refers to his own remarks on the legal knowledge of gen. Jackson, because of his opinion expressed concerning the “second section,” we wonder what that venerable Obsta Principii will say about this LL. D. “Nous verrons!” Let the veteran make a new pen, and nib it sharply.

With respect to this doctoring of the president various opinions are entertained, and some have pretty severely reproved the faculty of the university on account of it. But the compliment had been paid to every president of the United States who ever visited Boston, and to have omitted a tender of this courtesy, on the present occasion, would have subjected the faculty to much reprobation; and it would have charged upon Mr. Quincy, who is at the head of the faculty, as the result of his old federal feelings, &c. Besides, general Jackson had just been re-elected by a large majority of the American people—and an individual thus preferred, in due regard to our own republican institutions, should be, and must be, accepted, as possessed of some eminent qualifications for the most honorable office in the world. It is the right of every man to question the propriety of every measure proposed or carried out by the president, and his duty to place himself in opposition to every proceeding which he thinks in enmity to the general welfare; but it is also, and equally, his duty to render respect to the choice of the people, in his public character, and yield obedience to the laws of the land, enacted by the legal authority.

Without the former, our government would, in fact, be a monarchy; and without the latter, “nullification” would be made perfect. Under such circumstances and views of the subject, we easily arrive at the conclusion—that the university of Cambridge was altogether correct in tendering the highest compliment which it could bestow on the president—and that if there was any wrong in this matter, it was in general Jackson’s presenting himself at the university that he might receive it; and, therefore, his friends ought not to be offended with the application of a title to him which he voluntarily placed himself in the way to receive—which he might have easily declined, if it had pleased him, on any account, to have avoided. Those, however, who complain of the use of “Doctor Jackson,” when speaking of the president, would “feel a little red,” if blushing were not out of fashion, when recollecting what they said about “Doctor Clay”—on whom all men will agree that that particular compliment was rightfully conferred, because of his knowledge of the civil law. The contests of political parties have had no effect on that knowledge, unless to increase it; and besides, Mr. Clay did not present himself to receive the degree, as general Jackson did.

In the contest for the presidency, between the friends of Mr. Adams and general Jackson, in 1828, one of the leading objects of the latter (as stated by them), was to produce “reform,” by rotation in office, and limit the presidency to a single term—and they broadly and unanimously asserted, and on high authority too, that general Jackson, if elected, would certainly retire at the end of four years. We shall not recapitulate the strange things which occurred to do away the “commitment” that had been made—but, a long time before the expiration of the four years, it was regarded as settled, that president Jackson would be a candidate for re-election—things not being then ripe for the succession. If they had, we have many good reasons to believe that he would not have been preferred by the party.* And even now, because that the succession is not clearly discerned, some think that he ought to resign immediately after opening the next session of congress, and others suppose that he should be elected a third time!

There is all the difference in the world between the outs and ins! The first always wish “rotation in office” and “reforms”—the second firmly believe that “very well should be let alone.” And it must be admitted, that it is a “snug” thing to have an office, worth more than two or three thousand dollars a year (including the “candle-ends and cheese-parings”), without any necessity of being present to perform its duties ten times in a year, except to sign some official paper, which “Unele Sam” pays a clerk to make out—and about which the signer “knows no more than a horse does of algebra,” except that he has signed a paper, said to be for this or that purpose—a monthly return or charge for extra services! There are sundry places so held. Who does not desire such a “situation”? It is atum cum dignitate, in the most beautiful style!

During the excitement of the last presidential election, we saw a brisk altercation, which nearly resulted in a fight, because a person offered a large bet that president Jackson would not serve out his second term—if elected. The why and wherefore such an opinion was entertained, was imperiously demanded—but firmly refused. And now, many persons, and perhaps, the very gentleman who was so “indignant” on the occasion referred to, throw out the idea that the president will pretty soon resign the reins of the government to Mr. Van Buren, and retire to Tennessee—because of ill health, or for some other reason that may be assigned.

SHIP BUILDING. A very large number of first class of ships have been built at Baltimore within the last 12 or 18 months—some of them for eastern merchants, and intended for packets, whale ships, &c. One of 500 tons, owned at New York and Sag Harbour, and called the Daniel Webster, was launched last week.

THREE STEAMBOATS BURNED. The "Louisville Advertiser" of the 23d June, received this morning, contains the following:

Fire.—About ten o'clock last evening, the steamer Sentinel took fire while at the wharf in front of this city. The flames spread with such rapidity that in less than ten minutes the Delphine, above, and the Rambler, below, were also on fire, and the three boats were burned in about an hour to the water's edge. The Sentinel had a full freight for N. Orleans, the Rambler had on board several hundred barrels of whiskey, and the Delphine had just received about twenty tons freight from New Orleans for Cincinnati.

The engines, greatly damaged, will be saved. The cargoes have been entirely lost. Passengers had barely time to make their escape, leaving baggage, clothing and money on board. There were about twelve steamboats lying in port at the time, and it was with difficulty those on fire were separated from the others.

GIRARD COLLEGE. The corner stone of this splendid establishment about to be erected for the education of orphans, according to the magnificent endowment, and pursuant to the will of the late Stephen Girard—(who set aside two millions of dollars for that purpose), was laid on the 4th of July, in the presence of a great assembly of persons, with appropriate ceremonies, and an eloquent address by Nicholas Biddle, esq. chairman of the board of trustees.

A GOOD SIGN. The Charleston Courier of the 29th ult. says: "Yesterday being the anniversary of the battle of Fort Moultrie, was celebrated by the firing of a national salute at day light, from the citadel, and by a detachment from the regiment of artillery. Another national salute was fired, at meridian, from Fort Moultrie. The Star Spangled Banner was seen waiving over a marquee in front of the citadel. We hail it as a favorable augury, as an evidence of returning patriotism."

STOCK GAMBLING. There have been large operations in the stock of the bank of the United States at New York, within a few days past, supposed to amount to a million of dollars—and there was a great pressure on the money market. Among other things, it was said that the president's hasty return to Washington had some connexion with a speedy removal of the United States' deposits! These are not large enough (even if removed), to have any material effect on the business or state of the bank—at present!

In consequence of the demand for money, the stock fell one per cent. on the 3d inst. at the shops of the jobbers in New York.

THE U. S. BANK, declared, on the 1st, a dividend upon its stock, for six months ending on that day, of three and a half per cent.

WOOL. From the Hampshire Gazette, of July 3—published at Northampton, Massachusetts—

Agents from the manufacturers of Webster and other towns have recently visited this county and Berkshire, and purchased large quantities of wool in Worthington, Peru, Hinsdale, Windsor, &c. Many loads of wool passed through this place last week. We are informed that the prices given range from 47 to 70 cents, and the quality of the wool, from half blood to full blood and Saxony fleeces. We have heard of only two lots that brought 70 cents. What is called full blood merino brought from 55 to 65 cents; much of it was sold from 53 to 60 cents. Such is the information we have received; it may not be entirely correct.

A NOVEL CASE. Cheng and Yang, the Siamese twins, have been tried in Trumbull county, Ohio, for an assault and battery committed on an old and respectable citizen. The defendants plead guilty, and were each fined five dollars and costs.

WATER. The following interesting article is from the New York Gazette:

Mr. Holt. This enterprising individual, having for the last six months experienced in his mammoth house, all that he could wish by way of patronage, is now likely to realize his wishes in procuring a supply of pure water, not only for his own establishment, but for the lower part of the city. Late on Saturday afternoon, his drill, having passed through 510 feet of rock, the surface of which was 130 feet below the ground, (making a total depth of 640 feet), sunk suddenly into a depth of water of 2 feet. If he proceeds no farther all his wishes and expectations will be satisfied.

NULLIFICATION. A meeting of the state rights party was recently held in Charleston, S. C. on the occasion of the death of a distinguished member, the late R. I. Turnbull. The hon. C. J. Colcock, after paying a tribute of regard to the memory of his friend, concluded with the following remarks:

"Let me seize on this occasion to say to you that another contest is at hand, and your opponents in full array: you will soon be again called to the field—and all that you have achieved must be done again. The war against the liberties of man is becoming more and more desperate and furious—and the friends of freedom must exert themselves, or we sink forever into the gloom of despotism."

[With this flourish about the "liberties of man," &c. we hope that Mr. C. does not allude to the dark colored matter about which some seem so anxious to "kick up a fight."]

MESSEURS. RIVES AND GILMER. Because of the public character of these gentlemen, perhaps, we ought briefly to notice an unhappy incident which took place at Charlottesville, Virginia, a few days ago. Mr. Senator Rives and Thomas W. Gilmer, esq. had been old friends—they differed about nullification, and the principles of the president's proclamation—Mr. Rives supporting, and Mr. Gilmer opposing the latter. They unfortunately met, and after some conversation, Mr. Gilmer inflicted "the lieutenant Randolph outrage!"—or seized the nose of Mr. Rives, and afterwards struck him. The latter promptly made battle, but had rather the worst of it, being the weaker man.

GOOD NATURED REMARK AND REPLY! The "Pennsylvanian" says—"The New Hampshire Patriot persists in asserting that we are corrupted by the United States bank. Is the Patriot a fool or a fend?"

The "New Hampshire Patriot" replies—"We have never said the editor of the Pennsylvanian was corrupted by the United States bank, and we much doubt whether that editor's political principles are not past the process of corruption."

WOOD-CHOPPING SENATORS! Speaking of Mr. Webster, the Cincinnati Gazette says—"This gentleman proceeded from Chillicothe to Circleville on Monday, June 24, and from there to Lancaster on Tuesday. We subjoin an anecdote of the journey from Chillicothe to Circleville, as related in the Circleville Herald.

As Messrs. Webster and Ewing were wending their way to Circleville, when about seven miles from the town, their passage was intercepted by a tree, which had recently fallen across the road, and which an honest yeoman was leisurely cutting out. They surveyed the premises, to see how the difficulty might be overcome. Our knight of the axe, not knowing either of the distinguished senators congratulated himself on the timely arrival of two such hale and able bodied men to his assistance; and very frankly advised them, as the best means of escaping the difficulty, to get down from their carriage, and aid him in the removal of the obstruction. Pleased with the republican plainness of the suggestion, and finding the man's strength inadequate to the task in hand, they followed his advice. Mr. Ewing first took the axe, and wielded it with effect as he does his arguments in the senate and at the bar. He was relieved by Mr. Webster, who was less familiar with chopping logs from the road, than with removing the obstructions of chop logic from the wheels of government. His efforts were so labored and ineffectual, as to attract the notice of the woodsman, who declared to him, "you are not doing your best now, sir—you must be playing the possum! You don't bend your back enough, sir." The tree cut off and the way cleared, our travellers resumed their journey—and left the countryman blessing his stars that they had been directed that way, (which was off the main road), at that propitious hour.

LIVERPOOL AND MANCHESTER RAIL ROAD. Results.—170 passengers per day has been the average.

It has not been out of use a single day.

Only one fatal accident has occurred in 19 months.

The fare by coaches used to be double of what it is by rail road cars.

The time of going between the towns reduced from 4 to 1½ hours.

A regiment of soldiers has been taken over the road in two hours.

The locomotives travel safely in the dark!

Goods average about 10s. per ton for carriage. On the canals they pay 15s.

The Manchester cotton manufactures save $100,000 per annum, in the carriage of cotton alone.

A great deal of land along the line has been let for gardens, at increased rents.

There is much way-travel.

The mails are carried at two-thirds of the old prices.

"A MIGHTY FLOOD." The late advices from Arkansas (says the National Intelligencer) bring distressing accounts of a flood in the river of that name, the river having risen three feet higher than ever before remembered. The consequence is, that the plantations are deluged all along the river, and not only the entire crops swept off, but even the land itself, in some instances, washed away. The roads were flooded on all the levels, and travelling consequently entirely suspended. Many lives, also, it was feared, had been lost. One or two bodies were said to have been discovered in the torrent of the river, passing Little Rock. The following particular incident gives one a fearful glimpse of the awful reality of the disaster:

Little Rock, June 19.

The steamboat Arkansas, in coming up on Friday last, was beckoned to by a female, who appeared to be in a tree top near the shore, about 20 miles below this place. The current being very strong, it was some time before the boat could be rounded to with safety, during which the woman was lost sight of; and when they again came in sight of the place where she stood, she had disappeared. It is supposed she was drowned, as the banks appeared to be too much inundated for her to have retreated into the woods. [Gazette.]

RAIL ROAD ACCIDENT—at Brussels. On the rail road between Philippeville and Charleroi a serious accident has occurred in consequence of a train of carriages, containing upwards of 50 passengers, having been imprudently detached from the locomotive engine employed in towing them up a considerable acclivity. A stone had been placed behind the wheel of one of the carriages of the train for the purpose of impeding their descent, and this stone having by some accident been removed, the whole train was set suddenly in motion, and by the force of its own gravity was carried over a precipice eight or nine yards in depth. Three of the passengers were killed on the spot, and a great many others were wounded more or less dangerously. No fault, however, is ascribable either to the engineer, M. Cochaux, or his machinery, which is said to do great credit to the inventor, and to be such as is likely to accelerate the arrangements for the proposed rail road, which, when completed, is to establish an easy and rapid communication between the Scheldt and the Rhine.

RAILWAY EXPERIMENT. An experiment of very great importance to railways has been tried with much success upon the railway of the Lowe, the construction of which was under the direction of Messrs. Mellett & Henry. A locomotive engine manufactured by Messrs. Fenton, Murray & Jackson, of Leeds, employed upon this railway for the transport of goods, has travelled with a weight of 15,000 kilogrammes, or fourteen tons nearly, including the weight of the engine, tender, water and fuel, and has surmounted an inclined plane of a rise of 41 in 100, with a velocity the more surprising, as the pressure of the steam did not amount to more than 38 pounds upon the square inch. The inclined plane is 2,184 yards nearly in length, and the engine ascended it in six minutes, and descended it immediately with great ease and in perfect security by regulating the velocity of the descent. The power of the engine was only applied to one pair of wheels, and they did not slip round in the least. This experiment has far surpassed any which has come to our knowledge, and which has been made up to this day; for the experiment attended with the best results which have been tried in England, is that upon the inclined plane in the tunnel at Liverpool, the rise of which is only one in fifty, that is to say, four ninths of the rise of the inclined plane at Bernard, where the trial took place. Up to the present time it has been thought that the maximum rise of an inclined plane upon which an engine could possibly travel ought to be ten millimetres in one metre, that is, one in one hundred, or at most fourteen millimetres in one metre, that is, one in seventy-eight! The above trial, however, increases much this maximum. The inconveniences arising from the employment of stationary engines will be completely done away with, should they give place to locomotive engines, since the train of diligences can, through the mechanical agency of the latter, overcome the inclined planes. [From Le Nouveau Journal de Paris et des Départemens.]

CANADIAN CANALS. Welland canal. The first vessel entered the Welland canal, at Port Colborne, up lake Erie, on the 20th May, and in nine days after the collector reported thirty-eight schooners having passed through the new route without impediment. The canal is in full and effectual operation, and much more business doing upon it than was anticipated by its best friends. The American steamboat Perseverance runs daily from Buffalo to the Chippewa, and on Friday afternoon entered the canal by the locks at Port Robinson, proceeded across the aqueduct over the Chippewa, and through the new route over the Gravelly Bay, (Port Colborne) and thence shot across to Buffalo! The harbor at Port Colborne is pronounced by all the masters of schooners, as the very best on lake Erie, and the steamboats will in future land all passengers and light goods at Port Colborne, to be brought by the packet boats to Port Robinson (11 miles) and there by coaches to the falls (6 miles) or to St. Catharine's or Niagara, saving thereby 30 miles in lieu of coming round by Port Erie. [Kingston Chronicle.]

Rideau canal. We have at last the pleasure to announce the opening of this important line of communication. The new steamboat Enterprise, built at Perth, after passing through the Tay canal into the Rideau, to reach this port yesterday, where she awaits the arrival, from Oswego, of her engine—manufactured at Syracuse. We had this interesting evidence of the resources of a region of country, but a few years ago a pathless wilderness.

BRITISH DUTY ON COTTON—official, from the Globe. The following bill, communicated to this government by the charge d'affaires of the United States in Great Britain, received the royal assent on the 17th May last, and has accordingly become a law of the realm.

A bill to reduce the duty payable on cotton wool imported into the United Kingdom.

Whereas an act was passed in the first and second year of the reign of his present majesty, entitled "an act to discontinue or alter the duties of customs upon coals, slates, cotton wool, barilla and wax;" And whereas, it is expedient to reduce the duty on cotton wool thereby imposed, be it therefore enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, there shall be raised, levied, collected and paid, for and upon every hundred weight of cotton wool, the produce of any foreign country, or imported from any foreign country, a duty of two shillings and eleven pence, in lieu of the duty of five shillings and ten pence imposed by the said act.

And be it further enacted, That the said duty shall be raised, levied, collected, paid and appropriated, in like manner as if the same had been imposed by an act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late majesty, king George the fourth, entitled, "an act for granting duties on customs."

And be it further enacted, That this act may be amended, altered or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of parliament.

Boston. Fires during the last six months.—It will be seen by the annexed statement of fires in the city and vicinity, during the last six months, that the fire department have had a busy season, whatever others may think to the contrary. In the city the number of fires during the six months ending June 30, 1833, was 42; and out of the city, at which the Boston fire department turned out 12; false alarms 21—making in all, 75 turns out. The loss in the city was $40,050, of which $21,760 was insured; the loss out of the city, was $30,700, of which only $3,000, was insured. Loss in all $70,750; insurance $23,760. During the twelve months of 1832, there were only 50 fires in the city; 18 out, at which the department turned out; and 60 false alarms. Loss in the city, $61,863 34, of which $24,078 34 was insured; out of the city, $25,650, of which $12,300 was insured. Loss in all $87,513 34; insurance $36,378 34. From this it appears that there were only 14 more actual fires in 1833, than in half of the present year; and that the amount of damage was only $16,763 more in 1832 than in half the present year. [Patriot.]

SEA SERPENT AGAIN. The schr. Charles, of Provincetown, Jacob Cook, master, James M. Needham, mate, arrived here this morning, reports that yesterday, between 11 and 12 o'clock, when about one and a half miles east of Nahant, he heard a tremendous rush of water, and on looking out, saw at about 300 yards distance, an immense serpent, lying in the shape of a hoop. The circle was large enough for his schooner to lie in. It suddenly stretched itself out and appeared to be 60 or 70 feet in length, resembling a string of casks. All hands had a distinct view of it for "nearly an hour." Capt. Cook had a good glass, and could plainly distinguish the line of the serpent, with its "humps and hollows."

Captain Cook has always been an unbeliever in the sea serpent story. He has followed the sea for twenty years—been a number of whaling voyages, and never saw any thing similar before. He says that had he been fitted for a whaling voyage, he would not have hesitated to have got out his boats and harpooned him. He was within gun shot, but unfortunately had no fire arms on board. [Boston Transcript.]

It would seem that not one, but three or four veritable sea serpents have made their appearance off Nahant. The following account of them is from the Portland Advertiser of the 6th instant. The steamboat will now doubtless make her trips with crowded decks:

The sea serpents and the steam boat. The steamer Connecticut arrived this morning later than usual, having been employed for about an hour in chasing a school of sea serpents. About six o'clock last evening, a schooner off Nahant, hailed the Connecticut, and told captain Porter that if he would look out, he might see the sea serpent, for "the bore east of Nahant." The Connecticut steered accordingly, and very soon, not one sea serpent alone, but three, some say four, appeared in sight. All the passengers saw these monsters of the deep with their own eyes, distinctly and clearly.

One of the passengers who had a good view, says, that one of the serpents was one hundred feet in length—with a head partly in the form of a snake, and partly in the form of a pickrel. Some say this largest serpent, was yet longer. Another of the serpents was judged to be about 90 feet long. One threw his body out of water about 50 feet in a spiral undulatory motion, which formed at times upon a calm sea, a beautiful dark arch. During a portion of this time, one of the serpents was thought to be distant about 28 rods. And before and after his near approach, they could be seen for some time with a glass. The serpents seemed to enjoy the sport, and played around the boat for some time, perhaps they took it for another "serpent" in or on the deep—and were seeking an introduction.

Of all these facts, we are informed by many persons, verbally by one, upon whom we can rely—and who has hitherto been credulous enough. We do not, we cannot doubt the testimony of so many persons, in a steamboat upon a quiet sea—with the power of stopping and following the objects of their curiosity whithersoever they pleased.

From the Boston Post of Monday.

The sea serpent, in verity. Extract of a letter to a gentleman in this city:

"Portland, July 6.

"Dear sir—I arrived in safety this morning, at 8, having passed an hour or more yesterday afternoon among a shoal of sea serpents, three of which, measuring from 80 or 100 to 120 or 130 feet, I distinctly saw with the naked eye, and afterwards carefully examined through a glass. They were lying full length on the water, occasionally lifting their heads four or five feet above the surface and showing twenty or thirty bunches, or snake-like undulations, at a time. Their heads bore a resemblance to the pickerel's, and the crease of their mouths, marking the division of the jaws, was like that of a common snake. The engine of the boat was stopped, and for three quarters of an hour we had a cool and deliberate view of these monsters. Such ill looking objects I never beheld."

— Since the above was received, we have conversed with several people who came up in the Connecticut yesterday, and they all state that they saw, about 10 o'clock yesterday morning, a little below Nahant, three or four of the serpents, one of which was certainly 100 feet in length.

RHODE ISLAND. It appears by the Providence Journal that the Rhode Island legislature in acting upon an anti-masonic memorial praying that "the masonic corporations should be cited to appear and shew cause why their charters should not be declared void," have passed a resolution calling upon masonic bodies—not to shew cause why their charters should not be declared void, as has been erroneously stated in some of the Boston papers but—"to appear at the next session and shew cause why the prayer of the petitioners should not be granted; or, in other words, to shew cause why they should not be called upon to defend their charters."

EXTENSIVE LEASE. Gen. Leonard P. Cray, of Buffalo, has taken the lease of a lot of land 94 feet front and 118 deep, immediately south of the Eagle tavern on Main street, in that town, for a period of 999 years, at a yearly rent of $500. It is the condition of the lease that a block of brick buildings is to be erected covering the front, of at least three stories high. Gen. Cray has been offered $1,200 for his bargain. We mention this as an estimate of the value of real estate in the business parts of the city.

[Buffalo Jour.]

[At the commencement of the war in 1812—23 years ago—Buffalo was a spot in the wilderness, and seemingly almost without the pale of civilized life. The lease of the lot above mentioned will shew what it is now, and what it is expected to be. It must become a great city. Its location is one of the most commanding in the United States. It is at the foot of the open navigation of our inland seas, and the terminating point of the great Erie canal.]

MR. BERRIEN. A public dinner was given to this gentleman at Forsyth, Georgia, on the 20th ult. at which from 500 to 600 persons were present. On being toasted, he addressed the meeting—but we have not seen a report of his speech. He concluded by offering the following sentiment:

The perpetuation of the union and the sovereignty of the states of the confederacy—the one perfect, according to the spirit of the constitution—the other efficient to resist every violation of it. Save us from alarmists, consolidationists and office hunters; and the problem which reconciles federal union with state sovereignty, though difficult of solution, may yet be solved.

The following were among the regular toasts, and the character and spirit of the dinner party may be gathered from them.

The federal constitution—a covenant of union between free and sovereign states, each of which in virtue of its sovereignty, is possessed of the right of preventing, within its limits, all exercises of power not stipulated by that covenant; and each of which ceases to be free in precise proportion as it succumbs to federal arrogation of undelegated power.

The right of state interposition against federal encroachments—it is the great paramount conservative right, without which all the other rights of the states are merely precarious, and held at the will of the federal head. In proportion to its transcendent importance, ought we to be at once firm in maintaining it, and discreet in putting it in exercise.

The force bill—an act of legislation by which our confederate government has assumed to put the sovereign states composing the confederacy on the same footing, subject to be dealt with in the same manner, as bands of insurgents and outlaws. An outrage which, unless rebuked and repaired by the stern indignation of a free people, must end, in the long run, in consigning the country to consolidation and ruin.

THE COAL TRADE. The western part of Philadelphia, bordering on the Schuylkill, now has a considerable population, and much business. It is probable that the value of lands and lots has been increased several millions of dollars, in western Philadelphia, because of the coal trade; and the bustle which it causes may be partly esteemed from what follows:

The floating bridge at Gray's ferry, [over the Schuylkill] was opened in the year 1816 six hundred times in the whole year. In the month of June, 1833, it was opened three thousand two hundred times! Surely it is time that the river was treed—that the bridge was bought by the state, and that a steamboat was kept for passengers, as in the Delaware. Many hundred of eastern vessels now come direct to the river Schuylkill, laden with lumber, with plaster of Paris, and with fish, whence they depart with cargoes of anthracite coal.

[Three thousand two hundred times in a month, against six hundred times in a year!—and this increased trade on the Schuylkill has not diminished that on the Delaware front, but added to it—as any new creations of business must needs do.]

FLORIDA. The bank of Florida has, we understand, (says the Apalachicola Advertiser), been purchased by the Central bank of Florida. The business of both is now blended, and will be hereafter conducted by the last named institution, at the banking house of the former, in Tallahassee.

Col. White is re-elected to congress, beating gen. Call by a considerable majority.

THE CAPE DE VERD ISLANDS. The inhabitants are still suffering for the want of food—and many more have died. It is estimated that more than thirty thousand have perished by famine! The "mother country" affords no relief.

THEIR "GRACIOUS MAJESTIES!" A foreign journal relates the following strange story, at the same time vouching for its authenticity: "A short time ago, the king of Naples requested the young queen (a daughter of the late king of Sardinia) to sit down to the piano, at a little court soiree. The queen at first declined, but at the king's urgent solicitation, she at length consented. Just as she was about to seat herself at the instrument, the king drew back her chair, and the queen fell. On rising she reproached his majesty for this ill-mannered joke, observing that she thought she had married a king, but that she had only married a lazzarone. The king's reposta was conveyed in two smart coufflets. In consequence of this conjugal misunderstanding, an exchange of couriers has taken place between the courts of Naples and Sardinia. The result has not yet transpired."

A DUEL was lately fought with muskets, near New Orleans—the result of which is thus given—

The one to whom it proved fatal (and who was the challenger; and, it would seem, the aggrieved party) was a highly respectable young gentleman, formerly a resident of New York. The letter adds that the other party was informed by the surgeons that he must submit to amputation in both limbs as his only chance of recovery; but that choosing death in preference, he had been attacked with lockjaw, and was expected to survive but a few hours.

CHURCH COURTESY. The following communication addressed to the Boston Atlas, has been sent to us with an implied request for its republication. If the rebuke is without foundation, the sarcasm will be unfit.

"The occupiers of pew No. 56, (middle aisle), in the rev. Dr. Lyell's church, Anthony st. are informed, that if they ever go to Christ church, in the city of Savannah, Georgia, and take seats in No. 58, they will not be turned out thereof, as myself and family were on the morning of the 9th inst."

MR. EDITOR.—The above notice is taken from the New York Enquirer. If the fact be, as above stated, (and I have no doubt of it, having experienced a little of the same politeness), it deserves a public notice, and I wish to add the following:

If any gentleman occupying the pews in the middle aisle of St. Thomas's church, Broadway, New York, from the entrance to the twelfth pew, ever enters St. Paul's church, Boston, he will find no locks in the pew doors; and further, he will find that we do not allow strangers, with ladies, to stand in the aisles more than ten minutes, and that we do not suffer them to leave the church without offering them seats, particularly when the pews are but half filled.

GALLAPAGOS ISLANDS. An establishment has lately been made on Charles island, one of the Gallapagos group, under authority of the government of Ecuador, at which whale ships and others will be furnished with supplies. The colony consists of about 200 persons—and Joseph Villanil, a native of New Orleans, though long resident abroad, is the governor. The establishment is called Florina.

FRENCH ROUGE. Dr. Franklin, in one of his familiar letters, dated in 1767, said—"As soon as we left Abbeville, the swarthinness returned. I speak generally; for there are some fair women at Paris, who, I think, are not whitened by art. As to rouge, they don't pretend to imitate nature in laying it on. There is no gradual diminution of the colour, from the full bloom in the middle of the cheek to the faint tint near the sides, nor does it show itself differently in different faces. I have not had the honor of being at any lady's toilette to see how it is laid on, but I fancy I can tell you how it is or may be done. Cut a hole of three inches in diameter in a piece of paper; place it on the side of your face in such a manner as that the top of the hole may be just under the eye; then, with a brush dipped in the color, paint face and paper together; so when the paper is taken off, there will remain a round patch of red exactly the form of the hole. This is the mode, from the actresses on the stage upwards through all ranks of ladies, to the princesses of the blood."

THE TRAITOR ARNOLD. At the close of the revolutionary war, Arnold, the traitor, accompanied the royal army to England. The contempt that followed him through life, says an elegant writer, is illustrated by the speech of Lauderdale, who, perceiving Arnold on the right hand of the king and near his person, as he addressed his parliament, declared on his return to the commons, that however gracious the language he had heard from the throne, his indignation could not but be highly excited at beholding as he had done, his majesty supported by a traitor. And on another occasion, lord Surry, rising to speak in the house of commons, and perceiving Arnold in the gallery, sat down with precipitation, exclaiming, "I will not speak while that man," pointing to him "is in the house." This miserable out-cast died in London, June 13, 1801. COTTON SEED OIL. A correspondent of the New York Courier gives the following account of this oil: It is as limpid as water, I have seen it burn, and no one can discover a difference between it and the best hard winter strained oil; for machinery, it cannot but be superior to olive oil, being perfectly free from glutinous particles; as a paint oil it has properties beyond the common linseed, the oil cake is more nutritious for cattle than lused oil cake, and the sediment makes the best of printing ink.

SLAVES IN THE BRITISH WEST INDIES. From the Kingston (Jamaica) Courier. Let us just suppose that the omnipotence of parliament is to be brought into play, and that a bill will pass the imperial legislature, declaring our slaves free—how are its enactments to be carried into effect in the W. Indies? We would say the thing is impossible, and the effect might be most disastrous. The West India merchants, we are satisfied, would shut their stores, the planters their mill houses, and the business of the country would be at a stand, and the slaves themselves left, at a moment's warning, without the means of existence, and all this to gratify the feelings of a few fanatics in the mother country. It is not necessary for us to point out what would be the consequences of such measures. The West India merchants, whose property has been embarked in the soil, on the security of slaves, will be sacrificed, and English annuities will be involved in the general ruin. As we shall have no crops to ship, we shall not require, neither shall we be able to afford, the means of existence to the artisans of Birmingham, Sheffield, Manchester, or Glasgow. We shall require no supplies of osanburgha from Dundee, or pennistons from Halifax; and, in every view we can take of the case, we see nothing but ruin staring the mother country and colonists in the face; and woe be to the former when the British islands of the West India Archipelago, are severed from the parent state.

BRIEF NOTICES.

At the silver mine of Konigsberg, a wonderful gallery has been pierced through the side of the mountain at the depth of 600 feet, through which the ore is now transported, instead of being hoisted to the top. Its length is 6,000 feet, and it occupied 23 years in its completion. The process was most tedious, being entirely by calcination and hammering, which brought the rock off in flakes. Only two men could work at a time; it was commenced both internally and externally, and it is much to their credit that upon meeting there were only two or three feet difference in the level, and none in the direction. It is from six to seven feet wide, and from ten to fifteen high.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 31st May, inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The question concerning the renewal of the charter of the bank of England engages much attention. There were various rumors in circulation on the 31st of May, respecting the terms which have been agreed upon between the directors and the ministers. The Times gives the following outline as that which is entitled to the most attention:

1. A new charter for 10 years from the expiration of that now existing to be granted.
2. The old monopoly to continue, so far as regards the number of partners in private banks, which is not to exceed six, and joint stock banking companies, which are not allowed to be formed within 65 miles of London.
3. Bank of England notes to be declared a legal tender to any amount for the purpose of banking in the country, and gold only to be demanded for them either at the bank of England, or at the various branch establishments in the country.
4. A portion of the debt of the government to the bank amounting to £3,500,000, to be paid off.
5. The payment of the dividends and the management of the other public business to continue with the bank, but a deduction of £100,000 to be made from the remuneration at present assigned for that purpose.
6. Country bankers will be allowed to circulate bills of exchange, at present not permitted below £50, as low as £20, or, as some say, £10 only.
7. No legal rate of interest to be fixed on bills of exchange not having more than three months to run.
8. A communication is to take place weekly to the government on the state of the bank issues, the quantity of bullion, &c. which will be published in the Gazette once a quarter, or often as the government may see fit.

London, May 31. The house of commons yesterday, on motion of Mr. Stanley, went into committee of the whole, on the subject of colonial slavery, and at one o'clock rose. On the question of reporting progress, lord Althorp stated that the further debate of the subject must take its chance on the — for this day, after the discussion of the bank charter.

The Times, in reference to this debate, remarks—We cannot omit to state the chief modifications which Mr. Stanley has introduced into his original resolutions. We always objected, he it remembered, to that part of his project which imposed upon the negro the necessity of paying for his own emancipation by appropriating the fruits of the one-fourth part of his toils rescued from his master during his apprenticeship for that purpose. The planters were equally averse to defray the interest and redeem the principal of a sum of money which was intended to indemnify them for being deprived of their former control of their slaves. The right honorable gentleman and the government have yielded to the arguments employed in behalf of the planter and the negro, and now propose to relieve both from the burthen which the former condition of the loan would impose. Who, therefore, is to bear the loss, or to pay the interest and liquidate the debt? The country? No; or at least not the country from its present revenue, or from a revenue unconnected with the colonies. The government propose for meeting the interest of this loan, to raise the duties on sugar from 24 shillings, the present rate to 27 shillings, which they were before 1830. The country, indeed, will still bear the expense, though the revenue will be raised on colonial produce. The question comes to be, whether the additional duty may not, by decreasing the consumption of sugar, neutralize the benefit of the loan to the planter. Indeed, we do not see why a tax which the public is obliged to pay, should be laid particularly on colonial produce, because it is devoted to a colonial object, if that duty would otherwise be impolitic when levied for the general purposes of the empire. But in whatever manner the loan is to be paid, we never had the least hope that it would be redeemed by the planters, and we always felt a strong repugnance that it should be redeemed by the negro.

As a consequence of this change of plan, an important addition will be made to the relief to be administered to the "apprenticed laborer," and we think an important improvement will be made in the project. The laborer will now be enabled to devote his fourth of spare time to his own benefit, and, if so minded, may employ the money accumulated by his wages to shorten his term of apprenticeship.

The West India slave owners, and the mortgagees of the West India property, have mustered in great strength in London, to express their disapprobation of the ministerial scheme of slave emancipation.

We understand, (says the "Sun"), that a deputation of five persons from the West India interest, waited on Mr. Stanley a few days ago, and that the discussion between them and the secretary for the colonies was of rather a violent character. Mr. Stanley is reported to have said, that the government had come to their resolution deliberately, and would adhere to it firmly. If we are to believe the rumor now current, however, there is no intention of passing the details of the ministerial measure during the present session, although the government may insist on establishing the principle. We give this, however, only as the rumor of the day.

In our last paper we mentioned the result of the coroner's inquest in the case of Robert Culley, the police man, killed at the riot at Spitalfields—the jury, the reader will recollect, brought in a verdict of justifiable homicide. This verdict was carried by certiorari into the court of king's bench, and after a long argument was quashed. On the same subject, a meeting of the people has been held, approbating the conduct of the jury. At this meeting, Mr. O'Connell remarked, "that he was so unfortunate as to be able to number thirty-five years at the bar; and he should venture to say, (which he did without vanity), that in that time no man had had more experience in the criminal law than himself, and he could safely assert, that the verdict of the jury returned was the only one which an honest and conscientious jury could give on the evidence produced."

This case has produced a great deal of excitement.

The common council of London have voted a piece of plate, of the value of one hundred guineas, to each of the four medical officers attached to the London college of physicians, for their gratuitous services during the prevalence of the cholera in that capital last year.

Parliamentary returns have been just printed of the number of American and British ships entered inwards into the port of Liverpool from New York from the first of January, 1832, which present the following statement:—American ships 68, tonnage 35,403; British ships 23, tonnage 7,178. There were imported into Liverpool last year from the United States 682,038 bales of cotton, of which number 375,567 bales were imported in American, and 206,471 bales in British ships.

American stocks May 30. Pennsylvania 5 per cents. 1858, 107½; 5 per cent. 1860, 108½. Ohio 6 per cent. 1850, 114; Louisiana state loan, 105 a 105½; do. Barings, 99½. Mississippi 6 per cent. 106½; U. S. bank shares, £23 10s. a £23 15s.

A loan for the state of Alabama has recently been negotiated, to the amount of 3,500,000 dollars, bearing an interest at 5 per cent. from the 6th instant, a portion of which is about to be introduced into this market by Messrs. Thomas Wilson & Co. at the price of 96 per cent. One of the conditions of the contract is, that the loan shall not be paid off earlier than the year 1863. The price of 96 in London, at the present rate of exchange between the two countries, is equivalent to about 104 in New York, which forms, therefore, the real rate at which the loan is taken. The dividends will be made payable either in London or in New York, at the option of the holders of the stock. Besides Alabama, several other states of the American union, as New York, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, Mississippi, Ohio and Virginia, have separate debts, and so far as the prices are any criterion which the shares of them bear in this country, they all enjoy a considerable share of credit.

Tithes. Letter to the editor of the Wexford (Ireland) Independent.

"Facts have come to our knowledge, which convince us that government will proceed immediately for the recovery of the tithes of 1831 in this country, and also, where practicable, in behalf of the parsons, for those of last year, (1832).

"In our county the crusade is continued without the slightest abatement, more especially in the remote districts, and the agents of the parsons, with their subordinates of high and low degree, are reaping a plentiful harvest in the shape of law costs, from the unfortunate beings subject to their unholy sway. The subjoined letter of a correspondent, residing at Tallow, in the west of the county of Waterford, will give a tolerable idea of affairs in that quarter:

"To the editor of the Waterford Chronicle:

"DEAR SIR—I am sorry to inform you that the persecution of the poor people, under the tithe system, all through the country, is truly deplorable, and if not put a stop to, there is no answering for the result. I will give you an instance that occurred here on Friday last. About 30 or 40 of the neighboring parishioners of Conna came to Mr. Conway's, agent to Mr. Devereux, of Stradballagh, and tendered him their tithes; but that gentleman refused to take the money unless he got two pounds costs from each, although the poor people were satisfied to go before a magistrate and make oath that they were never served with any order of law, directly or indirectly, either by attorney's letter or otherwise. I understood Mr. Devereux is a very humane man; perhaps, through the medium of your excellent journal this may meet his eye, and be the cause of putting a stop to such a system of oppression. I am, sir, with great respect, VERITAS."

Tallow, May 19.

Yet Ireland, generally, is much more quiet than it has been for a long time—and it would seem that there is a growing disposition to relieve the oppressions of the people.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser. A great meeting was held on Monday, the 27th of May, at the city of London tavern, by persons interested in the West India colonies, to take into consideration the subject of negro emancipation, over which the earl of Harewood presided.

On assuming the chair, the noble earl alluded to his own situation as a West India proprietor, and said they were met to endeavor to save their property from spoliation and confiscation. He complained of the proposed law as being worse than a mere deprivation of the property they now possessed, and as being calculated to compel them to incur unproductive expense for twelve years to come. He contended that the clamor against slavery was factitious, and that the petitions were manufactured by a well organized agency in London, and sent down to the country for signatures, and in that manner found their way into parliament. He entered into detailed objections to the proposed measures.

Lord Combermere thought that if the proposed measure were allowed to pass by the government, it would inflict evils on the slaves, and ruin upon thousands, both in the colonies and in England.

Admiral Martyn said he was not a West India proprietor, but deplored the effect which the ministerial plan would have in diminishing the revenue and injuring the manufactures of Great Britain. He believed it would involve the loss of the colonies, and that would involve the loss of the navy.

Similar views of the subject were expressed by Mr. G. F. Young, M. P. Lord Colville, Mr. Fitzgerald, M. P. Mr. Harman, sir Charles Price, sir M. S. Stewart, M. P. Mr. Bliss, earl St. Vincent, Mr. Malcolm, Mr. Irving, Mr. Colville, Mr. J. H. Palmer, Mr. Lewis, lord W. Poutlet and Mr. G. Hibbert. The latter gentleman said that the measure, if carried, would inflict a death blow upon the colonial, commercial, naval and financial interests of the country. He was satisfied that if an request could be held upon the colonies by lords Vincent, Nelson, Gardiner, and other distinguished officers whom he had well known, the verdict would be, that the body came to its death by suicide during an interval of mental derangement. (Cheers and laughter.)

Eight resolutions were passed by the meeting in the course of its proceedings, strongly expressive of their conviction of the ruinous consequences, both to Great Britain and the colonies, that would result from adopting the plan which the ministers had proposed.

FRANCE.

Marshal Soult has developed his plan for the reduction of the effective force of the French army, with a reserve. The effective force is to be fixed at 310,000 men, which, added to the reserve of 300,000, and the mobilised national guards, 273,000, will amount to a total of 883,000 men available in case of war.

The ministers seem to have only a slim majority in the chamber of deputies.

There was a report of a great riot among the colliers at Valenciennes—5,000 of whom had assembled and committed many excesses. A large body of troops had marched to restore order.

Embargo on Dutch vessels taken off.

At the court at St. James's, the 20th day of May, 1833, present, the king's most excellent majesty in council—It is this day ordered by his majesty in council, that his majesty's order in council of the 6th of November last, directing that no ships or vessels belonging to any of his majesty's subjects be permitted to clear out for any of the ports within the dominions of the king of the Netherlands until further orders; and that an embargo be laid upon all ships and vessels belonging to the subjects of the king of the Netherlands which then were, or which should thereafter come into any of the ports, harbors or roads within any part of his majesty's dominions; and that the commanders of his majesty's ships of war should detain and bring into port all merchant ships and vessels bearing the flag of the Netherlands, be revoked, and the same is hereby revoked accordingly; and it is hereby further ordered, that the said embargo be taken off, and that all such ships and vessels be permitted to depart with their cargoes to their respective ports of destination; and the right hon. the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury, the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and the lord warden of the Cinque Ports, are to give the necessary directions therein as to them may respectively appertain.

Their majesties the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the king of the French, and the king of the Netherlands, grand duke of Luxemburg, being desirous of re-establishing the relations between them as they existed before the month of November, 1832, have for that purpose resolved to conclude a convention, and have named as their plenipotentiaries, viz:

Art. 4. Immediately after the exchange of ratifications of the present convention, the navigation of the Meuse shall be open to commerce; and until a definitive arrangement shall be made in this respect, it shall be subjected to the provisions of the convention signed at Mentz the 31st of March, 1831, for the navigation of the Rhine, so far as those provisions may be applicable to the said river.

The communications between the fortress of Mästricht and the frontier of North Brabant, and between the said fortress and Germany, shall be free and without impediment.

Art. 5. The high contracting parties engage to occupy themselves, without delay, about the definitive treaty which is to fix the relations between the states of his majesty the king of the Netherlands, grand duke of Luxemburg, and Belgium. They will invite the courts of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, to become parties thereto.

Art. 6. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at London in ten days, or sooner if possible.

In witness thereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed their names, and affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the stipulation relative to the complete cessation of hostilities, contained in article 3 of the convention of this day, comprehends the grand duchy of Luxemburg, and that part of Limburg which is provisionally occupied by the Belgian troops. It is moreover understood that until the conclusion of the definitive treaty, of which mention is made in the said article 3 of the convention of this day, the navigation of the Scheldt shall take place on the same footing as before the first of November, 1832.

The present explanatory article shall have the same force and validity as if it were inserted word for word in the convention of this day. It shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged at the same time as those of the said convention.

In witness thereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Very serious disturbances have happened at Antwerp. The office and press of the Journal du Commerce have been destroyed by the populace, and the houses of other persons were attacked. The cause of these things is not distinctly stated.

SPAIN.

Reply of Don Carlos to the king's invitation to swear allegiance to his daughter at the approaching cortes.

My well-beloved brother, &c.—This morning, at ten o'clock, Plazaola came to me to say that your minister at this court, Cordova, had requested to know when it would be convenient for me to receive a communication of a royal order. He was answered that twelve would be a fitting time for such a purpose. He returned a few minutes before one, and I immediately saw him. He presented me with an official paper which I read, and having done so, I said that my dignity and my character would not permit me to delay in stating that you were my king and my lord, and besides my brother, and always my much loved brother, further endeared by having shared in all your misfortunes.

You wish to know whether I intend, yes or no, to swear to your daughter, as princess of Asturias. Now, as far as wishes go, you will believe me, because you know me, when I say, that with all my heart would I take that oath, and that nothing would give me greater pleasure than to be the first to recognize your daughter, and to spare you any offence or possible inconvenience which my declining to do so might occasion. But my conscience and my honor do not permit it; I possess rights so legitimate, that I could not divest myself of them—rights which God gave me when it was his pleasure that I entered upon existence, and which God alone can take away, by transferring them to a male child of yours, which I desire so much, it may be even more than yourself do. Moreover, in this I am defending the justice of the rights of all those who are called after me, and therefore I feel myself called upon to transmit to you the subjoined declaration, which I have made with the greatest formality, and addressed to all the sovereigns, to whom I hope you will communicate it.

Adieu, my well-beloved brother, and be assured that your welfare will always be the first object of the prayers of your affectionate brother,

CARLOS.

Declaration.

"I, Carlos Marias Isidoro de Borbon y Borbon, Infante of Spain, convinced of the legitimate rights which I possess to the crown of Spain, and assured that your majesty has no heir male to the same, do say, that neither my conscience nor my honor permit me to swear to, or recognize, any other than those rights, and this I solemnly declare. To the senior our king, his affectionate brother and faithful vassal,

"THE INFANTE DON CARLOS DE BORBON Y BORBON.

"In the palace of Ramaha, the 20th of April, 1833."

POLAND.

A Berlin article of May 14, says—"It seems that new fears are entertained respecting the maintenance of tranquillity in Poland. The Russian government has received information from Paris, that a conspiracy has been formed to make a fresh attempt at revolutionizing that country. It is even said that letters have been intercepted, in which a plot has been discovered against the life of the emperor Nicholas. This last report wants confirmation. The emperor Nicholas has postponed his journey abroad, because the affairs of the east require his presence at St. Petersburg.

PORTUGAL.

Pedro seems to be on a good understanding with admiral Sartorius, and his naval force, generally—the wages of the sailors being nearly all paid. He had also received several parties of soldiers from France and England. His affairs are more promising of success than heretofore. Those of Miguel seem to be rapidly approaching a crisis.

Accounts from Paris mention that the ambassador of Don Pedro had an audience of M. Broglie, and it was reported that a loan of ten millions of francs were to be loaned to Don Pedro. The troops at Oporto had become very anxious for battle. They are much annoyed by Miguel's batteries, and some of them, as well as of the inhabitants, killed. The fire was very heavy of shot and shells, and many houses were much injured.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

The sultan has submitted to all the demands of Mehemet Ali, and his son, in the following order. The manner of it is laughable; but the "brother of the sun and moon" is not to be understood as granting any thing, except in his own good pleasure:

Order addressed to the viziers, mirimirs, mollahs, cadis, naibs, muellims, vaivodes, ayams, notables and other functionaries of the different parts of Anatolia.

"The assurance of fidelity and devotedness given me at length by the governor of Egypt, Mehemet Ali pacha, and his son, Ibrahim, having been acceptable to me, I have granted them my imperial benevolence. The governments of Crete and Egypt have been confirmed to Mehemet Ali, and in compliance with his earnest desire, I have granted to him the departments of Damascus, Tripoli, Syria, Seyde, Safed and Aleppo, the district of Jerusalem and Naploose, with the conducting of the pilgrims, and the command of Djidda. His son, Ibrahim Pacha, has acquired a new title to the Cheik al-Haram in Mecca and the district of Djidda; I have also acquiesced in his demand of the department of Adana, with the title of moshir. Following the equity, humanity and clemency with which God has endowed me, I order all persons in authority in the different parts of Anatolia to refrain from pursuing the notables and inhabitants, and to bury all past events in oblivion. You, on your part, will announce my generous intentions to all who are in authority under you; you will endeavor to assure the public mind on this subject, and you will endeavor to obtain prayers in favor of my august person from the people, whose welfare God has entrusted to my hands. It is in order to make you acquainted with these things that I have issued the present firman, in conformity with my hattî sherîf. You will, therefore, make known my sovereign will to all whom it may concern, and you will obtain their prayers in my favor. Be careful that you comply with it without molesting any person whomsoever, contrary to my supreme desires."

By the preceding cession, the satrap of Egypt is now a more potent monarch than the head of the faithful, who grants him his pardon, and promises him his clemency. He possesses not only the dominions whose resources have enabled him to extend his power, but the whole of Crete, which had been before granted him, and the Holy Land, together with the country and the ports of the Levant, from the limits of Asia Minor to the mouth of the Nile. He has thus obtained sea ports for his navy, a great accession of contiguous territory and population necessary for his permanent security, and a natural boundary, easily defended against foreign aggression.

There is a formidable insurrection in Bosnia.

The Russian fleet remains in the Bosphorus, and the Russian troops at Constantinople. The Porte may have some trouble in getting them away.

WEST INDIES.

The following is a memorial of the planters of Jamaica. The words used are lofty:

"We claim from the general government, security from future interference with our slaves, either by orders in council, or any other mode not recognized by our laws.

"We claim that sectarian missionaries shall be left to the operation of those laws, which govern the other subjects of his majesty; and if those laws are insufficient to protect us from renewed insurrections, excited through their machinations, we be permitted to amend them.

"We ask for such alterations in the revenue acts as shall revive our prosperity, by restoring to the colonies some part of the income of their estates, which has now, and has long been, altogether swallowed up by the exactions of the mother country.

"If these reasonable demands are rejected, we call upon government to give us, without further hesitation or delay, an equitable compensation for these interests, which it had thought expedient to sacrifice for the supposed good of the empire.

"Should compensation also be refused, we finally and limbly require that the island of Jamaica be separated from the parent country, and that being absolved from her allegiance to the British crown, she be free either to assume independence, or to unite herself to some state by whom she will be cherished and protected, and not insulted and plundered."

From St. Vincent. A report having been circulated among the slaves of this island that they would be emancipated on the arrival of the vice governor—and that event having taken place without the expected result—alarming symptoms of insubordination had discovered themselves on two or three of the estates in the windward part of the island. The lieutenant governor had issued his proclamation, dispelling the delusion, and enjoining a strict and cheerful obedience to their masters.

LAW CASES.

Drift notices of decisions.

A case of considerable importance was tried in the circuit court of the United States, held in Raleigh, some time in the course of last week, justices Marshall and Potter presiding. The plaintiffs in the case claimed title under a grant from the state of North Carolina to William Catheart, for 50,000 acres of land, bearing date in July, 1786, founded upon entries in the entry taker's office, of Buncombe county, in 1786. The principle point involved was, whether the line known as Pickens' line, ascertained and marked in 1797, was the true boundary between the state of North Carolina and the Cherokee territory, as prescribed by the treaty of Holston in 1791, and confirmed by the treaty of Tellico in 1798. The land in dispute forms Buncombe county. It was contended by the plaintiffs that the Pickens line was erroneous; that the surveyor should have stopped at the 35th degree of north latitude, which is the boundary of North Carolina, according to the declaration of rights, and is about twelve miles south of the reputed boundary of the state, and that, in fact, the true boundary line required by the treaty of Holston had never been run. The jury were instructed by the court that the reputed boundary of the state (if such boundary existed, which was a matter of fact for their investigation) was to be regarded, and not the parallel of latitude. The jury found for the defendant, and it is supposed that the case will be taken by writ of error to the supreme court of the United States.

In the district court of the United States, now sitting, a suit has just been tried, brought by the United States against John Heiber-tadt, for removing an empty cask having the custom house marks and numbers upon it, before the same had been obliterated. The jury found a verdict that the defendant did remove the cask before the marks were effaced. A point of law was asserted on his part, that the removal contemplated, was that by persons who sold or disposed of such casks, not those who purchased them. This point, we presume, will receive the formal decision of the court. It is certainly of great importance to the community, that the custom of using these empty casks, before the marks have been erased, should be put a stop to, and such we believe will be the effect of this verdict. The penalty is one hundred dollars for the removal of each cask.

[Philadelphia Gazette.

Important trial. A gentleman just arrived from Bangor (Me.) has given us the particulars of a case of recent occurrence there, which is said to have excited considerable sensation. An unlicensed grog dealer, named Treadwell, keeping a shop at what is called the Point, with the assistance of an understrapper, named Woodward, undertook, on Tuesday last, to furnish an Irishman with as much wine as he could drink for twenty-five cents. The Irishman drank a pint of stuff which was drawn for him as "port wine," and walked off. In about half an hour he returned and drank two pints more. The result was death. Woodward was apprehended, on complaint of the coroner, who held an inquest over the body. On Friday last he was examined, and required to recognize in the sum of $550, for his appearance at the next (June) term of the supreme judicial court for trial, on the charge of manslaughter. CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. From the Frankfort (Ky.) Commonwealth. United States vs. Jones. The jury found the prisoner guilty of the charge alleged against him, of robbing the mail. On Friday (the 15th June) the criminal was brought into court, and the sentence of the law pronounced upon him by his honor judge McLean. He was sentenced to twelve years imprisonment in the penitentiary of this state. After the sentence was pronounced, the prisoner requested the liberty of making a statement of the truth of the case, in which he was indulged by the court. He then, in a very solemn and emphatic manner, denied having made use of any improper means to obtain possession of the checks, and asserted that he knew witnesses who could have testified to material facts tending to establish his innocence, but which witnesses, he believed, were induced to absent themselves by the machinations of his enemies. He spoke of being the victim of a gang of cut-throats, horse thieves and counterfeiters, who had combined against him, because he had endeavored to run them out of the country. The court informed him that all these matters were subjects for the consideration of the president upon an application for pardon, but were not suitable upon the present occasion. The prisoner in conclusion said, that he "hoped God might never soften the heart of the president, to grant him a pardon, if what he said was not true." He was excessively agitated—he groaned audibly, and wept most bitterly. Jones is a small man, with light blue eyes and remarkably bushy hair—his appearance is an uncommon one. At the time of his arrest he was a member elect to the legislature of this state, but resigned his office upon his indictment. He is a married man with a small family.

There are no public alarm bells for fires in Boston, and resort is hence had to the church bells. Recently a fire broke out during the hours of divine service, and a fireman ascended the tower of King's chapel, corner of School and Tremont streets, and commenced ringing the mighty bell of that church. The sexton, by order of the vestry men, forcibly prevented further ringing, and a suit was brought against the sexton for assault and battery, with a view of testing the question of right—"Judge Whitman ruled that, although the bells were private property, the members of the department and citizens have a right to ring them in case of necessity, that is when a building was actually on fire; and consequently, as vindictive damages were disclaimed by the prosecutor, he fined the defendant 50 cents and costs." Counsel for the defendant, C. P. Curtis, esq. for the prosecution, John C. Park, esq.

From the Montreal Vindicator of June 28. A most extraordinary case came before the court of king's bench of this district, on Saturday last, the nature of which the following details will give some idea:

A young lady from Upper Canada, of the name of McMillan, about 16 years of age, was brought before the court on a writ of habeas corpus, at the instance of a man of the name of Kennedy. It appeared in testimony before the court, that this young man resided for a couple of years with the step-father of the young lady in the capacity of clerk. That having had, in consequence, frequent opportunities of seeing and conversing with her, he persuaded her, for certain reasons, to elope with him. They escaped through a window from the second story of the house, by means of a ladder, during the night; and having embarked in a canoe, gained the opposite or American side of the St. Lawrence, and were married at Messina, by a magistrate.

In the mean time, the family having discovered their flight, the step-father and one of the uncles of the young lady followed the fugitives, whom they overtook about nine o'clock in the morning, two hours after the marriage ceremony had been performed. The young lady appeared very much affected, and seemed very glad to be rejoined by her friends, with whom she consented to return, when asked so to do, having declared that Romeo Kennedy had deceived her. Some time afterwards she was placed by her father at her own request, in one of the nurseries of this city. Kennedy discovered her retreat, and by a writ of habeas corpus, had the young lady brought before the court. The judge having heard the parties by their attorneys, and read the several affidavits on both sides, decided, that as Miss McMillan was not detained against her will, the writ of habeas corpus did not apply to her case—especially as she was at liberty to leave the convent when she pleased, and as she declared in her own affidavit before the court, that she was desirous not to be restored to Kennedy. The writ was discharged accordingly.

Miss McMillan belongs to a most respectable family, and the question excited a great deal of interest.

SUPREME COURT. Reported for the New York Commercial Advertiser. Alvah Beebe vs. Charles M. Livingston. This was an action of false imprisonment, for the arrest of the plaintiff under the warrant issued by the defendant as speaker of the house of assembly, in pursuance of a resolution of the house, for an alleged contempt in writing a letter to one of the members, which it was adjudged amounted to an offer to bribe by the promise of stock in a pending bank application, &c. The defendant pleaded specially a justification under the resolution and warrant, to which the plaintiff demurred. The demurrer was brought on to argument, at the present July term, at Utica, and was argued by Mr. John A. Collier, counsel for plaintiff, and the attorney general, Mr. G. C. Branson, for defendant. The plaintiff's counsel contended, among other things, that an attempt to bribe being an "infamous crime," within the statute definition, was not punishable in this summary mode, but that plaintiff was entitled to a trial by jury—and also that the plea was defective in not averring that the warrant issued upon oath—this fact appearing only in the recital of the resolution, which was set forth in hac verba—but the court gave judgment for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiff to withdraw the demurrer of reply on payment of costs.

OLIVER WOLCOTT.

From the New York American.

Died, in the city of New York, on Saturday evening, June 1, Oliver Wolcott, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. The name of Oliver Wolcott, signed by the father of him whose death we now commemorate, to the Declaration of Independence, is associated in our historical annals with nought but illustrious deeds. The signer of the Declaration of Independence, and who was afterwards made a brigadier general on the field of battle at Saratoga—and subsequently to the peace was long governor of Connecticut—had in him who has now gone to join the heroic band of the revolution, a worthy son. While yet a boy, he marched as a volunteer in the hastily mustered forces that repelled the British marauders, who, during the revolutionary war, attacked Danbury, in Connecticut, and burnt Norwalk. His mother, with Spartan heroism, buckled on his knapsack, and placed the musket in his hands. His whole subsequent life proved that the virtues and patriotism of such parents were not degenerate in him. Educated for the bar, he had hardly entered upon his career, when the discerning eye of Washington selected him for comptroller of the treasury; in which office he remained till Alexander Hamilton retired from the post of secretary of the treasury, when the same unerring judgment promoted the comptroller to the head of the department, and made him secretary. This office Mr. Wolcott filled with unquestioned ability and integrity, during the residue of gen. Washington's administration, and the whole term of that of John Adams. He was one of the circuit judges appointed by Mr. Adams, under the judiciary act passed at the close of his administration, but which, ere it had well gone into effect, was repealed under Mr. Jefferson. Thus thrown out of public life, at the early age of forty, Mr. Wolcott removed to this city in 1800, and commenced business as a merchant. He was soon at the head of a flourishing house in the China trade, and was president of the Merchants' bank, and subsequently of the bank of America. On the breaking out of the war with Great Britain in 1812, he closed his mercantile concerns, and, under the full conviction that the war was both just and politic, gave the whole support of his name, and means, and talents, to the administration—differing therein from the political friends with whom he had always before acted. After the close of the war, Mr. Wolcott returned to his native village of Litchfield, in Connecticut, occupying himself in the quiet cultivation of a farm, and the society of his books. He was soon called by the voice of his fellow citizens to preside over the state—as his father for many years had done before—and for ten successive elections he was chosen governor of Connecticut.

At the close of this period he removed to this city, to be in the vicinity of his children, who were settled here; and, living in great retirement and privacy, he has here breathed his last. The character of Mr. Wolcott was strongly marked. Stern, inflexible and devoted, in all that duty, honor and patriotism enjoined, he was in private life of the utmost gentleness, kindness and simplicity. With strong original powers, which the stirring events of the revolutionary days in which he was born early developed, he had acquired a habit of self reliance, which little fitted him for that sort of political co-operation which results from expedience, rather than right. He aimed at the right always, and at all events, according to his best convictions; and if any questioned his judgment, none could impeach his honesty and sincerity.

THE LATE COLONEL NICHOLAS FISH.

New York, June 20. At the commencement of the revolution, col. Fish was aid-de-camp to brig. gen. John Morin Scott, and he and his corps went into service as "six months' men." On the 21st November, 1776, he was appointed by congress major of the second New York regiment of the continental army, commanded by colonel (afterwards general) Pierre Van Cortlandt, and served with that rank during the revolutionary war, and was at its close, by a resolution of congress, commissioned as lieutenant colonel. He was in the battles of 19th September and 7th October, 1777, at Bemis' Heights, in New York, which preceded the surrender of general Burgoyne's army, on the 17th day of October, of the same year. Early in 1778, he was appointed by general Washington a division inspector of the army under general the baron Steuben, and in the 28th June, 1778, colonel Fish commanded a corps of light infantry in the celebrated battle of Monmouth, New Jersey. In 1779 his regiment and himself were in Sullivan's expedition against the Six Nations of Indians, in which, after enduring every privation, they succeeded in destroying the Indian power. In 1780 he was attached to a corps of light infantry under the command of gen. Lafayette. In 1781 he went with his regiment into Virginia, and took a very active part in the battles which eventuated in the surrender of the British army commanded by lord Cornwallis, on the 19th of October, in that year. He was major of the corps of infantry commanded by colonel (afterwards general) Hamilton, which so gallantly stormed one of the British redoubts at Yorktown. In 1782 colonel Fish was with the main army under general Washington, at Verplanck's Point, in New York, and continued there, at West Point, and at the cantonment at Newburg, until the close of the revolutionary war. Col. Fish's character in the army was that of an excellent disciplinarian and a very gallant soldier; and he possessed in a very high degree the confidence of Washington, Lafayette and Hamilton. After the peace, col. Fish was for a number of years adjutant general of this state; and such was the activity of his mind and his habits of business, that he continued almost to the close of his useful life to hold civil employment.

"THE CELESTIAL EMPIRE."

From the Canton Register of Jan. 24, 1833.

The following order was issued in consequence of a cruise made some time last year by the British ship Lord Amherst along the eastern coast of China, for the purposes of trade and discovery:

VOYAGES UP THE COAST.

In the Peking Gazette, for September 5th and 6th, 1832, there is a paragraph from the emperor, in reply to Taou-shoo, the governor of Keang-nan, concerning the Lord Amherst.

It states, that, on the 12th day of the 6th moon, the English ship was delivered over to Lieutenant-general Kwanteen-fel, to see that she left the jurisdiction of Keang-nan, and was compelled to go southward; whereas, eight days after, she was found at Shan-tung. On this occurring, the emperor expressed his displeasure, and required from the governor an explanation. The explanation was not satisfactory, and the governor, the general, and a third officer are subjected to a court of inquiry.

The governor says, "that if any such ships should make their appearance, and anchor within his jurisdiction, he will send special officers to search them, and see whether they have prohibited goods or not; and if they have, he will drive them away; and if they refuse to obey, he'll punish them." The emperor replies—"this view of the case is utterly erroneous. Foreign ships are neither allowed to anchor, nor to sell any goods there. They are restricted to the port of Canton. If any ships make their appearance and solicit leave to trade, talented officers must be sent to proclaim to them the orders of government and require their implicit submission. They must not go to other provinces and anchor, and endeavor to sell goods. All the officers on the coast, civil and military, great and small, must watch and drive away southward, from province to province, every foreign ship; and they must be handed over by the imperial ships of one province to those of another—so that no excuses be afterwards made. If this be not effected, or any other mischief arise, the governor alone shall be held responsible. Let him ask himself how he will be able to sustain the weight of the guilt which he will incur! He mismanaged in the first instance, and now he boasts great things about what he will do hereafter. Let him, in every thing, act according to right reason. Not put on the airs of great perspicacity, and, after all, fail in doing the thing that is right."

Moreover, in managing outside barbarians, he must be careful to adhere to old regulations; and manifest at all times a stern gravity: never affording any pretext for commencing bloody affairs. It is very wrong in assuming all at once a spirit of swelling self sufficiency; and disregarding, at the same time, the dignity of government. He sustains an office in which the territory is committed to his care—is it becoming in him to act and speak in the way he has done!

"His majesty commands that these thoughts be fully explained to the governor, Taou-shoo, and his colleague Tintsh-seu. Respect this!"

SOUTH AMERICAN DEBTS.

Much has been said of late about the debt owing by the new Spanish American states to this country, and of the immense importance of receiving the whole, or even a part of that debt; but the public at large, perhaps even the creditors themselves, are very little aware of its vast extent. Subjoined is a statement of the whole amount, together with the arrears of interest, by which it will be seen that they actually exceed £22,000,000 sterling!

Statement showing the amount of bonds negotiated in London for account of the new Spanish American states, and upon which the dividends are now in arrear.

	Interest.	Amount.	Annual interest.	Amount of arrears.
Colombia	6 per cent.	£2,000,000	£120,000	£840,000
Ditto	6 "	4,650,000	279,000	19,53,000

Buenos Ayres	6 "	1,000,000	60,000	360,000

		£17,497,000		principal.
		4,597,000		arrears.
Total		£22,094,000

We are indebted for the above to a commercial friend, well acquainted with the subject, together with another calculation, which it is not necessary to give at length, showing the rates at which the respective loans were raised, and the depressed prices which, including the accumulation of interest, they at present bear in this market. The average rate was 82 per cent, and the sum drawn from the subscribers about £13,000,000; the current market prices average about 92 per cent, and the value, if converted into money at the existing rate, £3,380,000, constituting a loss of near £10,000,000 without computing the arrears of interest, which amounts to £4,597,000 more, which brings up the total loss to England by these ill-fated contracts to between £14,000,000 and £15,000,000 sterling. What aggravates the calamity is, perhaps, that these states all possess, more or less, the ability to pay, but want the honesty and good faith to make even an approach to the fulfilment of engagements by which they were enabled to shake off the yoke of Spain, and achieve their independence. The contrast with the conduct pursued by English America, (the United States), in a state of things nearly similar, is too striking not to be placed in juxtaposition with the above. Their securities during the struggle were as low in their price, and apparently in a state as hopeless, as those of Spanish America are now. One of their first measures, on attaining independence, was to classify the whole of the debt, and provide for the regular payment of the interest; it gradually became one of the most approved and secure investments, even for European capital, and will be, in the course of the present year, faithfully discharged in full to the last dollar. [London Times.]

THE CHINESE MULBERRY TREE.

From the New York Advertiser and Advocate.

"PALMAM QUI MERUIT FERAT."

GENTLEMEN: There is not a production in nature, after wheat, more precious than that which can afford what is incessantly wasted or wanted. While the past or approaching spring season only enriches mankind with abundant crops of food, a succession of crops of silk cannot be obtained by any known sort of mulberry tree, white, black, Italian or Calabrian; but it can, by the Chinese moras multicaulis, be repeatedly cultivated and distributed throughout in this part of the new world.

The leaves of the Chinese mulberry tree are very large, measuring from 10 to 12 inches in length and breadth, but always so delicate that they can afford a tender pulp to any young hatched race of the laboring silk fabricator, and leaving, of the food offered, nothing but an admirable lace work of the remaining slender fabrics, which the insect could not turn into silk or food.

The leaves of the Chinese mulberry tree look like pieces of silk, or pocket handkerchiefs, which might have been suspended on it for drying, or other purposes.

It was in the year 1828, that, as a member of the Linnean society of France, and constituted their president in the department of the new world, I heard of the discovery made of the Chinese mulberry tree, to which no one could before have an access in that country; but the same production was plentiful and flourishing in one of the Philippine islands, in which Chinese refugees, exiles, &c. have been allowed to settle, and revive all the goods, produce and industry of their country, and which Mr. Perrotet was directed to explore, and also any other land of the southern ocean, from which useful seeds and plants could be obtained. The voyage of Mons. Perrotet lasted nearly three years, and enriched his country with not less than 158 species of trees, 8 feet high, and with 534 individuals, besides two chests he took of palm seeds in full vegetation. He had indeed explored the seas of India, and then he came to those of South America. There had never been so vast an importation of rare genera of plants, seeds and trees as that of M. Perrotet, and among them was the ancient mulberry tree, to which he affixed the proper name of moras multicaulis, because it produces many shoots from the roots.

I now must mention that I had the first opportunity of receiving from Paris, and from my colleague, Mons. Perrotet, three rooted trees of the Chinese multicaulis, which I was permitted by the vestry of the French church, of which I have had long the honor to be a curator, to plant and cultivate in their burying ground; and which I delivered to the practical care of an intelligent horticulturist, Mr. Daniel Kane, who best could immediately propagate them.

1. The first tree I presented to the Horticultural society of New York, and placed it under the care of Mr. Floyd, an eminent culturist, and member of the same society.

2. The second tree I presented to Dr. Hosack, who, being the proprietor of a splendid garden in the centre of the state of New York, could better propagate the Chinese mulberry tree.

3. The third tree I had reserved for the Hamilton City Agricultural society, in the state of Ohio, of which I have also the pleasure to be an honorary member. This, in spite of the care of myself, and my correspondent and colleague, D. C. Wallace, esq. failed in its long voyage through the ocean and the Mississippi. I replaced it, however, by a sound rooted layer, for which I have received acknowledgment, and, I hope, merited thanks.

4. The last distribution for the Jefferson County New York Agricultural society, which is under the guardianship of Mons. Le Roy de Chamont, its president, an ancient landholder in that county. This also failed, but I replaced it by another, which has been acknowledged with kind and honorable thanks.

All the above distributions having been accomplished, I thought it was my duty to reward Dr. Kane for his labors and practical attention to the plant or tree I had first imported, and left the whole of it to him, on the only condition that he would supply me with one layer, if it was called for. He has since fulfilled his promise.

By this time I was informed that Mr. Parmentier of Brooklyn, a very intelligent horticulturist, had made a great importation of the Chinese mulberry tree, and that he was extensively cultivating the same. His success, as well as that of his widow, merit attention and praise—the more so, that they had daily labored to perform their part, and to prove their zeal by the extensive sale of the Chinese mulberry tree, which to our knowledge has been made to succeed by that establishment. At last, and in the year 1831, Mr. Richard K. Haight, of this city, applied to me to procure for him such recommendations as would enable him to make in Paris a great purchase of the moras multicaulis, for which he assured me he had already appropriated 500 acres of land. With this request I was very happy to comply—gave him several letters; to none of which I never received any answer. This final explanation I think myself authorised to give, in consequence of his late announcement in the Mercantile and Advocate to the public of his large importation of the Chinese mulberry tree, although I remain thankful for the compliment he at last paid me in the same paper.

CAPABILITY OF MACHINERY IN MANUFACTURES.

From the London Mercantile Journal.

In our remarks last week on open trade with one HUNDRED MILLIONS IN INDIA, AND THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLIONS IN CHINA, we observed that our manufactures were capable of being increased to any extent; that extent is certainly not infinite—it is however, indefinite—and to an indefinite extent our manufactures might be multiplied by machinery. In the single but important article of cotton, one man can now produce two hundred times more goods in a week than he could in 1760, when George the third ascended the throne. One mill, in Manchester can, when all the spindles are at work, spin as much cotton thread in a week as would go round the world. In the manufacture of hosiery, which is seated chiefly in the midland counties of Nottingham, Derby and Leicester, machinery has reduced stockings one hundred per cent. compared with what they were twenty years ago. Owing to machinery, lace, which was 2s. per yard eight years ago, may now be bought for 4d. what was £4 10s. per yard twenty years ago, is now 18s. and some kinds may be bought as low as one farthing per yard! Woollens have experienced less reduction in price than any other kind of wearing apparel. At a paper manufactory in Hertfordshire, a quantity of pulp can, at a distance of twenty-seven feet from the cistern in which it lies, be converted in three minutes by machinery, into a sheet of paper, ready to be written upon! Such is the continual advancement made in the Manchester manufactures by machinery, that the trade say, if a manufacturer were to leave manufacturing for a few years, he would be quite lost upon returning to it again. Rail roads are machinery, and their adoption and extension will tell upon the price of manufactured goods. Although the improvements in machinery during the last thirty years have been so wonderful, as to unite the realities of truth with more than the wonders of fiction, yet who will be so bold as to say that we are at the very top of the hill of advancement in mechanism? It was stated in evidence before a parliamentary committee, at the conclusion of the late calamitous and ruinous war, to the astonishment of the committee, that during the war, machinery equal to the power of sixteen millions of men, had been set to work in this country! and, if a market could be found for all that machinery is able to produce, it could soon be doubled. Now, owing to the increase of the population, particularly of the laboring classes, and the want of markets, machinery is in bonds, and the mechanic stands with one hand tied behind him, while the starving and misguided operative is ready with both hands to demolish his valuable inventions. What we want now is open trade to India, then will the green vitices, wherewith the Samson of machinery is bound, be broke asunder, and the steam engine and spinning jenny, to which England owes more than all her generals, admirals and statesmen will increase that debt, by securing the valuable natural productions of the east in exchange for her incomparable productions of art and science.

—A few weeks ago we had a reference to the preceding article, as a most splendid scheme, provided only, machine power shall be kept out of use in the East Indies, and the Chinese are persuaded to exchange their "NATURAL PRODUCTIONS," for English "productions of art and science."

The chief part of the machines mentioned in the preceding, we also have in the United States, or can easily obtain, when prepared to use them. Rail roads are well called "machinery," and so are canals—and whatever else reduces the amount of animal labor required to perform any particular thing; and it is because of the extent of her machinery, that England, while her average rate of wages paid for [male] labor is not less than 8 or 10 dollars per month, (though that is, indeed, low enough), is able to compete with the labor of the East Indies, though wages in that country hardly average two dollars per month—the people, in both cases, subsisting themselves. And hence it is that England wishes to have a "free trade" for the products of her machines, but will not make liberal exchanges with other nations in "natural productions," the result of manual labor—because of the real or supposed necessity imposed of protecting her own. And foreign bread and meat, and fish and fuel, the primary necessities of life, are excluded, that British grain growers and graziers, fishermen and miners, may exist.

An "open trade" to the British East Indies may be forced—but that will force the introduction of machinery into the east, and present advantages may be dearly gained in future injuries conferred—But the Chinese will never permit an exorcise of that partial policy which is suggested, and suffer themselves to be embarrassed by a left-handed freedom of trade.

PROGRESS OF IMPROVEMENT.

The improvements which have succeeded each other so rapidly in the travelling facilities in this country, are thus described by the senior editor of the New York Daily Advertiser, whose personal observations go back as far as 1783:

In the year 1786, if we recollect rightly, the first stage carriage that ever was established on the great post road between New York and Boston, was set up by Jacob Brown, then a resident of Hartford, in the state of Connecticut, and commenced running between Hartford and New Haven. It was a carriage somewhat resembling the coaches of later times, but far inferior to most of them in workmanship and appearance, and was drawn by one pair of horses, which performed the whole journey through from one town to the other. The route was upon what is called the middle road, that is by Berlin, Wallingford, &c. and the journey occupied the day. At that time, for a large part of the year, a great proportion of travellers from the eastward to the city of New York, took passage at New Haven, on board the sloops which plied between the two ports, and thus finished their journey by water. The passages varied, according to wind and weather, from twelve hours to three days. In the course of our own experience they differed as much as this. A considerable part of the road between New Haven and New York, along the shore of the sound, was extremely rough, rocky and uncomfortable, and in fact in some places almost impassable for wheel carriages. After Brown's carriage had run for a year or two, or perhaps more, a man of the name of Hall petitioned the legislature of Connecticut for the exclusive privilege of running stage carriages on the road from New Haven through that state, to Byram river, which was granted, and the stages were established, and run for a number of years, when they passed into other hands. Not far from the same time, an exclusive privilege of running stage carriages from Hartford to the Massachusetts line, between Suffield in Connecticut and West Springfield in Massachusetts, on the great post road to Boston, which then passed in that direction, was granted by the legislature of Connecticut to Ruben Sikes, who for many years in connection with Levi Peas of Shrewsbury in Massachusetts, and probably with others, kept up the line through to Boston.

At that time, there were scarcely any turnpike roads in the country, of course, travelling in any kind of vehicle, was performed in a slow, tedious and fatiguing manner; and all intercourse with different parts of the union was laborious, expensive and discouraging.

After some time, turnpike roads began to be formed, and the great obstacle to locomotion, presented by extremely bad roads, was in many places removed, and the travelling portion of the community began to take courage, and move from place to place with accelerated speed and increased satisfaction. The fashion having once begun, as is usual in such cases, it soon became general, and turnpike roads were made almost in every direction. The advantages to the business and the pleasure of the country were great; new life and spirit were infused among the inhabitants at large, and over a large part of the middle and eastern states, the aspect of things changed, and all was active, animating and encouraging.

In process of time steamboats were invented, and a new impulse was given, not only to the activity of the United States, but to the world at large. Here, vessels of this description, which commenced their career at a speed of about five or six miles an hour, by a series of improvements in machinery, and skill in navigation, went on gaining, until they have attained to the extraordinary expedition of nearly twenty miles an hour. This, one would have supposed, would have satisfied the desires of the most restless spirits in the world; but, as there is no end to the exercise of human ingenuity, and mechanical skill, probably those who live to see a few years more, will find a constant attempt at more rapid movements in these wonder working vessels.

In the mean time, not to be behind hand upon land, the invention of rail roads has broken in upon the world, and already millions of money are investing in these new and astonishing inventions for increasing the speed of locomotion. Projects, almost without number, are offered for establishing these new and extraordinary channels of communication, and it must be acknowledged that they meet with the most flattering encouragement among the minded men of the country. Nothing is more common than to hear people talk of travelling on rail roads twenty, thirty, and sometimes even forty miles an hour—of going from New York to Philadelphia to dinner, and back to New York to supper.

Those who are old enough to remember the state of things in the country at the peace of 1783, and for a number of years thereafter, and to recollect the extreme toil and apprehension of a journey of a hundred or two of miles, to almost any point of the compass, and to compare their former experience with what passes constantly before their eyes, can hardly fail of feeling and expressing their astonishment at the progress of human affairs, at the result of human ingenuity, and the improvements that have taken place in the moveable powers and propensities of the human race, and especially among those of their own countrymen.

The journey from Washington to New York is now made in 22 or 23 continuous hours—without hurry and without much fatigue, for the greater part of the time is expended in steamboats—so it may be said of the journey from New York to Boston; and Richmond is easily reached from Baltimore in hours. After a while, the Ohio river will be within thirty hours of Baltimore. St. Louis is only a short time from Pittsburgh, and the Yellow Stone will soon be close to St. Louis.

MANUFACTURE OF IRON.

From the Albany Gazette.

The manufactures of iron are daily becoming more important. With an increasing demand, there seems to be an increasing supply, and the ingenuity of our countrymen is exerting itself to the utmost, to produce articles of this material. Not only cheap but durable and highly finished.

At this moment, we remember two articles infinitely superior in character to those of a similar kind manufactured in England, and they, if we may use the expression, lie at the extremes of the workshop—axes and door locks.

It is admitted by the English that all attempts on their part to make good axes have hitherto failed. A premium offered for the best mould did not produce the intended result, and while her emigrants were crowding to Canada and New Holland, they were unable to carry with them axes, with which to bow "the woods beneath their sturdy stroke."

In the United States, necessity, the mother of invention, led to the formation of good axes. Like patient men they keep their temper. Our axemen may trace their celebrity, and attribute their expedition, to the shape and quality of the axes which our ingenious mechanics have placed in their hands.

So with regard to locks. The vast increase of our population, and the consequent demand for habitable dwellings, created a similar necessity for locks; and it is well known that those of American manufacture are much superior to the imported. In this city we have locksmiths whose work is unsurpassed in any country, while the axes manufactured in our vicinity are equally celebrated. So in the smelting of iron ore. Varieties of methods have from time to time been tried to obtain, at the least expense, the greatest quantity of metal from a given quantity of ore. One of the most ingenious operations, we remember at this time, and one in which science has exerted an astonishing influence, is the use of the magnetic wheel to separate the metal from the lumps of broken mineral. Mines which afforded the best metal were sometimes so distant from the furnaces that the transportation amounted to a sum that made it impracticable.

An ingenious person imagined that a wheel, armed with magnets, could be made to revolve in such a way, as to pick up the iron on one side, and drop it on the other. This had a wonderful effect upon the expenses of the furnaces. To produce one ton of iron, it is calculated that three tons of ore are required, besides charcoal and limestone, which are also used in great quantities.

The breaking up of the ore did not exempt the smelter from being obliged to throw in large quantities of stone with the ore, as he could not otherwise separate the metal from the rock in which it is found.

The magnetic wheel relieved him at once. Comparatively speaking, he was rid of the scoria. The magnets, however, became easily disordered; and to retouch them was a work of labor, inconvenient, tedious and expensive. Here the first fruits of the electro-magnetic theory were perceived. Professor Henry, of this city, (now the able occupant of the chair of natural philosophy at Princeton) after constructing the largest magnet ever known, was applied to for some advice in relation to the retouching of these wheels. He immediately made a small artificial magnet on his principle, and it was found to be successful in restoring the magnets to their former state in a very few minutes. This discovery has become invaluable to the furnacemen of the north, where the principle is now recognised; and it shews how much, after all, the money making, and money getting portion of society are deceived, when they think science of no consequence to any but men of leisure. Science puts money in their pockets, and creates the dividends upon some of their most valued stocks.

It has been a study much attended to of late, to know the character and value of American and foreign iron, compared with each other.

The consumption of iron in the shape of boiler plates, and cast rails, is becoming enormous. The tenacity and character of the metal are yet to be thoroughly understood. The Baltimore iron is considered the best in the world for steamboats. As yet we do not fabricate wrought iron rails, but probably very soon shall, as machinery will be contrived to equalise the difference between the prices of American and English labor. Cast iron rails have been made with success at our own furnaces.

The American iron being melted by the heat of charcoal, is allowed to be more tenacious than the English, which is melted with coke.

To put the matter completely at rest, however, very interesting experiments have been made at the apartments of the Franklin Institute, under the direction of Mr. Johnson, a scientific gentleman. The secretary of the treasury was authorised some years since, by an act of congress, to expend a certain amount in constructing machines to make experiments on the tenacity of iron and other metals used in steam boilers. It was so constructed as to admit any degree of temperature, up to 500° Fahrenheit.

Some interesting results have thus been obtained. The Pennsylvanian, who is our authority for the assertion, says it is ascertained that the tenacity of good iron is increased by the application of any degree of heat under 450°, which is contrary to previously entertained opinions. Some Tennessee iron (from the Cumberland works) was found equal to a resistance of from 59 to 64,000 lbs. the square inch! The Pennsylvania and Connecticut iron exhibited the same qualities. No iron from our state was sent on for trial—we hope some of our proprietors of forges will not forget to submit specimens of their iron to the test of these experiments.

It was also found that common American iron was better than the best British, and the best American equal and generally superior to Swedish and Russian.

A report is preparing to be exhibited to the next congress, in which we may expect an accurate statement of the facts, a document that must be of uncommon interest and importance.

To the editor of the Pennsylvanian.

Philadelphia, July 3d, 1835.

SIR: Having seen a quotation from your paper purporting to be a statement relative to some experiments on the strength of iron, now in progress at the hall of the Franklin Institute, which is incorrect in several particulars, and therefore calculated to mislead, it has been thought proper to give you the following information in relation to them.

Three years since the institute appointed a committee to inquire into the cause of the explosion of steam boilers, and to devise means to prevent them. The secretary of the treasury of the United States, learning that the institute were entering into this investigation, invited that body to make a series of experiments, and liberally offered funds for that purpose. Ever since their appointment, the committee have been laboriously and industriously pursuing their investigations, and the experiments alluded to in your notice, are a part of those performing by a sub-committee of that committee.

It is unnecessary to point out the errors in the results given in your notice, as obtained from those experiments, as the experiments are now nearly completed, and will, in due time, be made public by the institute. Yours respectfully,

WM. HAMILTON, actuary F. I.

SHIP BUILDING.

To the public. The proprietors of a vessel constructed on the plan and principle here recommended, are as evident as any other fact with which we are already familiar, and it only requires a little reflection to reconcile the utility and practicability of such a structure to our ideas; for it will be found when put in practice that there are no material difficulties attending either the construction or the management of vessels of this description; for if built of the lighter species of wood—such as white pine, poplar, or any other kind not exceeding these in their specific gravity, they will shew satisfactorily that they possess abundantly the indispensable quality of buoyancy for all the purposes for which they are recommended.

Neither white pine nor poplar are more than four-tenths of the gravity of water, consequently any common shaped vessel will, if the bottom part only is constructed of square logs of this timber, float more than one-half of its bulk above the surface of the water, which will be sufficient to buoy up all the upper works and materials of every sort required, and also allow pits in the solid log work for ballast and tanks to contain the water, provisions and stores of every description. The boilers, to render them safe, may be placed in pits in the solid log work.

The log work should be constructed of sufficient height from the extreme bottom to float one or more feet above the surface of the water, when all the upper works and materials to be carried are estimated.

It is then evident that such a vessel is not liable to the danger of being sunk by the same causes which occasion that catastrophe to others, and would be particularly appropriate for all the purposes for which they are recommended—such as steam-boats, stean batteries, bomb ships, gun boats, light boats, beacons, &c. and it is also believed that vessels built on this plan will be cheaper, stronger, lighter, safer and last longer than those constructed as heretofore.

By an estimate carefully made, the cost up to the top of the solid log work will not exceed half the amount of other vessels. Steamboats on the western waters, built on this plan, would be entirely free from many of the most serious dangers that they are now liable to—such as snags, explosions of the boilers, ice, wrecking by the power of the engine, &c. Neither could fire make such ravages as in hollow vessels, for the top part only of those built on this plan would be endangered by this destructive element.

The method proposed for building this description of craft is as follows: The first log laid will serve for the keel—lay the next tier crosswise—the next lengthwise, and so alternately, until the bulk required be laid; then add the timbers by letting them into the sides of the solid work, after which proceed with the operation of planking the vessels as in other cases. Those logs are to be secured by wooden bolts of large size—three or four inches in diameter, and but little metal will be required. To preserve the buoyancy of these vessels, coat each log with turpentine and tallow, fill up the interstices between the logs with the same or any other approved water cement, caulk the seams in the log work, and coat them also with turpentine and tallow, which is impervious to water for a great length of time.

The vessels should be sheathed for fresh water service, and coppered over the sheathing for salt water service, or for the ocean.

To those who are disposed to adopt this mode of constructing vessels, a more particular description will be furnished.

Patent rights for states, cities or districts, may be had by application to the subscriber, post paid.

HOSPICE OF ST. BERNARD.

From the New York American.

Our readers will be interested, we are sure, in the communication published to day relative to an American benefaction to this ancient and solitary station—the discovery, by an American traveller, one of our fellow citizens, of anthracite coal, in the vicinity of this monastery, and the subsequent transmission, from home, of one of Nott's stoves, in which to consume it, have been the means, it will be perceived, by the letters of the senior resident, Barras, of securing the blessing of abundant warmth to the pious brotherhood who pass their lives amid eternal snows, for the cause of pious humanity.

[COMMUNICATED FOR THE NEW YORK AMERICAN.]

The Hospice of the great St. Bernard is among the choicest spots of interest to the European traveller. The unpaid labors of the good monks and their co-workers, the noble dogs of the hospital, are familiar to all those who take pleasure in the records of deeds of benevolence. It is pleasing to learn by recent advices from that dreary region, that these pure hearted devotees, to whom humanity itself stands debtor, are likely to enjoy henceforth a little more of human comfort than they have heretofore done, and, what adds to our pleasure, that it will be through the instrumentality of our own fellow citizens. A few circumstances of their condition will make what we allude to better understood. This Hospice occupies, as is well known, the most elevated practicable pass of "the high Alps," where, at an elevation of 8,000 feet from the level of the sea, has been constructed amid precipices of rock and ice, a rough bridge pass for the convenience of travellers, connecting the Pays de Vaud with Savoy and the neighboring parts of Italy. In this gorge stands the Hospice of St. Bernard, on the edge of a frozen lake, the highest inhabited spot in Europe, and a great deal too high, as all visitors will testify, for human endurance—unless supported as these good fathers are, and have been for these six hundred years, by the united enthusiasm of religion and benevolence. To give warmth to this frozen mansion, situate amid eternal ice and snow, and in a temperature which often falls to the zero of Fahrenheit, even in summer, would seem to be "a sine qua non" of residence in it, and yet, from the expense of fuel, is utterly beyond the scanty and precarious means of the establishment—all the fuel hitherto consumed by them, consisting of small faggots of wood, brought up on the backs of mules, over a broken, rocky ascent of 25 miles from the valley below. The result has been, that the whole supply of their fuel, beyond what was needed for cooking, has been reserved to warm their shivering or frozen guests, in the "travellers' rooms," while they themselves have been content to pass their lives in a freezing temperature within doors as well as without, between naked stone walls, on bare stone floors, without curtains, carpets or fire. Such have been their comforts. It is pleasing now to contemplate a warmer picture.

In the summer of 1830 a traveller from our city, during a short abode at the Hospice, whose friendly walls relieved him and his family just in time to save them from one of their perilous snow storms, had the good fortune to light on the discovery that among the mineral products of the adjoining height was an anthracite coal, though of very inferior quality. Having no means of burning such an incombustible fuel, this discovery led to immediate directions for the erection of a grate for that purpose, but, as it proved, with partial success; and subsequently, on his return, to the remitting to them better plans and models, and eventually, through the liberality of a few to whom the story was told, to the transportation to the Hospice itself of one of Dr. Nott's admirable stoves of a large size, with all things appertaining to its immediate use. The following extracts of letters from the Hospice relate to the progress of the experiment, and conclude with the most satisfactory statement of its complete success, and that "the joy of the brethren knows no boundary."

[The N. Y. American gives copies of the original letters, in French, and adds a translation of them. We shall insert only the latter.]

St. Bernard, July 19, 1831.

DEAR SIR: I often think of your short visit to our abode, and of the good instructions you gave us on the method of burning anthracite. We continue the experiments, and we intend to put up grates soon.

BARRAS, chan. reg.

St. Bernard, 5th September, 1831.

SIR: I scarcely know how to thank you, dear sir, for the kind and obliging letter with which you have honored us, accompanied by valuable descriptions and models of grates, that will be of the greatest use to us: I beg you to accept our sincere thanks for them. According to the instructions you gave us a year ago, I had a grate put up in the parlor chimney: it has succeeded well; there are, however, still some improvements to be made after your model, and, thanks to you, we hope to succeed in it entirely.

A few days after your departure from our Hospice a year ago, I was in great danger of being lost in a tempest on our mountain. Three persons perished at a short distance from me. God was graciously pleased to prolong my days; I ought to be very grateful to Him, and endeavor to live for His service. Your very obedient servant,

BARRAS, chan. reg.

St. Bernard, February 30th, 1833.

MUCH HONORED SIR: The Hospice of St. Bernard will always preserve a lively remembrance of the interest which you take in its prosperity. I assure you, and I beg you also to assure your friends, that there is no member of our congregation, who is not very grateful for the benefits which our Hospice has received, and is yet to receive, by your generous offer of a furnace to burn anthracite: it will be very valuable to us, by enabling us to warm the house economically, and will be a great relief to suffering beings, for the distance of five leagues (25 miles) from the woods, their scarcity, and the difficulty of transportation, obliged us to practice the strictest economy. The anthracite, as you know, is so near, that it can be transported without expense—but we were in want of the means of making it burn. This furnace, then, will be a monument which will perpetuate the generosity and the devotion of our friends in America, to the poor travellers across the "high Alps," by the great St. Bernard. Gratitude will owe these benefits to that pious sentiment, which so deeply interests the friends of humanity in the unfortunate. Your humble servant,

BARRAS, chan. reg.

St. Bernard, April 26, 1833.

SIR: The experiment made by Mr. Jaynisch, on the burning of the anthracite in the furnace that you had the kindness to send to us, was crowned with the most complete success. We have now only to thank you, and beg you to be the interpreter of our sentiments of deep gratitude, to the generous benefactors who have united with you in kindness to us. Your very humble servant,

BARRAS, chan. reg.

The following is an extract from the gentleman above alluded to, a scientific traveller and friend, who was fortunately at the Hospice on its arrival.

Hospice St. Bernard, 26th April, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR: It is with the greatest gratification and pleasure that I can communicate to you the fulfilment of your wishes to erect the stove which you had the kindness to send to the St. Bernard. In this time of the year, when the snow reaches Lydte, 4 miles below St. Pierre, it was with the utmost difficulty for me to bring it up. Till Lydte, it was brought on wagon; from there I took six men, who brought in pieces to the summit. The construction was very difficult, because several pieces were broken when I opened the case.

Notwithstanding all this I succeeded to burn the coal, which is more a plumbago than anthracite. Twice yesterday the stove was in full operation, and the joy of the brethren has no boundary. They remember you and your dear family with the greatest gratitude. To-morrow I shall go down with the mariner and the dogs, because the weather is very stormy, and the snow enormous. Your most obedient servant,

L. JAYNISCH.

P. S. I hope you will excuse my good English, my dictionary is 6,000 feet below.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 21—VOL. VIII.] BALTIMORE, JULY 20, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,139.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The editor has not only neglected his usual correspondence with many valued friends, but been compelled to postpone the presentation of several long papers, on important statistical subjects, for which the chief materials were collected some months ago—not on account of what may be properly called bad health, but because of a general inability to labor with his mind or body as heretofore—and both need a brief relaxation, to regain strength. For the last twenty-two years, the editor truly believes that he has been engaged in actual business, (and nearly all at the desk), not less than fifty-four hours a week, for an average of the whole period, and it is not at all extraordinary that he should, sometimes, feel the general inability spoken of. Every bow, if expected to retain its elasticity, must now and then be unbent; and it is the present intention of the editor, in the course of a few days, to start on a journey that will occupy four or five weeks—hoping to return and resume his seat with a renewed power to merit the liberal and kind support which he receives.

In the mean time, the ordinary business of the REGISTER will go on as usual, and he also expects to contribute much to its contents.

¶ Certain movements are making with a seeming design to create a new and premature and ardent agitation of the tariff question. We hoped that this might have been avoided, at least "for a season"—and shall not do anything to provoke it; though it is our intention to do all that we can to keep the PROTECTING PRINCIPLE alive, and convince the people of the United States of the necessity of perpetual vigilance; and that, though the friends of domestic industry have been brought to a pause, they must not suffer themselves to be disunited, nor permit a suspicion to prevail that they have abandoned their opinions, in despair of the future. BETTER TIMES ARE A-HEAD! Facts will present themselves to dissipate the fool-notion, that high duties, on goods imported, are necessarily burthens on the people—and to show that they oftentimes are most substantial benefits—THAT PRICE IS ALWAYS MEASURED BY THE MEANS OF PAYING IT; and that three-fourths of the interest in MANUFACTURES is in the OWNERS AND CULTIVATORS OF THE SOIL. AS JOHN ADAMS said in 1776, when supporting the claims of his country to independence, we say—that "sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, we give our heart and hand to this measure," in a solemn belief that the protection of free labor in the United States is indispensable to the peace, liberty and safety of our countrymen; and that the enjoyment of such protection is a "natural and unalienable right."

With the views just stated, we propose, in the course of a few weeks, to commence a regular and calm discussion of principles, and their effects—with the hope of being able to present some things in such lights as will give confidence to the friends of the "AMERICAN SYSTEM," and weaken the virulence of its mistaken opponents. Of those who have used "the tariff" to accomplish their own treasonable or ambitious purposes, we have no hope; and, if they will go headlong to destruction—why let them! There is no class of persons, in our opinion, so deeply interested in the preservation of that "system," as those who most violently oppose it. Passion will not permit them to observe the "SIGNS OF THE TIMES." We shall hoist the banner to the head of the mast—not in defiance—but as evidence of our confidence in the justice of the cause, with a consciousness, also, of an ability to keep it proudly floating there. We—though only of the rank of a "cabin boy," will not "give up the ship," until the captain [which is the people], shall say "douse the stripes and stars!" That "command" being heard, we shall humbly submit—but, until then, have resolved to do what we think is "duty."

We learn from the "Pennsylvanian" that the health of the president is tolerably good, considering the fatigue he has recently encountered," and "that he will probably retire for a short period from Washington, to enjoy the cool breezes and bracing air of the Rip Raps."

We insert the address of Mr. Biddle, on laying the corner stone of the Girard college, at Philadelphia, as well because of the beauty of its composition, as for the liberal and enlightened principles which it proclaims.

The letter mail bag, or "Pouch," was missed between New Brunswick, (N. J.) and New York, in the night of the 5th inst. and no doubt stolen. The postmaster, at New Brunswick, in offering a reward for the recovery of the mail, &c. gives a list of checks and drafts which are known to have been in the mail, and also mentions considerable sums of money, which had been also reported to him.

Under the head of "electioneering in Vermont" will be seen a new move in politics. The Jackson and anti-Jackson parties have united, to put down the anti-masonic—which is stronger than either of the other two, but much weaker than the two united.

The violence to which parties have proceeded in this state, cannot be duly esteemed by the people of the south and west, who are free from the "anti-masonic excitement"—which does not appear to have reduced its action, though the masonic lodges have generally surrendered their charters and dissolved themselves, as we see it stated in some of the Vermont papers; and it is on this ground that the national republican and Jackson parties have "coalesced."

The fathership of nullification is disputed in South Carolina. The honor having been claimed for gov. Hamilton, has produced considerable discussion. The parties acknowledge Mr. Jefferson as the original of the doctrine—but they have not agreed upon the author of its revival. We rather think that it belongs to Dr. Cooper, and see that he was so toasted on the 4th of July, at Columbia:

"By Dr. M. H. DeLeon—The father of nullification, Dr. Thomas Cooper: He has been the patron of free principles in two hemispheres, and is most valued where he is best known."

Our much esteemed fellow townsman, Charles S. Walsh, esq. late secretary of legation of the United States, at Madrid, died on a journey from that city towards Valencia, whither he was proceeding for the sake of his health—being afflicted with a confirmed consumption. He was a gentleman of fine talents, and highly accomplished, and only 32 years old.

One petition has been presented to the British parliament for the immediate abolition of negro slavery, that was signed by 800,000 women—and another by nearly 200,000 more. The whole number of signers seems to have been almost two millions! The question has become a national feeling—and such feelings, in seeking their own gratification, pay little respect to consequences; and things which may be right in themselves, are oftentimes brought about in a wrongful manner. It seems almost beyond a doubt, that slavery will be abolished, and speedily, in the British West Indies.

There has been a grand display at the court of England. The queen, the princess Victoria, heiress of the throne, and her mother, the duchess of Kent, were splendidly dressed—all the particulars of which are described, and every article, it is proudly stated, was of "British manufacture."

This is right. The lord chancellor significantly sits upon a sack of wool—but a late American "statesman" said that "he would go twenty rods out of his way to kick a sheep!" How uneasy then would he have felt on the wool-sack, sitting as lord chancellor of Great Britain?

There has been a great deal of excitement, and sundry revolutionary movements in Mexico—in which blood was shed. The bottom of the business may, perhaps, be understood by quoting the following article set forth by one of the bands of conspirators:

"Art. 1. This garrison protests that it will sustain at all hazards the holy religion of Jesus Christ, and the canons and privileges of the clergy and of the army, threatened by the intruded authorities."

We had hoped that the day of such things was nearly passed away. The religion of Jesus Christ is not one of persecution or blood-shed. The fanatics were put down. Santa Anna had behaved well.

A letter from Vera Cruz dated June 15, says—
"There has been another revolution attempted in the interior, but is so nearly smothered as to cause no fears. Energy pervades every department, and the states are all in arms to support it. This crusade will end like all others—in disaster to the party that got it up. Santa Anna was betrayed and made prisoner by Arista, but escaped. A death blow will now be given to the priests and gauchipins as well as their friends; many have been seized and made prisoners. Among them are numbered Terran Fontula and Almiranti; and of Mexicans, Ramera Serena and Morand, (exteaudi de verancas), &c. Depend upon it all is safe, and it will make the government stronger and more respected."

The king of Spain has resolved to establish the succession on his infant daughter Maria Isabel Louisa, in failure of a male offspring, and had summoned those who have a right to vote in the cortes to appear in the church of the royal monastery of St. Jerome on the 20th June last, to take the oath of allegiance to her.

Spain is filled with highway robbers and church robbers—and some of the provinces are almost covered with locusts.

Mr. Webster arrived in Baltimore late in the afternoon of Monday last, and departed in the steamboat for Philadelphia next morning, at 6 o'clock, A. M. He expressed great pleasure in having witnessed the wonderful growth and prosperity of those parts of our country which he had visited—and seemed much gratified with the generous and kind attentions which had every where been paid to him, and by persons of every political party.

We received yesterday the "Pittsburg Gazette" of the 16th, containing a sketch of Mr. Webster's speech delivered in that city, as reported by Mr. M. T. C. Gould, the stenographer—which we shall publish next week.

We have a copy of col. Drayton's farewell address to the Washington society at Charleston—and shall give it a place, on several accounts.

The present year will be long and awfully remembered in Kentucky—for the "scourge of the human race," the mysterious and terrible cholera, has passed over most parts of the state, and, in some, decimated the people in ten or twelve days—and then retired, as if appeased with the sacrifice made! Many of the best and most valued inhabitants of Kentucky have fallen victims to this disease. It seems to have abated, in general—but at some places still fearfully raged. It will afford pleasure to many to learn, as we have been informed—that Mr. Clay, and his family, had not been afflicted.

We have just received a letter from a highly respectable gentleman, resident in the south-western part of Louisiana. He speaks of the cholera in fearful terms—and says that some of the planters have lost one-fourth of their working hands! And even when it shall please Providence to arrest the disease, it is believed that a large part of the growing crops will perish—for the want of laborers to secure them in season.

The cities and towns on the sea-board of the United States are, in general, rather more healthy than is usual in the present season of the year. We do not hear of cases of cholera in any of them.

It is not easy to imagine the march of population and business in the "great west." Think of thirty-five huge steamboats lying at Louisville, at one time, receiving or discharging their cargoes—then look at the map and see where that city is located! Proceed north, and enquire what is doing on the shores of lake Erie, &c. where the Indian had his "home" less than 20 years ago, when the tomahawk and scalping knife of the savage were bathed in the blood of our people, and the wildness of desolation had perfect dominion! In the present year, up to the 13th inst. there had been 230 arrivals of vessels at the port of Cleveland, (last year, for the same time, only 142) and about as many departures! Then think of lands being leased in Cincinnati at the yearly rent of 33 dollars the foot front—about three dollars an inch! Such are mere types of the mighty benefits which are flowing upon us, because of the protected and excited industry of laboring freemen.

"THE INCLINED PLANES." We never passed these planes on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road without some degree of apprehension, until Monday last, when returning from Frederick—though assured that all necessary guards for the safety of passengers had been provided, and were daily examined, lest they might get out of order. This confidence was the result of an accident which happened on the preceding Saturday. When descending the plane No. 3, at a rate of not less than ten, and perhaps of twelve miles an hour, being near the foot of it—the horse fell; but such was the vigilance of the driver and his assistant, and so great the power of the breaks, that the heavily laden car was stopped before any of us knew the cause of it, and the horse did not appear to have suffered an injury, though his hind legs were lying on the rail! He was much frightened—but, gathering himself up in one or two minutes, he was put into his place again, and performed the remainder of his trip with a fine spirit, and at perfect ease. On being released, we could not observe any lameness, or hurt—though some one said that a part of his skin, "of the size of a cent," was rubbed off.

The knowledge thus obtained will render it hard in us to excuse an accident happening at the inclined planes; for, unless because of some very extraordinary circumstance, it must be the result of pure carelessness. And against that we have the best guarantees possible, in the interest of the company, and the employment, only, of steady and discreet and respectable persons, having charge of the cars. We have frequently travelled the whole line of this road, and never once observed the least disorder in the management of the transportation—so far as the safety of individuals was concerned; but must add—that there is a great want of attention to seeming trifles that add much to the comfort of travellers, and which, without interfering with the urgency of journeys on business, induce persons to make pleasurable excursions, and to take their wives and children with them.

THE CHOLERA.

We shall give up, for the present, our brief notices of the progress of the cholera, through the west—for we observe that they are subject to numerous errors.

The disease has swept over nearly all Kentucky—and in several places it carried off one-tenth of the inhabitants! It still raged in some of the small towns, and in certain of the counties—but, on the whole, seemed to be decidedly retiring. In one instance, 12, out of a family of 13, had died!

A few cases now and then occur in different parts of Ohio, Tennessee, Alabama, Missouri, (Western) Virginia, Louisiana, and at Pittsburg, &c. and in Maryland, near Williamsport, among the laborers on the canal.

A letter dated Williamsport, July 9, says—"A very appalling circumstance occurred among the first cases which we had. On the afternoon of Sunday week, a female was attacked at one of the shanties, a mile above town, and a messenger was despatched for the doctor instantly. Dr. Finley went up and remained a time with her, but her situation was such when he got there, as to preclude all hope of recovery. He returned to town, and had scarcely taken his seat in the house, when another messenger came for him with the tidings that the man who first came for him was very sick. He remounted his horse to visit him, and found him in the collapsed stage. He died in four hours from the first attack, and when he seemed in perfect health. The men have all deserted the line for miles above us, and more than 500 men have gone off during the week. They have not removed a great distance; some have rented cabins and huts in the country above; others have gone to the national road, near Cumberland; and many (as I was informed by a gentleman yesterday) have erected shanties in the mountains to remain in until health is restored. Eight cases occurred yesterday after dinner, and all are dead."

New Orleans is not restored to health—but the number of deaths is comparatively small. On the 25th ult.—36. A letter of a later date says the interments were only 15. Present population about 30,000.

The cholera was raging with great malignity in Lisbon, at the date of our last accounts.

A Frankfort, (Ky.) paper says: "In many parts of this county chickens and other fowls have died in great numbers with all the symptoms of cholera. A gentleman of our acquaintance administered spirits of camphor to several chickens which were apparently near death, and they instantly revived and speedily recovered."

PICKPOCKETS, &c. The whole country seems infested with sharpers, pickpockets, and other robbers of the meanest and most scoundrel-like grade. We almost every day hear accounts of their depredations and in large amounts. England seems to have the honor of giving birth to a majority of these "artists." The highway robber stands in the relation of a gentleman to a boor, when compared with such sneaking villains. We hope that the legislature of Maryland will, at the next session, "give rank" to pickpockets and their kindred, by placing their offences highest on the list of crimes against property, except man-stealing—that persons convicted may be taken care of, and taught to apply their nimble fingers to the hammering of granite, for a goodly number of years, without a hope of pardon, before the termination of the periods to which they shall be sentenced—for the hearts of these persons must be "desperately wicked." Gangs of them followed the president in his tour, and, probably, abstracted pretty near 50,000 dollars from the pockets of honest men, collected in crowds to pay respect to the chief magistrate—and Black Hawk also yielded them a rich harvest. They are provided with many scientific instruments, and are exceedingly dextrous in the use of them. They are generally well dressed, and have the manners of respectable persons, and press round individuals on board of steamboats, &c. when called upon to pay their fare, to discover the pockets in which money is deposited, &c.

AMERICAN NAVIGATION. Never was the effect of protection more clearly demonstrated than in the success which attended the nursing of our navigating interest. It was protected—EFFICIENTLY PROTECTED, from the start of our government, as well by high discriminating duties, as by the CANNON LAW of the nation, for twenty-five years—and then had reached such power as not only to protect itself, but to demand, even of England, a relaxation of her navigation laws, and obtained it! With the same policy extended to manufactures, resolute and unyielding as applied to navigation, and to be relaxed only on the principles of pure reciprocity in trade, the like success would have attended that far more important branch of industry, within the same period; and we might already have said, to all the world, we will receive your goods on a simple revenue duty, if you will so receive ours—with this consideration, however, whether the American laborer, who eats meat freely three times a day, if he pleases—should be placed in competition with an European laborer, who cannot eat meat, freely, three times in a week!

These thoughts occurred on reading the following from the London "Times" of the 28th May last—

No question of commercial, financial, or economical policy has ever excited greater interest or anxiety among the great body of merchants, ship owners, and tradesmen of the metropolis, connected with the traffic or the supply of the colonies, than the proposed abolition of negro slavery: accordingly, no city meeting was ever more numerously attended, or more zealously watched, than the assemblage of the West India body collected yesterday at the city of London tavern.

We were rather amused to observe the dexterous manner in which a certain honorable ship owner attempted to repeat his old objections to the "reciprocity system" on a question of negro emancipation; but we cannot think that his execution was so happy as his design. His allusion to America was certainly very unlucky, and his want of success ought to counsel him not to venture beyond the Sound or the Baltic trade. The proportion of our trade with the United States carried on in British bottoms last year did not amount, he assures us, to more than one-tenth of that carried on in American bottoms! Has this relative quantity altered of late; and, if so, for what cause? Not, surely, from the reciprocity system, which has existed with the United States of America since 1815, and which, indeed, was founded on a treaty that subsequently became the model of all our similar compacts with other commercial and maritime states.

The Americans refused to trade with us on any other conditions, and what we were obliged to concede to the powerful government of the United States we could not refuse to the more feeble commercial navies of northern Europe. Hence the origin and justification of that change in our navigation laws which Mr. Young is so zealous to condemn, but which no English government could at first have prevented, or can now alter, without entailing on ourselves greater evils than we inflict upon others. We may mention by the way, for Mr. Young's benefit, that the Americans have in this respect followed the policy of Great Britain, and that still their enterprise is such as to give them a manifest advantage over all other nations who take their produce or trade to their shores. In the year ending September, 1830, of a total of imports amounting to the value of $70,876,920, only 4,841,181 were imported in foreign vessels!!

EGYPT. This empire, or kingdom, or by whatever name it may be called, is now more powerful than that of the Ottoman Porte. The "slave" has, at least, become the equal of the "master," the vassal, with more tact and talent, energy and ambition, has dictated terms to his lord—and won, for himself, independence and sovereignty—as well as obtained means to compel a due respect for both. Thus an old nation (under new circumstances), is restored—and Egypt, if the policy of Mehemet Ali is pursued, may again become a distinguished seat of the arts, as well as of arms; and, exerting a mighty influence over the adjacent tribes, or nations, materially change the character and conduct of many millions of the human race—reaching even the dark centre of Africa, and gathering under one head the whole of the Arab races, those alone excepted whose "home" is in the desert, and "whose hands are against every man."

Neither the present population or extent of Egypt (proper) as now established, seems settled, because that the extent of the new territories in the south, is not ascertained. A large part within its limits is in deserts; but the valley of the Nile is exceedingly fertile, and there are large tracts of tillable land high up that famous river. The population that was subject to the pacha of Egypt has been estimated at from 2½ to 4 millions. We should suppose it nearer to the latter than the former. Syria, a vast country, is added, with a population of more than 2,000,000; Adana, which lies on the north eastern part of the Mediterranean, is populous—and the island of Candia, happily located, has about 300,000 inhabitants; and to these is yet added, in fact, the whole of cultivated Arabia, with the charge of the "tomb of the prophet," &c. having absolute jurisdiction over Jerusalem, or Palestine, now included in Syria. We should roughly guess, that the whole population under the influence of the Egyptian sceptre, or sword, cannot be less than ten millions, and, perhaps, may considerably exceed that amount—inhabiting what has been, (and again may be), some of the most delightful regions of the earth—fitted to all the occupations of man in the highest state of civilization and refinement, and which, under a good government, would soon again teem with densely placed millions of people.

The opening of a canal, or making of a rail road, (either of which is within the means of Mehemet Ali), from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, would have as great an effect, on his country, as the introduction of steamboats has yet had on our own mighty rivers of the west, and restore Alexandria to her ancient rank as a seat of commerce.

ONWARD—STILL ONWARD. We understand, says the Village Record, that a contract has been entered into by the operators of the marble quarry of John R. Thomas of the Valley, to furnish two hundred thousand feet of marble for the Girard college. The Pennsylvania rail road, when completed, will give value to many productions of the country, which, without it, might have lain dormant for centuries. We state, as a fact deserving of notice, and with the hope that it may be useful to those who have limestone or other quarries of mines, which they have either abandoned, or wrought with difficulty, from the quantity of water which impeded their progress, that a siphon has been constructed and introduced into the quarry, which conveys the water off by a constant stream, permitting and facilitating the operations of the workmen.

It is thus in every stage of the union in which internal improvements have been made; and if the proceeds of the public lands were applied according to the provisions of Mr. Clay's bill, there is no calculating the amount of the benefit that would flow from the proceeding. The three millions that would (probably) be divided among the states every year, would, perhaps, set a new value of thirty millions, annually, into motion.

The Baltimore and Ohio rail road has caused a new business. It would be quite safe, we think, to say, that a thousand persons are now subsisted by the quarrying and dressing of granite; and the road also gives an easy access to the best quarries of limestone.

WOOL. Fifty bales of Buenos Ayrean sold at auction, in New York, at 7½ cents—sale stopped. Sales at Philadelphia—prime Saxony 60 cents—sale stopped; 65 offered and refused: full blooded merino 49 cents; 3 and 7-8 blooded 43½ cents—sales stopped. There is a brisk demand for fine and light fleece wool.

THE OVERSLAUGH. The Albany Evening Post of the 10th inst. says—The schooner Crescent, from Martinique, with a cargo of molasses, to Mr. F. Quarles, of this city, has been two days upon the Overslaugh! Is it not strange—very strange—that while the West India vessels of our citizens are constitutionally bound to pay revenue to the United States, it should be declared “unconstitutional” for the United States’ government to furnish for these vessels an unobstructed navigation? We should be gratified to know whether gov. Marcy does not have queer dreams about his vote against an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Hudson river! Nothing but the recorded evidence of the fact, could keep us assured of its existence. Duty, justice, reason and patriotism, all exclaim against the probability of such a vote! A senator in congress from the great and patriotic state of New York, and vote against a bill to improve the navigation of the noblest river in the world!! A citizen of Albany, and give a vote which cripples its commerce and blasts its prosperity!!!

THE WEST INDIAN TRADE. English vessels, says the New York Daily Advertiser, are constantly arriving at this port with cargoes from the West Indies. Here they reload with cargoes of provisions, flour, &c. and clear for St. John’s, or some other near port in the province, discharge, pay the trifling warehouse duty, and proceed again with their cargoes to the West Indies. By this circuitous route they avoid the duty imposed on American produce, and succeed in securing to themselves all the carrying trade to and from the West Indies.

MOISTURE IN FLOUR. Most important researches have recently been carried on by M. M. Payen and Persoz, on the several points in the chemical history of bread, flour and grain. Their observations are not yet published in detail, but we select the following as being of the very highest commercial and domestic importance. They have found, that 100 parts of flour, sold as dry, and imparting no moist stain to blotting paper, contain, under ordinary atmospheric circumstances, 19 per cent. of water, and but 81 of dry or nutritive matter; that flour exposed to moist air contains as much as 23 per cent. water, that the finest flour employed by the bakers, contains 16 per cent. under ordinary circumstances. In summer, these proportions of water are reduced, but they are remarkably increased in moist weather. Thus, the quantity of flour which by weight, at the rate of five per cent. of water, would produce 150 lbs. of bread, will produce but 127½ lbs. when the same weight of flour is purchased in long continued wet weather. The price of flour should consequently, in all seasons be based on the true quantity of dry matter it contains, and which a simple and rapidly performed experiment would exactly indicate. Thus, by placing 100 grains of flour on a plate, and heating this on a vessel of boiling water for an hour, the loss sustained will denote the precise quantity of water mixed with the flour. The facts ascertained by M. M. Persoz and Payen are published in outline in the last number of the Journal de Chimie.

[We some time ago noticed the apparatus of Mr. Nathan Tyson for disengaging the water from flour, when being manufactured, with a view to its better preservation in warm countries—and are happy to learn that experience amply supports the good opinion entertained of his invention. The flour thus made, will not only keep sweet longer, but must be more valuable than other flour because of the weight of the water discharged.]

CINCINNATI. We learn from the “Daily Advertiser,” that ground on the public landing of that city, has been recently leased at thirty-three dollars the foot front, per annum. The length of the landing is 1,020 feet. Other instances of the great value of lots in Cincinnati are mentioned—and its rise has been rapid, within the last six or seven years.

AN IMMENSE ESTATE. It has been reported in a Philadelphia paper—that the chancellor of New York had decided in favor of the claimants in the important case of the Trinity church, which has been contested in law for many years, and which involves property to the amount of twenty-five millions of dollars; one of the principal heirs to which, we learn, is Mr. George Brewer, of Kensington, in this city, an elderly gentleman, in moderate circumstances, formerly a clerk in the old United States bank. It is stated that they have made a further claim to one hundred and thirty acres more, situated in the centre of the city of New York, which, with the other lands, will not only embrace the church, but its revenues, as well as some of the most valuable real estate in that city. This property has been a subject of dispute ever since the close of the American revolution.

The New York Journal of Commerce copies the preceding and says:—“That suit has been commenced to quiet the corporation of Trinity church, having for its object to dispossess said church of its immense real estate in this city, is very probable, and in fact true. But in this there is nothing very alarming or very novel. Many suits have been commenced at different times against Trinity church for the recovery of this property, but they have uniformly failed, and we have no doubt this will.”

WASHINGTON. The following toast was given, at Lynchburg, Virginia, on the 4th instant:

The memory of Washington.—When temples and trophies shall have mouldered into dust—when the glory of other names shall be but the legends of tradition, and the light of other achievements live only in song—philosophy will rise again in the sky of our FRANKLIN, and glory rekindle in the light of her own WASHINGTON.

COL. DRAYTON. At a dinner of the Washington society, in Charleston, on the 4th of July, at which col. Drayton was present and presided, the following toast was offered by one of the vice presidents:

The hon. William Drayton.—The patriot “without fear and without reproach”—estimable in private, illustrious in public life—all the ends he aims at, are his country’s.

After the enthusiastic applause with which this toast was received by the company had subsided, colonel Drayton rose and returned in a handsome manner his acknowledgments for the honor done him; he then entered at some length into the questions connected with South Carolina’s local politics and party divisions, and triumphantly vindicated his course in congress in reference to them, and concluded with an affecting allusion to his approaching departure from the state, bidding those around him an impressive and affectionate farewell. His parting acknowledgments and benedictions were received with deep emotion.

A TOAST. The “Pensylvanian” finds fault with the “democratic” committee, for permitting the following toast of the late mayor of Philadelphia to be published!—regarding it as an attack upon both president Jackson and governor Wolf!

By Benjamin W. Richards, 3d vice president. True democracy.—The free will and free choice of the people; it scorns alike official dictation, official patronage, and the delusive and treacherous machinery of official leaders.

MAINE. We sometime since noticed a great sale of wild lands in Maine, at very high prices—concerning which the “Portland Courier” says—

This subject at present excites a good deal of interest. There is a mystery hangs over it, which nobody hereabout can solve. Five or six townships of land belonging to the state of Massachusetts, after being advertised some months in the papers of several states, were sold at auction at Bangor a week or two since for a sum but little short of four hundred thousand dollars. The collection of people at the sale was very great; hundreds of them having come from a great distance. The expenses, including time and money, must have been some thousands. The minimum price at which the lands were to be put up was one dollar per acre, and they would have been sold at that price if no more had been bid. Some land dealers from this place who attended the sale, had made up their minds not to give more than seventy-five cents an acre. The sale commenced, and the bids ran far above the expectation of every one, and they were finally all struck off at more than three dollars an acre, and some of the townships at nearly four dollars. Mr. Ralph Huntington, of Boston, was announced as the purchaser of the whole.

But lo! and behold, as soon as the news reaches Boston, Mr. Huntington appears in the public papers, and denies having any knowledge of the transaction, or being any way directly or indirectly concerned in it. And report says that the individual who bid the lands off is irresponsible, having no property.

Here was a pretty kettle of fish, as Paddy would say. People at the first blush, stared and laughed at what they considered the most splendid joke, the most sublime and magnificent hoax on record. But after all, is not this quite too serious a business to be suffered to pass off as a joke? Ought not the authors of it to be made to smart for the deep injury they have inflicted not only on the land interest of the two states, but on a great number of individuals also? For it will for a while have an injurious effect upon land sales, and may affect many persons very sensibly.

We put the question to Mr. Coffin, the land agent of Massachusetts, who superintended the sale, whether his duty to himself and the public does not require him to probe this affair to the bottom, and ferret out the secret authors of it, if there are such, and arraign them at the bar of public opinion. At any rate, it is due to his own reputation to make a statement to the public of the circumstances of the sale, and if he has been deceived, to show if he can, that it was no fault of his.

VIRGINIA. The treasurer makes the following exhibit of the public funds on the 1st day of July, 1832.

The statement which we annex of the amount of inspected tobacco in this state, during the year ending the 30th of June, and of the difference between this year’s crop and the preceding, have been furnished us by a merchant in this city, whose name alone assures us of its correctness.

SHIPPING AND EMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC. Comparative statement of arrivals, tonnage and emigrants, for the last four years, up to the 9th July in each year.

Years.	Vessels.	Tonnage.	Emigrants.
1829	366	99,961	6,528
1830	421	108,659	15,935
1831	497	130,051	32,327
1832	544	146,113	33,848
1833	473	122,627	12,989

This shows a great falling off. It is probable that the ravages of the cholera, last year, have chiefly checked emigration in the present.

THE INDIANS. A letter from brigadier general Atkinson to the commander-in-chief, published in the Globe, states that the Winnebago Indians are removing peacefully from the ceded lands. The Potawatamies intend also to sell out and remove beyond the Mississippi, after raising their present crop.

Black Hawk and suite arrived at Buffalo on Friday evening, the 28th ult. and left there on the Sunday morning following, in the steamboat Uncle Sam, for Detroit. They availed themselves of the opportunity, while at Buffalo, to visit the Senecas in that neighborhood.

INDIANS IN MASSACHUSETTS. Scattered remnants of the aborigines still linger in various parts of the state; but chiefly in the south eastern quarter, about Buzzard's bay, and on the island of Martha's Vineyard. Their united numbers are about 750. They are all under the guardianship of the state government, and are not allowed to alienate their lands but by consent of the overseers appointed by the state to look after their interests. The society for the propagation of the gospel among the Indians, furnishes them with ministers and teachers. At Marshpee and Martha's Vineyard are settlements containing 660 souls, who own 18,000 acres of land in common. They are all except 50 or 60, of mixed blood, mostly by intermarriage with blacks. Some of them have gardens and cultivated fields, but their chief sources of income are the wood on their lands, the pipe clay of the island, and pasturing the cattle of the whites. Many of the young men are employed in the whale and other fisheries, and are skillful and industrious. They have forgotten their ancient names and nearly all the Indian language; most of the children read and write. [Taunton Gaz.]

HEALTH OF SEAMEN. Navy department, July 8. The fleet surgeon in the Mediterranean, under date of April 4, on board the frigate United States, writes—

"But one death from sickness has occurred in the squadron for three months, which was on board this ship, being the first victim of disease since leaving America. No death has occurred in either the Constellation or the John Adams during the last three months."

TIME OF THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The "National Gazette" some months ago said—Among the reforms needed, we are inclined to place the adoption of one and the same time, and space of time, throughout the United States, for the election of electors of president and vice president of the United States. Under the present diversity of period, the results of a struggle in one state, Pennsylvania, for instance, have a sensible influence over those of others, where the election is held later; and it may happen, as is the case now, that the absolute success of a candidate is ascertained before several of the states have opened their polls. The knowledge of this fact damps zeal and exertion, and prevents many citizens from voting at all, as they then deem useless the exercise of their right of suffrage. But it is always of general importance that the real relative strength of candidates and parties in every division in the union should be determined and promulgated.

Q.—This is not an unimportant suggestion—and the subject may now be taken up, considered and decided, uninfluenced by political parties.

THE GOVERNMENT DEPOSITES. Inquiry having been made of us why the yeas and nays, in the house of representatives, on the question of the continuation of the deposits of government funds in the bank of the United States, have never been published, we find, on examination, that the fact is so. The omission was of course accidental, or inadvertent. We have procured a copy of them, and submit them.

The question being stated on the 2d day of March on agreeing to the following resolution, reported by the committee of ways and means, viz:

Resolved, That the government deposits may, in the opinion of the house, be safely continued in the bank of the U. S. states.

The yeas and nays having been ordered thereupon, the question was decided as follows:

MEXICAN REPUBLIC. We deplore the never-ending disturbances that take place in the new states of the south—but must confess that we expected no good for the people of them so long as they permitted the existence of an established religion. We refer not to any particular church. It is no matter what it is. But it is the quintessence of folly, to speak of liberty and justice in connection with an established church. It is the principle of the latter to domineer over and oppress the people, that the "fat things" may be gathered by the priests.

Extract of a letter, dated Vera Cruz, June 15th.

"A disturbance having taken place on the 30th ult. in the neighborhood of Mexico, the president, gen. Santa Anna, left the city with a small division to quell it. A few days subsequently the troops declared against the government, and placed Santa Anna under arrest; at the same time the officer concerned in the conspiracy published that he was at their head, and that he directed their movements. It was generally believed and we anticipated the proclamation of centralism. Fortunately one of his aids-de-camp escaped, and informed the vice president that Santa Anna was really a prisoner, and not concerned in the revolution, declaring that he would rather suffer death than prove a traitor to his country. This caused the people to rise en masse, and although the rebellion party threatened Mexico and Puebla, they did not succeed. Both places were well prepared to resist; meantime no information being received from Santa Anna, the business became very mysterious, and great doubts were generally entertained yesterday at mid-day, when an express arrived from Puebla, bringing the welcome information, that he had escaped from those who pretended to proclaim him dictator, and kept him a prisoner; that he was not concerned in the rebellion, and had escaped only with one officer of the guard placed over his person. In Puebla there was a strong force, of which he will now take the command. This revolution may, therefore, be considered at an end, and we presume measures will be taken to secure tranquillity on a firm basis."

FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES. The Paris correspondent of the New York Courier, under date 23d May, furnishes the following information:

In the "Tribune," I find the following, which may perhaps interest you:

"The Constitutionnel asks ministers the following question: 'Is it true that the treaty with the United States has experienced a commencement of financial execution?' Is it true that a bill of five millions drawn on the French treasury, has been presented and paid within the last few days?"

"We assure the Constitutionnel, (says the Tribune)—to whom ministers will no doubt reply by a flat denial—that the treaty in question has been in the course of provisional execution for a long time past. Not only has the bill of which this journal speaks been accepted, but the treasury has entered into a number of other engagements, and has also given up securities. And it is expected that these preliminary arrangements will be urged to enforce the financial sanction of the treaty, if even it should be discussed. These fresh millions have been paid, and will continue to be paid, in like manner as those destined for the establishment of the Russian viceroy in the Morea, and those for the Antwerp expedition, &c."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

All questions which have relation to the state of the currency, are important to the people of the United States—deeply interested in its contractions or expansions—or, the appreciation or depreciation of what we call “money”—as measured by the selling-value of lands, and houses, and all other sorts of “merchandise,” including gold and silver, in bullion or in coin. Whether for good or evil, or the whole, the “paper-money system” is so deeply rooted with us, that we cannot cast it down without prostrating ourselves; and hence the great anxiety is—that that system, while rendering service to the public, shall cause the least possible detriment to the public. Honestly and prudently managed banks are extensively useful; they are the aliment of industry and parent of enterprise: dishonestly and imprudently managed, they must needs be a curse of the productive classes, and a despoiler of worthy men; and this curse and spoliation is certain when they fall into the hands of “scurvy politicians”—as certain banks, that need not be named, most assuredly are—or use the means afforded to advance the interests of gambling individuals, whose business it is to speculate on the wants or misfortunes of other men, and gather profit to themselves by “head work”—despising honorable labor.

We have no difficulty in locating the newly declared hostility against the bank of the United States. It rests with sets of men resolved to “make money”—honestly, if they can—but dishonestly, if they must. There are persons who, like the witch in the fable, would “disturb all hell” for “a little dog”—the meanest thing affecting their own private interest; or, like Nero, would “fiddle while Rome was in flames”—whose soul is in the acquisition of wealth, who would almost agree to swallow molten gold, that they might be gorged with that precious article! These are always busy—nothing escapes them; to have money is their “aim and end.” But when such miscreants connect their own selfish and base purposes with the party politics of a country—then have the people reason to be alarmed; and they should interpose, for self-preservation, against the bands of marauders—few in numbers, but powerful from the instruments which they employ—who, in their zeal for the party, do not make over-nice discriminations between truth and falsehood!—And the movement of the great wheel of the party press, is necessarily followed without an exercise of the judgment—as the “preservation of the republican party” defrauded the people of New York of a vote for their president, in 1824, and gave a new aspect to the general politics of our country—that certain private views might be subverted. And “the end is not yet.”

The preceding brief remarks occurred on reading the articles which are appended. There is said to be a sudden “scarcity” of money, and it is the policy of political partizans to charge it to the bank of the United States—but, as will be seen, without a shadow of justice. That this bank has the power to do much injury—we surely believe; but that it has, for many years past, so exerted that power, we cannot believe. As a measure of safety, we would not renew the charter of this bank with its present power, and that has not been asked for; but is it honest to expect that the local banks should not be called upon to pay their debts—though they freely, (and without reason assigned) call upon their debtors? It appears clearly that the U. S. bank, instead of reducing its accommodations, has extended the amount of them, in the places where the present money pressure is reported to exist; but if these accommodations had been reduced, what reasonable man would have condemned the expediency of the measure, in the circumstances under which the bank is now placed? A winding-up of its affairs is demanded—and why not prepare for it as every prudent man provides himself with a new residence before the expiration of his old lease?

But the truth is—as every person who reflected upon the subject foresaw that it would be, that the diminished extent of the credit for duties payable on goods imported, is the chief cause of this pressure on the merchants. They have had, perhaps, an average of 25 millions of the people's money in use, without interest—probably a larger sum, at particular times. The periods of the credits to them were reduced by the tariff law of 1832, as they ought to have been many years before; and importers, especially the English agents at New York, instead of getting a settled capital out of the United States to carry on and perpetually extend their business, are now compelled to make quicker returns of the people's money into the public treasury—and in this we suspect is the whole secret of the present pressure, if any there is. And the fact that it commenced in N. York, and is chiefly complained of there, may be offered in proof—for that city is the chief seat of the importation of English goods—the particular trade in which is generally much against the United States—the exchange on London having a direct and powerful effect on our own “money market.”*

*It is almost universally the case, (except on the payment of large portions of the public stocks, and for a brief period), that, when the exchange on London is high, money is “scarce”—when at par, or below it, “plenty,” in the United States. We see it stated in the “Journal of Commerce,” that “the U. States bank has bought largely of bills on London at $4 79 the pound sterling”—which is less than par; and yet money is

We clearly foresaw this—and it had no small influence in partially reconciling us to the law of 1832. We have no idea of "lending a stick to break our own heads with"—and if all the duties were payable in cash, as is usual in other countries, a reduced amount of the "protection" sought might be submitted to. Perhaps, at least three-fourths of the British goods received at New

"scarce" in New York. And the New York "Mercantile Advertiser and Advocate" of the 16th says—"We understand that the amount of duties secured at the custom house in this city for the first quarter of the current year, was about $5,500,000, and that since the present law went into operation, the monthly amount here has been about one million of dollars. So that if the importations which have taken place since the 4th of March, shall prove a fair average, the receipts in New York for a year from that time, will be twelve millions of dollars. From these principles it would appear that lowering duties does not necessarily decrease the revenue. We have no exact data by which to ascertain the fact, but presume there can be little doubt that, when it is considered that tea and coffee now come in duty free, as well as many other articles, the increase of importation has been considerable in some species of merchandise, otherwise the duties could not amount to a million of dollars per month."

These things render it manifest that the bank of the U. States has had no instrumentality in bringing about the pressure complained of—even without recurring to the fact, that the accommodations of that bank, instead of being reduced, to produce a pressure—have been extended, to relieve one. The reduced credits on duties, or excessive importations, and, perhaps, both together, have had that effect which the charity of the party press ascribes to the bank!

Before the act of 1832, the lawful value in the United States of the English pound sterling, was 444 cents—but its real value had averaged about 488 cents. For the sake of easier calculation, perhaps, the legal value is now established at 480 cents—or 2 cents to the penny: 479 cents, as paid by the bank, is one cent less than the legal par, and 9 cents less than the (generally) real par.

We measure the value of "money" by silver: in England it is measured by gold. The value of English money is then determined by the quantity of silver which must be sent from New York to purchase or pay for a yard of cloth worth £1 in London—and this is the real rate of the exchanges of money-values. Those values in France are measured by silver—and, when the pound sterling was rated at 444 cents, 1,000 dollars worth of goods, in France, subject to a duty of 20 per cent. on importation into the United States, paid nearly $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more duty than 1,000 dollars worth of goods imported from England—the "hard dollars," in each case, being paid for the articles, in France or England respectively; because that the pound sterling was more than 444 cents.

It is probable that the purchases of the bills on London, by the bank, have been partly induced by the wish of the directors to relieve the pressure at New York—by throwing into instant operation there, a large amount of value which, for some time, might have remained dormant—and hence, perhaps, the increased accommodations, or issues, of the bank. The bank may have, also, desired to hold a large deposit in London, (where silver is plenty), to guard against any sudden demands that may be made against it for specie.

The false valuation of the pound sterling, previous to 1832, (from 1815 to 1832), brought into the treasury, for duties, at least 15,000,000 dollars less than the duties on English goods imported would have amounted to, on the real money value of the pound sterling—488 cents, for the period stated.

We cannot suffer this note to pass without adding—that the words "par" and "real par," are used in their vulgarly accepted meaning. An ounce of gold, or pound of silver, has no more of an absolute value than a cart-load of pumpkins—though less liable to fluctuations—because, only, that the supply and demand are more generally equalized. The time has been, in England, when 125 legal pounds sterling, (or more) were required to purchase the legal worth of 100 pounds in gold—and then we said that the exchange with England was "below par"—the measure of value in the United States being regulated by the precious metals, and in England by pieces of paper—covered with certain marks and writings, "according to law." And so it was with us—except that the legal value of the dollar was determined only by a certain quantity of silver, stamped in a particular manner. And the relative value between gold and silver, (as between iron and tobacco), is also unsettled—depending upon supply and demand, and differing, in different countries, at different times, under "existing circumstances"—and it appears to us a foolish as well as a mischievous error, (as we have more than once observed), to speak of exchanges on London as being at a certain premium, or so much "above par"—seeing that there is no mutually existing par, gold being the present standard of legal value in one country, and silver in the other. Why not then, as has been the practice of the bank of the United States for some time past, give the commercial value of the pound sterling in so many cents? This value is fixed by law, for the assessment of duties, at 480 cents—which is sufficiently near the general average of exchanges, for 15 years past, for every useful purpose; and the price of exchange being stated in cents, cannot be misunderstood by any one—as above or below the rate of values established.

York are on British account. WHY SHOULD WE FURNISH CAPITAL TO BRITISH AGENTS?

THE MAMMOTH AND THE CITY BANKS.

It is said that the United States branch bank in the city of New York, aided by the parent institution, has pushed the local banks for specie, for several weeks with unusual urgency; and that the consequence is a pressure upon the money market and restricted discounts. It is not necessary to show that the bank has a particular design in this, to establish the fact that it possesses an undue power over the local banks and over the money market; and that it may exercise the one and control the other to the injury of the banks and of the community. Whether it be the effect of its own previous over issues, or the result of a scheme to narrow the means of the local banks and to add to its own strength; the conclusion is still inevitable, that it possesses undue and dangerous powers, and that they are liable to be wielded by passion or caprice, or for sinister objects, to the public injury, if not to the ruin of individuals. It is not to be denied that the power of this institution, for evil if not for good, is very much increased by the forbearing course pursued towards it by the general government. Indeed it may be said that the money of the government, against its own wishes and interests, enables the monopoly to oppress the local banks, and to accomplish nearly any scheme of advantage or of vengeance. The immense sums kept in deposit by the government, have lent it the means not only to sustain itself against the public opinion, but to carry on a war, with fearful odds, against the state institutions; to cripple their means, and to restrict their ability to serve the public in seasons of pressure or of increased demand for money. It tends also to convey the impression that the bank enjoys fully the confidence of the government, and is essential to the public convenience; and that, whatever may have been the expressions of the popular opinion and expectation, and however fully that opinion may have been responded to by the executive and by the representatives of the people, it must be sustained, not only in its measure against the state banks, but in its means, however questionable, to procure the renewal of its charter. The whole subject merits the serious consideration of the government; for it is not easy to predict what may be the consequences of a continuance of the present state of things.

From the National Intelligencer of July 16.

The "Globe," of the 11th inst. under the head of the "United States bank," stamps with its official sanction an article from the New York "Standard," beginning with this sentence: "It is well known that this institution has for some time past been rapidly curtailing its accommodations to the merchants, and taking specie out of the state banks." The recklessness of the writers for the "Globe," in all their statements regarding the bank of the U. States, must now be so well known to all its readers, as to satisfy them that no faith can be reposed, either in what it says, or in what it sanctions by its quotations from kindred prints. With it the bank can never do right. If its loans are extended, it shouts, "the government deposits are not safe;" if its loans are diminished, the cry is, "the community is oppressed." The sagacious "Globe" cannot "distinctly perceive" what is "the object the bank proposes to accomplish." Astonishing! and not astonishing only, but most horrible and alarming! What! shall this bank dare to take a step without first knowing whether the great "Globe" "distinctly perceives" the motives? Shall that pure guardian of the public weal, that profound inquirer into the mysteries of currency and banking, be left in the dark respecting the fluctuations of the money concerns of our great seaports? Shall—but before we carry these alarming inquiries any further, let us take breath, and look into the facts.

"It is well known," says the Globe, "that this institution has for some time past been rapidly curtailing its accommodations to the merchants." From the phraseology employed, and the article that it is intended to introduce, it is plain that the curtailment alluded to is alleged to be at the bank and its northern offices, or in other words at the places where the revenue is principally collected, say at New York, Philadelphia and Boston. Now, in the official paper, possessed of course of the confidence of every department of the government, in constant communication therefore with the treasury, with daily access to the returns of the bank regularly received there every month, and supposed to have official sanction for statements of this nature, the public have a right to look for some regard to truth: they have a right to demand that they should not be grossly deceived by the official organ of the government on a subject susceptible of arithmetical demonstration. Has the truth been told in this instance? or are the writers for the "Globe" at their old tricks of falsehood and deceit? We have not the same free access to the bank documents at the treasury which the "Globe" has, but we challenge it to publish the figures; or, if it is asking too much to require it to prove to the country its total want of honesty in this matter, are content ourselves with asserting, upon our own responsibility, that the bank returns prove that in the points spoken of, the reverse of the Globe's "well known" assertions are the fact. If "for some time past," means between January and July, the monthly returns of the bank for those periods shew an aggregate INCREASE in the loans of all kinds at Philadelphia, at New York, and at Boston, of more than two MILLIONS OF DOLLARS. If, "for some time," means between June and July, those returns shew an aggregate increase at the same places in one month of more than ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS. This is the attempt of the official organ to deceive the country plainly exposed. Thus it is shewn, that, at the places where the revenues of the country are received, and where from enormous speculations in stocks and other causes a pressure for money exists, the bank of the United States has in one short month increased "its accommodations to the merchants" more than one million of dollars. What now, honest Ingo? Is it not time now to turn round, and chastise this naughty bank for daring to increase "its accommodations to the merchants" of Philadelphia, New York and Boston?

Let us look now at another "fact" adopted by the veracious Globe. The writer in the "Standard" says, "the government deposits are probably eight or nine millions at this time." The "Globe" has no doubt verified this statement by examining the returns; so candid and impartial an "official" would not surely let the public be deceived on this point. But, let us look for ourselves. The total public deposits of all kinds, which were in April and May last nearly eight and a half millions, are shown, by the returns, to have been on the first of June not quite six millions and a half, and on the first of July the increase was less than one hundred thousand dollars. So that, during the same month that the public deposits increased one hundred thousand dollars, the loans of the bank of the United States increased, in the three great northern commercial cities, more than one million of dollars. Now, with the knowledge of these facts which the Globe has, or might and ought to have had, are not the statements which it is putting forth to the country, under its official character, (false and unfounded as they are), sufficient to disgust every friend of truth and justice, every plain and honest citizen, and every supporter even of the administration, who would not see it and the country disgraced? Is it not time that those, whose official stations implicate them with the Globe, should think of what is due to truth, to themselves, to the country, and not suffer misrepresentation to be thus decked out with the semblance of their authority?

It is proper to add—that the "Globe" has replied to the "National Intelligencer" and said—

"The discounts of the bank appear under four different names, viz: 'bills discounted on personal security,' 'bills discounted on bank stock,' 'bills discounted on other stocks,' and 'domestic bills of exchange.'"

"The 'accommodations to the merchants,' are almost entirely confined to the first description of paper. The discounts on stocks belong almost exclusively to brokers and stock jobbers, and those on domestic bills, in a great measure, to men of the same description, and speculators of every kind. Now, let us see what has been the amount of discounts on personal security, which includes the accommodations to the merchants at the three places and three points of time specified by the bank.

	Jan. 1.	June 1.	July 1.
Boston	$1,273,237	717,731	767,973
New York	4,490,977	4,488,833	4,576,922
Philadelphia	3,482,159	3,820,627	3,481,624
	$9,246,373	9,027,191	8,826,519

"Thus it appears, that instead of an increase of two millions in 'its accommodations to the merchants' at these three points since the first of January last, there has been an actual curtailment of $419,654; and instead of an increase of more than one million within the last month, there has been a positive decrease of $218,982."

— Taking this in its worst appearance, there is a seeming curtailment of only $419,654 on the great sum of $9,246,373—an amount which it is ridiculous to suppose has caused the pressure that is spoken of. But in the next paragraph the "Globe" admits that "the loans of all kinds" have been increased $2,158,791, since the 1st of Jan. last—saying, however, that they were not made to the "merchants—but to the stock-jobbers"—on deposits of stocks. The discounts on stocks have probably been increased—but it does not follow that they were made to the "jobbers." If the pressure be such as is stated, its natural and inevitable effect is to cause deposits of stocks—to obtain discounts upon them, by real and regular owners of stocks—suddenly called upon to use the means in possession to meet the emergency of the occasion; and, as discounts on stocks are the best secured, they are rightly preferred when a pressure for money exists; for we have often seen the failure of a single house followed by a long train of bankruptcies.

TREASURY INSTRUCTION.

DUTIES ON WINES.

From the Philadelphia Commercial Herald.

We are indebted to a commercial friend for the following correspondence, with the remarks of the treasury department relating to the duties on wines.

Treasury department, comptroller's office, July 12, 1833.

GENTLEMEN—I duly received your letter of the 10th instant, stating that a diversity of opinion appeared to prevail among the importers of Madeira and Sherry wines, in relation to the reduction of the duties, which, according to the 23d article of the 2d section of the act of 14th July, 1832, was to take place on the 3d of March, 1834.

The views of this office upon the subject, having been fully explained in a communication to Messrs. — and —, of New York, under date of the 2d inst. I enclose a copy of it for your information.

Respectfully

JOSEPH ANDERSON, comptroller.

[COPY.]

Treasury department, comptroller's office, July 2d, 1832. GENTLEMEN—I have received your letter of the 22d ultimo, stating that there had appeared in the public prints a reply from this office, to certain questions relative to the operation of the laws on the subject of the duties on wines—which questions, you say, from the involved form in which they were stated, not being clearly understood, you submit the following with a view of eliciting an explanation:

1. "Suppose we have wines in public store, and under the control of the custom house on the 31st December, 1832, and imported before that period, the duty secured on which shows to be more than 20 per cent. by proof of cost, and are not entitled to the reduction of 10 per cent. or excess over 20 per cent. by the act of 2d March, 1833, 1st section.

2. "Does this allowance of reduction cut off the right to claim one-half the amount of duty on the 3d March, 1834, as per 23d section of act of 14th July, 1832, provided said wines are still retained in the possession of the officers of the customs?"

According to the 23d article of the 2d section of the 14th July, 1832, the duties on wines were to be reduced, after the 3d March, 1834, one-half the rates to which they were previously liable; and by the 3d section of the act of 2d March, 1833, entitled "an act to explain and amend the 18th section of an act," &c.—all wines remaining under the control of the custom house officers until the 3d of March, 1834, were to be subjected to no higher duty than would be demandable under the said 23d article of the 2d section of the 14th July, 1832.

But the 6th section of another act passed on the 2d of March, 1833, entitled "an act to modify the act of 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," repeals so much of the act of 14th July, 1832, and any other act, as is inconsistent with the act of 2d March, 1833.

As the 1st section of the last mentioned act, affects only such goods, the duties on which, by the previous laws, (whether specific or ad valorem), exceed 20 per cent. It results that the wines, the value of which will be such as to bring them within the operation of that section, will be excluded from the reduction authorised by the act of 14th July, 1832—because as to them, the last mentioned act is repealed, as has already been observed: and that as so much of that act as relates to the wines, the present specific duties on which will not be equal to our ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. has not been repealed, they will, of course, be entitled to a reduction, after the 3d of March, 1834, of one-half their present rates converted into an equivalent ad valorem duty.

I deem it proper to add, that the subject of the regulation alluded to in the act of 2d March, 1833, entitled "an act to explain and amend the 18th section of an act," &c. having been to place the importation of wines before the 4th of March, 1834, upon the same footing with the importations which might be made subsequently to that day, it has been considered to be in accordance with the spirit and intention of the regulation, that such wines imported before the first of January, 1834, and deposited in the custom house stores, as would come within the operation of the 1st section of the act of 2d March, 1833, entitled "an act to modify the act of 14th July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports," to allow them to be withdrawn from the public stores after the 31st of December, 1833, subject to the same rates of duty with similar wines which might be imported subsequently to that day.

But as the wines which may be imported before the 3d of March, 1834, the present specific duties on which will not be equal to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. will not come within the operation of the 1st section of the last mentioned act, they will, of course, have to remain deposited in the public stores until after that day, in order to be entitled to a reduction of one-half their present rates of duty, whereby they will be placed on an equality with similar wines which may be imported subsequently to the 3d of March, 1834.

In favor of the wines of France, it is to be borne in mind, that there is a discrimination by the convention of that country of the 4th July, 1831, which discrimination is also sanctioned by law.

Respectfully

(Signed)

JOSEPH ANDERSON, comptroller.

ITEMS AND SCRAPS.

Trade of the Susquehanna. Five respectable persons residing at Cattawissa, on the North Branch of the Susquehanna, have published a certificate that between the 18th and 23d of May, there floated down past that village 2,688 arks, and 3,480 rafts, the latter with extra loading of all kinds of produce equal to 5,000 tons and upwards. The amount converted into tonnage, that has passed this spring on that branch, is estimated at 282,600 tons!!!

A heavy portion of this property is carried across from Ithaca to Owego, and will hereafter be transported on the railway, which will be finished next spring. 300 wagons a day, with lumber, salt and plaster, are frequently counted on the road between these two places.

A militia outrage. One of our most respectable citizens, a clerk in one of the banks, and a member of the society of Friends, was a few days since suddenly arrested by a militia fine collector, for a fine of two dollars, and thrust into Arch street prison, to the distress of a large family, and the surprise and indignation of a large number of friends. We shall endeavor to ascertain the particulars of this case, and solicit from our fellow citizens, all facts that come to their knowledge, showing the evils and barbarity of the present militia system, pledging ourselves from this time forward, to exercise every energy for its total abolition, looking upon it as we do, as disgraceful to the state and the age.

Iron houses. The new process for smelting iron by raw coal and hot air blast, is producing a great change in iron trade; and it is anticipated by good judges, that no long period will elapse before cast iron of the quality known as No. 1, will be manufactured at the cost of about 40s. or 45s. the ton. When this takes place generally, it must inevitably produce an effect which will pervade almost every condition of society. Rich and poor will, by degrees, find themselves inclosed in iron cages; and fir joists, and slate roofs, will become things to be alluded to as betokening something venerable from antiquity. The introduction of iron into building operations will, no doubt spread rapidly, as the price of cast iron falls; and, if unskillfully done at the outset, we may have a number of imperishable monuments of bad taste wherever we go. It is, therefore, of importance that good examples should be given in time, and that architects should be prepared for the change, so as not to leave the matter to the caprice or taste of the workmen of the founderies. [Louden's Encyclopedia of Architecture.]

Singular suicides. The Pittsburgh Advocate says—In a letter received by a gentleman in this city, we learn the following facts, which occurred in the neighborhood of Little Beaver, in this state. The letter states that "a very singular case, or more properly cases, of suicide took place in this neighborhood within a short time back. A woman, whose name I do not now recollect, hung herself with a hank of yarn—her sister, about two weeks after, followed her example, with the same hank—and two or three days since, another sister did the same. The fourth is now kept closely confined, her friends fearing she may commit a similar act. Last fall one of the same family hung herself, making in all four who have been the means of their own deaths, none of which can be accounted for even by their most intimate friends. They bore excellent characters, lived in the midst of plenty, and to all appearances were living happily."

Coal mine on fire. The singular spectacle of a coal vein on fire is to be seen in the neighborhood of Port Carbon, at no great distance from the Schuylkill Valley rail road. It is supposed that fire was communicated to the coal vein some years ago, since which it has been in a state of ignition, smoke having been seen at different periods issuing from the ground in various places. The fire is distinctly visible from the surface of the ground by means of a shaft. [Miner's Journal.]

Coal trade. It appears by the Ulster (N. Y.) Republican, that during the week ending on the 22d ult. 6,341 tons 5 cwt. of Lackawanna coal were received at Rondout; and during the same time, 52 vessels were loaded with this article, and cleared from that place. Of these, 13 were bound to Providence, 7 to Boston, 2 to Salem, 1 to Jersey City, 1 to Norwich, 2 to Williamsburg, 1 to Staten Island, 2 to Hudson, 1 to Nantucket, 2 to Athens, 2 to Albany, 1 to East Greenwich, 4 to New York, 1 to Troy, 1 to Belleville, N. J. 1 to Brooklyn, 1 to Poughkeepsie, 1 to Hartford, 1 to Bristol, R. I. 1 to Newburgh, 1 to Haverstraw, 1 to Rahway, 2 to New Bedford, 1 to Fall River, 1 to New Haven, 1 to Newport.

Steam vessel of war. A Kingston (Jam.) paper of June 4, says—The Rhadamantus steamer, now in this port, from England, is 178 feet in length; her extreme breadth 46 feet; and her depth of hold 17 feet 10 inches. The engines, two of 113 horse power each, are on the largest scale ever manufactured, and the means adopted to prevent accidents from fire, are, as far as we can judge, effectual. The accommodations on board are splendid and commodious. As a sea boat, we understand her qualities are excellent, whether under steam or canvas. She encountered some very rough weather, without much danger, when in the bay of Biscay, when other vessels went on shore on the French coast. She only mounts four guns—two heavy 32 pounders, and two brass 6 pounders. Her original equipment was the guns we have already mentioned, with an eighty-six pounder on the bow, and a sixty-four pounder astern! That such a vessel will be most useful here, is beyond a doubt, in transporting troops from head quarters to any part of the island where they may be required at a moment's warning. The expense of maintaining her in port will not cost more than an ordinary sloop of war, with 120 men; but her consumption of coal per day, when her steam is up, amounts to 20 tons!

Died in Baltimore on the 6th inst. Francois Augustin Du Bois-martin, aged 91.

The deceased was a native of Barbesienx, in France, and was educated for the army where he served until the early part of our revolutionary struggle with Great Britain, when inspired by the enthusiastic love of liberty then awakening in his native country, and informed of the difficulties the marquis de Lafayette had to encounter in obtaining a conveyance to the American colonies, he readily volunteered his services in their cause, and by procuring and fitting out the vessel which bore the youthful patriot to the shores of America, hastened an event so interesting in the history of our revolution. On his return to France he resumed his rank in the French army, and subsequently served in the regiment of Port au Prince, until the dispersion of the French troops in the island of St. Domingo, when his devotion to liberal principles led him to seek an asylum in this country. Here by his urbanity and the uprightness of his character he secured the esteem and confidence of all who knew him, and by his kind and gentle disposition acquired the lasting affection of those who stood in the more intimate relations of kindred and friends.

Diamond cut diamond. A six foot Vermonter lately entered a store on one of our principal wharves in search of employment. He could do any kind of chore, he said, and boasted much of his strength. "Stout as you are," said the clerk, "I'll bet $10 you cannot carry that bag of salt (pointing to a very large one) twice across this store and back again and never lay it down." The Yankee stood for a moment scratching his head and gazing at a rope with a hook at its end which dangled through a scuttle, and then accepted the wager. He shouldered the bag with the utmost ease, carried it twice backward and forward, and then hung it upon the hook aforesaid. "Mister," said he, "I guess I'll trouble you for that are ten. I didn't lay it down—I hung it up." The clerk, much to his dissatisfaction, handed over the money, and the Vermonter left the store saying, "catch a weasel asleep! Not so bad a day's work. Better than chopping logs!" [Boston Galaxy.]

Baltimore vessels. Our Baltimore vessels continue to sustain, to the full, their pre-eminent reputation as fast sailers. Our builders have a certain tact in modelling, and our seamen in sailing them, which, it would appear, has yet to be acquired elsewhere in order to produce the same results.

Another black pony. The new brig John Gilpin, built at Baltimore, left that port in June, 1832, for Canton and Valparaiso. She arrived at the latter port on the 16th of March. Her passage from Canton to Valparaiso is said to have been the shortest ever made, and, as the supercargo states, both voyages were performed at the average rate of one hundred and sixty-eight miles a day. [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

A thief in a church. William Avery (says the N. Y. Journal of Commerce), was on Friday tried in the court of sessions, upon the charge of having abstracted thirty dollars from a lady's reticule at church. The circumstances were as follows. A young lady on entering St. John's church, to attend a week-day lecture, passed Avery on the inside, who immediately followed, closed her pew door with seeming politeness, and took a seat in the pew immediately back of hers. The affair was singular, and attracted the notice of the lady, but did not so far awaken her suspicions as to prevent her throwing down her reticule upon the cushion by her side, notwithstanding it contained a wallet with thirty dollars. After praying, she was surprised, on opening the reticule, to find the wallet lying on top of her pocket handkerchief, and turned to look for the gallant gentleman, but he had decamped, feeling no doubt quite sure of having obtained some good at church.

Unfortunately for him, however, he had been too long in setting his trap. A gentleman in the gallery had noticed him for several weeks at church, and always following some lady and taking a seat behind her, as on this occasion. As he was a stranger, and had no peculiar marks of a praying man, the constant repetition of the same ceremony excited suspicion. As the congregation were standing, this gentleman saw Avery, while leaning over and reading with apparent devotion, reach down and take something from the lady's seat, examine it, pass his hand to his own pocket, and then lay back what he had taken up. The gentleman interpreted the whole in a moment, and came down at once to secure the stranger's arrest. But he was gone. A young lady in the opposite gallery, also had a full view of the whole affair. The gentleman had marked the appearance of Avery, and three weeks afterwards saw and recognized him, and secured his arrest. On the trial, Avery managed his own cause with tact, exhibiting good mental resources, and notwithstanding the completeness of the testimony, and without offering any witnesses himself, undertook to maintain his innocence. He appealed earnestly to the jury on the value of liberty and besought them not to deprive him of so great a blessing to gratify the combination of fanatics which had been formed for the ruin of an innocent man. But all in vain. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and he will go—not to church exactly, yet where he will enjoy one continued Sing Sing.

Egyptian newspaper. A journal is now published at Alexandria, under the title of Miszer Wekaeisi (Egyptian news) the vignette of this paper, in opposition to the Ottoman crescent, presents half a sun, shining forth from behind a pyramid, on the side of which stands a flourishing young palm tree. On the left of the vignette are these words—"Printed at the office of the Divan of Events in the Royal Castle." This paper, which is in the Arabic and Turkish languages, gives no political news, but is confined to civil and military subjects, which have merely a local interest.

A western comparison. Mr. Webster talks of making the tour of the west this summer. Let him come. We know of no man who would be more cordially received among those who "whip their weight in wild cats," than the boxing "giant," who handed nullification back to its champion in the same predicament that col. Crockett returned his last plate to the servant at the president's levee—handsomely licked out. [Ohio paper.]

Old times! Great fire in Boston in 1760. From the Boston Mercantile Journal. On the 30th of March, 1760, a fire broke out in Washington street, in this city, which extended into State and Water streets and destroyed 174 houses and 175 shops, being nearly a tenth part of the town. The sufferers were directed, by the town authorities, to hand in a statement of their several losses; and from this curious collection of old documents we select the following specimens:

Very strange. A New York paper says—While one of the ships recently arrived from New Orleans was on the passage, it became necessary to open the scuttle into the run, when the passengers were appalled by the sight of a black woman and new born infant lying upon the floor, both dead. No one had any knowledge of such a person having been on board, and it was matter of earnest inquiry who she could possibly be. At length suspicion fell upon the steward, a colored man, who has a family in this city. The run of a ship is under the charge of the steward, being used as a store room, and communicating with his department. This scene was suspected to be the result of his criminal indulgences, and an effort to remove the object of them to this city in a clandestine manner. He was accordingly put in confinement, to await a legal examination.

Dutch trade with London. The following is the return which Mr. Alderman Thompson moved for on the 8th inst. and which was laid on the table of the house of commons on Monday: "An account of the number of British and foreign vessels, with the aggregate amount of their respective tonnage, which cleared at the custom house, London, for ports in Holland, from 1st January, 1832, to 6th November, 1833: British ships, 218; tons, 25,319. Foreign ships, 117; tons, 16,343. A similar account from 6th November, 1832, to 25th April, 1833: British ships, 0; tons, 0; foreign ships, 84; tons, 9,885.

Hydrophobia. Died, of Hydrophobia, on the 28th of June, at 9 o'clock, P. M. Anne, daughter of Robert Mitchell, of St. Jones's Neck, in Kent county, Delaware, in the 17th year of her age.

The deceased complained, from the Monday previous to her death, of an aching throughout her system, accompanied with a vague feeling of anxiety and apprehension. She attended, nevertheless, to her work, as usual, until Wednesday afternoon about 3 o'clock, when, upon going to the well for drink, the spasmodic sensation produced by the approach of water, gave the first symptoms characteristic of the malady by which she was attacked. From that period her spasms gradually increased in frequency and violence, and were accompanied with severe pains in her head and the lower part of her breast.

The family never suspected the nature of her disease until the morning of the day upon which she died; when, upon being asked by one of them if she had not been bitten by a dog, she replied that she had not been bitten, but that she had allowed a little dog, which had subsequently run off, and been killed as mad, to lick a small sore, produced by a scratch, upon her heel; medical aid was then resorted to for the first time.

The deceased appeared to retain her senses perfectly throughout her illness, and evinced not the slightest disposition to injure any one in attendance. She lived twenty-eight days from the period when the virus is supposed to have been communicated—five days from the commencement of her indisposition—and fifty hours after the convulsive sensations at sight of water, gave the first clue to the nature of her disease.

United States. The Edinburgh review, in an article relative to Stuart's Travels in the United States, after speaking of the unexampled progress of population and civilization in America, holds the following language respecting the causes that have produced such astonishing effects; which we commend to the attention of the reader.

"The truth is, that every man in America is instructed, reads the newspapers, and takes a part in the prevailing political discussions. The hotels and public houses have all a pretty good assortment of books; much better, at least, than the trash usually met with in such places in this country. The universal diffusion of education is, in fact, the grand, the distinguished excellence of America. It is this that has rendered the terms, mob or rabble, inapplicable even to the dregs of her citizens in the northern states; and fits them for enjoying, without abusing, the freest institutions. Had the tenth part of the sum been expended in establishing schools in Ireland that has been thrown away in supporting a priesthood detested by the people, that country would not have been in the disgraceful state in which it now is. And what but the want of education has drawn recruits to the standard of Swigg? and made our laborers believe that the destruction of their employers' property was the best means of augmenting their wages?"

Etiquette of the French bar. During a recent trial in Paris, as an advocate was preparing to take his seat upon the counsel's bench, he was rudely seized by the collar, by one of the municipal guards. A struggle ensued, and upon being liberated, the advocate immediately complained to the president of the court of the outrage upon his person. The judge called upon the peace officer to account for his having thus created a riot, who attempted to justify himself by pointing out that the barrister had violated the regulations as to costume, by presenting himself in a pair of gray pantaloons and black stock. The president, however, informed this self constituted master of the ceremonies that he had exceeded his province, and dismissed him, with a severe reprimand for his presumption.

France. A magnificent undertaking is in contemplation by the French government—the formation of a grand line of railways from Paris to Rouen, Havre, Lyons and Marseilles. The government have, with this intent, already demanded a vote of twenty thousand pounds for the preliminary surveys. This is part of a vote of four millions sterling just taken for the completion of public edifices and monuments, canals and military roads in La Vendee. Amongst the former are the finishing of the triumphal arch De L'Etoile, £88,000; the church of the Magdalen, £112,600; the pantheon, £90,000; the museum de natural history, £96,000; new buildings for the grande bibliotheque, £230,000, royal school of the fine arts, £78,000; cathedral of St. Denies, £60,000; and deaf and dumb asylum, £8,000.

Patriotism of the clergy during the revolutionary war. Two ministers' sons, in the county of Essex, whose fathers were out in the great struggle for American liberty and independence, met not long since. After talking over some of the events of that period, one says to the other, "I believe my father did more than any other minister in the state." "How so?" says the other, "what did he do?" Why, he sent three sons into the field." The other replied, "my father did more; he went himself, and took four with him." [Salem Gazette.]

Longevity. There are now living in Charleston, (S. C.) three individuals, who transact their own business with perfect accuracy, (and in two of the instances, the business of others), of the following ages: 95, 85, 80—261. It is remarkable that two of the three are the direct descendants of Hugonians, exiled after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 1685. These were living in 1809, a lady, the mother of 34 live horn children, who never had twins but once: one with 28—nine over 100 years, (oldest 110), and that nine centarians died since 1797 (the oldest 114). AWFUL SHIPWRECKS.

A considerable number of vessels have been lost in the ice, in the St. Lawrence, since the opening of the navigation this year, and several hundreds of persons have perished in consequence. The following description of one of these wrecks may shew the character of the whole.

Wreck of the Lady of the Lake. We have had an interview with Mr. Robert Davidson, from the vicinity of Moneymore, county of Londonderry, one of the surviving passengers of the unfortunate crew of the Lady of the Lake, from Belfast, from whom we learn that in addition to the fifteen passengers brought to Quebec whose names were given in a previous number, twenty-one were carried safely into Saint Johns, N. F. and one carried home to England.

On the morning of the 11th May, the weather being calm, the vessel was surrounded with ice. The passengers discovered a number of human beings, about eleven in number on the ice, some standing, some lying and some sitting. They implored the captain to permit them to put out with a boat for their relief; but he being in a state of intoxication refused to do so. In less than half an hour after these unfortunates had disappeared, the Lady of the Lake was struck with the ice and went down, as before stated in about 25 minutes.

The captain put out from the vessel in the long boat, and our informant finding the boat about to leave, jumped overboard with his wife and child, and swam to the boat, the child was lost, but the parents were saved. There were in all, 32 persons in the boat, (without oars), with the captain who after two days fell in with the Harvest Home, of Newcastle, came alongside and nearly all of them got on board; but immediately discovered her captain and crew hastening into their boat at the stern as she was sinking rapidly. Captain Grant then pushed off with his boat, leaving thirteen of his fellow sufferers on the sinking vessel, and putting out with the 19 in a boat, and had safely weathered out two days with 32 on board without oars. Our informant having found two oars and a bag of biscuit on board the Harvest Home, held them up and stipulated to be taken on board for giving the valuable articles; but the moment they were thrown into the boat, captain Grant pushed off, and left him. Four young men then jumped from the bowsprit of the Harvest Home, and swam to the boat, but they were not taken in, when they laid hold of the edge of the boat he struck their hand with the oar till they could not retain their grip any longer, and on their renewing their hold with the uninjured hand, the oar was used in the same manner, till they sunk to rise no more: two of the unfortunate persons who thus perished were named John Wilson and John Turner. It ought to be borne in mind that at this time there were thirteen persons less in the boat, than during the two previous days, and she was provided with two oars and biscuit.

The sufferers abandoned on the deck of the Harvest Home, launched on the sinking vessel. The captain refused to put back, to instruct or assist them in launching the boat, though imploringly entreated to do so. As soon as the Harvest Home was abandoned, captain Grant put back to her, and took several articles out of the wreck, but upon perceiving the boat in which our informant was approaching, he called out to those on deck, "there they are—come down," and getting all into the boat, rowed away. Our informant remained in the open boat for five days, weather very cold, half clothed, some of the females having no wearing apparel, but chemise and petticoat, and was picked up by the Messenger, captain Stabbs, who also picked up the jolly boat of the Lady of the Lake in which were the mate and seven others, making in all twenty-one persons. The captain of the Messenger treated them with great kindness, waited on them and prescribed for them, placing every comfort his vessel afforded at their command. The steward of the Lady of the Lake lost both his legs by the frost, and several of the survivors suffered severely from the cold.

Our informant declares that at the time of the accident the captain and second mate were intoxicated, and that the person on watch was not on look out, but laid on his breast on the deck, talking through the hatchway to the passengers below. The whole number of passengers was 235 not including infants on the breast. The whole number saved is 36, making the loss of lives to exceed two hundred. [Montreal Herald.]

YANKEE MANAGEMENT. From the Portland Advertiser.

Our southern brethren are perplexed to know how it is, that they with rich land, a warm sun, and staple productions giving an income of from four to twenty per cent. are becoming poor and cashless, while we Yankees are becoming rich, and are having money, if not in abundance, at least as much as is necessary. If they would come among us, and study our economy, the answer would soon strike them. One little instance is no bad example of that Yankee economy and skill that turns all things, even the worst, to advantage.

It may not be generally known that in many parts of our state, our schoolmasters are not only "boarded round," so as to save the drawing the pay of the schoolmaster's board from the school fund—that is, the schoolmaster is boarded a week here and three days there, according to the number of children—but that the school master is often "bid off" or "put up at auction," as are our paupers—and the lowest bidder in the district takes him, as the highest bidder takes an article at a regular auction.

The writer of this article, when preparing to be a college boy, being short of funds, and with no other means of getting money than by keeping school, hired out as a schoolmaster for ten dollars a month. This was all the school district could well afford to give, as their fund was small; and even with this small sum given, it was necessary to board the schoolmaster as cheap as possible. The school committee, therefore, called the district together, into a new, neat, convenient and comfortable schoolhouse, and in his presence, a scene of this sort took place.

Auctioneer—"What will you take him for?"

1st Bidder—"One dollar and twenty-five cents a week."

Auctioneer—"One dollar twenty-five, one dollar twenty-five."

2d Bidder—"One dollar twelve cents and a half."

3d Bidder—"One dollar."

Auctioneer—"One dollar, who'll take him for less than a dollar?"

One dollar, one dollar, any body less? Who speaks?"

4th Bidder—"Seventy-five cents."

5th Bidder—"Seventy cents."

And thus the bids went on, the auctioneer exclaiming as usual in the mean time, till the schoolmaster was bid off at forty cents per week! Yes, the lowest bidder took him to board for forty cents per week. On going home with this bidder, a sociable happy man, whose house had more comforts and luxuries than nine-tenths of the houses of the rich planters in the interior of the southern country, and whose table was as good as many sit down at, paying fourteen dollars a week for board, the writer held the following dialogue:

"How on earth can you afford to board me for forty cents a week?"

Answer—"I make money by it, and have your company in the bargain."

"How so?"

Answer—"Why, you will board with me fourteen weeks.—The whole pay for board will be $5 60. My taxes are a little over six dollars. Now, I have bread enough, meat enough, poultry enough, cider enough, in short enough and more than enough of every thing necessary to eat and drink. I have enough of every thing but money. All I want of money is to pay my taxes. But, in order to raise these six dollars, if I do not get a town order for your board, I must make a journey to Portland, or to Bath, with three times the produce you will eat, and from all this I find it difficult to raise six dollars in cash. Therefore I make money in keeping you to eat this produce, and have your company, these long winter evenings, in the bargain. Thus you see, I am interested at boarding you even at forty cents per week."

Now, we give this to all our southern brethren, as a specimen of the manner in which we Yankees live, and thrive. Let them do likewise, and their country will be the richest and the happiest on the globe. Here we are shivering in summer, with corn but three inches high to the most, while they are enjoying the blessings of midsummer, and have corn almost ready for the harvest.

THE LOCOMOTIVE "ATLANTIC."

To the editor of the Baltimore Gazette:

SIR—My attention has been called to an article, going the rounds of the newspapers, describing the locomotive engine, used on the Saratoga and Albany rail road. It is stated that this engine can take fifteen tons at the speed of seventeen miles in the hour. I have, of late, often travelled in the train of the Atlantic, the engine with Cooper's vertical boiler, used on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road—constructed originally at York, Pa. and modified and brought to its present perfection since it has been in use here. An account of its powers may not be unacceptable—and I am induced to offer it in consequence of reading the above mentioned article. The "Atlantic" has been running continually for the last 3 or 4 months, from Baltimore to the foot of the inclined planes, a distance of 40 miles, and back again, the same day. Upon this portion of the road, thirty-three miles are ascending, at various grades, of from ten to forty feet per mile, exceeding, in the ascent, 20 feet, per mile on the average, and the whole forty miles, is almost a constant succession of curves, of 400 feet radius, and upwards. Upon this road the Atlantic has drawn, on the outward, or ascending trip, thirty tons, at the least, at the rate of seventeen miles per hour—with only 15 tons, her practicable speed exceeds any safe limit on a curved road. The Atlantic has drawn 92 tons on a level, at the speed of 9 miles to the hour, and has brought seventy-two tons from the half-way house, (6 miles), to Baltimore, at a rate of 12 miles to the hour, on the level parts of the road; passing two summits, of 16 feet per mile, for a half mile, each at the rate of six miles an hour. The train which recently brought in the president weighed forty tons, and passed over the same distance at the average speed of 15 miles to the hour. The power of the engine is such as to overcome the adhesion of the bearing wheels, of soft metal on dry rails, with 4 tons weight resting on them—in other words, when too great a weight is attached to the engine, or too steep an ascent attempted with her, the wheels fly round on the rails, without moving the car. This shows the ample supply of the steam—and in a new engine, now building it is designed to couple the wheels, so as to employ the adhesion of all four, with the view to render the superabundant steam available. The motion of the piston compared with that of the wheels, or progressive motion of the engine is as 1 to 5½. The only fuel employed is anthracite coal, which burns without any difficulty, and it is believed with more economy and convenience than any other. The trip, of 80 miles per day, is performed with one ton of it. Although this engine is the first of this peculiar construction, and the first that has completely succeeded in burning the anthracite, yet—in the small amount of its repairs, and the quantity of work that it is capable of performing—it is believed to be equal, if not superior, to any engine that has yet been made. I am, sir, your's respectfully.

A FRIEND TO THE USE OF STEAM ON RAIL ROADS.

HOLT'S FOUNTAIN—NEW YORK.

The facts stated in the following articles are of general importance—and we take pleasure in giving the particulars stated.

New York, July 8.—We are happy to learn that the persevering endeavors of Mr. Holt to obtain water by boring have at length been crowned with success. About the middle of last week, the person engaged in boring was delighted to find that he had struck a stratum of limestone, from which he predicted that he should find water in three or four days. On Friday afternoon, the drill which had been sinking with increased rapidity since it entered the limestone, suddenly dropped about two feet at a single blow, and then struck upon a very hard rock below. Immediately a strong current of water arose, and there is reason to hope it may prove to be of the desired quality. It is supposed to be so copious that it will afford a constant supply of as much as can pass through the pipe, which is about three inches in diameter. On this point, however, it will be impossible to determine with certainty, until the water ceases to be affected by the foreign matter introduced into the passage. The two or three feet through which the drill dropped, is no doubt a brook or fountain; and the fact of a flint rock or something like it, underneath, promises well. The boring will now be discontinued. We understand that no vein of water of any magnitude had been struck since entering the rock about 130 feet below the surface. Some water, we believe, was obtained before entering the rock, but it was of an inferior quality. The cost of the undertaking cannot be less than $2,000 or $3,000. It has been in progress nearly two years.

[The drill had, within the last six months, penetrated 640 feet in depth, of which 510 feet are of solid rock. So much for perseverance.]

Pure Water.—The important fact, which we mentioned on Monday, that of Mr. Holt, having stricken a fissure, at the depth of more than 500 feet of rock, by which it is made certain that the lower part of the city may be supplied with pure water (provided that now found, proves to be such), is a subject of conversation, and congratulation among our citizens. We have been consequently induced to make, of Mr. Holt's engineer, some inquiries on the subject. The digging of the earth commenced 22 months ago, and we learn, that at the depth of 40 or 50 feet, a vein of fresh, but impure water was found, which induced Mr. H. to go farther down. When he had dug to 130 feet, he came to a rock, on the surface of which flowed water, as salt or salter than ocean water. Not succeeding in his pursuit, he was induced to apply the drill, which has been at constant work a large portion of the time, night and day, wrought by a steam engine, till Saturday last. In this vast depth, which is as great as any perforation on record, the engineer believes his tool has been applied to a solid rock, as hard as granite and gneiss could form it, without once penetrating a stratum. The quality of the rock during the last three or four months work has been found to be nearly as hard as flint; and some estimate of the labor performed may be judged of from the fact, that the drill did not descend more than 8 or 10 inches a day during the whole time in which it has been employed.

We further learn from the engineer that the pipe which was inserted into the surface of the rock was not properly secured against the flood of salt water that continues to pass over it, and which rises in the tube to the ocean's level. This fact may account for the fresh water now found, not rising to the surface of the earth, mingling as it probably does, and passing off in the same vein through which the salt water flows.

It is intended immediately to apply the proper remedy against the salt water flood, till which time it will be impossible to test the quality of that from the fissure. This will be effected as soon as the proper instruments can be made, and we shall be happy to make a favorable report—of which we have no doubt.

While on the subject, we may as well say a word in regard to the great inconvenience which such an establishment as the hotel of Mr. Holt suffers for the want of pure water. He employs constantly three men, each with a horse and cart, owned by himself, and two others whom he hires, to bring him water from Traphagan's well, more than two miles from his house, at an expense of eight dollars a day. This water is emptied into four cisterns, holding one hundred and twenty-five hogsheds, and his daily consumption for drinking, cooking, and washing, is twenty-four hogsheds. [New York Gazette.]

From the Commercial Advertiser.

Holt's castle.—Mr. Holt has found water at the depth of six hundred and fifty feet. The Journal of Commerce says that limestone was found there—but it is not so. It is mica slate. It also speaks about a flint rock there, but this is all verbiage—it is mica slate. The fissure is large, and the water abundant. Its quality is not yet known, though I think it will prove to be good. It rises within a few feet of the surface, and not above it, which proves that it does not enter the rock at any point higher than this. Thus much to satisfy distant geologists as to the geology of this place. The Journal of Commerce thinks this will cost as much as two thousand dollars—had it said twenty thousand, it would probably have come quite as near the truth. The one in Bleeker street, as Mr. Disbrow told me, cost ten thousand dollars, and that does not begin to be as expensive as this. Holt's castle may now be called the "FOUNTAIN TKN." A. S.

Mr. Holt informs us, that he has not only ascertained that the supply of the fountain will be abundant, but that the water has been tried, and proved to be of a pure, soft, and excellent quality.

ELECTIONEERING IN VERMONT.

Two conventions, one national republican, the other consisting of friends of the administration, lately met at Montpelier. In the former, a committee reported, that they had conferred with a committee of the Jackson convention, and had agreed with them relative to the mode of nominating a union ticket for state officers. The Jackson convention were to nominate candidates for governor and four counsellors, and the national republican for lieutenant governor, treasurer, and eight counsellors. This mode was adopted by both conventions, and Ezra Meech was nominated in both for governor, Jedediah H. Harris for lieutenant governor, Benjamin Swan for treasurer, and twelve other gentlemen for counsellors.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"Percinville June 8, 1833.

"To the hon. Ezra Meech—

"Sir—At this period of our political affairs, when our party feelings have become calmed, after the late presidential contest, we can look around more dispassionately, and without a reference to the struggles that have past, and select such men as we deem most fit to entrust with the government of our state affairs. With a party whose motto is proscription, we cannot, will not unite; but with a party whose opinions upon the great and leading interests of our country agree with ours we would go heart and hand, and by the success of an union ticket, place Vermont, again, on a footing with the other states of the union, where she may no longer be a bye word and a jest for the fallacy of her opinions, and the infatuation of her sons.

"Believing that such a consummation is devoutly to be wished, and that through the agency of our enlightened and patriotic yeomanry, it can be fully and decidedly accomplished, we would respectfully solicit your views upon the great interests of our country, to wit—the protective policy—a system which we deem so interwoven with our national prosperity that to blot it from our records, as a law of the land would be to spread misery and poverty, where all is now peace and plenty.

"We also solicit your views on the land bill, as passed by congress the last session, the principles of which, we consider deeply important to the interests of Vermont. Very respectfully your obedient servants.

"Signed,

J. R. WILLIAMS,
JOHN MARSH,
ROB. B. SCHENCK,
ASA WHEELER,
F. K. NICHOLS."

JUDGE MEECH'S REPLY.

"Shelburne, June 23, 1833.

"GENTLEMEN—Yours of the 8th instant, is this day received—having been absent on a journey, when it arrived. I therefore embrace the earliest opportunity to answer your inquiries. With regard to a union of the nationals, and those called Jacksonians, I most heartily accord with your sentiments—that the time has come, when we should lay aside all those party feelings, and use our utmost exertions to redeem the lost character of our state.

"Relative to the protective system, it has always had my support—believing as I do, that the middle and eastern states never can prosper, without protecting all the articles for which we grow the raw material.

"With regard to the land bill, I had looked forward to the extinction of the public debt, as the period when the proceeds of the sales of the national domain—the common property of all the states, ought to be divided amongst them, agreeably to their representation in congress. Respectfully yours,

EZRA MEECH.

Messrs. J. R. Williams, John Marsh, and others."

BLACK HAWK AND THE SENECA, &c.

From the Buffalo Republican, July 5.

The party of western chiefs, under the conduct of major Garland, consisting of Black Hawk, the Prophet Napope, the Prophet's adopted son and brother, and Black Hawk's son, arrived at this place on Friday of last week, and remained until Sunday morning, when they took passage in the steamboat for Detroit. On Saturday morning they rode over to Black Rock for the purpose of looking at the union of the grand canal with the lake at that place, and also to have a fair view of the Canada shore. Black Hawk immediately pointed out Fort Erie, and appeared to be familiar with the country around. He was there during the last war in the British camp, at the time when, as he expressed himself, the "Americans walked in the fort." In the afternoon the party visited the Seneca Indians, who had collected at the council house on the reservation to receive them. They were addressed by capt. Pollard, an old and very respectable chief of the Seneca nation, who, after expressing the pleasure which it gave them to meet the chiefs of the Sacs, and after alluding to the present state of the aborigines, counselled their brothers to return home with a peaceable mind, to cultivate their land, and no more to fight against so powerful a people as the whites. To this both the Prophet and Black Hawk replied. The former said, "We have heard your talk—it is full of truth and good advice—I have said much on this subject to our great father—we shall go home in peace, we wish that all the tribes were collected on the fine lands west of the Mississippi. I will not make you a long talk—we only came over to see how our brothers the Senecas lived, and we are glad to see you." Black Hawk said, "Our aged brother of the Senecas who has spoken to us has spoken the words of a good and wise man. We are strangers to each other, though we have the same color, and the same Great Spirit made us all and gave us this country together. Brothers, we have seen how great a people the whites are. They are very rich and very strong—it is a folly for us to fight with them. We shall go home with much knowledge that we have got on our journey. For myself, I shall advise my people to be quiet and live like good men. The advice which you give us, brother, is very good, and we tell you now that we mean to walk the straight path for the future, and to content ourselves with what we have, and with cultivating our lands."

The chiefs of the Black Hawk party behaved themselves with much decorum and propriety. They were visited by most of our citizens, and every opportunity was furnished by major Garland to gratify the curiosity of all who came.

They will proceed over land from Detroit to Chicago, where a military escort will receive them, and convey them thence to the Mississippi.

A large party of the Oneida Indians, under the charge of the agent, Mr. Savage, left this port on Wednesday last for Green Bay, in the schooner Globe. They numbered in all, men, women and children, 145—were well provided with every thing necessary to render them comfortable in their new habitations, and seemed happy in the prospect before them.

SELF-DEVOTION OF INDIANS.

"Dulce et decorum est, pro patria mori."

The subjoined account we copy from the Jacksonville, (Illinois), Banner. Ks-o-kuck, is well known to those who take an interest in the Indian tribes. But had the four great men, we mean the Indians who offered themselves to save their country, had they lived in ancient times they would have come down to us immortalized in the records of patriotism and philanthropy. David—the Horatii and the Curatii and others, had a chance, they might conquer, but the poor Indians were sent to die—Mintius Seevoh burnt off his hand—but he stood in the presence of the great. Curtius leaped into the chasm—but the admiring plaudits of the Roman world hushed the whisperings of fear and the calculations upon pain—but the poor Indians, knew they must be hung up like dogs—amid the sneers and curses of those who preferred their dogs to them. The case as set forth in the annexed detail is highly interesting and would furnish a fine hint to a vigorous fancy, for the leading incident of a tale.

By private sources, we hear that the Sac Indians who had been delivered up by Ke-o-kuk, to the civil authorities of Warren county, for the murder of Martin have been discharged—the grand jury not having found a bill against them. The history of this affair is somewhat curious. When the agent went to Ke-o-kuk to demand the murderers, under instructions from the war department, he informed the agent that they were out of his reach, but would consult with his tribe what course to take, in the premises. He called them together, and having stated to them that their great father would send an armed force into their nation to take the murderers, which would cause strife and bloodshed, which it was his desire to prevent, four young men of the tribe, (they who were discharged), proffered themselves as voluntary offerings to appease the vengeance of their great father, and consented that they should be given up to the agent as the offenders. They were accordingly confined in jail to await their trial. At court Ke-o-kuk and other Indians of his tribe appeared, and the old chief was made a witness on the part of the prosecution; and, before the grand jury, he stated that these young men were not the persons who committed the murder, that they were out of his reach having fled from his tribe; and that he supposed they would be satisfied, if any four of his young men should be delivered up to their justice, not doubting but the same principles governed his white brethren that obtained among the Indians. This testimony, of course, discharged the prisoners. The people were much excited at this termination of the business; and the grand jury, in the exercise of their powers, handed to the court a presentment, the object of which was, as we understand, to request the president to take the necessary measures to procure the murderers, with testimony sufficient to convict them, and presenting the agent for accepting the men who were discharged, and requesting him not to accept any others than the real murderers, whose names were obtained from Ke-o-kuk, and the bills of indictment found against them. The idea of Ke-o-kuk and the young men was, that the judge would sentence them to be hung immediately—they had no other expectation. In this view of the case, they showed more devotion to their tribe, and more firmness, than could be found, under similar circumstances, among the most enlightened and civilized portion of the community. It is needless to add, that they manifested great joy at their unexpected deliverance.

Messrs. Gatewood, Field and C. S. Hempstead attended as counsel for the prisoners.

THE INVENTION OF LETTERS.

The invention of the Cherokee alphabet, the absolute perfection which is ascribed to it by philologists, and its general adoption amongst a nation which we denominate savage, appear to us to be among the most interesting circumstances of modern history.

When, where, and by whom, letters were invented, it is now useless to imagine. Notwithstanding the pretensions advanced for Hernes, Mennon, Cadmus and others, there is no evidence to authorise us to award the honor to either of them. But although history has given us no authentic account of the sage, whoever he was, that first dissected the human voice, analyzed its sounds, and gave to each an appropriate mark or character, our own age and our own country were to witness this novel enterprise conceived and executed by an untutored savage, belonging to that race whose wrongs will fill so black a page in our history. Cadmus imported an alphabet into Greece; Sequayah, a poor Cherokee, invented one for his native tongue, and a newspaper is now printed in the characters which he devised. This great genius, (for he richly merits the appellation), is one of the most extraordinary personages of the age. His name, when time shall have made it venerable, will be coupled with the names of Franklin, of Fulton, and other men whose inventions and discoveries have gained them an imperishable fame.

About the time of St. Clair's defeat, Sequayah, and a party of Cherokees, found a letter on a white man whom they had taken prisoner. This letter was, to the Indians, something novel and curious; and, much to their astonishment, its nature and uses were explained to them. It was long a question whether the talking leaf, as they expressively termed it, was the invention of the white man, or the gift of the Great Spirit. The rest decided for its divine origin. Sequayah, with the spirit of a philosopher, maintained the contrary. The "leaf," however, and its origin, were forgotten, till a painful disease disabled Sequayah from sharing in the pursuits of war and the chase. Then it was that his mind reverted to the mysterious paper. Day and night did he meditate upon it, till, by observations on the sound of the human voice and notes of birds, aided by the nicer ears of his wife and daughter, he succeeded in his enterprise. All this time, like Galileo, he had to contend with the neglect, suspicions and superstitions of his countrymen; for they had heard of his strange occupation, and thought that he was dealing with the evil spirit. After a time, however, he succeeded in convincing his brethren of the importance of his invention, and he has ever since been held by them in the deepest reverence. [Salem Gazette.]

GIRARD COLLEGE—PHILADELPHIA.

Address, by Nicholas Biddle, esq. chairman of the trustees of the Girard college for orphans, pronounced by request of the building committee, on the occasion of laying the corner stone of the edifice, July 24, 1833.

FELLOW CITIZENS: We have now witnessed the laying of the corner stone of the Girard college for orphans. That stone, simple, massive and enduring, fit emblem of the structure to be reared from it, and of the man whose name it bears, has been deposited in its final resting place. The earth received it. Tomorrow the earth will cover it. Ours are the last eyes which shall look upon it, and hereafter it will lie in its silent repose, unmoved by all the revolutions of the changing world above it.

And yet from out that depth is to rise the spirit which may more influence the destiny of ourselves and our children, than all else the world now contains. The seed that has been planted is of the tree of knowledge—that growth which gives to existence all that renders it attractive—flowers for our early youth—fruits in maturer life, and shelter for declining years. It is that knowledge, which trampling down in its progress the dominion of brutal force, and giving to intellect its just ascendancy, has at length become the master power of the world. No people can now be distinguished or prosperous, or truly great, but by the diffusion of knowledge—and in the stirring competition of the roused spirit of our time, the first glory and the highest success must be assigned to the best educated nation. If this be true in our relations abroad, it is far more true at home. Our institutions have boldly ventured to place the whole power of the nations in the hands of the people at large, freed from all the great restraints which in other countries were deemed necessary. In doing this, their reliance is entirely on the general intelligence and education of the community, without which, such institutions can have neither permanence nor value. Their brilliant success has hitherto justified that confidence, but as our population becomes concentrated into denser masses, with more excited passions and keener wants, the corrective influence of instruction becomes daily more essential. The education then of the people, which elsewhere is desirable or useful, becomes with us essential to the enjoyment, as well as to the safety of our institutions. Our general equality of rights would be unavailing without the intelligence to understand and to defend them—our general equality of power would be dangerous, if it enabled an ignorant mass to triumph by numerical force over the superior intelligence which it envied—our universal right to political distinction, unless the people are qualified for it by education, becomes a mere abstraction, exciting only an abortive ambition. While, therefore, to be uneducated and ignorant, is in other countries a private misfortune, in ours it is a public wrong; and the great object to which statesmen should direct their efforts is to elevate the standard of public instruction to the level—the high table land—of our institutions. It is thus that this day has been appropriately chosen for the present solemnity.

It is fit that the anniversary of that day when our ancestors laid the broad foundations of our public liberties—on that day when our countrymen, throughout this prosperous empire, are enjoying the blessings which these institutions confer—we, in our sphere of duty, should commence this great work, so eminently adapted to secure and perpetuate them.

This truth no man felt with a deeper conviction than our distinguished fellow citizen, whose history, and whose design in founding this institution, may apply occupy, for a few moments, our attention.

Of these, now that the tomb has dissipated all the illusion which once surrounded them, we can speak with the impartiality of history; and here, on this chosen spot, the scene of his future fame, we may freely bestow on his memory the homage which his unassuming nature would have shunned while living.

We all remember, and most of us knew him. Plain in appearance, simple in manners, frugal in all his habits, his long life was one unbroken succession of intense and untiring industry. Wealthy, yet without indulging in the ordinary luxuries which wealth may procure—a stranger to the social circle—indifferent to political distinction—with no apparent enjoyment except in impelling and regulating the multiplied occupations of which he was the centre—whose very relaxation was only a variety of labor, he passed from youth to manhood and finally to extreme old age, the same unchanging, unvarying model of judicious and successful enterprise. At length, men began to gaze with wonder on this mysterious being, who, without any of the ordinary stimulants to exertion, urged by neither his own wants, nor the wants of others—with riches already beyond the hopes of avarice, yet persevered in this unceasing scheme of accumulation; and possessing so much, strove to possess more as anxiously as if he possessed nothing. They did not know that under this cold exterior, and aloof in that stern solitude of his mind, with all that seeming indifference to the world and to the world's opinions, he still felt the deepest sympathy for human affliction, and nursed a stronger, yet a far nobler and wiser ambition to benefit mankind, than ever animated the most devoted follower of that world's applause. His death first revealed, that all this accumulation of his laborious and prolonged existence, was to be the inheritance of us and of our children—that for our and their comfort, the city of his adoption was to be improved and embellished, and above all, that for their advancement in science, and in morals, were to be dedicated the fruits of his long years of toil.

It required the self-denial of no common mind, to resist the temptation of being himself the witness and the administrator of this bounty, and to have abstained from enjoying the applause of his grateful countrymen, who would have acknowledged with affectionate respect, the benefits which they derived from him. Yet even this secret and prospective munificence must have had its charm for a mind like his; and we may well imagine that the deep and retired stillness of his spirit was often soothed with the visions of the lasting good, and perhaps, too, of the posthumous glory, which he was preparing. Such contemplations he might well indulge, for to few have they been so fully realized. From the moment that foundation stone touched the earth, the name of Girard was beyond the reach of oblivion. From this hour, that name is destined to survive to the latest posterity, and while letters and the arts exist, he will be cited as the man who, with a generous spirit and a sagacious foresight, bequeathed, for the improvement of his fellow men, the accumulated earnings of his life. He will be remembered in all future times by the emphatic title with which he chose to be designated, and with which he commences his will—a title by which we ourselves may proudly recognize him as "Stephen Girard of the city of Philadelphia, in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, merchant and mariner"—the author of a more munificent act of enlightened charity than was ever performed by any other human being.

His, will indeed be the most durable basis of all human distinction—a wise benevolence in the cause of letters. The ordinary charity which feeds or clothes the distressed, estimable as it is, relieves only the physical wants of the sufferer. But the enlightened beneficence which looks deeper into the wants of our nature—which not merely prolongs existence, but renders that existence a blessing, by pouring into these recesses of sorrow the radiance of moral and intellectual cultivation—this it is which forms the world's truest benefactor, and confers the most enduring of all fame. His glory is the more secure, because the very objects of that benevolence are enabled to repay with fame, the kindness which sustains them.

It is not unreasonable to conjecture that in all future times, there will probably be in existence many thousand men who will owe to Girard the greatest of all blessings, a virtuous education; men who will have been rescued from want and perhaps from vice, and armed with power to rise to wealth and distinction. Among them will be found some of the best educated citizens, accomplished scholars, intelligent mechanics, distinguished artists and the most prominent statesmen. In the midst of their prosperity, such men can never forget the source of it, nor will they ever cease to mingle with their prayers and to commemorate with their labors, the name of their great benefactor. What human being can be insensible to the happiness of having caused such a succession of good through remote ages, or not feel that such applause is more grateful than all the shouts which ever rose from the bloodiest field of battle, and worth all the vulgar fame of a hundred conquests!

The general design and the resources of the institution are proportioned to its purposes, and characteristic of him who did nothing which he did not do well.

After the building shall have been completed, there will remain the annual income from two millions of dollars, now yielding $102,000, and if these funds should be inadequate for all the orphans applying for admission, the income of nearly all the remainder of the estate is to be appropriated to the erection of as many new buildings as his square in the city would have contained. So that in general, it may be stated with reasonable confidence, that when all the buildings are ready for the reception of the pupils, there will be available for the maintenance of the institution, an income of not less than one hundred thousand dollars, which may be increased to at least two hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

These ample funds are to be devoted to the maintenance and education of "poor male white orphan children." Of all the classes of human indigence there are none more helpless and none more entitled to our sympathies than these children of misfortune. They have lost their natural protectors. The arms which have hitherto embraced and sustained them, have been folded in death. They began life in comfort, perhaps in affluence; but now they stand alone, abandoned and helpless, to struggle against the world's coldness, with precarious means of subsistence, with no means of instruction, and treading on that narrow and slippery verge which too often separates want from crime. From this friendless condition they are rescued by the benevolence of Girard, who not merely provides the means of subsistence, but redresses the wrongs of fortune, raises them at once in the scale of being, and qualifies them to be useful members of that society which they would otherwise disturb or corrupt.

How wide the limits of that benevolence may be, it is impossible to conjecture. If the imperfection of language suggests a doubt as to the degree of destitution which makes an "orphan," the greater weakness of our nature forces upon us the melancholy inquiry—what child is there who may not be a poor orphan? Who is there indeed among us whose children may not yet need the blessings of this institution? Let none of us in the confidence of prosperity deem his own offspring secure. Alas! all our prosperity is so vain and shadowy, and misfortune is so constantly in ambush to assail us, that it were presumptuous in any of us to suppose himself beyond the reach of vicissitudes, which would render such an institution the happiest refuge for his children. Yes, fellow citizens, this college is our own; the property of us all. It is intended to remedy misfortunes to which we are all equally liable. And it should be a source of great consolation to each of us, that if, in the ever varying turns of human life, misfortunes should overtake, and death surprise us, they who bear our names, and are destined to be the fathers of our descendants, will here find a home where they may be prepared for future usefulness, and become in turn the protectors and support of their more helpless relatives.

Hereafter, thanks to the bounty of Girard, every father among us may, on his death bed, enjoy the reflection, that although unprovided with fortune, there is secured to his sons that which is at once the means of fortune, and far better than the amplest fortune without it—a good education. This consideration, if any such incentive were wanting, may serve to stimulate the sense of public duty in those who administer the institution, to render it worthy of their own children.

For this purpose, happily, it is only necessary to fulfil the design of the founder, which provides ample means and expressly enjoins the employment of them, to give every kind of liberal and useful instruction.

They would much err, who, comparing this institution with any ordinary standard, regard it as an almshouse or a poor house, in which a certain number of pauper boys, housed together, to be kept from harm, are to receive some hasty rudiments of instruction, and then to be thrust out on the world to make way for a similar swarm of unfortunate children. By no means. The comprehensive benevolence of Girard looked to higher and better things. It is not a poor school, nor a charity school, nor a free school, in their ordinary acceptation. It is, as he denominates it, a "college." The peremptory prohibition that "no distinctive dress should ever be worn," reveals his purpose that these youths shall not be designated as objects of remark or contempt by their contemporaries—that they shall be distinguished only by their conduct, and shall not wear the liveliest character, embracing almost every thing worthy of being studied in the circle of human knowledge. "They shall be instructed," says he, "in the various branches of sound education, comprehending reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, geography, navigation, surveying, practical mathematics, astronomy, natural, chemical and experimental philosophy, the French and Spanish languages—I do not forbid, but I do not recommend the Greek and Latin languages—and such other learning and science as the capacities of the several scholars may merit or warrant."

This excludes nothing—nay, it embraces every thing necessary to form a well educated man. How far this instruction is to be carried—whether the degrees of talent and disposition come to be analyzed, some are to be instructed up to the point of their appropriate capacity, while the more intelligent and more diligent are to be carried into the higher regions of science, are questions of future administrations, to be decided by experience. But it is manifest that all the means of education, thorough, perfect education, are to be provided; that every facility for the acquisition of knowledge should be at hand; nor is there any reason why the Girard college—liberally endowed beyond all example—should not be superior to any existing establishment, in the talents of its professors or the abundance of its means of instruction; and with the blessing of God, so it shall be. There shall be collected within these walls all that the knowledge and research of men have accumulated to enlighten and improve the minds of youth. It will be the civil West Point of this country, where all the sciences which minister to men's happiness, and all the arts of peace, may be thoroughly and practically taught. Its success will naturally render it the model for other institutions—the centre of all improvement in things taught no less than in the art of teaching them—the nursery of instructors as well as pupils—thus, not merely accomplishing the direct benefit of those to whom its instruction extends, but irradiating by its example the whole circumference of human knowledge.

To this intellectual cultivation will be added that, without which all instruction is valueless, and all learning the mere ability for evil—that moral discipline which makes men virtuous and happy at their own firesides. "My desire is," says he, "that all the instructors and teachers in the college shall take pains to instill into the minds of the scholars, the pure principles of morality, so that on their entrance into active life, they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence towards their fellow creatures, and a love of truth, sobriety and industry." When this harmony between the heart and the understanding ceases, mere knowledge is a curse, and men become intellectual statues, with the perfect forms of manly exterior, but cold and selfish and worthless to the community which endures them. Our youth too will not fail to be deeply imbued with that enthusiastic devotion to republican government, and that knowledge of his public rights and duties, which should form the basis of the American character. It is thus that the founder strictly enjoins "that by every proper means, a pure attachment to our republican institutions, and to the sacred rights of conscience as guaranteed by our happy constitution, shall be formed and fostered in the minds of the scholars."

Nor need there be any dread that such an education will disqualify them for their pursuits in after life. In this country all pursuits are open to all men, nor need the humblest citizen despair of the highest honors of the republic. They err who suppose that because men are instructed, they may desert the ordinary walks of employment. There never can be such an over-education of the mass of the people. Men labor not for a want of knowledge, but for want of bread. The cultivation of the mind, like the cultivation of the soil, only renders it more productive, and knowledge becomes the best auxiliary to industry by rendering the laborer more intelligent and more ambitious to excel. The youths thus instructed will go forth into the various pursuits of life, many of which are in their nature mechanical; but they will begin with the disposition and the power not merely to excel in them, but to rise beyond them; and they will emerge from their workshops, as their countrymen Franklin, and Rittenhouse, and Godfrey, and Fulton did before them, reaching all the distinctions of the state which may be honorably won, by talents and character.

That the scene of so many blessings may be appropriate to them, it is intended to make this structure worthy of its great object—worthy of the name of its founder, and of the city which he was so anxious to embellish. Among the sciences most needed in this country, where individual wealth is hastening to indulge its taste, and where every state and city and county requires extensive public buildings, is architecture. Indispensable in the rudest forms of life, it becomes the highest ornament of the most enlightened. In every stage of its progress, the style of its public works displays the character of the nation which rears them. Disproportioned and grotesque among a coarse and unlettered people—in nations more advanced, often over-ornamented with the gaudy profusion and the caprices of tasteless wealth—it is only when sustained by the public spirit of a community at once enlightened and generous, that architecture attains its highest glory—a refined simplicity. Of that perfection it is proposed that this structure shall present a model, the equal at least of similar works in any other country, and not unworthy of the best days of antiquity—a structure which will at once gratify the honorable pride of every citizen of the United States, and form the best study for all the branches of industry connected with architecture.

The enjoyment of so many advantages devolves on us, fellow citizens, the duty of great care and vigilance to preserve them. After bestowing upon our city this rich inheritance, Girard adds this emphatic declaration. "In relation to the organization of the college and its appendages, I leave necessarily many details to the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of Philadelphia, and I do so with the more confidence, as from the nature of my bequests and the benefit to result from them, I trust that my fellow citizens of Philadelphia will observe and evince special care and anxiety in selecting members for their city councils and other agents."

That the generous confidence with which he has thus committed to us the execution of his great designs, should never be betrayed, we owe equally to the name of the founder and to the interests of our posterity; as the whole value of this institution will depend entirely on the administration of it. For myself and my colleagues, to whom the high honor has been assigned of sharing in that administration, I can only say, fellow citizens, that we have assumed the trust with the deepest sense of its responsibility, and a determination to execute it in the spirit of enlightened benevolence which animated the founder; and we shall in our turn retire from it, with the hope that our fair city may always find successors who to equal zeal, add greater ability to serve it.

Under such auspices, we confidently trust that all the expectations of the founder will be realized. With this delightful anticipation, we now invoke the blessing of God on this great undertaking.

In the name of Stephen Girard of the city of Philadelphia, in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, merchant and mariner, we lay the foundation of this Girard college for orphans. We dedicate it to the cause of CHARITY, which not only feeds and clothes the destitute, but wisely confers the greatest blessings on the greatest sufferers;

To the cause of education, which gives to human life its chief value;

To the cause of morals, without which knowledge were worse than unavailing; and finally,

To the cause of our country, whose service is the noblest object to which knowledge and morals can be devoted.

Long may this structure stand, in its majestic simplicity, the pride and admiration of our latest posterity; long may it continue to yield its annual harvest of educated and moral citizens to adorn and to defend our country. Long may each successive age enjoy its still increasing benefits, when time shall have filled its halls with the memory of the mighty dead who have been reared within them, and shed over its outward beauty the mellowing hues of a thousand years of renown.

SKETCH OF THE PROPOSED BUILDING.

The college is located on a tract of land containing forty-five acres, formerly known by the name of Peel Hall, situated on the Ridge road, 12 miles from the city. This estate was purchased from Mr. William Parker, by Mr. Girard, a short time before his death, for the purposes of the college.

The building is peripteral, being 160 feet front, by 217 feet on the flank, including the porticoes.

The columns are 6 feet in diameter at the base, and 54 feet 6 inches high, including capitals and bases.

The order is Grecian Corinthian, from the monument of Lycistratus, or Lantern of Demosthenes at Athens.

The superstructure reposes on a casement, in the form of a truncated pyramid, composed of 12 steps surrounding the whole building. The passage between the columns and the walls of the cell is 15 feet.

All the columns, entablature and pediment, are to be composed of white, and the cell of light blue marble. The floors and stairways are also to be composed of marble.

The vestibules are each 26 by 48 feet; they are ornamented with 16 rich Ionic columns, ante, and entablature, supporting a ceiling embellished with lacunari.

Each story contains four rooms 50 feet square in the clear. The two rooms across the south end of the first story, are divided from each other by marble columns, and entablature of the Corinthian order, so that they may be used as one room, for the purpose of exhibitions, &c.

The whole building is to be heated by means of furnaces placed in the cellar.

The college is located parallel with the city streets, fronting the south. The land at the base of the building is 26 feet above the reservoir on Fairmount. The whole height of the edifice is 97 feet, making the elevation of the roof 123 feet above the said reservoir.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE—NEW YORK.

From the N. Y. Advertiser & Advocate.

The attention of the public is earnestly solicited to the following circular from the managers of the American Institute, inviting attention to their exhibition, to take place on the 15th of October next.

This early promulgation of the intended annual fair is made with a view of giving opportunities to our mechanics to prepare such articles as they may wish to exhibit for the purpose of giving them notoriety—and well merits their particular attention. No method that could be devised for the advancement of the useful and ornamental arts among us, would seem to be so advantageous as the plan here submitted. The collection in one large room of the various productions of American skill and industry, has an undoubted tendency to awaken feelings of a proper national pride, and from the very numerous visitors attracted at these exhibitions, we have no hesitation in giving our decided award in their favor.

What can possibly have a greater tendency to call forth a friendly disposition to native genius, than an opportunity to witness from year to year the many advances which are so rapidly making in the arts in this young and enterprising community? But a few years since the manufactures of the United States were confined to a few of the coarser articles in flax, in cotton, wood and iron. Now, a fair of the American Institute exhibits elegant specimens of almost every article of household and personal comfort and luxury. Musical instruments of the finest tone, and other articles of cabinet ware, of the most exquisite workmanship, cloths, cassimeres, calicoes and muslins of superior fineness and fabric, japanned ware of every kind, saddlery and harness furniture, plate and plated ware of the finest polish, carpets and carpeting, equal in texture and colors to the most brilliant of the imported article, cutlery of all kinds, from the finest surgical instruments to common table furniture. In fine, in every branch of mechanical science the masonic hall, at one of these fairs, exhibits specimens which would attract praise and eulogy even in the great cities of London and Paris.

We speak advisedly on this subject, having attended similar European institutions; nor do we hesitate to say, that for ingenuity, enterprise and skill, no country produces workmen better qualified to minister to the taste, refined enjoyment and comfort of society than those of America; and nothing promotes advancement in their various departments more than grouping together, in annual exhibitions, the various utensils and fabrics fashioned from the abundant raw material with which our country abounds.

To mechanics, therefore, in an especial manner would we recommend an early attention to this truly patriotic plan of promoting their interest, prepared for them by the laudable exertions of this valuable institution. Let them remember that they are fast wearing away the prejudices which formerly existed in favor of foreign fabrics, and that consumers, for the many and various articles of their production, are at last what is most desirable for them. An intelligent and discerning public cannot remain insensible to the claims of their brethren for encouragement and patronage, when the vast store of material with which our country abounds is found, annually, to be increasingly brought forward, fashioned into every variety of shape in implements which the advancing state of society calls for, to minister to its demands.

Let our fellow citizens but once become convinced of the fact, which will not much longer be denied, that we can furnish ourselves with vast numbers of the comforts and luxuries of life from our home resources, with more profit and advantage to the country than they can be derived from abroad, and all parties and denominations will rally around them, to second the endeavors of a paternal government to take every proper measure for their continuance and support.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE.

New York, July 4th 1833.

The sixth annual fair of the American Institute will be held in the city of New York on Tuesday the 15th of October next, and continue three days.

Premiums, consisting of diplomas, or medals, will be awarded, as usual, for such articles of American production as shall be adjudged superior, either in material or workmanship.

As a new impetus seems to have been lately given to American industry, it is confidently expected that the fair announced for October next, will present still more decisive evidence of the advancing condition of our agriculture, our manufactures, and the arts, than any of those which have preceded it.

Your attention in giving publicity to this circular, and aiding the efforts of the institute to effect a very general display of ingenious and useful fabrics, will promote the cause of national industry, by affording ocular demonstration that our skill and perseverance, under adequate protection, can compete with any and all other countries. The variety and perfection of the productions which have on former occasions been displayed at the fairs of the institute, and the rapid reduction of prices manifested at every successive exhibition, has already satisfied many, who before doubted, of our ability to compete with older and more experienced nations; and it is confidently believed that future exhibitions will attract and open the eyes of others, who now undervalue our resources, and who do not realize the perfection of our native improvements, because they have never been spread before them.

Such ingenious and useful machinery as may be conveniently transported, and put in operation, will give interest and spirit to the occasion.

Each article should be labelled with the name of the manufacturer or producer, and with the agent's name and number in this city.

The design is to inform buyers where they can supply themselves with the best articles. In this way, by means of former fairs, many excellent workmen have become better known, and have obtained permanent and profitable customers, who, while they have been better served, have at the same time rewarded and stimulated American skill and industry.

Articles entered for premiums must be delivered as early as Monday the 14th of October.

More particular notices will be published previous to the fair. For any other information which may be desired, apply to either of the managers, in person, or by letter.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 22—VOL. VIII.] BALTIMORE, JULY 27, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,140.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Mr. William Shippey, at the counting house of Messrs. Peter H. Schenck & Co. No. 34½ Pine street, is agent for the REGISTER in the city of New York, and generally authorised to transact all its business, in the receipt of orders, subscriptions, &c. &c. and will attend promptly thereto.

THE CHOLERA.

Ten of the Indian youths at the Choctaw academy, at Blue Spring, Kentucky, have died of the cholera, and col. R. M. Johnson has lost fifteen of his slaves.

In the town of Richmond, Kentucky, in twenty days, up to the 16th inst. but nine persons had died of cholera, six whites and three blacks. The town was assuming its wonted lively appearance, its stores and offices were again open. But the disease was still raging in the country.

In the town of Lancaster, Ky. 116 persons had fallen victims to the disease from the 19th of June to the 8th of July, 58 whites and 58 blacks.

In Flemingsburgh 66 deaths had occurred, being about 1 in every 10 of its population.

In Lawrenceburg, Ky. 89 deaths had taken place out of a population of 250.

In Scott county, Ky. the disease was making the most frightful ravages.

The board of health of Maysville, Ky. announced, on the 11th inst. that the cholera had ceased to prevail in that city, and that all persons whose business or inclination may induce them to visit that place could do so in safety.

The canal hands at Williamsport, Md. are now said to be entirely clear of the disease.

The Wheeling Gazette of the 20th inst. says:—In Triadelphia, a village 8 miles east of this place on the turnpike, containing about 50 inhabitants, the cholera broke out with great violence on the 11th inst. In a few days there were 17 cases and 8 deaths. We understand the village has been almost entirely deserted.

Little Rock, June 16.—The steamboat Reindeer, capt. Cockran, arrived at this place on Sunday evening last, from New Orleans, in a most distressing condition—having lost SIX of her crew and passengers, by cholera, since she left the mouth of White river. One of her passengers was lying at the point of death when she arrived, and is still lying in rather a critical situation, and almost every soul on board was more or less affected with the epidemic.

The Pittsburg Gazette states that the cholera has never been known in that city as an epidemic, and the board of health announce, officially, that from the 11th of June, when the disease made its appearance, up to the 16th July, only 39 persons had died from the disease.

There had been little or no melioration of the disease in Kanawha Salines, Va. and its vicinity up to the 18th inst. The whole number of deaths, as ascertained in the county, we learn from the Charleston Banner, was 74. In Charleston, Va. there had been six or seven cases of cholera and three or four deaths.

The National Intelligencer, on the authority of a student announces that the cholera had made its appearance at Princeton, New Jersey, and that the students of the college had, in consequence, been permitted to return to their homes.

In Indiana the disease is spreading, as is also the case in Ohio. Deaths have occurred at several of the small towns on the Ohio river, and in the interior, we notice deaths at Lebanon, Dayton and Columbus, though in none of these places does it appear to possess the malignancy which marked its progress in Kentucky.

STRANGE! The following, extracted from a Connecticut paper, has been spoken of in "tribute to Andrew Jackson!"

VOL. XLIV—SIG. 24.

"He travels unarmed and unattended, but by his household, by day or night, through a land where every house he sees is his home, and every man he meets is already enrolled as his life guard."

The remark is well—and proper. But the servile stupidity is in reference to it as something extraordinary. The "collar" is manifest! None but a grovelling slave—a fit subject for the sultan of Turkey, would imagine a president of the United States travelling otherwise—for so all our presidents have travelled, and, we trust in heaven! always will do. We have seen president Adams taking care of his own baggage in a steamboat—and sitting down at the common table, like any other passenger—and thus, we hope, that it ever will be. And there are tens of thousands of men, who were most decided in their opposition to the election of general Jackson to the presidency, who would have risked their lives to have prevented the insult inflicted on president Jackson by ex-lieutenant Randolph, had they been present, and foresaw what was about to happen. And the general idea given out in the preceding extract, is as old as the constitution. We saw general WASHINGTON thus proceeding to New York, to take his first oath as president—and have seen president WASHINGTON on his return to Mount Vernon—"unarmed and unattended, but by his own household;" and beheld a negro, doff his three cornered revolutionary hat, and heartily shake hands with him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen"—whose "name and fame" will outlive the pyramids of Egypt, and be more and more cherished as time shall hallow their adamant. It is the glory of our country that such things always have been; and to suppose that they can be otherwise is—"moral treason."

UNITED STATES BANK. The New York Commercial of the 18th inst. remarks: "The government deposits have become a fruitful source of speculation, and some of the stock brokers are endeavoring to inculcate a belief that the president intends to remove the public money to the state banks. If he has any such intention, we should incline to the opinion that he would not again entrust certain folks in Wall street with the secret. Be that, however, as it may, it is certain that a premium of 25 per cent. was paid yesterday in Wall street, to insure that the deposits would not be transferred before the next meeting of congress, and Mr. Jacob Barker accepted the premium, and wrote such policy."

IRON. From the Albany Daily Advertiser. It is not only our own opinion, but we are confirmed in the belief, by many with whom we have conversed, that the manufacturing of castings is brought to greater perfection in Albany than in any other place in this country, and, we may add, even Europe. The hollow ware of Bartlett, Bent & Co. is preferred to the best "Scotch hollow ware"—the stoves of Dr. Nott receive the preference wherever they are known, and the machinery castings of Many & Ward, and others, are equal to those of any foundry in the world.

The amount of castings consumed in this section of the country, may be judged of by the following facts:

Howard, Nott & Co. melt annually about	1,000 tons.
Bartlett, Bent & Co. do.	350
I. & J. Townsend do.	300
Rathbone & Silliman do.	200
Many & Ward do.	450
Total	2,300

About one thousand persons obtain their support from the employment derived from these establishments.

In addition to the amount of irons melted here, Messrs. Heermans, Rathbone & Co. sell annually 750 tons stove plates (from Philadelphia) and Gill, Cooper & Co. about 300 tons from same place.

From the best information we can obtain, there are about 2,300 tons of castings manufactured and sold in this city, and about 1,250 tons imported and sold here—making in all 3,550 tons.

VERMONT. The "union" proceedings noticed in the last "Register," it appears, will be strongly opposed—and Mr. Seymour, late of the senate of the United States, has been nominated, in several of the anti-Jackson papers, for the office of governor.

NEW YORK CANALS. From the Albany Argus. The tolls collected on all the canals of the state, for the month of June, amount to the sum of $174,646 90—being $3,260 38 more than the receipts of the corresponding month of the last season. The following statement exhibits the sum received on each canal for the month of June, to wit:

On the Erie canal	$148,170 46
Champlain canal	21,165 24
Cayuga and Seneca canal	2,411 17
Oswego canal	2,900 03

$174,646 90

The whole sum received for tolls from the opening of navigation to the 30th of June, two months and eight days, is $500,211 94 cents; being $58,240 96 more than the receipts up to the same period in 1832.

[The increased amount of the tolls on these canals is not proportioned to the increase of business on them—for the rate of the tolls had been considerably reduced.]

UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK. The following is the close of Dr. Matthew's address, on laying the corner stone of the university of New York:

"With these hopes and prospects, in the name of the most high God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, from whom cometh down every good gift and every perfect gift, and with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning, do we now lay this corner stone of the university of the city of New York; and with the humble hope of his blessing and favor, we dedicate it "To the cause of freedom—of freedom, civil, intellectual, and religious; and to that high cause for which our fathers were first exiles and then warriors. May this institution furnish able and devoted sons, who will appreciate and maintain the privileges transmitted to them as their heritage and birthright. We dedicate it "To the cause of letters—of science and of education; the brightest earthly ornaments of a nation, free and happy as ours, and without which, freedom itself soon degenerates into coarse licentiousness, and results in anarchy and every evil work. We dedicate it "To the cause of religion—for without this, the tree of knowledge is severed from the tree of life; but with it freedom and knowledge alike become sanctified into blessings that endure forever.

"And firmly and permanently as we have now laid this corner stone in its place, would we also lay this institution deep in the affections and confidence of this community, and commit it confidently to the care and patronage of Him who sees the end from the beginning, and in whom we trust, that after our names and memorials shall have passed away, this university will remain a pillar of light and glory to our city and our nation. Esto perpetua."

EASTON, PA. The anniversary was celebrated with great spirit in this prosperous town, by military and civic processions, &c. but was specially remarkable because of the laying of the corner stone of "Lafayette college," on which a noble edifice is to be erected, with appropriate ceremonies.

On settling the stone to its place, colonel Porter, (president of the board of trustees), said:

"Here, on the anniversary of our independence, we dedicate this building to the cause of science and education. May it long be the seat of virtue and learning. May the example of him whose name it bears and who is well described as the model of republican chivalry, the hero of three revolutions, of two centuries and of both hemispheres, inspire the youth who shall be here educated, with the proper spirit of patriotism and philanthropy.

And may the all bounteous Author of nature bless this our undertaking, protect those engaged in completing this structure from accident and harm, and long preserve it from decay."

BALTIMORE. The ship-building business continues to be prosecuted in Baltimore with unabated activity. Within a short time past, the keels of five brigs, six schooners and a steamboat have been laid down, the greater proportion of which, including the steamboat, are building for account of owners in other cities. Two noble ships, of 500 to 600 tons each, are advancing towards completion, and one of them is expected to be launched in about a fortnight. They are both designed for merchants of Petersburg, Va. Our naval architects possess that peculiar skill and talent in the line of their profession which cannot fail to secure them full employment, as long as first rate vessels are required. [Amer.

In the quarter ending July 1—there was inspected in Baltimore 134,047 bbls. and 1,494 $\frac{1}{2}$ bbls. wheat flour—87 hhds. and 5,226 bbls. corn meal—146 bbls. and 35 $\frac{1}{2}$ bbls. beef, 3,367 bbls. pork—the two last nearly all "foreign" packed.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. A late report of a committee of the board of directors shews:

That the receipts for transportation during the last six months, appears, by the accompanying statement of the superintendent of transportation, to have been $92,556 86

That the expenses of transportation, and the salary of the superintendent of transportation were $41,534 35

That the repairs of the road, machinery and attendance on the same, and salary of superintendent of machinery, were 18,374 89

The wear and tear of horses and harness is estimated at 2,800 00

62,709 24

Leaving, after deducting the foregoing items, the sum of $29,847 62

The income and expenses of transportation in the first six months of 1832 and 1833, are thus shewn:

Income.	Expenses of transportation.
1832, $78,160 44	1832, $41,414 29
1833, 92,556 86	1833, 41,534 35

NORTH CAROLINA. The internal improvement convention of the state of North Carolina met at Raleigh, on the 4th instant. The honorable D. L. Swan, governor of the state, was chosen president, and two secretaries were appointed. One hundred and eighteen delegates were present. A committee, composed of one member from each county delegation, was appointed, to whom were referred all matters of inquiry, with instructions to make a general report. This committee made a detailed report on Friday afternoon, which produced a protracted discussion. After being modified in several particulars, it was finally adopted, on Saturday. Nearly the whole of the debate which occurred in the convention, took place on a resolution reported by the committee, which affirms "that the true policy of the state requires that its funds should, in the first instance, be exclusively applied to providing the means of internal transportation, and in creating and improving markets within her own limits." The true point appears to have been whether the necessary improvements should not terminate at some point or points in North Carolina, rather than be connected with improvements, in other states on the north, south and west, which might lead the trade to Norfolk, or to Charleston, or down the western waters to New Orleans.

The resolutions finally adopted declare it expedient that "a liberal system of internal improvements should be immediately organized and vigorously prosecuted;"

That the general assembly ought to provide "by law or otherwise," a fund for purposes of internal improvement;

That this fund ought to be applied "in the first instance, exclusively" to creating and improving markets within the limits of the state;

That provision ought to be made by law, that the state shall subscribe for two-fifths of the stock of every company chartered for internal improvement; and

That every company so chartered, ought to have power to cross and intersect at pleasure, any work previously authorised or made.

Committees of correspondence and to address the people of the state on the subject were appointed, and a memorial was directed to be laid before the next legislature. A new convention was recommended, to be held in November next, to deliberate farther.

OHIO CANALS. The tolls received on the Ohio canal, in May last, amounted to $16,933 80—same month, last year, $10,147 43. On the Ohio and Miami canal, last May, $3,340 14—same month, last year, $3,734 58.

NATCHEZ is about 400 miles from the ocean—but about to become a great seaport, by the aid of steam vessels ascending the current of the Mississippi, towing up ships. The state of Mississippi now exports about 225,000 bales of cotton, and is growing rapidly in population and means to double the quantity, if the market remains good.—There seems hardly a limit to the amount of cotton which may be produced.

THE DUTIES which accrued at Boston in the two first quarters of 1832, amounted to $2,647,130 24: in the two first quarters of the present year $1,821,957 79. The reduction is chiefly caused, no doubt, by admitting coffee, tea, &c. duty free; and yet the price of these articles has not declined.

In Philadelphia, the amount of duties in the two first quarters of 1832, was $2,310,178 49: in those of 1833—$1,322,772 23. The duties which accrued at New York were mentioned in the last REGISTER.

THE COAL TRADE. 111,577 tons have descended the Schuylkill—the present season, up to the 14th inst. The cost of coal, at different points of embarkation is from $2 00 to $2 50 per ton, and the freight to Philadelphia from 112½ to 125 cents per ton.

THE NORTH WEST. A lot of ground in Buffalo (without buildings) lately sold for $75,000. It was purchased a few years ago for $800. A steamboat has been built at Huron, (on lake Erie) 200 feet keel, and her engines are to have the power of 240 horses! Well situated stores in Detroit rent for 600 or 700 dollars.

WHEAT. The standard weight for merchantable wheat this season, has been fixed by the city millers of Richmond, at 58 lbs. the bushel. Last season it was 60, and half the crop weighed 61. [Whig.]

BRITISH IMPORTS OF GRAIN, MEAL AND FLOUR. By a parliamentary return just published, it appeared that the following quantities of foreign and colonial grain paid the duties for the home consumption during the interval between the first day of the operations of the corn bill (9 Geo. IV. c. 60) which took effect on the 15th of July, 1828, and the 1st of April last.

	Foreign corn.	Colonial.	Total.
Wheat,	4,795,746	553,905	5,148,651
Barley,	1,067,068	213	1,067,370
Oats,	1,455,987	8,818	1,464,815
Rye,	141,869		141,869
Peas,	195,201	5,521	200,722
Beans	178,452		178,452
Buckwheat,	34,859		34,859
Indian corn,	100,225	11	100,236
Quarters,	7,968,405	367,578	8,336,083

The annual average of foreign grain entered for home consumption during the period in question, appears, therefore, to have been as under—

	Quarters.	Peas,	Quarters.
Wheat,	895,410	Peas,	43,900
Barley,	185,630	Beans,	31,030
Oats,	254,759	Buckwheat,	6,060
Rye,	25,630	Indian corn,	17,430

The duties paid upon the 7,968,405 quarters of foreign corn amounted, within the above interval, to £2,501,713, being an average of about £435,080 per annum. Those on colonial corn, paid on 367,578 quarters did not produce more than £60,378.

The quantity of wheat, meal and flour, being foreign, on which the duties were paid, was 1,880,534 cwt. from which the revenue derived the sum of £182,888; that of colonial articles of the like description was 372,446 cwt. which paid duties to the amount of £15,076.

[The quarter of wheat is 8 bushels, of 70 lbs.]

A MACHINE has been invented in Cincinnati for cutting wheat, or any other small grain, by horse power. It is stated that it will, when propelled by two horses, cut as fast as eight persons can bind. A fair trial has been made of it in the presence of several members of the agricultural society of Hamilton county. It met their fullest approbation, and the editor of the Cincinnati Advertiser, who has seen the machine, expresses his opinion that it may be applied to cutting grass also. This, if it proves fully successful, is an important invention; but so many ingenious novelties have been brought forward of late, and so few have answered the expectations at first held out of their utility, that we are disposed to be somewhat cautious and incredulous.

SPEER OIL. The city of Boston has contracted for a supply of oil for the street lamps at the following rates, viz:—summer oil 90 cents, and winter 1 dollar per gallon. Greatly as the whaling business has increased within a few years, the supply of oil does not equal the demand, and the price is therefore constantly and steadily on the increase. It is almost impossible that the market should be over-stocked.* [Salem Gazette.]

AN IMMENSE VINEYARD. Von Meyerfiky, a landowner at Pesth, in Hungary, is completing a vineyard in that vicinity, which will probably be the largest ever known in Europe. Its superficial area is nearly four hundred acres, and its produce, even in moderately favored seasons, will not be short of five and twenty thousand sulms, or 375,000 English gallons. As a receptacle for this produce, the grower is erecting a cellar sufficiently spacious to receive double the quantity. Meyerfiky's brother, too, is by no means a small dealer in this branch of the liquor trade; for he is on the eve of starting a rival to the famous sire of Heidelberg, viz: a tun made entirely of marble, and capable of containing 63,000 gallons.

A CURIOSITY. A gentleman of New Haven, (Conn.) has several volumes of the first newspaper that was ever published in England. It was commenced in 1558, and is entitled "The English Mercurie" which, by authority, is imprinted at London, by Christopher Baker, her highness's [queen Elizabeth's] printer.

CASE OF SEDUCTION. From the Lynchburg Virginian, July 15. The superior court of this corporation was engaged the greater part of Wednesday and Thursday last in the trial of a case of seduction; the first action of this sort, we believe, which has been brought before it since its organization. The plaintiff was Benjamin A. Phillips, who instituted a suit against Tinsley Padgett, for the seduction of Maria Phillips, under a promise of marriage, the consequence of which seduction was the birth of an infant during the last winter. We were not at court on Wednesday and did not hear the testimony, but the character of it may be inferred from the fact that the jury returned a verdict against the defendant of thirteen hundred dollars damages—a sum, according to his statement of his pecuniary resources, which he is unable to pay.

GOV. STOKES. At the anniversary dinner, at Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, the following toast was given—By the president of the day—I give, a friend, a statesman, and a revolutionary soldier, now a distinguished guest—gov. Stokes, of North Carolina.

After this toast was announced, gov. Stokes rose and said—"Gentlemen, among strangers, few of whom I have ever seen before, and fewer still of whom I ever expect to see again, I feel highly gratified with the attention shown me on this occasion—I shall ever remember it with pleasure. I entered the service of my country at a very early age; I was in the battle of King's Bridge at Norfolk—I have been 44 years in the public service, (this year will make 45), and I expect to die in the service of my country, as I am old and have but a short time to live. I will give you—The young, rising, and flourishing state of Missouri."

MISS CRANDELL, a young lady, has been imprisoned in Connecticut, because that she persisted in keeping a school for "young ladies of color," at Canterbury—"contrary to law." She has been bailed out.

THE SIAMESE TWINS, being at Cleveland, Ohio, were visited by Black Hawk and his party, who seemed much interested in seeing them, and asked many questions. Black Hawk addressed the twins, (through the interpreter), for five minutes or more. The substance of the address was—"That he and his friends had heard of the twins, and having been very anxious to see them that they felt pleased in having their wishes gratified."

He said "the Great Spirit had made them as they were, and would protect them and be their guide and protector, should they again cross the great waters."—The concluding phrase of his address was, "the Great Spirit will call both to him at once."

The Indians sat with the twins for nearly fifteen minutes.

He added "that he would show to his red brethren the portrait which they had presented to him, and would tell them what he and his friends had seen?"

"WESTERN WOMEN. I saw there a couple of splendid western beauties. The south produces elegant women, and the valley of the Mississippi splendid ones. There is an originality—a raciness—among the women of the west, which is eminently attractive. They touch the confines of civilization and barbarism with such a daring grace, that the precise petits maitres of the Atlantic are thunderstruck or turned into gaping statues at their fascinating wildness and enchanting audacity. A western or southern belle fresh from the woods, is a sealed book to an Atlantic dandy. He cannot understand her; he has not the key; she is beyond his vision. To know them properly; to estimate them accurately, we must have been lost on the Alleghanies; shipwrecked on a foreign coast, drank sherbet with the Turk; tasted the river Jordan, or been killed and eaten by pirates. It is quite distressing to see the Atlantic belles pick their way through a crowded drawing room. They sometimes stand on the outward edge of the crowd, and look despairingly to a friend at the other end of the room, as one would look upon the spires of Cincinnati from the pinnacles of the Alleghanies, or a traveller look across the Arabian deserts. A western belle dashes through the crowd as she would through the river mounted on horseback. Nothing impedes her. She makes manners, and controls the rulers of society as she marches through it—throwing dandies aside as a ship does the billows. The southern fine lady glides like a sylph; full of feeling and passion, which give edge to her conversation and fire to her eyes."

IRELAND. It is almost constitutional with us to wish well to the oppressed people of Ireland—so long have we entertained a deep sense of the injuries inflicted upon them by the "tyrant" which also oppressed our fathers, in our own land; but have oftentimes had to regret proceedings of the character of those stated below—though the "organization of volunteers" mentioned was only, as we believe, in the idea of some ignorant person. And it is also a great misfortune, that foreigners, becoming citizens of the United States, do not always recollect that they are a part of the general mass of the people, and should have only such motives and feelings as belong to the new allegiance they have voluntarily made; not being a separate party, because of the place of their nativity.

The "Dublin Pilot," under the head of "American sympathy for Ireland," says—"We have received a copy of the United States Gazette, of April the 18th, in which is contained a long account of a public meeting held in Philadelphia, of gentlemen interesting themselves in the condition of Ireland. The proceedings of this meeting are too strongly worded to be given publicly to in an Irish paper. The discussion was a very animated one, as it referred to the coercive bill. The result was to appoint a committee to prepare a constitution and by laws for the proposed organization of "the association of the friends of Ireland." A correspondent states, "that meetings will be held all over America, and volunteers organized on the model of 1782."

"Every good rule must work both ways." What would some of us have thought, in 1798, if such proceedings had been intimated as happening in England—with respect to the condition of things in the United States?

BRITISH WEST INDIA COLONIES. The following statements, which we subjoin from the official returns for the year 1829, will be some guide as to the value of these colonies to the mother country:

The exports from these colonies to England amounted to	£9,087,919
The same to other parts	3,000,000

Gross exports	£12,087,919
The imports into the colonies from England amounted to	£5,521,169
The same from other parts	3,100,000

Gross imports	£8,621,169
And this trade gave employment to 18,000 British seamen.

STATISTICS—ST. PETERSBURGH. The following is a table of the population of St. Petersburg in 1832—males 294,468, females 154,900; total 449,368. Among them are ecclesiastics 2,188, nobles 34,079. Soldiers 39,437, merchants 10,828, artisans 24,179, citizens 36,732, of the middle class 66,566, foreigners of various conditions, with the exception of merchants and artisans, 7,199, domestic servants 94,000, peasants 127,865, inhabitants of Ochta 3,388. Births, males 5,198, females 4,969; total 10,167. Deaths, by various diseases, males 11,032, females 5,230, by accident 675; total 16,937. Excess of deaths 6,758. This great excess of deaths is not to be ascribed to the insalubrity of the climate, but to the disproportion between the number of the sexes. The male proportion being nearly double the female, the number of families is, of course, not proportionate to the gross amount of the population; accordingly, the excess of deaths is found in the males, and ought to be deducted.

"LORD PANGHULOO." To those who are in the habit of puffing great men and little men, we recommend the following extract from a recent narrative of Housain Ben Ismail El Ilmu, in which he describes the natural and supernatural qualifications of his master, Abubaker lord Panghuloo, a Mahometan Malay chief who rules at Malacca. The puffers and flatterers in this country will not meet with any thing in this more extravagant than they are accustomed to, but they may find some new expressions to grace their adulation.

"Praise be to Allah and Mahomed who is his prophet! under whose favor ruleth in wisdom and power the mighty chief, pre-elected of God, ARUBAKEN lord Panghuloo of the country of Nanning; the comforter of his people in peace, and when battle rages, the shedder-of the blood of his enemies; the shield of his wide domain and the vanquisher of invaders, who healeth with a touch those who ail, and with a breath disperseth his foes; whose house is the abode of propriety; who is faithful, valiant and discreet; courteous to his neighbors, and who is continually manifesting his tenderness to the needy; may prosperity, honor and lengthened sway wait upon his highness, and upon his foes confusion and despairing defeat; of whose proceedings in peace I indite the justice and wisdom, and of whose actions in war I record the tempestuous and scattering fury; and from whose countenance the rays of conquest and greatness illumine the page of me, his servant Housain Ben Ismail El Ilmu, recording his praise-worthy and valorous acts, that they may be known in all countries both above and below the wind, and be read by those who dwell to the east and the west of the sun, that his example may be remembered, and his greatness prolonged—And so be it."

[We know not the paper to which "credit" is due for the preceding—else would gladly award it. It is a fine specimen of crawling and puffing—and well fitted to the present state of the times.]

RELICS OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS. Certain interesting relics of the never to be forgotten queen of sorrows as well as of beauty, are yet amongst us, and in the possession of personages of her own gentle sex. The celebrated casket, said to have contained the fatal letters produced to excuse her condemnation, grace the cabinet of the honorable Miss Grimson. The pearl necklace, which used to adorn her beautiful neck in the bright days of her charms and her power, is the sometimes ornament of her no less lovely countrywoman, Miss McDonald. And the hallowed little cross which lay on her bosom in the hour of execution, is regarded as a sacred inheritance in the family of the duchess of Richmond. And, perhaps, what is the most affecting relic of them all, the last garment which folded around her in the last act of that horrible scene, and stained with her blood, is in the possession of the house of Throckmorton. Some touching verses show how often it has been embalmed with a tear from the gentle eyes of lady Throckmorton, the beautiful friend of the sweet bard of the "The Task."

"TRUE CHIVALRY." The following is related by Mr. Rush—"Sir Felton Harvey, aid-de-camp of the duke of Wellington, had lost an arm in battle. Whilst one of the battles in Spain was raging, the duke gave him an order to convey to another part of the field. Half across it, a French officer was seen galloping towards him. Sir Felton's sword hung by his side, though he could not wield it; it was his right arm he had lost, and the other held the bridle; but he faced the foe, looking defiance. As they swiftly drew near, the Frenchman raised himself on his stirrups, his sword uplifted. Discovering, at the very moment for the stroke, his adversary to be defenceless, he brings down his weapon in the form of a complimentary salute, and rapidly passes on. He gave his salute in silence." This was true chivalry.

BRIEF NOTICES.

We shall carefully refrain from entering into the merits of the matter, but having two or three times noticed the subject, we feel it right to say—that the excitement in Rhode Island, against the rev. Mr. Avery remains unabated. It would almost seem, indeed, that though acquitted by the verdict of a jury, he has yet to pass through the ordeal of public opinion.

According to the Dublin Journal, the number of Protestants who have emigrated from Ireland during the last few years is as follows—In 1829, 12,000; in 1830, 21,000; in 1831, 29,500; in 1832, 31,500—making a total of 94,000 during the short space of four years.

The New Haven Herald states that Messrs. P. S. Galpin & Co. being desirous of removing their carpet factory to the east bank of the harbor, contracted with Messrs. Wooding & Sperry, of Hamden, who effected the removal in a few days, bodily, without the workmen ceasing from their work. It was first taken up an ascent of 20 feet, and then conveyed about three-fourths of a mile. The building is 76 by 30 feet, and contains 16 looms, with apparatus.

John Randolph, at the time of his death, was in possession of 318 slaves, and 180 horses, of which 120 were blood horses.

With deep regret we announce the death of general John Coffee. He died on the 7th inst. in the 62d year of his age, at his residence near Florence, Alabama.

This brave man was one of the noblest specimens of an American citizen soldier. We saw him last winter on a visit to the president, to whom he had been a right arm throughout the war, and were greatly struck with the plain, unpretending, farmer-like appearance of one, who had been a thunderbolt in battle. He had nothing of "the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war" about him. Although of exceedingly robust, Herculean person, he had not a martial look. His manners were gentle—the expression of his countenance quiet and thoughtful—and his whole air and aspect wore the appearance of serious, religious feeling.

And this tone of mind, roused to enthusiasm, characterized his soldiery. One of the bravest men that ever led a column to the charge, and inspiring all with his own energy, the animating motive in his own bosom, was devotion to his country.

According to a Berlin article of the 7th May last, the university of Berlin has forty-six regular and forty-four extra professors; forty-three private tutors—altogether one hundred and thirty-three teachers. There are eighteen hundred and thirty-two regular students, and from five to six hundred persons who follow courses of lectures.

Joel Clough, the murderer of Mrs. Hamilton, who was under sentence of death, made his escape from the Mount Holly state prison between Saturday night and Sunday morning last; but was captured about dusk on Sunday evening. He was discovered coming out of a swamp on the Rancoas, by a colored man, about three miles west of Mount Holly, who gave the alarm, and was soon joined by several persons. Clough made no resistance though he had an axe in his possession. He was taken back to prison, and was to have been executed yesterday.

A most foul and unnatural murder was committed in Pittsylvania county, Va. on the 10th instant by Armistead Craft, on the person of his brother, George Craft, Jr. at the house of his father Philip Craft. Immediately after committing the deed the murderer fled; and the father was taken up on suspicion of having aided the escape of his son and thereby becoming an accessory after the fact; but after full examination before a court of justices, was discharged, the testimony not being sufficient.

The citizens of Lexington, Ky. held a meeting on the 10th inst. to take into consideration the expediency of establishing an orphan asylum in that place. A committee was appointed to solicit subscriptions and draft an address to the citizens of the city and county.

Melancholy.—We learn, that recently, in a neighboring town, an effigy of the rev. E. K. Avery was suspended in a public situation, at some period in the night. In the morning it was seen by the people passing, and among others, by a young man who had, for a brief space, been subjected to mania melancholica. He immediately came home, and observed to his mother and brother: "They say that the man hung up out there is intended to represent Mr. Avery—but it don't. I know what it's meant for—it's meant for me!" He seemed grieved, and "more in sorrow than in anger." About two hours after, he was found dead, having hanged himself with a cord. Thus it would seem, that in one instance at least the suspension of effigies has been attended with more immediately serious consequences, than the excitement of the public feeling, which they naturally enhance or engender.

Several cases of hydrophobia have recently been mentioned in the newspapers. Elicited by them, the following cure is published in the Boston Morning Post; of what efficacy it is to be considered, remains to be seen—

"The inhabitants of Gadici have made the important discovery, that near the ligament of the arm or beast bitten by a rabid animal, and becoming rabid, pustules of a whitish hue make their appearance, which open spontaneously about the 13th day after the bite; and at this time they say, the first symptoms of true hydrophobia make their appearance. Their method of cure consists in opening these pustules, and making the patient spit out the ichor and fluid which run from them, often washing the mouth with salt water. This operation should be performed the ninth day after the bite. The remedy is so effectual, that with these people this hitherto incurable disease has lost its terrors."

The steamboat Binnets of Blue has been recently lost between Savannah and Mobile. The passengers and crew with the exception of one negro were all saved.

A public meeting has been called in Edgefield, S. C. to take into consideration the construction of a branch from the Charleston and Hamburg rail road to the former town.

The manufacturers of iron in the city of Pittsburgh, have determined to abandon the present mode of weighing iron in gross, and adopt that used in weighing other articles of merchandise. This alteration to take effect on the first day of August next. The price of iron, however, is to be reduced, to correspond with the reduction in weight.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Liverpool papers to the 9th June, inclusive.
ENGLAND.

The question of rechartering the bank of England, was brought forward in the house of commons by the chancellor of the exchequer, on the 31st of May, and carried, and the plan as proposed by ministers has been subsequently acceded to at a meeting of the stockholders. The favorable result of this important question has given a fresh impulse to the commercial and unimpaired affairs of England. Confidence being restored, the funds rose, money was plenty, and business was moving on with healthy action. The American merchants will be glad to learn that cotton in Liverpool had risen three-eighths of a penny, and that upwards of forty-seven thousand bags had been sold during the first week of June. We trust, however, says the New York Commercial, that speculation in this country will proceed with caution. Remember the fatal year of 1835.

On the 3d of June, the duke of Wellington brought forward a motion for an address to the king, calling on his majesty to enforce a strict neutrality in relation to Portugal, and charging the ministers ever since they had been secure in their places, with pursuing a course most injurious to the country. After a long debate the motion was carried; contents 88, non-contents 68, majority against ministers 20.

The reply of the king to the address of the lords was presented by the marquis of Wellesley, lord Steward of his majesty's household, on the 6th. It was laconic, to the point, and gave little satisfaction to the party of the duke.

An address approbatory of the conduct of ministers had subsequently been introduced in the house of commons, and after a fiery debate carried; for the motion 361, against it 98, majority for ministers 263.

The discussion on the slave question came up in the house of commons on the 3d. Mr. O'Connell opened the debate, and spoke at great length in favor of immediate emancipation. Lord Sandon followed, and for the purpose of harmonising, was also in favor of immediate emancipation; but offered an amendment, increasing the grant to the proprietors of slaves to twenty millions, and a loan of ten millions. The chancellor thought the sum too large. After much discussion, Mr. Stanley said, he congratulated the country and the world that the fiat had gone forth; that the abolition of slavery was inevitable; and that the question was now reduced to the matter of compensation. The first resolution was then put and carried; and as lord Sandon did not press his motion, the committee rose and had leave to sit again.

Lord King, baron of Oakham, died in London on the 4th of June, he is succeeded in his title by his son Peter, now lord King.

Prince George, the only son of the duke of Cumberland, is said to have become totally blind. He has been looked upon since the death of the duke of York as the probable occupant of the throne, and husband to the princess Victoria.

Disturbances continued in Ireland.

Sir Stratford Canning had arrived at Paris on his way from Madrid to London.

FRANCE.

A riot took place at Boyev, near Amiens on the morning of the 23d ult. The gen d'armes were compelled to retire, at first; but being reinforced were enabled to take five prisoners, whom they handcuffed and were about conducting them to Amiens. The sight of the handcuffs so incensed the citizens, that the mob was again rallied in great numbers, and the gen d'armes obliged to abandon their charge. A detachment from the garrison of Amiens arrived and quelled the riot without bloodshed.

The colliers in the neighborhood of Valenciennes, to the number of 5,000 had tumultuously assembled and committed great excesses. Ten thousand troops had marched against them for the purpose of quelling the insurrection.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

England and France are said to have made a treaty with the king of Holland, in which they yielded to the latter those points for which he so strenuously contended. Belgium it is said is left in the precarious state in which William has thought proper to place her, occupying territory which she cannot keep, and not occupying all the parts belonging to her; without fixed boundaries, possessed of nothing which constitutes stability, inspires confidence, or insures the future happiness of a country. The elections in Belgium have resulted in favor of the Catholic interest.

GERMANY.

Serious disturbances took place at the fete of Hambach, and the Bavarian troops were compelled to charge the multitude; five persons were killed and fifty-four taken prisoners. Symptoms of disaffection had also been manifested by parties of college students.

TURKEY.

The viceroy of Egypt had ordered Ibrahim pacha to retire immediately behind the Taurus, with all his army.

The revolts against the sultan in Albania and Bosnia had become general. The Ottoman troops have been driven from all the places they occupied and the Turkish functionaries deprived of their employments. The Servians, from Vidin to Nissa, unanimously refuse to pay their taxes, and the Greeks of the districts of Verevin and Greneva are also in open rebellion against the grand seignor's government.

GREECE.

An order issued by the regency, declaring all Greeks foreigners who do not take an oath of fidelity to king Otho, had excited general discontent and in some places had been openly resisted.

ITALY.

An insurrection had broken out in Italy having for its object a republican government. The centre of operations was to be Chambery, and the Polish refugees were to aid. The plan is said to have been a simultaneous movement on the Sardinian states, France and the French parts of Switzerland.

PORTUGAL.

The accounts from Oporto are unfavorable to the success of Donna Maria's cause. The cholera was spreading throughout the kingdom.

THE PRECIOUS METALS.

From a late London paper.

An elaborate paper prepared in the foreign office has been laid before parliament, which decides the question as to the comparative productions of the American gold and silver mines during the last ten years, ending with 1829, and the periods immediately preceding. This return exhibits a material falling off; and although much of the diminution may, perhaps, fairly be attributed to the unsettled state of the countries in which the mines are situated, still there is abundant reason for concluding that the source itself is approaching to exhaustion. From this curious document we make the following abstract:—From 1790 to 1809, the mines of Mexico yielded gold to the value of £4,523,378, silver £94,429,303; those of Panama, gold £223,518, silver —; Chili, gold £863,974, silver £944,736; Buenos Ayres, gold £1,862,955, silver £19,286,830. From 1810 to 1821, Mexico yielded gold £1,913,075, silver £45,388,739; Panama, gold £25,033, silver —; Chili, gold £1,904,514, silver £878,188; Buenos Ayres, gold £2,161,940, silver £7,895,842; Russia, gold £3,703,743, silver £1,502,981. The returns from Monte Video are too vague to lead to any safe results. The comparative increase or decrease in periods of ten years is as follows:—Mexico from 1790 to 1799 and 1800 to 1809, in gold an increase of 16 1-10th, in silver a decrease of 22-5th, on the whole a decrease of 13 5th, as compared with the first period; from 1810 to 1819, in gold a decrease of 30, of silver a decrease of 48 3-5th, on the whole a decrease of 47 4-5th as compared with the first period; from 1820 to 1829, in gold a decrease of 78 7-10th, silver a decrease of 56 2-5th, on the whole a decrease of 57 2-5th as compared with the first period. Panama from 1790 to 1799 and 1800 to 1809, in gold a decrease of 11 7-10th as compared with the first period; from 1810 to 1819, a decrease of 93 3-10th; 1820 to 1829, a decrease of 84 4-5th. Chili from 1790 to 1799 and 1800 to 1809, in gold an increase of 65 4-5th, silver a decrease of 31, on the whole an increase of 4 3-5th, 1810 to 1819 in gold an increase of 33 1-10th, silver an increase of 30 4-5th, on the whole an increase of 148 3-5th; 1820 to 1829, in gold an increase of 55 2-5th, silver a decrease of 81 3-10th, on the whole a decrease of 31 9-10th. Buenos Ayres 1790 to 1799 and 1800 to 1809, in gold an increase of 45 4-5th, silver a decrease of 23 4-5th, on the whole a decrease of 19 1-5th; 1809 to 1819, in gold an increase of 42 3-5th, silver a decrease of 51, on the whole a decrease of 51 1-10th; 1820 to 1829, in gold an increase of 42 3-5th, silver a decrease of 70, on the whole a decrease of 62 3-5th. From 1820 to 1829 Russia produced in gold £3,703,743, in silver £1,502,981. On the produce of the whole of these mines therefore from 1790 to 1799, and from 1800 to 1809, there has been, as compared with the first period, in gold an increase of 26 4-5th, silver a decrease of 6 3-5th, on the whole a decrease of 4 4-5th; from 1810 to 1819, in gold an increase of 20 2-5th, silver a decrease of 45 4-5th, on the whole a decrease of 22 1-10th; from 1820 to 1829, in gold an increase of 74 3-5th, silver a decrease of 56 3-5th, and on the whole a decrease of 49 7-10th.

WEST INDIA SLAVERY.

The following is the petition of the planters, merchants and others concerned in the West India colonies, to the king of England.

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, being planters, merchants, mortgagees and others interested in the W. India colonies, approach your majesty in this period of our alarm and dismay, with a full confidence in your majesty's paternal feelings, which ensure the extension of your gracious protection equally to all your subjects—the weak as well as the powerful.

"We are threatened, through resolutions already proposed to parliament by one of your majesty's principal secretaries of state, with no less, in our opinion, than the confiscation of our property—our title in our slaves, secured to us in every possible manner by legislative and legal authority, being proposed to be forcibly taken from us.

"The effects of this measure will be to preclude the owners from all possibility of beneficial cultivation of their estates. It will reduce them from a state of competence to one of destitution.

"It will ruin such of us as, in our character of British merchants, have, under the faith of the guarantee of various acts of the British parliament, invested our fortunes—our entire dependence for the support of our wives and children—on mortgages of this very property. It is not more certainly, though more obviously, fatal to such of us, not a few in number, as are annuitants or claimants upon slaves only.

"We humbly submit to your most gracious majesty that injustice such as this, powerless as your petitioners are in comparison with their enemies, can never be sanctioned by the father of his people, through your majesty's giving your royal assent to a measure having such effects: unless the same shall be accompanied by an adequate compensation to all interested therein. We venture to represent to your majesty, that if the state, in the presumed exercise of a high moral duty, considers that the property of the West India proprietors in their slaves interferes with a national object, it has a clear course, as in all cases where the property of individuals so interferes, by offering to them a fair compensation for its surrender.

"We humbly assure your majesty that we shall not attempt to interpose unnecessary obstacles to such an object: but we claim your majesty's protection against any measures tending to deprive us of our positive and undeniable rights of property, which shall not have been matured with an equitable consideration of such rights, and have obtained our concurrence.

"We approach your majesty with increased confidence, feeling that we are laying our grievances not only before a benevolent and patriotic sovereign, but before the only one of our kings who has himself witnessed the enthusiastic loyalty and devotion of his subjects of the West India colonies, and is, of his own personal knowledge, aware of the calumnies and misrepresentations to which they have been exposed.

"Under these circumstances we lay ourselves at your majesty's feet, and humbly pray that you will not, by the exercise of your majesty's royal prerogative, sanction or authorise any act which shall be destructive of our rights of property, so repeatedly and so solemnly recognised by your royal predecessors, and the parliament of Great Britain, unless a fund should be previously provided for fair and sufficient compensation."

AXE FACTORIES AT NEW HAVEN.

From the New York Mercantile Advertiser and Advocate.

PRESENT TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. We know not when we have been more gratified than on the inspection of twelve wood axes, presented to the president of the United States, while visiting the manufactory at which they were made, at New Haven, Connecticut.

These axes weigh from $\frac{5}{8}$ to $\frac{7}{8}$ lbs. each, and were made by twelve different workmen, eleven of them being the first essay, only one out of the twelve having failed to complete his axe on the first trial. These specimens of the great perfection to which working in iron and steel has arrived in this country, were examined in our office by many persons who called in, and all admitted them to be of the most complete and splendid finish; their blades being polished as bright as silver, and each containing 1½ lbs. of steel; on a very close inspection not a flaw of any sort could be discovered. They are handsomely packed in a neatly made and highly polished hickory box, and will be exhibited at the Merchant's Exchange for a day or two, being on their way to Washington.

They were made at the manufactory of Alex. Harrison, esq. who now averages one hundred and fifty per day, and can with his present arrangements extend the daily product to 200. He usually makes his axes to contain but one pound of steel, that quantity being considered sufficient generally; any quantity, however, can be used, to order. The building used for this manufactory is 150 by 50 feet; the yard enclosure, for containing coal, iron and other materials, 200 by 130 feet. A steam engine of 20 horse power is used, which consumes one ton of Lackawanna coal per day, one ton of the same is consumed in the forges; fifty hands are employed; five grindstones of one and a half to two tons each are kept in constant motion, as well as two smaller ones for finishing. All hands in the establishment are remarkably healthy, no inconvenience whatever arising to the grindors.

How cheering it is to find that the useful arts are advancing to such a high state of perfection among us, consuming our raw materials, employing our citizens, furnishing employment to our farmers to feed them, our mechanics to clothe them, and our miners to keep them supplied with coal and iron.

Cold indeed must be the feelings of that American, who does not experience a pride as he reads the accounts which tell us of the rapid strides we are making in the supply of very many of our wants, at reasonable prices, by the employment of our own people, who are living comfortably and happily under a provident government; every industrious man enjoying his political, civil and religious freedom, and maintaining his rank in society.

It is in this latter glorious fact, that is seen the real and true advantage of our republican institutions. It is here, in the country of Washington, that the sublime scriptural truth, that the "laborer is worthy of his hire" is truly exhibited. Long may this state of things continue to exist. It is the number of honest, industrious mechanics, farmers, and other working men, that are the real substance of the country. In vain would Providence have blessed us with inexhaustible mines of the richest ore and beds of coal—in vain would our streams furnish the musical waterfall—in vain would rail roads and canals be constructed, were it not for the sweat which moistens the brow of our hardy and industrious yeomanry, who are kept employed by the capital and enterprise of those who have, under the same wise institutions, accumulated a sufficiency to embark in establishments such as that of Mr. Harrison, which has now been in operation only six months.

New Haven is famous for the manufacture of axes, Messrs. Collins & Co. of the same place, having one on a much larger scale and equal celebrity. We understand the president was highly gratified with the present of these axes, and wrote a very handsome letter of acknowledgment on their receipt. With a commerce that whitens every sea, colleges and universities in countless numbers, smiling fields of the richest verdure, and golden harvest with boundless stores; with facilities of interchange increasing daily, and a people industriously employed—in fine, with every other blessing, this great country wants nothing but a steady pursuit of its best interests, and thankful hearts to a kind Providence, to realise the most sanguine wishes of the purest patriotism, and to continue to the remotest ages the home of liberty and the asylum of peace.

RELEASE OF THE MISSIONARIES.

The release of Messrs. Worcester and Butler is one of the leading electioneering topics in Georgia—and the friends of governor Lumpkin—to defend him—have caused the publication of the following papers—a proceeding which does not appear to have been anticipated by the authors of them—for it is expressly stated that their views were "communicated only to yourself"—that is, gov. L. who has not been pleased to regard them as confidential. The proceeding will be esteemed an extraordinary one; but we shall not make any present comments upon it.

STATE OF NEW YORK, ALBANY, DEC. 18, 1832.

His excellency Wilson Lumpkin, gov. of the state of Georgia.

DEAR SIR: We beg leave to address you upon a subject with which, we confess, we have no right to interfere, and in reference to which your feelings must, long ere this time, have been sufficiently harassed. We refer to the refractory missionaries now confined in the penitentiary of your state, in pursuance of a sentence of the court of your state, and upon conviction for a deliberate and unjustifiable violation of the laws of your state.

It is not our object to enter either into an examination of the facts of their case, or into a discussion of the law which governs it, but to make to you friendly suggestions, proceeding from the best of motives, and which, being communicated only to yourself, can do no harm, if they do no good. Still it is proper, that we should precede these suggestions with such our clearly entertained opinions, in relation to the intrinsic merits of the impending controversy as may satisfy you that we are not now, as we at no previous period have been, ranged upon the side of those who arraign the conduct of Georgia, impugn the motives of her legislators and other public officers, or question the soundness of the principle she has assumed, that no independent sovereignty can exist within her limits, and that her laws within those limits, subject only to the laws and treaties of the United States, must prevail and be enforced; and that we may not be misunderstood, we further distinctly say that we do not consider the treaties made between the government and the Indians as partaking, in any degree in a national sense, of the character of treaties with independent nations, but rather hold them as contracts or articles of agreement, subject in all cases to the constitution of the United States and the laws of congress; and we consider it inconsistent, wholly and absolutely inconsistent with that provision of the constitution, which guarantees to all the states of this confederacy a republican form of government, that the president and senate should have the power to make a treaty which should constitute or recognise an independent sovereignty within one of these states. You will not understand us as admitting, or even for one moment supposing, that this has been either done or attempted by those authorities; but we are thus explicit, that no doubt as to our opinions may weaken the force of the suggestions we are about to make.

Thus much being said as to the impressions we entertain in relation to the law and the right of the case, we now speak as politicians. From the unpleasant agitations which, at the present time, are convulsing, in an unusual manner and to an unusual extent, another of the independent states of the union, we feel the deepest interest that all danger of conflict between the authorities of Georgia and any of the authorities of the general government should be put at rest. This, we believe, may be done by the pardon of those misguided men. Our reasons for this belief grow out of the late election. No subject was more fully submitted to the people, pending that contest, than the course of the administration in relation to the Indians and the opinions entertained by the president, which opinions, it was well known, would be carried out in practice, in case of his re-election; and we feel safe in saying, that no question involved in the canvass was labored so assiduously and so ingeniously on the part of his opponents. Still the result has overwhelmed them with astonishment and shame, if not with conviction of their errors. That same result has furnished your patriotic state with a judgment in her favor, paramount to all others under this government, the clearly expressed judgment of the American people.

Under these circumstances, we cannot but believe that the exhibition of magnanimity on the part of the state, by the pardon of the imprisoned missionaries, would have the most happy effect upon the public mind of the whole union, while it would take away the ground of pending litigation which desperate men may try to push to an unpleasant result; and we venture to ask this exercise of the important prerogative resting in your hands, because we are convinced that your patriotic fellow citizens would, after the events which have transpired within the last few weeks, sustain you in the act, for the sake of the state itself. We are sure they would do so for the quiet and peace of the union.

Excuse us for this unauthorised intrusion upon your notice and your official duties; and believe us, with the highest respect, your obedient servants,

SILAS WRIGHT, Jr.
A. C. FLAGG,
JOHN A. DIX.

His excellency Wilson Lumpkin, governor of the state of Georgia.

The undersigned citizens of the state of New York, having bestowed much attention on the proceedings in the case of Samuel A. Worcester and Elizur Butler, and viewing those proceedings as likely to affect the welfare of the other states and the whole union, feel it their duty to submit to your consideration the result of their reflections on the subject. As this expression of their opinions and wishes, springs from no feelings adverse to Georgia, but on the contrary is promoted solely by a regard to what they sincerely believe to be the true interest of all parties, they flatter themselves you will not deem it either obtrusive or improper.

Permit us then to state that under all existing circumstances, we deem it a matter of great moment, that the prisoners referred to, should be set at liberty, without delay, which as we suppose, can only be done by discharging them under a pardon emanating from the state authority—and such a pardon we earnestly recommend.

The result of the recent election must render it apparent, that the removal of the Cherokees is deemed expedient by the nation; and under this impression, the undersigned are of opinion that many persons, who have hitherto counteracted their removal, will now deem it their duty to co-operate in bringing it about; and they have reason to believe and confidently hope, that an influence will be applied to reconcile the tribe to such a result, by those very persons who have hitherto labored to prevent it.

Under such a change of circumstances, the undersigned cannot see any possible advantage in the further confinement of the missionaries. On the contrary they conceive that since it is apparent that the Indians must be removed, the release of the missionaries may be of use in reconciling the Indians to that measure. For we cannot believe after what has taken place, that the missionaries, any more than ourselves, can doubt the expediency of acquiescing in the policy of the general government, sustained, as it seems to have been, by the decision of the American people. In the present state of this question, and of our public affairs, every cause of irritation should be removed as speedily as possible, and as we sincerely believe that it is in your power by adopting the course suggested, to render an immense service to the nation, without injuring in the least the interests of your own state, we most respectfully solicit to the subject your early and favorable consideration.

We are, with sincere respect, your most obedient servants.

LATE TOUR OF THE PRESIDENT.

While the president of the United States was on his late eastern tour, we cut out and laid aside a multitude of accounts of the proceedings had at different places, in a supposition that much matter for record would be gleaned from them; for this purpose we have overhauled the mass, and are compelled to express some surprise at the poverty of its contents, and sameness and tameness of the incidents mentioned. There is enough, however, of the ridiculous and rude.

The following are some of the few articles which we think should be added to the record:

Among the various and numerous anecdotes related in connexion with the journeyings of the president, we have noticed no one more pleasing than this from the Providence Journal.

The venerable Moses Brown called upon the president, at his lodgings, and was ushered into a parlor on the lower floor. The president came down to receive him, and was addressed as follows: "Friend Jackson, having been acquainted with thy predecessors, I thought I would call upon thee." To which the president replied, that "he was happy to meet a man so venerable in years, in the possession of all his faculties, and hoped that God would continue to bless him." Mr. Brown expressed a desire that he might visit the Friends' school, before he should leave the city, which he accordingly did in the afternoon, where he again met the venerable patriarch, whom, on taking leave, he addressed in the following terms: "Mr. Brown, I have examined your institution, and find no imperfection in it—God bless you, sir." To which the sage of almost a century replied, "I wish thee a safe return to thy home—the Lord bless thee."

Address of governor Lincoln to the president.

The following is the address of governor Lincoln, of Massachusetts, to the president of the United States, in the hall of representatives, in Boston:

Mr. President—The legislature of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, representing sentiments and feelings of their constituents, learnt, with great satisfaction, during their recent session, your intention to visit this section of the union. Aware that the time proposed for your journey would not allow to the members the desired gratification of personally presenting to you their respectful salutations, by a concurrent and unanimous vote of both branches, the honor of tendering to you the congratulations of the government, upon your arrival in the capital, and the hospitalities of the state, during your continuance in it, was specially assigned to the executive.

This office, it is most grateful to me, to be permitted to discharge. And I have now the happiness, within these halls, where the resolution of the legislature was adopted, and in the presence of this assembled multitude of your fellow citizens, in the name of the government and people of the state, to bid you WELCOME TO MASSACHUSETTS!

Welcome, sir, most cordially welcome to all of interest, which can here be offered, worthy your attention and enjoyment!

We desire to present to you, as the chief magistrate of the nation, the evidences of the prosperity of this portion of a common country, over which, by the free suffrages of your fellow citizens you have for a second time, been called to preside.

We would point to our agricultural resources, and to the condition of an enlightened and independent yeomanry, the proprietors and cultivators of a rugged yet productive soil, which is alike, the occasion and the reward of a virtuous and untiring industry.

We would exhibit the amazing result of the progress of that spirit of enterprise and improvement in manufactures and the arts, which has filled every valley with busy population, and made every waterfall subservient to the devices of human skill and ingenuity.

We would invite you at the same time to observe, in our city and commercial towns, how that trade flourishes, in the connexion of domestic product with home consumption, and the exchange of the fabrics of the workshop for the raw material, which is the growth of every clime.

And more especially, would we commend to your notice our public institutions, the schools and seminaries of learning, those noble monuments of our fathers' wisdom, and patriotism, and piety; and the hospitals, and charitable asylums for the relief of the destitute and the afflicted, the beneficent provisions of more recent time.

We speak not of these things in the pride of local vanity. They are the legitimate fruits of our happy republican form of government, a government, in the establishment of which we rejoice to recognize the active agency of your early years, and to the support of which you have signally contributed, in various important stations in mature life. They spring, as do all our political and civil enjoyments from that national sovereignty and independence which you have so valiantly defended, when assailed by foreign foes, and that union under the constitution, which, with equal patriotism and glory, you no less triumphantly asserted, on a late memorable occasion, against internal dissension and disloyalty?

May this visit, undertaken for the purpose of becoming better acquainted, from personal observation, with the interests and sentiments of the people, confirm those patriotic views, which you have expressed, of the mutual dependence of each section of the country upon every other, for the continuance of the prosperity of the whole. And may it be your happiness, as it has been that of your illustrious predecessors, when the labors and responsibilities of the highest station of earthly distinction shall he laid aside, to enjoy in the tranquillity and dignity of venerated age, the cherished respect of a nation of freemen, benefitted by your public life, and grateful for your many services.

Mayor's office (New York) June 13, 1833.

The mayor has received from the British consul, sixty dollars—from M. Van Schaick, esq. one hundred and sixty-eight dollars—from Washington Irving, esq. one hundred and ninety-eight $5 100 dollars, making $426 25—being the sum of the contributions from the president's suite and the company on board the North America, on Wednesday last, for the benefit of the unfortunate man who was injured in firing the salute on board the revenue cutter.

The mayor has received this day, the following letter, with its contents, for the foregoing object.

New York, June 13, 1833.

DEAR SIR—Understanding that you have under your direction, the funds raised by subscription for the relief of the unfortunate seaman who lost his hands while assisting in firing the salute to the president as he approached the city yesterday, I hereby enclose to you, in conformity with instructions from the president, the sum of fifty dollars, which he requests you will apply to the same object. Your obedient servant,

A. J. DONELSON.

Washington Irving, esq.

[A similar letter, and enclosing also fifty dollars, was sent to Kirk Boot, esq. at Lowell, by order of the president, for the relief of two persons who were also mangled, when employed in firing a salute.]

Presentation of a bible.

While the president was at Hartford, Messrs. Andrus & Judd, presented him with a copy of their stereotype edition of the bible, elegantly bound. The president returned his acknowledgments for the present in the following terms:

Hartford, June 17th 1833.

GENTLEMEN—I return you my thanks for the sacred volume you have presented to me, and for the personal kindness you have expressed. I fervently unite with you in your prayer for our beloved country, and I supplicate Providence to incline the hearts of all our citizens to keep its holy law—to realise the inestimable blessings we enjoy—and to become as distinguished for genuine piety among the nations of the earth, as they are for the high favors, national and political, which have been vouchsafed to them.

For myself, gentlemen, I humbly rely upon the blessing of God to guide me in the performance of the high duties which my countrymen have assigned to me—commending all with all their requests to his care, and not doubting, as he led our fathers to acquire the independence we enjoy, he will lead our sons in his own good way to defend and maintain it.

I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Messrs. Andrus & Judd.

The president and the grand lodge.

The Boston papers contain the proceedings of the grand lodge of Massachusetts in reference to the visit of president Jackson to that city. It appears that as soon as the president arrived in Boston, the grand lodge was called together, and a resolution passed appointing a committee to wait upon him, and, in the name of the lodge, to "tender to him the congratulations of the fraternity in that jurisdiction—to express their deep and grateful sense of the firm, discreet and honorable manner in which he has sustained his masonic relations during a period which the enemies of the institution have rendered somewhat embarrassing to brethren in conspicuous public stations—to assure him of their hearty good wishes and prayers for his future health, prosperity and happiness, and to invite him to honor the grand lodge with a visit on the evening of the 24th of the month, at a special communication to be called for that purpose."

In reply to the invitation, the president said he was unable to visit the lodge on the 24th; but if another time could be selected, he would take pleasure in making the visit. The time was accordingly changed, and the grand lodge and invited brethren, to the number of between three and four hundred, were accordingly assembled, at an early hour, for the purpose of paying their respects to their distinguished brother. About 8 o'clock, the committee appointed to escort the president to the hall came into the grand lodge, accompanied by the hon. Joel R. Poinsett, (one of the president's suite), and presented the grand master the following letter:

Boston, June 23, 1833.

BRETHREN: I anticipated the pleasure of waiting upon the grand lodge of Massachusetts this evening, and of tendering to them in person my thanks for the cordial terms in which they were pleased to notice my arrival within their jurisdiction; but finding myself a good deal fatigued after the labors of the day, I must ask their indulgence, and beg them to accept in this form the assurance that I justly appreciate their kindness and good will, and trust that their interests, as an institution calculated to benefit mankind, may continue to prosper. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, ANDREW JACKSON.

R. W. Benja. Russell, Francis J. Oliver, and others, committee of the grand lodge of Massachusetts.

After the letter was read, the hon. brother Poinsett addressed the grand master as follows:

"Worshipful brother: The president of the United States charged me to express to the brethren of the grand lodge of Massachusetts his sincere regret at being prevented, by indisposition, from accepting their invitation to meet them in the temple, and from tendering them in person his acknowledgments for their attentions. He begged me to assure them that he shall ever feel a lively interest in the welfare of an institution with which he has been so long connected, and whose objects are purely philanthropic; and he instructed me to express to them the high esteem and fraternal regard which he cherishes towards them all."

We shall close our selections for the present, by recording the following remarks of the editor of the "Richmond Enquirer:"

We have never had any very great penchant for presidential tours throughout the country. We were not very much delighted with the descriptions we have read of president Washington's tour—and the excursion of Mr. Monroe, during his first term of service, was sufficient to satiate and sicken us. We never witnessed any good which it produced in the measures of his administration. And we expressed at the time the disgust, which many of the attentions he received were so well calculated to inspire in the mind of a republican. They were more like the homage of subjects to their ruler, than of a free people towards their first magistrate. They partook more of the pomp of monarchy—than of the simplicity of the republic.

For our own parts, we would much rather that Andrew Jackson had remained at Washington, or visited the Hermitage, than have gone upon such an excursion as the present. He cannot indulge the simplicity of his own character; nor absolutely regulate the manners of others by his own taste. He cannot repress the excessive attentions which will be paid to him, or the sycophantic panegyrics, and the overloaded puffs, of some of the newspapers. We have already seen the most ridiculous anecdotes told—things which would be scarcely tolerable in the acting—about ladies, and girls, and private parties, and select coteries—but the repetition and the flouting of them in the newspapers, are in the vilest taste! We beg our brethren of the north to avoid all such examples: "they are more honored in the breach, than in the observance." Yet amid all these superfluities, and many of them silly, descriptions, we cannot fail to perceive that the president has been received with a cordiality of kindness, and a sincerity of respect, which bespeak the great popularity of the man and his administration.

There is some "excitement," in several places, because of the expenses incurred on account of the president's visit. In New York they are reported to have amounted to from seven to nine thousand dollars—at New Haven, the tavern bill is put down at $500, &c. We do not admire such exposures. They are probably the effect of the "exclusiveness" which we have several times mentioned, and of the contests of "rival chiefs"—some of whom were not well pleased!

MR. WEBSTER AT PITTSBURGH.
From the Pittsburgh Gazette, of July 9.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

As already stated, this distinguished statesman reached town on Thursday afternoon last, under the escort of the mayor and a numerous cavalcade. The exchange hotel, at which he took up his quarters, has been thronged ever since by crowds of eager visitors, without regard to party, anxious to see and testify respect to him whom all unite in regarding as an intellectual giant, on whom the constitution itself did not disdain to lean at a moment of imminent peril. Agreeably to previous arrangements, he was waited on by a committee of forty of our most respectable citizens, to welcome him to Pittsburgh, to proffer facilities for seeing to advantage whatever he might deem worthy of examination, and to invite him to a public dinner. This last testimonial of respect was declined, for reasons, in the force of which the committee acquiesced. Mr. Webster intimated strongly in conversation, as we learn, that his great object was to see as much as possible, during his limited stay, of the west, of the people and the country, in a plain way—and that a public dinner, with its forms, etiquette and necessary limit, seemed calculated to restrain and obstruct, rather than to facilitate, the free and unceremonious kind of intercourse which he desired. The following is a copy of his written reply:

Pittsburgh, July 5th, 1833.

GENTLEMEN—I hardly know how to express my thanks for the hospitable and cordial welcome with which the citizens of Pittsburgh are disposed to receive me, on this my first visit to their place. The terms in which you express their sentiments in your letter of yesterday, far transcend all merits of mine, and can have their origin only in spontaneous kindness and good feeling. I tender to you, gentlemen, and to the meeting which you represent, my warmest acknowledgments. I rejoice, sincerely, to find the health of the city so satisfactory; and I reciprocate with all the people of Pittsburgh, the most sincere and hearty good wishes for their prosperity and happiness. Long may their city continue what it now is, an abode of comfort and hospitality, a refuge for the well-deserving from all nations, a model of industry, and an honor to the country.

It is my purpose, gentlemen, to stay a day or two among you, to see such of your manufactures and public institutions, as it may be in my power to visit. I most respectfully pray leave to decline a public dinner, but shall have great pleasure in meeting such of your fellow citizens as may desire it, in the most friendly and unceremonious manner. I am, gentlemen, with very true regard, yours, DANIEL WEBSTER.

To hon. James Ross and others, gentlemen of the committee. In deference to Mr. Webster's wishes, the idea of a formal dinner was abandoned; but as the anxiety seemed intense for some collective expression of public admiration, it was decided to invite him to meet our citizens at the spacious grove of Mr. Miltenberger, on Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The change of plan was judicious, and the scene a truly gratifying one. Refreshments of a plain kind were spread around, under the charge of the committee; but the tables could serve only as a nucleus to the vast multitude. Mr. Webster moved freely about the beautiful grounds, recognizing his numerous visitors of the preceding days, who were led, by his frank and engaging cordiality of his manners, to become, in turn, the introducers of such as had not before enjoyed the pleasure of taking him by the hand. His honor, the mayor, at length called to order, and addressed the company pretty much as follows:

"I have to ask, gentlemen, your attention for a few moments. We are met here to mark our sense of the extraordinary merits of a distinguished statesman, and public benefactor. At his particular request, every thing like parade or ceremonial has been waived; and, in consequence, he has been the better enabled to receive, and to reciprocate, the hearty and spontaneous expression of your good will. I am now desired to attempt, in your name, to give utterance to the universal feeling around me.

"Gentlemen—We are this day citizens of the United States. The union is safe. Not a star has fallen from that proud banner around which our affections have so long rallied. And when, with this delightful assurance, we cast our eyes back upon the eventful history of the last year—when we recal the gloomy apprehensions, and perhaps hopeless despondency, which came over us—who, gentlemen, can learn, without a glow of enthusiasm, that the great champion of the constitution—that DANIEL WEBSTER—is now in the midst of us. To his mighty intellect, the nation, with one voice, confided its cause—of life or death. Shall there be withheld from the triumphant advocate of the nation, a nation's gratitude? Ours, gentlemen, is a government not of force but of opinion. The reason of the people must be satisfied before a call to arms. The mass of our peaceful and conscientious citizens cannot, and ought not—except in a clear case—to be urged to abandon the implements of industry for the sword and the bayonet. This consideration it is, that imparts to intellectual pre-eminence in the service of truth, its incalculable value. And hence the preciousness of that admirable and unanswerable exposition which has put down, once and forever, the artful sophisms of nullification."

"If, gentlemen, we turn to other portions of the public history of our distinguished guest, it will be found, that his claims to grateful acknowledgment, are not less imposing. The cause of domestic industry, of internal improvement, of education, of whatever, in short, is calculated to render us a prosperous, united and happy people—has found in him a watchful and efficient advocate. Nor is it the least of his merits, that, to our gallant mary Mr. Webster has been an early, far-sighted, and persevering friend. Our interior position cannot render us cold and unobservant on this point, whilst the victory of Perry yet supplies to us a proud and inspiring anniversary. And such is the wonderful chain of mutual dependence which binds our union, that, in the remotest corner of the west, the exchangeable value of every product must depend on the security with which the ocean can be traversed.

"Gentlemen, I have detained you too long; yet I will add one word. I do but echo the language of the throngs that have crowded round Mr. Webster, in declaring, that the frank and manly simplicity of his character and manners, has created a feeling of personal regard which no mere intellectual ascendancy, could have secured. We approached him with admiration for the achievements of his public career—never supposing, for a moment, that our hearts could have aught to do in the matter; we shall part, as from a valued friend, the recollections of whose virtues cannot pass away."

To which Mr. Webster replied.*

Mr. Mayor and gentlemen—

I rise fellow citizens, with unaffected sensibility, to give you my thanks for the hospitable manner in which you have been kind enough to receive me, on this, my first visit to Pittsburgh; and to make all due acknowledgments to your worthy mayor, for the sentiments which he has now seen fit to express.

Although, gentlemen, it has been my fortune to be personally acquainted with very few of you, I feel, at this moment, that we are not strangers. We are fellow countrymen; fellow citizens; bound together by a thousand ties of interest, of sympathy, of duty; united, I hope I may add, by bonds of mutual regard. We are bound together, for good or for evil, in our great political interests. I know that I am addressing Americans, every one of whom has a true American heart in his bosom; and I feel that I have also an American heart in my bosom. I address you, then, gentlemen, with the same fervent good wishes for your happiness—the same brotherly affection—and the same tokens of regard and esteem, as if, instead of being upon the borders of the Ohio, I stood by the Connecticut or the Merrimack. As citizens, countrymen, and neighbors, I give you my hearty good wishes, and thank you, over and over again, for your abundant hospitality.

Gentlemen, the mayor has been pleased to advert, in terms beyond all expectation, or merit of my own, to my services in defence of the glorious constitution under which we live, and which makes you and me, all that we are, and all that we de-

*The Pittsburgh Gazette informs us that the sketch of Mr. W's speech is furnished by Mr. M. T. C. Gould, stenographer, who was much indisposed while making his notes—and hence the report is less precise and accurate than might have been expected. Adding—"A careful reader will, perhaps, in some places, perceive that the connection of the argument is not quite so close and logical as in the deliverance, and that abrupt transitions sometimes occur. No opportunity was afforded to submit the report to the revision of Mr. Webster. The only material deficiency, however, is in the remarks in relation to education. The reporter lives at a distance from Pittsburgh, and in his haste to forward the report by an opportunity which presented, was compelled to furnish a mere skeleton of a portion of that part of the speech, with a request that the committee of arrangement would fill it up. That committee, however, thought it better to omit it entirely, rather than to supply from memory."

And Mr. Gold himself says—"the state of my health is such, that I have not read the MSS. as I usually do, with reference to the sense and construction of sentences."

sire to be. He has vastly overrated and exaggerated any efforts of mine, but he has not overrated the importance of the crisis to which his remarks allude.

Gentlemen, it is but a few short months since dark and portentous clouds did hang over our heavens, and did shut out, as it were, the sun in his glory. A new crisis had arisen in the history of this government. For forty years our government had gone on, meeting with occasional resistance, incidental, or ill directed—not concerted. But now, a time had come, when authority of law was resisted by the authority of law—when the power of our general government was resisted by the arm of a state government, and when military force, under all the sanctions of state constitution and state law, was threatening to impede the operations of the federal government! That was, gentlemen, a crisis. Every one felt it to be such. I, and every good citizen of the country, felt it to be such. A general anxiety pervaded the breasts of all who partook of the glory of their country at home—and how was it abroad? Why, every intelligent friend of human liberty throughout the world, looked with amazement at the spectacle which we exhibited. In a day of unquestioned prosperity, after half a century's happy experiment—when we were the wonder of all the liberal men in the world, and the envy of all the ultra—when we had shown ourselves to be fast advancing to national renown—what was threatened? Disunion! There were those among us, who wished to break up the government, and scatter the four and twenty states, into four and twenty sections and fragments!

Gentlemen, it was at this moment, that the president of the United States, true to every duty—comprehending and fully understanding the case, came forth, by his proclamation of the 10th of December, in language which inspired in me new hopes of the duration of the republic. It was patriotic, and worthy to be carried through at every hazard. Gentlemen, I speak without reserve upon this subject, I have differed with the president, as all know, who know any thing of so humble an individual as myself, upon many important subjects. In relation to internal improvements—rechartering the United States bank—perhaps, in the degree of domestic protection, and the disposition of our public lands, I have been not able to see the interests of my country in the way which he did. But when the crisis arrived in which our constitution was in danger, and when he came forth like a patriotic chief magistrate, I, for one, taking no council but of patriotism—feeling no impulse, but the impulse of duty—felt myself bound to yield, not a lame and hesitating, but a cordial and efficient support to his measures.

Gentlemen, I hope that the result of that experiment may prove salutary in its consequences, to our government, and to the interests of the community. I hope that this signal expression of public opinion, which has for the time put down the despotism of nullification, may produce a lasting effect throughout our whole country. I know full well, that popular topics may be urged against the proclamation. I know it may be said, in regard to the law of the last session of congress, that if such laws are to be maintained, congress may pass what laws they please, and enforce them. But this argument forgets, that members of congress are but the agents of the people, chosen at short intervals, and always removable at pleasure, by the people, whose servants in the national legislature, are as much subservient, and as willingly obedient, as any other of their servants. It is easy for those who wish, and who pursue, measures calculated to break up the union, to raise the cry of consolidation. But I repel it. I am no consolidationist—I disclaim it. I wish to preserve the constitution, without addition or diminution of one jot or tittle. For the same reason that I would not add, I would not withdraw. Those who have placed me in a public station, placed me there, not to alter the constitution, but to administer it. If a change be desired, our masters must make that change—if alterations are required, you, and the rest of your fellow citizens must make the change. The constitution is our power of attorney—our letter of credit—our credentials—we are to act accordingly, without interpolation or alteration, honestly and truly. The people of the United States—they, and they alone, can tread it under foot, but their servants have no such power.

And what is the ground for this cry of consolidation? I maintain that the measures recommended by the president and adopted by congress, were measures of self defence. Is it consolidation to execute the laws? Is it consolidation to resist the force that is threatening to overturn our government? Is it consolidation to protect officers in the discharge of their duty, from courts and juries, who are previously sworn to decide against them?

Gentlemen, I take occasion to remark, that, after much reflection upon the subject, and after all that has been said about the encroachment of our general government upon the rights of the states, I know of no one power exercised by the general government, which was not admitted by the immediate friends and foes of the constitution to have been conferred upon it, by the people, when that instrument was adopted. I know of no one power which every body did not agree, in 1789, was conferred on the general government. On the contrary, there are several powers, and those, too, among the most important for the interests of the people, which were then allowed to be conferred by the constitution of the United States, which are now ingeniously doubted, or clamorously denied. Gentlemen, upon this point I shall detain you with no further remarks. It does, however, give the most sincere pleasure to say, that, in a long visit through the states west of you, and in the great state north of you, as well as in a tour of some days' duration in the respectable state to which you belong, I find but one sentiment in regard to the conduct of the government upon this subject. I know that those who have seen fit to entrust to me, in part, their interests in congress, approve of the measures recommended by the president. We see that he has taken occasion, during the recess of congress, to visit that part of the country; and we know how he has been received. No where have hands been extended with more sincerity of friendships; and for one, gentlemen, I take occasion to say, that, having heard of his return to the seat of government, with health rather debilitated, it is among my most earnest prayers, that Providence may spare his life, and that he may go through with his administration, and come out with as much success and glory as any of his predecessors. [Great applause.]

Your worthy chief magistrate has been kind enough to express sentiments favorable to myself, as a friend of domestic industry. What a world of remark does that suggestion open—when standing at the confluence of the two streams that constitute the Ohio, in the midst of a population distinguished for their domestic industry, family comforts—the means of education, and the means of providing for their families by their industry. What is not comprised here, in “the means of protecting domestic industry?” Next to the constitution itself, there can be no question of more absorbing interest, than the protection of our own domestic manufactures. I do not mean any particular class, but the whole, as comprehended under that system which provides for our wants—that system whose essence, and object, and life it is to administer compensating rewards to American manual labor.

Gentlemen, those of you, who have taken any pains to inquire into the history of that part of the country to which I belong, know, that in the quarter with which I am more immediately connected, the people were not early to urge upon the government protection by high duties. Indeed, candor obliges me to acknowledge, that, when the act of 1824 was passed, neither he who now addresses you, nor those with whom he acted, were ready or willing to take the step which that act proposed. They were not prepared to act; they doubted the expediency. It passed, however, by the great and overwhelming influence of this central section of country, New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. We acquiesced; we yielded to it, adopted it, and gave to our capital and labor, such direction as would enable us to conform to the policy of the country. We have become wedded to it, and identified with it, till I know of no shade of difference between the interests of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. We shall not yield it without a struggle. Neither shall we yield the principle of protection without a severe struggle, under any circumstances whatever. And who would choose to yield it? Who, standing here, and looking round upon this community and its interests, would be bold enough to touch the spring to so much industry and so much happiness? Who would stop the mouths of those vast coal pits—arrest the cargoes that are now running down a river, the noblest in the world, and which stretches over the finest territory possessed by any government? Who would quench the fires of so many steam engines? It cannot be done, without great public calamity, and great private distress.

I have said, that I am in favor of protecting American manual labor—and after all that has been said, I have come to the conclusion, that, to leave American manual labor to bear a competition with the unpaid and half fed labor of Europe, would produce a state of things to which our country can never submit. This is the reason why I maintain the policy of the American System. I see in my own country, and I believe it is the same in this, that its stimulus to labor, has been its offering a fair compensation for labor. When I say our country, I mean from Penobscot to New Orleans; for nine-tenths of the whole, belong to the industrious, productive, laborious classes. Dead capital is in but few hands; and this system does not promote the interests of the capitalist one tithe part that it does those of the laborer, the industrious man who oversees, or labors upon, the capital of another. Is it not this great stimulus which now applies itself to our whole society, and sets so many wheels in motion? Is it not the compensating price of labor—is it not, that labor is high and the means of living low? I want no other proof, that God has blessed us with a happy country and generation.

Suppose we compare ourselves with other countries—I see many whom I know to be emigrants from other countries. Why is the native of Ireland among you? Why has he left the land of his fathers? The Emerald Isle is as dear to him as these rivers and hills are to you. Was it not taxation on one hand, and the low price of labor on the other, that induced him to come to a country of free laws, and of boundless extent; where industry has its reward—where the means of living are low, and the price of labor adequate? And do not these remarks apply to emigrants from every part of Europe? Is it not that industry and personal character can do more for a man here, than in any other part of the world?

Our government is the breath of the people's nostrils; they make it, and they appoint agents to administer it. They are the source of the power of our government; and is it not clear, that it is unsafe to trust the affairs of government in the hands of the people unless the great majority of the people have some interest in the government? Who would be safe in any community when the power is in the hands of those who have nothing at stake? It is the true policy of our government to shield the great body of the people—the productive classes.

Gentlemen, it appears to me so plain a proposition, that the industry of this country ought to be protected, and must be protected, against the pauper labor of England and other parts of Europe, that argument is superfluous. Were it not for trespassing upon your patience, I would state, as a historical truth—for it is beyond all question—that a leading object of establishing the constitution was to devise a system of laws to protect artisans against the cheap pauper labor of Great Britain. In the town in which I live, it is as notorious as the revolution itself.

Soon after the peace of '83, there came on a period of distress over the whole Atlantic coast, far exceeding any thing that had been felt during the war. Importation in British ships was free—American ships there were none. The cheaper labor of England supplied the inhabitants of the Atlantic coast with every thing, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot. The mechanics of Boston appointed a committee, at the head of which was the name ever venerable to the mind of all true Americans, John Hancock, by whom strong resolutions were reported, declaring that the inhabitants would not use any articles imported in British ships. The mechanics of Boston met and recommended the inhabitants not to use British articles at all.—[Great applause.] “For,” said they, “with all regard to you, Mr. Hancock, what odds does it make, whether our shoes, boots, hats, handkerchiefs, or shirts come in British ships, or American ships—they take away our bread, come in what ships they may.” This state, the state of Massachusetts, and even the state of Virginia passed laws to protect their own people by impost. But it could not be effectually done. One state would pass a law—another would not—there being no general system, there could be no protection. And it is a historical truth, plain beyond doubt, that our great object, along the Atlantic coast, in adopting the constitution, was that, by establishing a regular and uniform system of imposts, the various artisans and handicrafts might be permitted to earn their bread. There were, at that time, no manufactures in the interior, for there were no inhabitants. Here was fort Pitt—upon the map to be sure—but no people. Among the mechanics—the workers in leather, tin, iron, &c. there was a greater depression and poverty, than there had been during the war. And, I hope you will pardon me for another anecdote which is brought to my recollection. Massachusetts was the ninth state to adopt the constitution. If she adopted it, it would go into effect; but it was matter of great doubt whether she would. The mechanics of Boston met and passed resolutions. They said it was necessary for them. They elected delegates to adopt the constitution. Their proceedings were communicated to Samuel Adams. He had doubts—he was a friend of liberty, but he had honest and sincere doubts about the practicability of a general government. Paul Revere, a worker in brass, read to him the resolutions of the mechanics. He was asked how many mechanics passed these resolutions—(the meeting was held at the old Green Dragon)—was the room full? Oh, yes, to overflowing. Were there any in the streets? Many. How many? More than the stars of heaven. [Laughter and applause.]

It was thus the constitution of the United States was carried. Any gentleman desirous of pushing the historical inquiry, will find that the great and prevailing interest was where there were merchants and mechanics. There was a natural hesitation about the adoption of the constitution; and it was only urged through by the interests to which I have adverted.

Under these circumstances, it cannot be expected that we, of New England, will readily abandon our ground. We are ready to do more work, with less protection, if that will answer—but we yet believe that the power is in the constitution. And I do not believe that it is within my competency to draw my pen across that power; for I have no more power to diminish, than I have to add. And, acting in the situation in which we are placed—as a portion of the great American family—having the same interests as these great and vast central districts—we shall go on, attached to the union, attached to all the great interests of the government, and attached to the constitution.

Your worthy mayor has alluded to the subject of internal improvement. Gentlemen, it has always seemed extremely strange to me, that in the progress of human knowledge and human virtue—for I believe that human virtue is making rapid progress—it has always seemed extremely strange to me, that the objects of government should be limited so much to helioger operations, that its duties should seem to be considered as referrible so exclusively to wars with other nations. Certainly, in a day of Christianity, in a day of light and knowledge, of benevolent feeling and action, it should be the business of government to turn its attention inward; to remember, that the objects of its supervision are rational, immortal beings; and to seek to promote all great interests, so far as may be within its constitutional power; and, surely, within that range, are objects far more worthy of zeal and assiduity, than such as look to our external relations—to war, or victory, or triumph.

What, in our day, has not been done by voluntary association? Our whole government is a voluntary association. Why should it not direct its attention to those things which look to peace? Upon this subject, I will observe, that when I came into congress, on taking a view of the country, and its interests, and concerns, at the close of the late war, I thought it to be my duty, to say, that a suitable time had come for government to turn its attention inward—to survey this vast country, and particularly this vast western country—to take a comprehensive view of the whole, and to promote the interests of the whole, by the construction of roads, canals and other means of internal communication—to adopt a liberal system of internal improvement, in whatsoever unites man to man; in whatsoever opens a better market, by clearing the way between the producer and the consumer; in whatsoever connects more intimately the various parts of our country, and binds us closer and closer together. The west, with which I am no more connected than with all my fellow citizens, is the great theatre for these internal improvements. The east is old—not only old but small. Our rivers can be measured, yours cannot. Our forests can be surveyed, yours cannot. We are bounded, you are boundless. It has appeared to me, that the west, the fertile, the opening, the soliciting west, was a proper object for the regard of government. To clear the rivers, to improve the harbors upon our lakes, to open roads and canals, to do whatever might unite the people, and bring him who sells and him who buys nearer together, appear to me to be objects worthy of all regard. I claim no particular merit upon this subject—it is from no partiality to the west that I would lend aid to all these objects. My affections know no west—no east—no north—no south. I would comprehend them all in one great and connected whole, and consider it my country.

I see this place, gentlemen, surrounded with circumstances strongly enforcing these truths—you have vast internal improvements—the most prominent of which is your canal, which connects you with the Atlantic ocean: others are projected, not less important than those completed. The Ohio canal, which does so much credit to our young sister of the west, and with which your city needs a direct connection—the Ohio and Baltimore rail road, an arm or branch of which, extending to your city, would be peculiarly beneficial, and which is as much entitled to aid from the general government as the Ohio and Chesapeake canal: with respect to these, and many others, it has always appeared to me, and I make no merit of it, that it is the duty of our government to lend a generous countenance.

One word more, gentlemen, and I have done.

The mayor has spoken of education: and can any man doubt, as a social being, as an immortal being, as a being interested in the world that is—as a being vastly more interested in that which is to be—that education is the great business of man? I take not back one jot or tittle of the expression. Education—the formation of the mind and character, by instruction in knowledge, and instruction in righteousness, is the great end of human being.

Gentlemen, it is most gratifying to witness the attention which has been aroused, not confined to latitude or longitude, upon this subject. In the progress of some five or six weeks in the state west of you, and a part of the time in your own state, I have marked it with delight. The western world—our whole west, is full, beyond all comparison full, of aptitude and claims to instruction. The country is young, and settled with parents who have many children—whose means are not affluent, but who eagerly seek education. The demands are fast increasing, and becoming more and more urgent and imperative.

Under free institutions, literature, knowledge and morals, might well be expected to flourish; but, we are setting the great example which all Europe may look upon with astonishment—that, with popular institutions, and under a system of absolute toleration, we see no indifference to the great cause of religion.

We have denied a political sanction to any sect; yet places of worship are seen to spring up in every direction, and of every denomination. Toleration begets no indifference; but zeal, rather than indifference. It is connected with education, with the intellectual and moral culture of the mind; and wheresoever men meet, to worship the God of their fathers, I wish them the means of instruction and the means of adequately conducting the great and good work.

Gentlemen, I have detained you too long.

My friends, my fellow citizens, my countrymen, I must now take a respectful leave of you. I have spent a period of five or six weeks west of the Allegheny, for the first time in my life. It has been a series of happy days. I have seen much which I shall always remember—much to inform, as well as delight me. I return you, again and again, my unfeigned thanks, for the frankness, and kindness, and neighborliness, with which you have made me welcome: and wherever I may go, or wherever I may be, I pray you, my friends, to believe, I shall never lose the recollection of your kindness. May God bless you all.

It is believed that about three thousand persons were present during the delivery of Mr. Webster's speech.

We had laid aside some account of the attentions paid to Mr. Webster at Lancaster, Chillicothe, Steubenville and many other places in Ohio—at Louisville, &c. in Kentucky—at Wheeling and Wellsburg, Virginia—at Bedford, Chambersburg, Gettysburg, &c. in Pennsylvania—but it does not seem necessary that we should record them; but it may be well to insert what follows:

He declined a public dinner at Steubenville—but at a private entertainment in that town gave this toast—

The state of Ohio—The abundance of her resources and the fertility of her soil, are only equalled by the hospitality of her citizens—may her influence in the councils of the nation always be as salutary as they must be influential.

The Frankfort (Ky.) Commentator has these remarks:

The Cincinnati papers inform us that Mr. Webster has left that place for his return to the east. In consequence of the prevalence of the cholera in Kentucky, he declined visiting this state. We speak the feelings of the whole community when we say, that it is a matter of deep regret that any circumstance should have prevented the people of Kentucky from having it in their power to testify to Mr. Webster the regard they entertain for him as a citizen and as a statesman. The citizens of Kentucky have looked forward with much eagerness for the period when the great son of New England would visit their state; and see with his own eyes how much there was in this favored land to justify the attachment of her children to it. We wished him to have contrasted our own people with those of his own section, confident that he would have discovered much to admire in us, although it was totally different from that to which he had been accustomed. We were prepared to welcome him. But, since it is so ordered, that the fell disease which desolates our land, turning a paradise into a charnel house, has deprived us of this pleasure, we must indulge the hope that when the country is restored to health, he will return again. Cicero, we are told, when he visited the cities of Greece, although under the clouds of political displeasure, was every where in that polished land, greeted as the accomplished orator and skilful civilian. Mr. Webster would have found that in Kentucky he was considered as the compeer of our own great orator—like him an ornament to the bar, the halls of legislation and the national councils; and like him deserving of the respect and attention of every man who took pride in the fame and achievements of his countrymen.

The "National Intelligencer" of July 11 said—

Mr. Webster has wrought little less than a miracle upon party feuds and divisions in the western country. He has fairly extinguished the one and obliterated the other. In the last number of the Nashville Banner we find published the letter of invitation to him to visit that city, from which we take the following extract:

"In discharging the pleasing duty thus assigned them by their fellow citizens, the undersigned have much satisfaction in being able to assure you, that should it suit your convenience thus to extend your western tour, you will be most cordially greeted by the citizens of this town and neighborhood, without distinction of party, and that every effort in their power will be cheerfully made to render your visit as agreeable to yourself as they are sure it will be satisfactory to them."

That Mr. Webster should be thus respectfully invited to Nashville by a portion of his western countrymen is not at all surprising. The remarkable feature of the honor thus paid him is the complete political amalgamation perceptible in the following list of the committee by whom the invitation was signed:

Wm. Armstrong,	E. S. Hall,
Thomas Washington,	John Catron,
Felix Grundy,	Ephraim H. Foster,
H. M. Rutledge,	And. Hynes,
Royd McNairy,	Ph. Lindsey,
H. R. W. Hill,	Francis B. Fogg,
John P. Erwin,	John Williams,
Robert Woods,	G. W. Gibbs,
George Crockett,	W. G. Hunt.
H. L. Douglass,

We here behold Jackson-men, Clay men, neutrals, and every other class of politicians, harmoniously uniting to pay honor to talents and integrity which they believed to have been employed usefully to the whole country. It is a spectacle we delight to look upon. Would that such were often seen!

DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Southern district of New York.

The postmaster general of the U. S.

vs. John L. Clark.

The same, vs.

Samuel J. Smith.

} Post office cases.

These were actions of debt brought to recover penalties alleged to be incurred by a violation of the third section of the act of congress passed the 2d of March, 1827. That section is in the following words:

"That no person, other than the postmaster general, or his authorised agents, shall set up any foot or horse post for the conveyance of letters and packets, upon any post road, which is or may be established as such by law; and every person who shall offend herein shall incur a penalty of not exceeding fifty dollars, for each letter or packet so carried."

The causes were brought to trial before a jury at the last January term, his honor Judge Defts presiding. The counsel for the plaintiff, J. A. Hamilton, D. A. offered evidence, showing that the suits were commenced on the information of E. J. Mallet, postmaster at Providence, R. I. That the defendants as partners kept a lottery and exchange office there, and another office in New York, and that they had been for a considerable period of time in the practice of sending their letters, from one office to the other, in a bundle or small leather bag by passengers going back and forth in the steamboats running between Providence and New York. They were also in the habit of sending with their own letters, free of any charge, the letters of third persons who desired to have them forwarded. Mr. Mallet several times interfered, and insisted on the illegality of the practice, and threatened them with a prosecution unless it was discontinued, and the defendants, not having taken legal advice, agreed to discontinue it.

Being afterwards advised that sending letters in this manner was not unlawful, they again began to send them as before, which, being discovered by Mr. Mallet, he directed these suits to be brought, being the first ever brought for the offence alleged. No evidence was offered on the part of the prosecution to prove the offence of "setting up a foot or horse post," except that the defendants had sent letters by passengers going in the steamboats, as before mentioned. This, the counsel for the prosecution contended, was the setting up a foot post within the meaning of the law. To show that the waters between N. York and Providence were a post road, he referred to the act of congress of March 3d, 1823, which declares, "that all waters on which steamboats regularly pass from port to port, shall be considered and established as post roads." He also insisted that sending letters from the defendant's offices to the steamboat wharf by their office clerk, was clearly setting up a foot post on the post road between the two cities, the street to the steamboat being a part of the post road.

E. Paine, for the defendants contended that the acts complained of, did not constitute an offence within either the letter or spirit of the act of congress relied on. It was apparent to every one, that the gravamen of the offence provided against, was, not the sending of letters, but the setting up a foot or horse post. This was the act prohibited, although the penalty was affixed to the letters sent.

It was contended, that to bring the defendant within the letter of the law, it must be shown that they had set up a post. That by a post was meant, some person sent expressly, and with some sort of regularity, for the purpose of conveying letters. If he went on foot, he would be a foot post; if on horseback, or in a carriage drawn by horses, he would be a horse post; but in either case, he must go by land. That it was absurd to suppose that a horse or foot post could go by water. The words horse or foot prefixed to the word post, were intended to be descriptive of the mode of conveyance, and could mean nothing else. A person going in a packet to England might as well be called a foot post, as one who went in a steamboat to Providence. Besides, the letters were sent by passengers in the steamboat, going on their own business, and who carried the letters casually. This was not the setting up of a post of any kind. It was indispensable to the character of a post, that the business on which it went should be the carrying of letters. And it was insisted that the words of the law were to be understood in their plain, and obvious sense and not to be strained to create a penalty.

In order to show that the alleged offence was not within the spirit of the act of congress, the other post office laws on the same subject, and the obvious policy of their prohibitions were referred to. From these it was evident that the government did not claim the exclusive right to carry all letters, but merely the exclusive right to maintain posts for carrying them. The government post office establishment was derived from the English system of monopolies. In that country, the wants of the government, might preserve it, as a branch of the revenue, in the highest degree of rigor. But in this country no such necessity existed, and it was inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions, to make the post office establishment an infringement upon the liberties of the citizen. All that was necessary was, to prevent establishments of the same character from being set up in opposition to the government establishment. And accordingly all the prohibitions of the various acts of congress were directed to this object, and, this only. None of them were designed to prevent the transmission of letters, however frequently, or in whatever quantities, but to prevent the setting up or growth of such establishments.

The act of March 3d, 1823, repeals all other acts passed for the establishment or regulation of the post office, and is emphatically the post office law. The only prohibitions in this act are the following:—

Section 6. Requires the master or manager of any steamboat to deliver the letters brought by him to the postmaster of the place—and also requires every person employed on board a steamboat to deliver the letters entrusted to him, to the master or manager.

Section 17. Requires the master or commander of every ship or vessel arriving at a port of the U. States, before breaking bulk to deliver all his letters at the post office.

Section 19. Prohibits any stage or other vehicle which regularly performs trips on a post road, or road parallel to it from conveying letters; and also prohibits any packet boat or other vessel which regularly plies on a water declared to be a post road, from conveying letters, except such as relate to some part of the cargo; and imposes a penalty of fifty dollars on the owner of the carriage, other vehicle or vessel, or the person who has charge of it, for its violations.

No subsequent act of congress contains any prohibition except the section above recited under which these suits are brought prohibiting the setting up of a horse or foot post.

It was contended that the uniform and studied forbearance of congress, when legislating about ships, vessels, steamboats, packet boats, and carriages, to prohibit the sending of letters by passengers, or passengers conveying them, and confining the prohibition expressly to the masters and owners, or persons in their employment, was conclusive evidence that they never designed to prevent their being sent by passengers. That the reason of the master, owner and servants being prohibited was obvious. It was to prevent the conveyances themselves from becoming rival establishments to those of the post office. It would have been the most natural and easy thing imaginable for congress, when legislating about these conveyances, to have said that no passenger going in them should carry letters. As they had not seen fit to do so, it was hardly to be supposed that they had designed to do it, when prohibiting something so apparently different as the setting up of a foot or horse post.

The court charged the jury in substance as follows:—

That, if the defendants employed a person to carry letters from New York to Providence regularly, such person was to be deemed a post. That, if such person was employed to go on horseback, he would be a horse post; if on foot, a foot post. But that it was not necessary that a person employed to go on foot, should go all the way by land, to constitute him a foot post: For instance, if he were employed to go from New York to Albany, and should go to Harlem on foot and then take a steamboat the rest of the way, he would be a foot post. That the law having, by various previous provisions, prohibited the carrying of letters by steamboats, packets, stages and carriages, undoubtedly designed, by the provision under which these actions were brought, to complete the plan of prohibition by extending it to the conveyance on horseback, or on foot. That it was for the jury to say, whether the acts complained of were a violation of the law, as the court had stated it to them. If not a violation, the acts were undoubtedly an evasion of the law, but these actions should not be sustained for acts which the law did not expressly forbid.

The jury withdrew and returned a verdict for the defendants. Afterwards, the district attorney moved to set aside that verdict on the grounds of misdirection of the court, that the verdict was against evidence, and on newly discovered evidence. But the court, after argument, denied the motion, as the charge contained no misdirection; the jury had passed upon the evidence submitted to them, and the newly discovered evidence was merely cumulative and was known, or might have been, before the trial to the postmaster at Providence who had directed the suits to be brought. Judgment was therefore rendered for the defendants.

"IRON CASE"—AT NEW YORK.

The following case was reported for the "Journal of Commerce"—and we give it in extenso. It is not necessary, at present, to say more than that the great principle involved in Mr. Clay's "bill of compromise," as some have called it, was grossly violated before it went into operation, in the repeal of certain provisions in the act of 1832, on which that compromise was founded, and at four o'clock in the morning!—though these provisions were originally intended, and specially inserted in the law of 1832, to insure to the makers of iron the amount of protection apparently extended to them, and for which they the more cheerfully submitted to the large reduction of the duties established by that law!

There were circumstances attending the repeal of the provisions which cannot be thought of without disgust—and the effect of this repeal is—that iron, partially manufactured, or, more properly speaking, apparently manufactured, is admitted at a less rate of duty than the iron itself!

We have already freely stated the facts which belong to this extraordinary act of legislation—and shall, probably, have something more to say on the subject, that the repealing act may be repealed, as a matter of respect to common decency. The boast of the Englishman seems as if accomplished—"we'll break down the iron arch of Pennsylvania," said he, "and the whole system will fall to the ground."

DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

In admiralty, July 7, 1833.

The United States of America, vs.

Thirty-one boxes and forty-two packages of articles, and ten pieces of iron falsely denominated straight, bent and turned links, and anchor iron. John F. Sarchet, claimant.

These articles were imported in the Wm. Byrnes from Liverpool, and invoiced 29 boxes bent links—2 boxes straight links—43 packages turned links—and 10 pieces of anchor iron, with their respective weights, cost, &c. The importer, by his attorney, John Sarchet, claimed to enter them at the custom house at 15 per cent. ad valorem under the act of 1816, as non-enumerated articles manufactured in part—and denied that they were a complete manufacture of iron, which pays 25 per cent. ad valorem. Attached to and forming part of the invoice, was the affidavit of the shipper at Liverpool that he was in the habit of receiving and giving orders for links and anchor iron, and that they were the articles in commerce known by that name—and also the affidavit of the manufacturers that these were articles of commerce well known by those names, and fit for nothing but scrap iron unless made into chains and anchors, and for these purposes much more valuable than bar iron. These affidavits were very full, detailing the proofs by which links and anchor iron are made from the raw material and every thing in relation thereto. These the importer submitted to the collector attached to his invoice, who handed them to Mr. Mead the appraiser, who made the following report:

Appraiser's office, January 18, 1833.

S. Swartwout, esq. collector.

The two invoices handed you herewith of Mr. Thomas Barrow of Liverpool, offered for entry, contain the following articles, viz.

Bolt or chain iron of various diameters cut up in ends of different lengths for the making of links for chains, some are straight, some bent thus U and others of an oblong form turned or twisted thus 2 the ends tapering to a point and flat for welding.

The straight ends are of the diameter of 72 inch and cut in uniform lengths of 5 inches. The ends bent thus U are 72 and 9-16 of an inch in diameter and in length 5½, 6 and 7 inches. These, together with the straight ends before named, are simply cut from the bar or bolt iron while in a heated state—varying in length and in diameter according to the size or strength required.

The oblong or turned links are 15-16 of an inch diameter and 11¼ inches long, bent while heated, and in that state cut diagonally at the side by the aid of a machine called a mandrill, and then packed for purposes of transportation on a round bolt of iron 10½ feet long and 1¼ inches in diameter, with a large head or flat piece of iron at one end of the bolt sufficiently large to prevent the links from passing over, and at the other end by a key securing them from coming off.

The two pieces called anchor iron are two feet long, 6½ inches square at the large end and tapering down to 1½ inches at the other end, and is in fact and truth hammered iron. It is unlike bar iron in every particular. Each piece besides is prepared separately by itself and then welded together for anchors.

I would particularly recommend to your perusal the oath or affirmation attached to this invoice of anchor iron. It sets forth in a clear and explicit manner the article in question—without a word from me—that it is intended for anchors there cannot be a doubt—that they are not anchors there cannot be a shadow of a doubt, and that they are not manufactures of iron suited to any known purpose, it is also equally clear and conclusive.

The oath or affirmation attached to the invoice of bolt or chain iron, is in the main equally clear and comprehensive, as regards the facts therein set forth, save that part which draws deductions from premises not warranted by facts, which part is marked in the margin of the affirmation by inverted lines. I cannot but consider this a case where the object of the owner is to evade the payment of duties imposed by the laws, and one so clearly and palpably wrong as not to admit of any well grounded defence under any view of the case. They cannot in truth be considered as manufactures within the intent and meaning of the law; that they are not chains, no one will be foolish enough to aver; but that they are intended for links for chains, no one will deny.

Under what view of the case, then, can they be called manufactures of iron? We might with the same propriety call a bar of iron a manufactured article. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant.

(Signed) A. B. MEAD.

The bolt or chain iron, although cut up into pieces for links, should be classed for duty as bar or bolt iron, made wholly or in part by rolling, and the anchor iron as hammered iron.

(Signed) A. B. M.

The collector then, on suspicion that a fraud had been committed in making the entry, ordered the packages to be examined by Nicholas Saltus and Daniel Ayres, two merchants in New York city, who reported to the collector as follows:

SCHEDULE D.

New York, January 31, 1833.

David S. Lyon, esq. deputy collector of port of New York.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 18th, requesting us to report to you our opinion of the iron entered by Mr. Sarchet in this custom house, imported in the ship Wm. Byrnes, beg leave to state that the said iron is what is represented in the certificates, viz: three descriptions of links well known to the trade as parts of chain cables, requiring but a small process to make them complete chain cables, and parts of anchors ready to be joined together. The tariff expressly states that chain cables or parts of chains, shall pay 3 cts. per lb. and anchors or parts of anchors, 2 cts. per lb. This was well known to Mr. Sarchet, and his attempt to enter them under any other form is an attempt of fraud on the revenue, and consequently in our opinion ought to be seized. Respectfully we are, &c.

NICHOLAS SALTUS.
DANIEL AYRES.

The articles were thereupon labelled as bar and bolt iron—short bars and bolts of iron, falsely denominated links and anchor iron—and also for that "the invoice and packages were falsely made up with intent by a false valuation, extension, or otherwise, to defraud the revenue"—that the goods were described as manufactured articles subject to 25 per cent. ad valorem, when they were iron in bars and bolts, and subject to a specific duty—that the packages contained articles not described in the invoice—that the packages were examined by two merchants and found to differ in their contents from the entry.

On the trial—the substance of the testimony was this:

The entry clerk of the custom house testified that Mr. Sarchet came to his desk, and proposed to enter this invoice at 15 per cent. ad valorem; but witness would not so enter it, and an entry was then made out at 25 per cent. ad valorem: He asked Mr. Sarchet what he wanted it charged at? He replied 15 per cent. Bonds were executed in blank.

Mr. Mead, U. S. appraiser, testified—that his report was correct, and he found this invoice, pieces of iron intended for links of chains, and he was bound to say, that the papers attached to the invoice were correct in every particular, and squared with the information he received, and confirmed it. The straight links he considered braziers' rods, but in commerce they would not be known as such. That he had no experience in iron, but what he had acquired as appraiser.

Mr. Saltus for the U. S. said that he was an importer of iron, and signed the report with Mr. Ayres to the collector as above, which was correct—that it costs about 2 to 3½ cents to make these links into chains—links are known in commerce as distinctive articles. In orders you merely give the diameter, and the manufacturer has rules for the length. The government advertise for straight and bent links, and witness has supplied them. Also for anchor iron in parts, but he never supplied anchor iron—chain cables are invariably imported 90 fathoms, in sections of 15 fathoms connected by shackles.

Mr. Ayres for the U. S. said that he signed the above report—and it is correct. He should think a link a part of a chain, and thinks the trade would so consider it—should think anchor iron parts of anchors. He sells links, and anchor iron—he invoices them as links and anchor iron—they are ordered by those names, and so known in commerce. He should order them by that name from abroad. Being asked if he so ordered, sold, bought and invoiced them, by what name he would enter them—the district attorney objected and the judge ruled he must not answer the question.

Mr. Ayres further said, to make the turned links into chains he thought would cost 2½ cents per lb. Imagines Sarchet's parts of anchors only wanted welding, a hole punched and a ring to make anchors of them.

Mr. Jacobs, clerk in the appraiser's office, said he knew very little of iron—supposed this anchor iron for the purpose of making anchors. Until this trial supposed a link considered by every body a part of a chain.

Mr. Barker, collector of Philadelphia, said Sarchet in 1829, contended that the anchor iron was not parts of anchors, but anchor iron subject to 15 per cent.—But for the law of 1832, witness would have considered links parts of bolt iron, and so charged them. The treasury decided before 1832 that they were not parts of chains, and the anchor iron not parts of anchors. I had charged the links as bolt iron and the anchor iron as anchors, as I always fix the highest rate of duty where there is a doubt.

Mr. De Camp, custom house officer, made iron 30 years previous to 1818. He should call links parts of chains, welded or not, and the straight ones, braziers' rods cut up in pieces, fit for rabbit screws and many purposes. The anchor iron I supposed pieces of anchors, and would be so considered by the trade. When these pieces leave the forge they are half made. If I wanted to make an anchor, I should order the number of pieces, giving the weight, and I don't know how it would come invoiced. Never saw an invoice of it. I don't know whether it is an article of commerce, but I have seen small quantities come into port for 13 years past, like this. Never finished or made an anchor, but sold a great quantity of anchor iron to merchants, who sell to the anchor maker. If well drawn, not much to do but weld it.

On the part of the claimant—Mr. John H. Howland of New York, importer and dealer in iron for many years, testified that, this invoice was not chains nor bar or bolt iron.

Mr. Cornell, a merchant, and five chain cable and anchor maker, including the most extensive in America, testified that links, straight, bent and turned, and anchor iron, were an article of commerce well known by those names, and so ordered, bought, sold, and invoiced—that the anchor iron was equally finished with iron in bars and bolts, and the links more so. That both were more valuable for chains and anchors than bar or bolt iron, but if not used for these purposes they should sell the same for scraps. That these links are not a manufactured article, but partly manufactured, and are the raw material of the chain maker, as common bar and bolt iron is of the general smith, and as anchor iron is of the anchor maker. That links welded and finished separately, would be no part of a chain unless in links—that a chain or part of a chain is a series of chains connected together, and these must be more than one. That the cost of making these straight links into chains is about 4 to $5 per cwt.—bent links 10 per cent. less, and turned $4 37½ to $5—that the general price of anchors is 11 to 12 cents per lb. and of anchor iron 5½ cents. That chain cable iron and anchor iron is a different kind of iron from bar or bolt iron, and much superior in quality, having no cinder in it, and higher in price, made in a particular way for the manufacture of cables and anchors. There is none in America suitable for the purpose, and experiments have proved it. The claimant also introduced the testimony taken in 1828, before congress, to show that congress in passing the law knew these articles as links, in which Mr. Keese's examination says, that at the Peru works they manufacture principally chain links and bar iron—and also the advertisements of the navy departments for links and anchor iron—to show that congress intended to leave these articles non-enumerated, as bar iron could not possibly be imported in that form for any useful purpose, and as our own iron is not suitable, that the chain cable and anchor makers might have the advantage of a cheap raw material.

Much other testimony was taken, which, with the arguments of counsel, occupied the court six days; but our limits will not permit its insertion.

Judge Betts read the following

OPINION:

U. S. district court, vs. 6 Iron boxes, &c.

The forfeiture is claimed—

1. Because, on inspection of goods, the invoice was found to have been made up with intent by a false valuation, extension or otherwise, to evade and defraud the revenue. There is no proof showing any erroneous valuation or extension in the invoice, and it is admitted by the district attorney that the forfeiture can only be sustained by force of the expression "or otherwise."

He insists that the proof shows that the invoice was accompanied by a representation from manufacturers abroad, calculated and intended to induce the collector to allow the goods to be entered at a rate of duty lower than they were subject to by law, and that the inventory in correspondence with that proof, was made up by a misdescription, a false denomination of the goods.

The articles were entered as articles of manufacture subject to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, and the affidavits of the manufacturers representing them to be so. It is contended on the part of the government that they were bar and bolt iron and anchors or parts of anchors, and liable to a specific duty under the act of May 22d, 1824, of 3 cents per lb. on the links and 2 cents per lb. on the anchors.

By the act of May 22, 1824, sec. 1, art. 5, a duty is imposed "on iron cables or chains or parts thereof," of 3 cents per lb. and "on anvils and anchors two cents per pound."

By the act of May 19, 1828, sec. 1, art. 2, a duty is laid "on bar and bolt iron, made wholly or in part by rolling," of $37 per ton.

The 5th article of the 1st section of the act of May, 1824, provides that "on all manufactures not otherwise specified, made of brass, iron, steel, pewter, lead, or tin, or of which either of these metals is a component material, a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem shall be laid."

The 2d article of the 1st section of the act of April 27, 1816, enacts, that there shall be laid a duty of 15 per centum ad valorem on all articles not subject to any other rate of duty.

The claimant insists that although he entered his importation as subject to duties under the act of 1824, yet that strictly it comes within the provisions of the law of 1816, and should be charged with only 15 per cent. duty.

To bring these articles within the scope of the libel under this branch of it, it must be found that they were subject to specific duties, and that the manner of charging them upon the invoice is comprehended in the interdiction "or otherwise" of the act of 1830.

The point has been most pressed, in argument, that the court should now decide whether they are not entitled to entry on the payment of 15 per cent. instead of 25.

It does not appear to me that the point is necessarily raised for decision in this cause. The allegation is that the goods were subject to specific duties, and that the claimant attempted a fraud upon the revenue in entering them as liable only to an ad valorem duty. If the general proposition is decided in favor of the claimant and his goods acquitted, it would be entirely gratuitous on the part of the court to go further, and settle between him and the officers of the custom house the rate of duty he should pay.

The present question is one of forfeiture alone, and whether the goods are liable to specific or ad valorem duties, is an inquiry which can have no relevancy except as showing the motive of the party in preparing his invoice. As he entered them there as liable to 25 per cent. duty and offered to pay that, it would be a useless speculation to inquire what the evidence of a fraudulent motive might be, had he endeavored to pass them at the lower rate, thereby saving 10 per cent. more to himself. We can in justice, do no more than estimate the influence of the act done, and there would accordingly seem to be no utility in carrying our regards to a more supposable state of facts. The term "otherwise" in a penal law is liable to serious objection for want of that precision and certainty the citizen has a right to expect in the language of a law which is to confiscate his property; and no court could go further in giving it meaning and application, by construction, than the plain intent of congress manifested in the context of the term, imperiously demanded.

The 4th section of the act of May 28, 1830, declares "that if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation or extension or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited."

Having designated three delicta by this clause, each of which shall work a forfeiture of the goods, the inquiry is whether some other substantive and distinct offence was intended to be provided against by the term "otherwise," and if so, whether it is to be interpreted to embrace every other fraud or evasion that may be devised, other than the three specifically designated.

It is believed no sound administration of penal law can permit a range so unlimited and hazardous to language of a very equivocal import. The expression ought rather to be construed as suppletory to those preceding it, and as having relation to the same subject matter. Congress no doubt intended to specify the modes in which offences followed by a forfeiture of property should be proved to have been committed, but as the enumeration might possibly omit some offence coming clearly within the general classification, though varying in some accidents of form or manner from those named, used a phraseology broad enough to bring such equivocal acts within the statute. The statute should therefore be construed as applying only to cases of the same character with those enumerated, and not to any of a different and independent description.

The offence described by the act is "making up a package or invoice" in a particular way. The term valuation and extension, apply to the invoice, and the otherwise as immediately associated with them by juxtaposition and grammatical connection, ought undoubtedly to be read as having reference to the invoice also. By what method of making up an invoice other than by valuation or extension, can this fraud be committed.

But by omitting articles, that offence is provided for in a previous part of the section.

But effect may be given to the term by applying it to a fraudulent misdescription of the invoice, though true to certain intents, yet being false and fraudulent as to the matter of duties to which the real article would be entitled. For instance, as entering refined sugar as white clayed, &c. the description actually given though true in terms, not being the whole truth such as represents the exact character of the commodity, and if acted upon at the custom house will leave the goods to pass with a lower rate of duty than they would pay under full denomination. In the case before the court, anchors or bar iron entered as anchor iron—parts of chain cables, as links—bolt iron, as straight links—if done with intent to evade or defraud the revenue, would be making up the invoice otherwise than by false valuation or extension, and in a way calculated to evade the payment of duties and so as to give application and significance to this branch of the statute. It would thus become the false charges and the want of correspondence of the goods mentioned in the preceding part of the section, as all the articles of the libel proceed upon the allegation of a false denomination, or description of the goods imported. This controlling question in the merits of the cause may be as well discussed under this branch of the case, as in connection with any of the other charges of the libel. The different forms in which the offence is stated in the libel so as to bring it under some of the prohibitions of the statute as comprehended in and depend upon the proposition that "what is called in the invoice anchor iron, is bar iron or anchors; and what are called straight links, are bolt iron, or brazier's rods; and what are called bent and turned links, are parts of chain cables or chains;" and these false descriptions are given with intent to evade the payment of duties. If this proposition is true, the goods would be subject to forfeiture under the branch of the libel now discussed: and if not true there is no matter set forth in any other part of the libel that would subject them to forfeiture. Without therefore waiting to arrange the proofs under the various charges of the libel, the most commodious and perspicuous mode of considering it will be to bring it in review under the head of the pleadings.

A critical examination of the evidence produced on the part of the government cannot fail to show that the allegations upon which the property was seized are too feebly supported to justify a condemnation for these causes alone, and if the proofs make out a case involved in some uncertainty and doubt, this doubt raised is not as to the accuracy of the invoice and entry (which would impose on this claimant the obligation of proving their correctness and bona fides. Wheat. R. 411), but it is, whether a probable cause for seizure existed.

The invoice and entry described the first item under consideration to be, "ten pieces of anchor iron."

The specific charge in the libel, applicable to this commodity, is, that it was iron in bars; although in the proceedings and argument it was considered to be anchors, or parts of anchors, and that it did not correspond with the invoice because of that misnomer. The only witness on the part of the United States personally conversant and experienced in the iron business who considers these as parts of anchors, is Mr. De Camp. But he is exceedingly indistinct and uncertain in his judgment as to the denomination it has acquired in commerce, and he unites with the other experienced witnesses, on the part of the United States, in saying it is not known as bar iron, that it is both more refined and of higher value than bar iron, and also is carried forward to a state of manufacture adapted to making anchors, and is more valuable for that use than any other.

Mr. Ayres says it is known in commerce as anchor iron; is so imported, invoiced and sold, and the general bearing of the proofs for government is, that an order for anchor iron would be as distinct and well understood in business as for any other article in the iron trade.

Under this proof, without adverting to the very full and satisfactory evidence on the part of the claimant in this behalf, it cannot be maintained, that the article entered as anchor iron did not correspond with the invoice describing it as such. If it was not to be considered a manufacture, but the raw material for the trade and business of anchor making, yet it is put beyond all doubt by the proofs, that it has acquired a settled and notorious denomination entirely distinguishing it from bar iron. So also it cannot be termed an anchor and be liable to a specific duty as such, because it has to undergo an important modification and manufacture to bring it from its present state into that of anchors.

The act of 1824 imposed a duty on anchors, and not as is assumed in the report of the merchants who inspected this importation, on anchors and "all parts thereof." The latter provision is made in the act of July 14, 1832, (sec. 1. art. 9.) but this importation does not come under the provisions of the latter statute.

So as to the other parts of this entry. The testimony of Messrs. Mead, Sattus and Ayres, on the part of the United States, is clear and unequivocal, that the articles inventoried and entered as straight, bent and turned links, are well known in commerce by those denominations. They are manufactured and sold by these appellations; the straight and bent are common in our market and pass by the name of links—the turned are an English fabric, and seem to have been imported solely by the claimant. All the witnesses however agree in terming it a link, and the appraiser using the same denomination details the mode of its manufacture.

This species of links and the bent ones were unquestionably within the general description of links, and whether they are more, and compose parts of chains, will be more particularly noticed presently.

Those called straight links have the appearance of ordinary brazier's rods, shortened to a standard length, fitting them for chain links. The rod is no other way changed than by cutting it into pieces.

It has been strenuously argued that this is only a simulated manufacture, still leaving the raw material to answer many valuable uses to which it is ordinarily applied, and that the alteration is fraudulent; intended to introduce the article in its present form at an impost below what it is legally liable to.

Although in the opinion of some of the witnesses, iron cut into these short pieces may be used to advantage for bolts, screws, spikes, &c. yet by far the greatest weight of evidence is, that unless manufactured into links, it would be only marketable or useful in this form, as scrap iron.

And the proof both of the witnesses on the part of the United States and the claimant, places the fact above question, that the article in this form is a well known commodity, manufactured here and imported from abroad, and bought and sold under the name of straight links, and that it is in well established use for making chains, and is most valuable for that purpose. This proof is abundantly sufficient to show that the articles found in the packages correspond with the invoice, and that they were properly entered as links, if they are not something more than merely links. The remaining inquiry then is, whether all the links are not subject to duty as parts of chains.

There can be no doubt that in correctness of language every distinct component portion of an entire thing, is a part of that thing. In this sense a link is a part of a chain. As a wheel, spring or chain is a part of a watch, each of them essential to the existence of the particular thing.

The act of congress laying a like duty upon "cables or parts thereof," includes within the letter, the separate links, as well as the series united in a chain, and would accordingly be so applied, unless a different signification be given up by usage and is well known to those conversant with the particular article, or the connection in which the expression is used, denoting that it is to receive a more comprehensive meaning. In seeking the proper interpretation of the phrase "parts thereof" as applicable to chain cables, we discover at the first step, that custom, norma loquendi of laws, as well as of society, has affixed a meaning to the first element of the subject (links) essentially variant from its acceptance in the strict sense of the term. A link considered as a substantive article of manufacture, must unquestionably be finished, have every operation performed upon it required to fit it for the use it is destined for; whether round or oval, open or closed, it becomes the link only when the artist has completed his labor upon it. The link which forms part of a chain cable, must necessarily be closed; neither a straight piece of rod, nor bent at one end, nor turned so as to bring the two ends nearly into union, can in accuracy be said to compose that description of link. Usage, however, as it has been abundantly proved, does give the name of links, to things intended to form chain cables, that cannot compose such cable without great additional labor and manufacture, and if in like way the expression "parts of chains" has obtained a meaning different from the literal import, the rule which adopts the customary appellation in the one case, ought also to give it the same force in the other.

The evidence very satisfactorily shows, that chain cables are imported entire and in fragments or sections of several fathoms in length, which can be united by shackle links, or opening an ordinary link so as to supply the length that may be required, and that such sections of the chain are known in commerce as parts of cables or chains. The part being complete as a chain of itself, but of less length than the cable commonly required.

As this is the denomination the commodity receives from the dealer, the manufacturer and those conversant with it, the presumption is exceedingly forcible, that the law of 1824 contemplated those sections as the parts of chains which are made liable to the same duty as the entire chain. But whether this be so or not, it is very clear to my mind, that in the sense of the act of 1824, nothing can be deemed part of a chain that is not, as to itself, as finished and complete, as the entire chain. It matters then very little in this case whether in the interpretation of the act, single links should be accepted as parts of chains, inasmuch as to acquire that quality, they must be finished and perfected as links. Nevertheless the construction I put upon the act in view of the facts disclosed by the evidence in this cause, and which it is proper to avow is, that parts of chains and pieces of chain are synonymous, and mean a series of links comprising a section less than the chain as usually imported. In this view of the subject, the part may consist of several fathoms, or any less extent beyond individual detached links: it denotes a portion taken from the whole and still retaining the properties of the whole, less only the extent.

In either view of the subject these articles are not liable to condemnation for the causes alleged.

The district attorney has argued that the importer is bound to swear that the entry is true in all particulars, and that these goods being entered as manufactured articles and subject to a duty of 25 per cent. if it is found that they cannot with justice be denominated manufactured or are subject to specific duties, they must be forfeited for those causes.

The answer to this argument is, that the goods have not been proceeded against as improperly described in the entry, nor is any statute shown subjecting them to forfeiture for that cause. The allegation of the libel is, that the goods on examination and inspection were found not to correspond with the description in the inventory, and it is for that variance that the act of 1830 subjects property to forfeiture.

And it may be further observed, that it is not shown that an erroneous claim at the custom house in respect to the duties, payable by imports, affects the importation or entry, when the goods are correctly described.

Probably it is of constant occurrence at the custom house, that merchants and the collector differ as to the rate of duties to be applied to an entry, when the goods are accurately and exactly denominated. The court know judicially, that such differences have sometimes occurred, and that the construction the merchant claimed for the laws, has been upheld in all the courts. Had it been invariably otherwise, congress would deal with most ungenerous severity with the citizen in confiscating his property for a difference of opinion, which could do the revenue no harm, as the thing is placed undisguisedly in the hands of the public officers, for them to judge whether the merchant is correct or not, in his estimate of the character of the commodity, and they have the power in the first instance of enforcing their construction of the laws, by retaining the goods until he pays the duties they demand.

In my opinion a misdescription of that character would no afford ground for forfeiture of the goods.

The following decree was entered.

This cause having been brought to hearing upon the pleadings and proofs, and having been argued by Mr. Hamilton, the attorney of the United States, on the part of the United States, and by Mr. Walker and Mr. Hall on the part of the claimant, and the premises having been fully considered by the court, it is considered and declared, that the charges in the libel, purporting that the goods specified in the entry were falsely described in the invoice mentioned in the pleadings, with intent to evade and defraud the revenue, are sufficient in law to subject such goods as were imported in boxes to forfeiture under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of May 28, 1830: but it is considered and declared, that anchors, or anchor iron, imported in bulk and not in packages or bundles, are not subject to forfeiture, under the provisions of the said section, and if they were so, it is further declared, that it is established by the proofs in the cause, that anchor iron is a commodity well known in commerce and to artisans by that appellation, and is distinct and different from the article denominated bar iron, or iron in bars; and that the commodity seized and article upon in this cause corresponds with the description thereof in the invoice.

And it is further considered and declared, that it is established by the proofs in the cause, that the articles described in the invoice as straight links, bent links, and turned links, are articles well known in commerce, and to artisans, by those names and denominations, and are not, nor is either of them, bar or bolt iron, within the acceptance of that term in ordinary usage in trade and commerce; that they have been subjected to a process of manufacture by machinery and manual labor, changing them from the raw material into articles of enhanced value, for the particular uses to which the change has adapted them; and that they correspond with the descriptions thereof in the invoice.

And it is further considered and declared, that it is established by the proofs in this cause, that cables or chains, or parts thereof, as known and denominated in commerce and by artisans, consist of a series of finished links, and that one unfinished link or any indefinite number of unfinished links, are not denominated "cables or chains or parts thereof," and are not known as such.

Therefore it is considered, adjudged and decreed by the court, and his honor the district judge, by virtue of the power and authority in him vested doth order, adjudge, and decree, that the goods, wares and merchandises, specified in the pleadings in this cause, and seized by the collector as forfeited, were not entered at the custom house in this port as charged in the libel, by a false denomination, or description; and that the packages or invoices thereof were not, nor was either of them, made up with intent to evade or defraud the revenue, and that none of the said packages contained any article not described in the invoice thereof; and that the goods imported and entered as aforesaid, correspond with the invoices thereof; and it is therefore further considered and decreed, that the goods, wares and merchandises, described in the pleadings, be acquitted of the seizure thereof, and be forthwith delivered up to the claimant.

But inasmuch as it is made to appear in the proofs that the public appraisers, and two merchants, sworn to assist in the examination of the goods aforesaid, reported to the collector that, in their opinion, the importation and entry thereof had been fraudulently made with intent to evade the revenue, and recommended a seizure thereof, it is ordered that a certificate of probable cause of seizure be allowed and entered.

[From this decree the U. S. district attorney has appealed.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

—We insert, under the head of "nullification and so forth," a strange letter from gen. Hamilton, of South Carolina, and certain rough remarks of the Washington "Globe" upon it—as matters of curiosity only, proper for record, and in the manner presented to us, except that we have italicised the words in the "Globe," as to the "unconstitutional protection" of coarse woollens, and cottons and "cash duties," with what is said about the triumph of president Jackson "OVER THE AMERICAN SYSTEM IN ALL ITS PARTS." These are queer things; and, if the "collar" is truly marked—may be worthy of future comment. The temper of the general's letter, and the charity of the "Globe's" remarks, can hardly be sufficiently admired.

THE CHOLERA.

But four cases of this disease occurred at Pittsburgh, from the 17th to the 23d ultimo.

The cholera had nearly disappeared from the western part of the state of Louisiana. At New Orleans it had entirely disappeared, and that city is represented as healthy. The mortality amongst the slaves in Louisiana must have been immense. The Richmond Compiler states, that on the estate of general Wade Hampton, a little above N. Orleans, on the Mississippi, out of 1,500 slaves, more than 700 had died.

The various papers received by the late mail from Kentucky, give the gratifying intelligence that the cholera has greatly abated through the state, and in many of the towns where it had raged severely, it had entirely ceased. In some sections it had left the towns but had extended its ravages into the country.

Two cases and one death of cholera have occurred at Knoxville, Tennessee.

At Columbus, Ohio, seven deaths had occurred from cholera, and the disease prevails in several other towns in that state.

At Charleston, Va. but one case had occurred for several days.

A note from Kanawha Salines, Kanawha county, Va. reports 26 cases as having occurred there between the 9th and 16th ult. Most of the new cases are represented as mild and much more manageable than before.

The board of health of Pittsburgh under date of the 23d ult. report six more deaths from cholera, within the week immediately preceding, being forty-eight in all since the 11th of June, the date of its first appearance.

It appears from letters subsequently received from Princeton, New Jersey, that the reported appearance of cholera in that city was premature. The physician who, at first pronounced the case, which gave rise to the alarm, "a case of malignant cholera," now considers it "an aggravated case of cholera morbus."

A gentleman from Salem, Indiana, writes to his friend at Cincinnati that from the 1st to the 12th of July the cholera had carried off 60 of their citizens out of a population of 600.

—RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS, AND CONTROVERSIES. We have "fallen upon evil times." Indeed, it would almost seem that a return to the "days of fire and faggot" might be speedily looked for—if the secular power could be rendered subservient to the propagation and "glorious progress" of some of the leading Christian sects. Concerning such quarrels, (which then existed as now though with a better excuse than at present), Franklin, about sixty years ago, said in a private letter to a friend:—

"When theologians or religious people quarrel about religion, each party abuses the other; the profane and the infidel believe both sides, and enjoy the fray; the reputation of religion in general suffers, and its enemies are ready to say, not what was said in the primitive times, behold how these Christians love one another, but, mark how these Christians hate one another!"

And when we refer to certain newspapers in which "the drum ecclesiastic" is most loudly and wickedly beaten—with rub-a-dub here, and rub-a-dub there—it may well be said—"mark how these Christians hate one another."

There have been many regular set-to's between wrangling priests—whose zeal was manifestly greater "to floor" their antagonists—and, by cart-loads of Latin and Greek and Hebrew, "with" or "without points," send each other into the safe and fast keeping of "the prince of devils," and gather laurels for themselves—outrageously and indecently inconsistent with the sublime principles of that religion which teaches meekness and forbearance and "peace and good will to all men." And even the 4th of July—a day which of all others should be kept free from such controversies, and mainly because that perfect rights of conscience were established by the Declaration of Independence, has been used for the purpose of forwarding sectarian or particular religious views, and the progress of one of the "churches" has been toasted on this day! At Salem, (Mass.) a "reverend gentlemen," invited to address the people in honor of the anniversary, thumped and thundered against Sunday mails; and at Boston, at a large dinner party, the increasing power, or numbers, of the Roman Catholic church in the United States, was several times greeted at the "festive board!" Such things are not only in "bad taste"—they are decidedly mischievous, and should promptly obtain the most decided marks of public reproach, contempt and scorn.

We "owe no subscription" to the rules of faith of any party of religionists—for we cannot receive the whole dogmas of any one; but we agree in practice with the good people of all, who "do justice, love mercy and walk humbly." And it always delights us to witness, or be informed of, such instances of co-operating goodness, as is found in the Baltimore infirmary, where our valuable and valued friend, Solomon Eiting, esq. the governor of that institution and a "Jew," has a charge over the "Sisters of Charity," devoted to administer to the wants and relieve the pains of the sick and wounded and sore. No one who is acquainted with the persons just alluded to can, for an instant, suppose that "Jew or Gentile," "bond or free," is regarded in the fatherly or sister-like kindness and care with which patients are attended—or that between the two, so different in matters of faith, there is any difference in doing what the "law and the gospel" enjoins on both.

The wonderful increase of Roman Catholics in the U. States, within a few years past, seems to have much alarmed some other sects of professors. But these ought rather to imitate the zeal and industry of the Roman Catholics in performing what they believe is a duty, than "utter thunders" at them which fall harmless. And on the other hand, the lofty exclusiveness which we sometimes see proclaimed by the Roman Catholics, is merely calculated to provoke enmities among the people, and render cause for saying "mark how these Christians hate one another!"—and alas! with strict justice.

We read that "the harvest truly is great, but the laborers few." Every "church," more or less, has adopted certain "articles of faith" which are regarded by its thorough-going members as essentials; but if all these "essentials" were collected together and made into one book, a Chinese philosopher would, probably, regard the Christian religion, (as set forth in these utterly opposing dogmas), as a much more confused mass of matter than that of the various sects which abound in his own land; and, perhaps, also claim, in his own behalf, the fact,—that a far greater number of the inhabitants of the world are of his own general way of thinking. And yet on the important point of shewing the duty which man owes to the CREATOR by rendering kindness to his creatures,—the followers of Moses or of Jesus—of Confucius or Mahomet, or even those who regard the person of the Grand Lama as the invisible evidence of GOD—would all agree. In matters of faith, every man has an unquestionable right to judge for himself, when determining what particular sect approaches the nearest to the dictates of his own conscience—but it is required of all men, that, using this great and glorious liberty for themselves, they should not interfere with or abuse others for doing the same thing. It shows a spirit which is in malignant opposition to the charity of the gospel; and in the beautiful parable of the "good Samaritan," and in numerous other instances, it pleased the Great Teacher, to shew that professions, without works of benevolence, were utterly vain. The Gentle, who poured oil and wine into the wounds of the man who had been beset with thieves, was preferred to the priest-capped Levite, who would have suffered a fellow man to perish by the way-side. The dignified professor—one who had a legal right to enter the temple and render mouth-worship there—saying "stand aside, for I am holier than thou," was shewn to have no religion in his soul—whereas the other, who might have been hacked into pieces had he penetrated even the "outer veil," was held up as an example for the followers of the "Meek and Lowly."

It is not often that we speak of such subjects—and for the reason that it is hardly possible to refer to the tenets or conduct of a religious sect, without finding a thousand pens ready "to leap from" their ink-stands, blackened with all the fury of partizan zeal, and sharpened by the common "danger of the craft;" and the most insolent remarks uttered, in the most general terms, are discovered to have some direct application to persons or things which never entered the mind of the writer of them—but we would encourage a greater degree of liberality, and a closer observance of what we quaintly call the 12th commandment—"Let every one mind his own business." Our business, "as we understand it," is to enforce the 11th commandment—"Love one another." And we do think that deeds, and not words—the offerings of the heart, rather than of bulls or of rams, or any other outward ceremony or sacrifice, will find acceptance hereafter: when the dust of all men shall be mingled in a common mass of matter—autocrats and emperors, popes and archbishops shall return to the earth as they were, with the wild Arabs of the desert, and the filthy Hottentots of southern Africa—and "all without distinction lie." But we have been disgusted with the foul and malicious things which we have seen published in too many of the religious newspapers, and would enter an humble, but earnest, protest against them all, saying "Let there be peace between you."

"BULLS AND BEARS." It is not long since that speculations in stocks assumed the shape of an organized business, in any part of the United States—though allied gangs of "black legs," and other sharpers, including counterfeiters of bank notes, were well known to exist—for nearly all, if not all, of the dealings in stocks resulted in actual sales and actual purchases made, as persons wished to change the condition of their capital, or as they supposed that prices would honestly advance or decline—as individuals sell, or purchase, flour, cotton, tobacco, &c. in their prospects of the future state of the actual market. And even yet it will not be easy for sober-minded Americans clearly to apprehend, that persons holding a respectable rank in society, make a regular business of gambling in the stocks, on the same principle that persons bet 100 or 1,000 dollars on the turn of a card, the cast of a die, or a foot-race between a pair of cockroaches! With this difference, however—that the "black-leg," in the gambling houses, proper, or "hells" as they are called in London and Paris and other places—perhaps, more fairly takes the chances of the play, than the stock-jobber on 'change, and may be a less closely-calculating knave—for the stock-jobber may have more influence on the game which he is playing than the "black-leg." Instance the vile and base procurement, at New York, of a certain message of president Jackson concerning the bank of the United States, before it was laid before congress, and the heavy stock transactions which followed that disgusting proceeding—a proceeding which, even in stock-jobbing London, would have consigned the authors of it, with the actors in it, to public execration and universal contempt. It was for less than this, that the banner of lord Cochrane was torn from the wall, and trampled under foot, and he, himself, cast out of the company of honorable men. This gross fraud has never been explained. The president is, as he must be, acquitted of all previous knowledge of the matter; but many think that the grossness of it, and the treachery of some in whom he had confided, ought to have caused a strict examination into the facts, as well as a severe and public exposure of all the persons engaged in it.

The fact is that such a body of dealers in stocks as we have described, is in full operation—and to these men may be fairly ascribed the chief part of the clamor and falsehood which has been latterly circulated concerning the bank—for the aliment of the stock-jobber is in agitating the price of the stock, resting upon his more perfect knowledge of business, (as the professed gambler does upon his knowledge of the cards), to turn such agitations to his own advantage. So the buzzard, at a "giddy height," smells a putrid carcass, to feed on.

We have "bulls and bears" as well on 'change at New York, as on 'change at London—a class of persons who have adopted not only the cockney terms, but also the cockney rules, for doing "business." They had better have called themselves the swindlers and the swindled—and then we Americans would have understood them without the necessity of referring to an English slang dictionary.

In making these general remarks, we do not wish to be thought as denouncing every such dealer in stocks for a delicate gambler, or desperate knave. We hope that some exceptions may be found among them. But the ordinary manner, and leading motives on which this business is conducted, we think, well deserves, the general character which we have given to it. There is a saying that "speculation is the life of business." It may be so—though we have never practised it in any manner whatever. But if speculation in substantial things—such as flour and cotton, "gives life to business"—it is no argument in favor of those processes concerning [not in] the stocks that we have spoken of—any more than it would be to apply it to foot-races of cockroaches, as suggested above—for the whole business of stock-jobbing does not add one cent to the earnings of the country; whereas speculations in flour or cotton, by encouraging or compelling enterprise, may add to the quantity, or increase the general market for those substantial commodities; and thus a benefit will accrue to the growers of wheat or of cotton—and the circulation of money, which is "the life of business," be rendered more rapid as well as more extensive—resulting in new and substantial investments, to be further used in new creations of value. But dealings in the stocks have no substantiality in them. Persons who do not hold a single share contract for the delivery of thousands—and those with whom such contracts are made, offer fresh contracts—without the transfer of a single share of stock, except in some extraordinary case, where the shares contracted for are demanded. It is not possible to believe that there is any public good in such transactions—or that they furnish a fitting employment for intelligent men. Let every circumstance be pleaded in their favor that may—it is neither more nor less than sheer gambling.

We have been led to these observations by the facts stated in the following paragraph—which we cut out of a Philadelphia paper a considerable time ago, and have just found in one of our collections of scraps; and, with its insertion, we shall conclude our remarks for the present.

Bulls and bears. These terms, so common among stockholders, and so well understood by them, frequently puzzle the uninitiated of the community not a little. They originated in the London stock exchange, where stock-jobbing is carried on to a greater extent than in any city in the world, and where a large majority of the transactions have no reference to investments, being made altogether on time, and the difference paid on settling day. Bulls are buyers, and bears sellers. In New York, where they endeavor to copy England as much as possible, and especially London, a large trade of the same nature is carried on, especially in United States bank stock. A great strife has prevailed for the last two or three weeks between the two belligerent parties, the bulls and the bears, the latter struggling to the utmost to keep the stock down, as they have large, and still have larger deliveries to make at prices considerably below the selling rates. The bulls have nothing to do but to watch the manoeuvres of their adversaries, as the stock continues to rise, in despite of all their efforts to cheapen it. But the worst of all is, that the bulls refuse to settle at the difference, but demand the stock, which requires the bears to make bona fide purchases, and which they must do of the bulls, who keep advancing on them, or send here, as they have done, though without much success.

WE ARE AND WE ARE NOT. We are sorry to see it mentioned, by a Washington letter writer, that a distinguished officer of the navy was, sometime since, engaged in speculating in the stock of the bank of the United States, and as if in full communion with the herd engaged in that business—but we are not sorry to learn that he probably sustained a loss of five thousand dollars by thus wandering out of his proper course.

BANKING IN NEW YORK! We have a full and long statement of certain things which happened in taking, or assigning the stock of the "Seventh ward bank," in New York, and enough, indeed, of "bargain, intrigue, corruption and management!" We have not room for the details. The great principle of the politicians of this state—that the "spoils belong to the victors," were never more completely manifested than on the present occasion, as the following brief notices will shew:

The number of shares applied for in the 7th ward, was 13,170
 Do. awarded 3,710

Refused 9,460
 The capital of this bank was to be only $500,000—but it seems that more than 6,000,000 were subscribed, a "glorious speculation!"

Now, of the 3,710 shares assigned to the 7th ward, it appears that the four bank commissioners, ("providing for their own families"), first awarded 1,135 shares to themselves, their fathers and brothers, sons-in-law and brothers-in-law and mothers-in-law, and JOURNEYMEN—yet generously leaving 2,575 for other persons, or more than two-thirds of the whole!

Well—the 2,575 shares were thus disposed of—
 To public officers—of the United States or state or city of New York..... 1,640
 To members of the common council..... 230
 To inspectors of the ward elections—(3 persons).... 115
 To members of the assembly..... 550

2,535
 To THE PUBLIC!!!..... 40
 2,575

"O, heu—jam satis!"

An application is to be made to the legislature for the repeal of the charter of this bank—but is the "management" about it more flagrant than in other cases, since the organization of that grand machine, the "SAFETY FUND?"

There was, however, one redeeming feature in the conduct of the commissioners. They did not knowingly, it seems, award one share to the brokers. But still we must say that the right to exclude them, as a body, is rather questionable!

PRICE! The price of cotton is rapidly rising. We suppose that the south will not ascribe this to the arrangement about the tariff, seeing it does not go into effect until the end of the present year—and, for several years, will not have any material effect on our present manufactures of cotton. But coffee, has also risen, though imported duty free! What will the "philosophers" say to these things? They are "botherers," whichever way they are turned—"stumbling blocks" to the "wise," but easily understood by practical men.

THE REVENUE. According to the data which have been furnished by the returns of revenue accrued at some of the principal ports during the first half of the present year, there seems to be a diminution of about one-third as compared with the revenue which accrued during the same period in 1832. This is owing to the repeal or reduction of duties under the new acts of congress, and not to any falling off in the amount of importations. But notwithstanding the diminution of duties accruing the present year, it would not be surprising if the actual receipts should be equal to those of 1833. For, in the first place, a considerable part of the duties which accrued in 1832 are payable the present year; and in the second place, the introduction of the cash duties and short credits under the new laws, will throw a larger amount of payments in the present year than of right belongs to it. The receipts last year, from customs, were $24,224,441 77. The expenses of government will not exceed $14,000,000. Consequently, if the receipts of the present year shall equal those of 1832, there will be a surplus of more than $10,000,000, which, added to the balance in the treasury at the commencement of the year, $4,502,914 45, and $4,000,000 from public lands and other sources, will give a total surplus of more than $18,000,000. Deduct $7,001,698 83, the amount of the national debt at the beginning of the year, and there will be a clear balance of about $11,000,000, which congress will not know what to do with. If we had the control of Uncle Sam's purse-strings, we would, with the consent of the southern states, apply this sum to the gradual extinction of slavery. Next year the actual receipts from customs will not probably exceed $15,000,000 or $16,000,000.

Cour. & Eng.

[We shall see—"nous verrons!" how nearly these calculations will be realized. There are some "odds and ends" which, we think, have not been brought into the account.]

PUFF—PUFF—PUFF. Flaming handbills are stuck up, says the N. York Gazette, about our streets, offering to teach fifty-two (!) branches of education in a year, at thirty-eight cents each branch. We saw one under which some wag had written—"Them as larius manners, twopence more."

It would not be venturing much to say, that the handbills alluded to were issued by modest foreigners, just imported or exported, as the case may be, and who have had interest, or impudence, enough to fill many newspapers with daily puffs. One fellow teaches reading, perfectly, in 12 lessons, to persons who just know the difference between A and Z; another grammar, critically, in 7½ lessons; others writing, in 6½ a 7 lessons; another painting in 5½ lessons; and many teach—that "fools and their money are soon parted."

LOST MAIL FOUND. We learn from the post office in this city, that the mail from New Brunswick, (New Jersey), which has been missing for two or three weeks, and for which a reward was offered, was received at our post office by the southern mail this morning. It appears from the post bill that this mail had been received at the post office in Cincinnati, (Ohio), whence it was sent to the post office of this city where it should have arrived on the 6th ult!! It is fortunate that this mail has been found, as it exonerates several persons from unjust suspicions. We are informed that a considerable sum of money has also been saved; that one letter contained $700, and others checks, &c. to the amount of more than $2,000. [N. Y. Post.

LIBERIA. There are good accounts from Liberia.—Those who expected that a prosperous colony would be built up at once—were ignorant of the history of every state in this union. All such establishments require much nursing, as well as energy of mind, and strength of body—with considerable time—and the pioneers are always the greatest sufferers; but now the colony appears to be established—and its inhabitants have become sufficiently acquainted with the soil and climate, as well as with one another, to make rapid improvements of their condition, and make daily accessions of strength.

Two of the principal, (colored) officers of the colony, Messrs. Williams and Roberts, lately addressed a large meeting at Boston, in aid of the colonization society—when the following facts appeared—

The population of Liberia is between three and four thousand, distributed in seven settlements along the coast and in the interior of the colony. Its territorial extent is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles in length along the coast, and about fifty in breadth. It contains one thousand houses, four schools and six churches. The most friendly relations subsist with the surrounding native tribes, many of which have placed themselves under its protection, and submitted to its laws.

Mr. Williams, who is lieutenant governor of the colony stated that when he first arrived at Liberia, it was nearly a wilderness. There were but a few inhabitants, and these furnished with nothing but miserable huts for habitations. They were surrounded with enemies on every side, among the native tribes—and by the more infernal foe, the slave trader. Slave factories were numerous along the coast, and one was located within a few miles of Monrovia. Yet he felt that there he would enjoy the privileges of a freeman, and he determined to adopt it as his home. He accordingly returned to America for his family, with whom he soon after established himself in Liberia. He drew a brief but striking sketch of the condition of the country then, when they were obliged to sleep on their arms, with the fearful anticipation of midnight massacre, and rejoiced when the morning sun beamed upon the unbroken slumber even of infancy. The slaves were abroad on every side, and even in the harbor of Monrovia, several slave ships were often at anchor at once. Yet in this feeble and perilous condition they resolved upon the bold attempt of storming the slave factory in their neighborhood. In the white man's land, such an exploit might have been called chivalrous. Mr. Williams headed the party, and the enterprise was completely successful. The fort was taken by storm, and a large number of imprisoned slaves liberated. Mr. Williams contrasted those times with the present situation of the country—with a population increased thirty fold, at peace with, and themselves the protectors of the surrounding native tribes, enjoying the means of moral and literary improvement, and possessing all the comforts of life. He gave a favorable account of the morals of the colonists. During all his residence in the colony, he had not seen more than two or three residents drunk, and had heard more profaneness since he left home a few weeks ago, than during the whole period of his abode there.

Mr. Roberts confirmed the statements of Mr. W. concerning the condition of the colony. Ten thousand natives of the adjoining tribes were under its protection and laws, and it had friendly intercourse and communication with more than one hundred thousand in the interior. The commerce was considerable and increasing. The exports of the last year amounted to $70,000, and those of the present year would probably be more than $100,000. The slave traffic had been completely abolished. He repelled, as totally untrue, the charge, which has been circulated in this country, that the colonists connived at the traffic, and even furnished the traders with slaves. He said that a slave ship had not been seen in the harbor of Monrovia for many a year. They dare not cast anchor in its waters. Nor is there a slave factory within one hundred and fifty miles of the colony on either side. To that extent the traffic is completely abolished.

The colony, he said, is prosperous and increasing, and the day is not far distant, when the flag of Liberia will wave in the harbors of America and England. Then policy, if not justice, will persuade America and England to respect us.

MR. STUART'S TOUR. A certain Mr. Stuart has made a book called "Three years in America." It very much differs from other manufactures about us and our country. Mr. S. evidently meant to be honest—and to speak of things as they were, or, at least, as they appeared to him.

We meet with the following notice of the book alluded to—

Mr. Stuart did not see a beggar in Boston, or a person that was not well dressed. His observation just comes contemporaneously before the public with a paragraph in the country newspapers, which tells us that at Old Boston, in Old England, where the population amounts to 13,000 upwards of 5,000 are paupers in the receipt of parish pay.

It should have been added, however—that, though there are no "beggars" in our Boston, there are a few "paupers"—perhaps, to the amount of the half of one per cent. of the whole population, regard being had to natives of all New England.

LOTTERIES IN THIS COUNTRY. It appears from the statements collected in Mr. Gordon's able discourse, that although the lottery trade is prohibited by the laws of this state, the yearly traffic in Boston alone, probably amounts to more than a million of dollars; and that, 25 per cent. being allowed for commission, the profits may be rated at $250,000, which, divided among 50 dealers in this city, makes a yearly income of $5,000 to each. It is believed that the business is so systematically arranged, that the city is divided into districts, and persons appointed in each, to board vessels just arrived, visit certain bar-rooms, cellars and other resorts, and contrive means generally for the good of the trade.

In the city of New York, according to the presentment of a grand jury, made Nov. 12, 1830, the number of lotteries drawn during the year previous was 52—with 1,857,000 tickets, amounting at the scheme price, to nine millions two hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

But, says Mr. G. to ascertain, as near as may be, the amount of tickets sold in various states, the best data, that can be easily obtained, are furnished by the number of schemes drawn in a year in each state, and the value of them. We presume the following statement may be relied upon as very nearly correct, in regard to the lotteries authorised by the following states, in 1832:

States authorising lotteries.	No. of classes.	Am't of tickets at scheme prices.
New York,	80	$14,387,801
Virginia,	72	10,920,166
Connecticut,	88	8,332,583
Rhode Island,	68	7,837,621
Pennsylvania,	26	5,313,056
Delaware and N. Carolina, (joint grants)	37	3,462,900
Maryland,	18	2,212,540
Delaware,	32	670,263
Aggregate in 9 states,	420	$53,136,930

In addition to this amount, Maine has two lotteries, and several of the southern states have others. Rhode Island granted one of 52 classes last month, which will tax the community several millions. But independently of these, the sum above named, with the addition of 25 per cent. brokerage, makes an amount of sixty-six millions four hundred and twenty thousand dollars—that is, of five times the sum of the annual expenses of the American government, and of nearly three times the whole yearly revenue! [Boston Mer. Jour.]

FRIENDS' TRIAL IN TRENTON, N. J. The court of errors and appeals—composed of the governor and members of council, one from each county in the state—convened yesterday, and organized for business, the cause for argument being the important case between the two parts of the society of Friends commonly called Orthodox and Hicksites, involving the right to the possession of certain property. In consequence of the absence of George Wood, one of the counsel for the Orthodox, the court adjourned over to this morning; when all the members of the court appeared, except two—Mr. Board, of Bergen, and Mr. Carter, of Warren county. The cause was then opened by Garrett D. Wall, who read the pleadings filed in the case, on the part of the Hicksites. He was followed by George Wood, who read those filed on the part of the Orthodox, which occupied the court nearly two hours. He was followed by S. L. Southard, who read the interpleadings on the part of the Hicksites.

The members of the court, with the governor, sitting in this case, are—Dr. Clowson, vice president of council, of Salem; Judge Wood, of Morris; Peter I. Clark, of Hunterdon; I. Townsend, of Cape May; James S. Green, of Somerset; Daniel Holmes, of Monmouth; Wm. Champion, of Burlington; Wm. Merkle, of Sussex and I. T. McDowell, of Middlesex; two members being absent; and two—J. Kaighn, of Gloucester, and I. H. Williamson, of Essex—being ineligible to a seat in this suit, the first being a member of the society of Friends, and the last being one of the counsel for the Orthodox. There is no member of council from Cumberland besides the governor, who was elected to council, and afterwards appointed governor.

It is yet uncertain when the regular summing up of the pleadings of the counsel will commence. If the reading of evidence, which is very voluminous, is dispensed with, it will probably be opened by G. D. Wall, on the part of the Hicksites, this afternoon, or to-morrow morning. He will be followed by George Wood and the hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, on the part of the Orthodox; and the whole will be closed by the hon. S. L. Southard, on the part of the Hicksites.

Great interest is felt, both on account of the importance of the trial and the very high standing and talents of the counsel, on both sides of the question. In addition to the above named gentlemen, who will take part in the argument, I. H. Williamson assists in preparing and arranging the case on the part of the Orthodox. The court meets regularly at 9, A. M. and 3, P. M. sitting six hours each day. The secretary of the court, judge Westcott, has taken pains to have the supreme court room fitted up in a very convenient manner for the occasion. This room is very large and airy, and capable of containing a large number of spectators; although numbers are now here from Philadelphia and the adjoining counties, yet hundreds more might be accommodated without inconvenience.

MR. RANDOLPH'S WILL. We understand that Mr. Randolph's papers have been ransacked, and that no will of a later date has been found. The public curiosity has been so much excited upon this subject, that we may be excused for noticing the present state of the facts, as we understand them.

Judge Leigh is said to have in his possession, two wills in Mr. R.'s hand writing—the 1st is dated in January, 1822; the 2d in March, 1832.

The 1st directs his slaves to be manumitted, and makes provisions for their maintenance, and we believe, removal, under the superintendence of bishop Meade, and of Francis S. Key, esq.—and bequeathes the residuum of his estate to judge Leigh. This will is said to have been subsequently "cancelled" by Mr. R. and his signature to have been cut out.

The 2d will makes no provision for the manumission of his slaves—and its principal legacies are, 1. $10,000 to judge Henry St. G. Tucker. 2. $10,000 to judge Leigh. 3. $5,000 to John Randolph Leigh, a young son of judge L. 4. Gascoigne and a filly and some plate to Mr. John Wickham. 5. Two fillies and a pair of candlesticks to Mr. Macon. 6. His carriage and horses, and some French plate, to Dr. Brockenbrough—and the residue of his estate to the eldest son of his niece, Mrs. Bryant, of Gloucester, a daughter of judge Coalter—with the reversion, in case of the death of the boy, about 20 months old, without heir, to the eldest son of judge H. St. G. Tucker—and in case of his death, to the judge's next son, &c. &c.

This last testament will probably be offered for probate to the next Charlotte court. It may perhaps be contested by the trustees for the slaves, upon the ground that the first will may be good—or, it may perhaps be contested by other parties, upon the ground, that neither of the wills is good—and in this case, that the whole property should be distributed according to the provisions of the act of assembly.

It is probable, indeed, that the subject may give rise to some litigation—in which case, it may become hereafter the duty of the court of appeals to decide the whole matter.

ESCAPE OF SLAVES. As the James Fisher, a regular trader from Richmond to the northern ports, was lying at Rocketts, on last Saturday evening, the 27th ult. four slaves got on board and concealed themselves in the hold of the vessel. She was deeply laden with coal bound to Newark. In the course of that night or the next morning, she sailed—and some time during the day, (Sunday), a knocking was heard on the ceiling of the deck. On raising the hatches, three of the negroes rushed out, one of whom jumped into the river. On putting out the small boat, the swimming fellow was taken in. It was then discovered that the fourth slave, belonging to Messrs Wortham & Magruder, of this city, had become suffocated in the close air of the vessel. The captain of the James Fisher, with the negroes, returned on Sunday evening, in the steamboat Potomac, and delivered them up to their owners. The captain and crew most positively disclaim all knowledge of the intended plan of their escape. As several cases of this description have recently occurred, it becomes essentially necessary to adopt the most efficient police regulation to prevent their repetition.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT WATERFORD, N. Y. Waterford, (Saratoga co.) July 26. We have just subdued one of the most ruinous fires which has ever been visited upon our village. Almost the entire part of the town, upon which our extensive mechanical and manufacturing operations were carried on, is now in ruins. The loss is immense, and falls almost entirely on that enterprising class of our citizens which constitute the life of all our business operations. The fire was discovered in the new machine-shop of Kimball & Co. about 2 o'clock this morning, and before the citizens had collected to much extent, the roof had tumbled in, and the fire had communicated to the shop of Messrs. King, Wing & Co. on the south, and Messrs. Olney, Ambler & Minor, on the north; the last contained about 8,000 dollars worth of machinery—loss very heavy. From thence it caught to the roof of Waterford cotton factory, and raged with such violence, that before we could arrest its progress, the two upper stories, with almost the entire machinery, and much valuable property, was either consumed or dashed to pieces, in the attempt to save it from the devouring element. The walls of this great building remain almost unbroken, only to give prominence to the surrounding desolation. The Fire Engine Manufacturing company, are sufferers to a considerable extent, say in all, four or five thousand dollars. The company of Olney, Ambler & Miner, about $10,000; Mr. Blake 2,000; and the cotton factory $15,000; besides, some eight or ten different branches, which were carried on in the same buildings, of more or less importance. The loss amounting in all to from forty to fifty thousand dollars.

About four hundred industrious mechanics are dependent upon the mercy of the public for employment in consequence of the fire.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS. The sales of public lands in Michigan territory during the quarter ending the 29th June, amount to about two hundred and five thousand dollars, as follows:

At Monroe,.....	$90,000
Detroit,.....	79,000
White Pigeon,.....	36,000

The accession which has been made to the population of Michigan since the opening of navigation this season, may be estimated at between 5,000 and 6,000. There is but little doubt but that next year the population of this territory will entitle us to enter the union as a free and sovereign state.

FROM THE "FAR WEST." The steamboat Assineboine, B. Pratte, jr. master, arrived on Thursday night last, from the mouth of the Yellow Stone, with a full cargo of furs, skins, &c. for the American fur company. By this arrival, we learn, that the steamboat Yellow Stone lost three of her hands and a pilot, by the cholera, while ascending the river, near the mouth of the Kansas. We also learn, that famine—a calamity more dreadful than the cholera—threatens the inhabitants of the immense region of the Upper Missouri. No buffalo had appeared upon the plains of that country during the past spring; and the Indians, in the thriftless economy which governs them at all times, were in consequence destitute of the means of subsistence. Even the traders were compelled to subsist on Buffalo tongues, (obtained during a preceding season), and corn; and the voyageurs had not this fare allowed to them. No one has, we believe, pretended to account for this disappearance of the immense herds of buffalo which covered those regions. It was observed, by persons who were in the Assineboine, and who have been in the habit of navigating the Missouri, that points at which vast numbers of buffalo had always been known to herd, were deserted, or but a single one now and then seen.

OFFICERS OF THE LATE WAR. A meeting of a number of the officers, who served in the late war, with Great Britain, was held at Columbus, O. on the 8th ult. when a resolution was passed, appointing a committee of three, to draft a memorial to congress, asking a grant of land, in consideration of their services and sacrifices—and that the committee respectfully solicit the co-operation of the Ohio delegation in congress, in obtaining a just remuneration as aforesaid. And that said committee, George Kesling, John McElvain and William Doherty, correspond with officers and committees of other states, interested in the subject.

SAILING OF THE DELAWARE. The United States ship of the line, Delaware, capt. BALLARD, sailed from Hampton Roads on the 30th ult. for New York, with a fresh southerly breeze, which will probably take her to that port in 30 hours. On Monday, the president of the U. States, and his suite, paid a visit to the Delaware, and were attended through the ship by capt. Ballard and his officers. The president expressed in warm terms his admiration of the interior wonders of this prodigious floating castle, its superior style of equipment, and the high state of discipline observed in every department. At going on board, and leaving the ship, he was complimented with a salute of 21 guns—although he had signified his wish to dispense with that ceremony.

SINGULAR PHENOMENON. A correspondent of the Buffalo Bulletin, gives the following account of an uncommon occurrence which took place in Genesee county, on the 20th of June:

Between two and three o'clock in the morning, there was heard by several of the inhabitants of the town of Java and Sheldon, Genesee county, a remarkable roaring, resembling that of a "rushing mighty wind," accompanied with a trembling motion of the earth for a considerable extent. It was so considerable, that some removed the glass and earthenware from their shelves to prevent its breaking. In the morning there was discovered on the farm of Mr. J. Sykes, in the north part of the town of Java, a remarkable breach in the earth, extending from Seneca creek, west, across a small flat of a few rods in extent, up the side of a hill, the slope of which was about twenty degrees, making it in the whole to be about forty or forty-five rods in length. It was 20 rods wide at the end next the creek, 13 at the middle, and 16 at the upper end, where the earth was sunk from 25 to 30 feet, while it was raised about 20 feet above the bottom of the creek at its lower end, making the highest point at the creek nearly as high as the lowest depression at the other extremity. The bed of the creek was raised about 20 feet above and carried about 3 rods beyond its former situation. The ground was thrown into ridges from 2 to 10 feet high. A considerable portion of the surface has entirely disappeared, presenting in its stead several strata of different kinds of earth. Trees, stumps and logs were carried 12 or 15 rods. A small grove of timber, some of which was 20 inches through, was carried the above distance, some standing, some broken down, and some torn up by the roots. In some instances, logs and other ponderous substances, that were in contact, were separated six or eight rods, and others before at a distance, were thrown together. There are many conjectures concerning it, but no one can satisfactorily account for it.

A PATRIARCH. Died at Hickory Hill, in Baltimore county, on the 22d inst. Mr. William Thompson. This venerable man, on the first day of February last, had attained the very advanced age of 111 years. He was born in St. Mary's county, Md. spent the greater portion of his life in Frederick county, and moved, last fall, to Baltimore county, where he died. He left eleven or twelve children, the eldest of whom was living last summer, and is believed to be still in existence, at the advanced age of 91—his youngest son surviving is 25 years of age. The subject of this notice was distinguished for his honesty and temperance. He has been heard to say, that in the course of his long life he had never used a gallon of ardent spirits, and had never been intoxicated but once, and then from drawing cider. He never was confined to his house until three days previous to his death, and enjoyed his sight and hearing to the close of his life. He never required the use of spectacles, and as recently as the past summer, walked the distance of two miles to a son's house and back to his home in the same day.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY. Messrs. Dueatel, Alexander and Tyson, the gentlemen appointed by the executive, in pursuance of a resolution of the last house of delegates, to make a geological survey of the state, reached Fredericktown, on Saturday evening last, on their return from Washington and Alleghany counties. They are now engaged in exploring the neighboring county of Montgomery, from whence they will proceed to Baltimore, and soon after contemplate again visiting our county, with a view to a more extended and minute survey. We learn from them that they have discovered the most flattering indications of great mineral wealth in Alleghany county—and that that heretofore neglected part of the state is probably destined one day to become the Wales of Maryland, yielding inexhaustible supplies of iron and coal.

Various speculations have been for some time on foot in regard to the existence of coal and other mineral products, in the mountains in the vicinity of Frederick, and it is stated that an examination is now in progress in the neighborhood of the Yellow Spring. When Messrs. Dueatel, Alexander and Tyson revisit the country, they will probably endeavor to ascertain whether the expectations of the coal hunters are well founded. [Examiner.]

A "VENERABLE TURTLE." In the year 1816, Mr. Jonathan Worthington, of West Springfield, found a turtle upon his premises which had "J. W. 1717" marked—evidently cut with a penknife—upon the under shell. The turtle was set at liberty, after examination; and again found in 1823; again in 1828; again in 1829; and a few days since in 1833. The father, grandfather and great grandfather had the same given name with the present Jonathan Worthington, who thinks that the great grandfather marked the turtle. The turtle is of the species commonly called the box turtle, having the upper shell very crowning, and the lower shell flat, with a joint in the centre, with which this amphibious, when alarmed, closes his entire body in his shell in a close and compact manner. The "venerable" gentleman, if the date is correct, must of course be upwards of 116 years old, and is said to be as active as any of the young fry of the same species which is generally to be met with.

"What's all the best on't," the farm upon which the present Mr. Worthington lives, has been in "possession of the four several Jonathans, and the "venerable" has always been found within a few rods of the same spot; which indicates that, whatever may have been his observations for the last century, his travels have not been very extensive. Springfield (Ms.) Journal.

SANTA FE CARAVAN. Letters from some of our traders, as late as the 20th June, have been received in this city. They were then assembled at the Diamond Grove, about 160 miles from Independence, in this state. On the 19th, an election for officers was held. Mr. C. Bent was elected to the captaincy; Messrs. Legrave, Barnes, Smith and Branch, lieutenants. There were one hundred and eighty-four men belonging to the expedition, and ninety-three wagons, carriages and dearborns attached to it, sixty-three of which were loaded with goods. The company had suffered very much from the badness of the roads, caused by the great rains which had fallen there, as every where else. We have understood, though the letter we have seen does not allude to it, that the traders are under the escort of a company of rangers. [St. Louis Rep.]

MONUMENT TO CANOVA. Extract of a letter dated Rome, March 8: "Last Monday week cardinal Galeff visited the capital, for the purpose of inspecting the piece of sculpture erected to Canova's memory. The work was entrusted by the late pontiff to Fabris, the sculptor, who has acquitted himself in a way highly creditable to his talents. On the pedestal of the memorial is sculpture in the act of embracing painting and architecture, and mourning with them over the loss of their favorite. At her feet reclines the genius of harmony, contemplating her stringless lyre. Canova is represented sitting, reclining against a bust of Minerva, but as if on the point of rising from his seat, under the inspiration of some sudden conception, which he is desirous of perpetuating with his chisel.

A NOBLE TAILOR. The great Mr. Stultz, tailor, in Clifford street, who retired to France a few years ago, and was created baron Stultz, died on the 17th November, at his estate called Aire, in the south of France. This estate cost him upwards of £100,000. He had another large estate near Baden-on-the-Rhine. About a year ago the baron sent the emperor of Austria a present of £40,000, to do with it what he pleased, for which present he received in return the order of Maria Theresa, and the patent as count Gothenburg. The baron had great wealth in the bank at Vienna, (Rothschild's). His property, besides these estates, exceeded £400,000.

A young man made the attempt and was wounded in the face. Another seizing the opportunity rushed behind Haggerty and knocked him down with a porter bottle. An attempt was made yesterday by several of the convicts in the Maryland penitentiary, to effect their escape. We learn that three of them succeeded in scaling the yard wall, by means of a rake which is used for cleansing the sewers. This they fastened upon the rail of the parapet and ascended the handle. One of the men leaped to the ground on the outside of the prison, but was soon apprehended and returned by the persons in the neighborhood. The other two were taken on the wall, by the officers of the institution.

In a few moments he was seized with a cramp in the stomach, and though medical assistance was promptly tendered he died in the course of the day. The individual was Dr. Mangus, a French gentleman.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London and Paris papers of the 14th to 24th of June.
GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Mr. C. Grant, on the 13th June, brought before the house of commons, in a speech of great length, the propositions of government for regulating the affairs of the East India company.

The following resolutions have been adopted in the house of commons on the bill for the abolition of slavery in the British colonies, the second resolution passed by a vote of 286 to 77.

"1. That immediate and effectual measures be taken for the entire abolition of slavery throughout the colonies, under such provisions for regulating the condition of the negroes as may combine their welfare with the interests of the proprietors.

"2. That it is expedient that all children born after the passing of any act, or who shall be under the age of six years at the time of the passing any act of parliament for this purpose, be declared free; subject nevertheless, to such temporary restrictions as may be deemed necessary for their support and maintenance.

"3. That all persons now slaves shall be registered as apprenticed laborers, and acquire thereby all rights and privileges of freemen; subject to the restriction of laboring, under condition for a time to be fixed by parliament, for their present owners.

"4. That, towards the compensation of the proprietors, his majesty is enabled to grant to them a sum not exceeding £20,000,000 sterling, to be appropriated as parliament shall direct.

"5. That his majesty be enabled to defray any such expense as he may incur in establishing an efficient stipendiary magistracy in the colonies, and in aiding the local legislatures in providing upon liberal and comprehensive principles for the religious and moral education of the negro population to be emancipated."

House of lords. East India charter. Lord Ellenborough inquired how the question on the above subject was to be introduced to the house?

Earl Grey—by means of resolutions.

Lord Ellenborough then inquired if a similar course was to be pursued respecting the West India measure?

Earl Grey said resolutions had already been proposed in the other house, and that a bill founded thereon would follow.

The house, on the 12th of June, went into committee on the Irish title act, when Lord Althorp proposed a resolution to the effect that an advance should be made to the clergy of Ireland, in lieu of all arrears of tithes in 1831, 1832 and 1833, and that the money should be repaid by a land tax on those lands for which the tithes were in arrear.

The plan of the government as stated by the chancellor of the exchequer, with regard to the tithes in arrear, is to stop their exaction to grant a sum of money to the clergy in lieu thereof, which is to be repaid to the government by a tax upon the land liable to the payment of tithes, but which have not been paid. This will shift the burthen from the tenant to the landlord. Sir Robert Peel took part in the discussion, as also did Mr. O'Connell, of course. The first proposition submitted by Lord Althorp was agreed to, and the debate upon the other resolutions was adjourned over.

"It is said that his majesty, as the head of the church, has addressed a strong letter of remonstrance, through the archbishop of Canterbury, to the bench of bishops, and especially to the six or seven, who distinguished themselves by their vote on the Portuguese question, relative to their conduct under the present critical circumstances of the nation, expressing his surprise that they should expose themselves to the imputation of acting from selfish and worldly motives, sacrificing all claim to the respect of the religious community, and exposing the church to the danger of losing its influence, by their being ultimately driven by the power of public opinion from their seats in parliament, if their votes, as spiritual peers, were not regulated by more discretion and attention to the signs of the times?"

It is stated in the London Times that the tory peerage, aided by the bishops, will make another attempt to overthrow the Grey ministry by defeating the Irish church reform bill, which it is feared can only be defeated by the creation of new peers, as the majority of the tory party in the upper house cannot amount to less than fifty. The king is said to be averse to this measure.

Mr. O'Connell had given notice that he should bring forward a motion for the repeal of the union.

On the same day, on the second reading of the duke of Richmond's Quakers' and Moravians' affirmation bill, the bishop of London took occasion to make some remarks upon the want of solemnity in the administration of oaths in that country, and the unnecessary use of those solemn obligations. The right reverend prelate said that he considered that nine-tenths of the municipal oaths ought to be abolished, and a simple affirmation substituted; he also objected to administering oaths to persons not of age, except in judicial cases, and he gave notice of his intention to direct the attention of parliament to the subject in the next session.

The lord chancellor and lord Bexley fully concurred in the views of the bishop of London.

In the house of commons, Mr. Tennyson gave notice of his intention to move a call of the house on the 2d of July, to take into consideration the expediency of triennial parliaments.

Mr. Ewart, on the same day, presented a petition from the merchants and ship owners of Liverpool, praying for the removal of all restrictions upon the importation of sugar for the purpose of refining. The petitions stated that the exports of British manufactures and produce to Brazil, St. Domingo, Cuba, &c. exceed by five fold those to our West India colonies, with a field for unlimited extension, whilst our imports admitted to consumption from those countries do not amount to one-fourth the value of our exports. The petitioners estimated the loss to the revenue and commerce of the country by the present restrictive system, of bounties actually paid out of the treasury, by indirect taxation, by the restraint upon the consumption, and upon the extension of commerce and manufactures, at fully £5,000,000, annually.

Mr. Freyer moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the corn laws. He was seconded by Mr. Hume. The motion was rejected by a majority of 25.

London, June 24. The state of the markets for the principal staple articles of trade and commerce, is exceedingly favorable, and prices have generally advanced. The spirit of speculation and confidence in the future condition of trade has revived, and business to a great extent is doing in nearly all the articles.

Cotton. A week of heavier business has not occurred in the Liverpool cotton market for some time. On one day 10,000 bags were sold. We are not authorised, by any communication we have seen, to state that they are overrunning business in the manufacturing districts, but we apprehend that to be the case, and are desirous therefore of throwing out a warning hint upon the subject, because we think the extraordinary activity of the cotton market would not continue, if manufacturers were paying due attention to the demand.

Ireland still remains in a highly excited condition on account of the collection of tithes, and in many instances of late the civil authority have found it necessary to call in large detachments of the military to their aid.

FRANCE.

Prince Talleyrand had sold his splendid collection of paintings preparatory to his leaving London for Paris, which was to have taken place on the 20th of June. It was confidently believed that he would not return again as ambassador.

The duchess of Berri had been liberated and taken her departure for Palermo, accompanied by general Bugeaud, a nurse and her child.

In France a discovery has been made of the existence of a secret tribunal of the most appalling description, and which seems to have been formed on the model of the sacred rehmé of Westphalia. It was instituted by the Italian refugees in France, and has led to the most horrible assassinations. It serves to shew that the friends of Italian freedom, like the friends of liberty every where else, are injured and discredited by weak, furious and unprincipled partisans.

At the sitting of the chamber of deputies on the 18th ult. M. Benjamin Delessert said that he was charged by the committee, and intrusted with the examination of the bill relative to the treaty with the United States, to express its regret that the late period of the session at which the bill had been presented, and the numerous important points involved in the examination, rendered it impossible to make the report this session: but the committee was most anxious that a treaty should be terminated which preserved the commercial relations so highly important to the interests of such old allies as France and the U. States.

Gen. Lafayette thus spoke:—"The rapidity, gentlemen, of our work, and the sentiment of a double duty, impel me to say a few words. An American treaty (exclamation from the centre) was laid before you, with the speech from the throne at the commencement of the session. I do not mean to dwell upon the various causes of delay that have supervened, but will confine myself to what was presented to you the other day by the minister of finance. I will not either, gentlemen, expatiate upon the sentiments of national honor and justice, or of what is becoming towards a friendly nation—the only one, which, in 1814 and 1815, did not unite with our enemies; and if she had done it, be it said in passing, her claims would long since have been liquidated, as were those of all hostile powers. I will add, that she had even consented that a third power, England, for instance, should take charge of, and urge these claims, every thing would have been settled long ago; but she would not present herself as an enemy, and preferred to wait till she could, as a friend, urge her claims. Nor will I enlarge upon a great interest, the greatest of our maritime interests, that of the liberty of the seas, though, as we cannot place any great reliance upon that coalition which occurred during the American war, between the squadrons of Russia, Spain, Holland and our own, I think that a union of our naval forces with those of America, without meaning to prejudice possible circumstances, is the true plan of securing the liberty of the seas. I will merely occupy your attention concerning a commercial interest of great urgency.

I regret that our honorable colleague, M. Pulcheron, is not here, as he might repeat to you the estimate he made for me the other day. The city of Lyons alone (1 cite but a single example) carried on with the United States a commerce of 55 millions of francs: Since the treaty made by the good will of the United States, this commerce is worth 80 millions, and it will be 100 millions by the 1st January next. I might also speak of what the chamber of commerce of Havre has written to one of our colleagues; I might dwell upon the interests of the wine growing departments: but I confine myself to the single observation, that the treaty is not decided on at this session, it is to be decided at the meeting of the American congress in December next, measures may be taken, in view of the neglect on our part, to replace things where they were before the treaty. I leave you to judge of the inconvenience of such a course to our commerce.

With these short remarks, which the minister of foreign affairs would, if he were present, sustain, as not long since he told me he would, I will merely reply, in advance, to one objection that may be made, that in this matter I speak as a good American. Gentlemen, that is a title of which I am proud—it is a title dear to my heart—but no one, I imagine, will allege that I have ever been a bad Frenchman.

I ask, therefore, that this question may have an early place in the orders of the day, so that you may discuss it before the close of the session; and my advice, if I may be permitted to use such a term, is, that after such examination as is proper, the great interests above alluded to be not lost sight of.

The minister of foreign affairs said that the government was most anxious for the immediate discussion and adoption of the treaty. The delay in presenting the bill to the chambers arose from the difficulty of collecting all the documents necessary for the elucidation of a treaty by which a final adjustment was made of transactions extending over a period of more than 20 years. Even now, some of these documents had not come over from America, but he hoped before the next session the committee would be in possession of every information.

Count Jaubert considered that it should not be allowed to go forth to the world, and particularly to the United States, that the chamber was prepared to adopt blindly a treaty involving the payment of so large a sum of money as was to be paid to the United States. The interests of the country required that every point connected with the treaty should be minutely examined, and from the feelings of distrust which the provisions of the treaty had excited in many members of the chambers, he had no doubt it would be so.

M. Mauguin inadvertently on the absurdity of supposing that the chamber or the committee could have formed any decided opinion on the subject, when the minister himself had just told them that all the necessary documents were not collected.

The minister for foreign affairs observed that all the most important documents were in the hands of the committee. Those which were to come would be useful as explanatory documents, but were not of primary importance.

Other hon. deputies demanded to be heard, but the chamber, which had for some time shown strong marks of impatience at this episodal discussion, called loudly for the order of the day.

The president said that as no question was before the chamber, the discussion could not be allowed to be carried further; the constitutional right of the chamber was perfectly understood; no treaty which required the assent of the legislature for the means of carrying it into execution could be considered as even provisionally susceptible of being carried into execution until that assent was given. The question was, therefore, entirely open, and nothing which had passed could prejudice the opinion which the chamber might hereafter come to on the treaty. (Applause.)

The chamber then proceeded to the discussion of the budget of ways and means for the year 1834.

In the session of the chamber of the 10th, gen. Lafayette took occasion to complain of the continuance of the slave trade, even under the protection of the tri-color flag.

The minister of the marine replied, that since 1830, not a single instance had existed of the French flag having covered the slave trade; but Spanish and Portuguese vessels, engaged in the slave trade, had disguised themselves under French colors, in order to avail themselves of the exemption enjoyed by French vessels from the search of English men of war; but this would not again occur, as with the express object of putting an end to the slave trade, a new convention had been made between France and England, for the mutual right of search in certain seas.

A statue of Napoleon is about to be erected upon the column in the Place Vendôme, formed of the cannon taken from the enemy in his victorious campaigns; and the workmen are already engaged in raising the scaffolding.

SPAIN.

A private letter from Madrid states that in consequence of a discovery that the troops and civil authorities in Cadiz being devoted to the queen's party, the garrison of the city had been suddenly changed, and the persons appointed to office by the queen suspended. It was also stated that a Spanish army to co-operate with that of Don Miguel had been ordered to be collected on the frontiers of Portugal.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

At the opening of the chambers on the 7th of June, the king of Belgium announced from the throne that events of great importance to Belgium had taken place; that France and England, according to their engagements had taken possession of the fortress which threatened one of the finest Belgian cities. That a convention had been concluded by the same powers which would put Belgium in possession of the greater part of the advantage attached to the treaty of the 15th of November, without taking from her those portions of territory, the separation of which would be always felt as a painful sacrifice. He would take care that, in the arrangements with Holland none of the rights of Belgium should be infringed.

A partial disarming was to take place, so as to diminish the expenditures without weakening the organization of the army.

He announced that the government would now be able to direct unremitting attention to the internal melioration of the country—to the fostering of its manufactures and commerce.

He also stated that he had obtained from the United States the most favorable stipulations for one of the most important branches of manufacture.

The government had felt the necessity of giving a new impulse to the public works, and he commended a plan to the chambers for a grand communication from the sea and the Scheldt to the Neuse and the Rhine.

Accounts from Rotterdam state, that great preparations are making there to receive the prisoners coming from France. King William and all his court will be present to welcome their return.

From Brussels, advices have been received to the 22d of June. Among the topics of discussion was the appropriation of money to construct an iron rail-road, to commence at Malines, (which is between Brussels and Antwerp,) and directed to Verviers by way of Louvain, Tirlemont and Liege, with branches to Brussels, Antwerp and Ostend. For this purpose it was proposed to contract a loan of eighteen millions of francs.

PORTUGAL.

A letter from Valtango of the 30th of May states, that the batteries had almost incessantly continued to fire upon the city of Oporto since the 16th, which had suffered considerably. Desertions were frequent from Don Pedro's army, chiefly Frenchmen. The fort of Ervilho had been completely silenced. Don Pedro had dismissed twelve officers and two quarter-masters from the marine brigade. The marquis of Palmello and Mr. Meudizabel had reached Oporto with reinforcements for Don Pedro's army. Captain Napier had arrived to take command of the fleet. It is stated on what is called a respectable source, that a very satisfactory understanding exists between the king and earl Grey on the subject of Portugal, and that in the event of the constitutional forces marching on Lisbon, they will meet with a degree of support from this country which was hardly to have been expected, considering the difficulties with which the agents of Don Pedro had to contend here, owing to the conviction on the minds of ministers of the hostility of the majority of the house of peers to the constitutional cause of Portugal. Arrangements have, we are informed, been already made to secure the pacification of Portugal. They are dependent, it is true, on certain contingencies, but little doubt is entertained on the subject.

Despatches had been received at Paris from Madrid by the government, apprising it that the king of Spain has refused to acknowledge Donna Maria, the queen of Portugal, although the cabinets of Paris and London had put this condition to their consent to the abolition of the salique law, and to their acknowledgment of the princess of Asturias, as heirress to the throne of Spain. In consequence of which, the envoys of France and England would protest against the holding of the cortes, and against the violation of the rights of those which it would consecrate.

RUSSIA.

The czar received that portion of his troops, at Dunaberg on the 31st, which were under the command of count Pahlen. He has also visited a number of fortifications that have been recently erected. The numerous new public buildings in St. Petersburg are proceeding rapidly. But no works of art—no splendid dome, or costly towers, can relieve him from the exasperation which his conduct has justly drawn upon him, in relation to the Poles.

A letter from Warsaw, in March, states, that by order of the czar, prince Paskewitch has declared to respectable mothers (now bereaved of their sons) that should they be discovered to have written to their exiled children, they would be publicly whipped in the public market place.

AFFAIRS OF THE EAST.

It is stated from Constantinople, May 28th, that Ibrahim pacha has really commenced his retreat, and preparations were making in the Russian camp which indicated the speedy withdrawal of the troops. The official news that the Egyptian army had actually commenced its retreat, arrived at the Turkish capital on the 27th. The reis effendi immediately communicated it to the foreign ambassadors, and count Orloff repeated his declaration that the Russian army should retire so soon as he was certain that the Arabs really had retreated.

TOMB OF KOSCIUSKO.

From the Swiss Patriot.

Soleure, Switzerland. At a short distance from Soleure, on the high road to Lucerne, is situated the village of Zukwill. It is there, in the vicinity of a chapel, that repose the remains of Kosciusko.

Kosciusko! At this revered name Poland should arise and threaten the tyrants oppressing the land of liberty. At this very name the glorious achievements of a great general burst on our minds.

On the 3d of May, 25 Poles proceeded from Soleure in military procession to Zukwill, to prostrate themselves at the altar of the Almighty, to salute the ashes of an illustrious countryman, and to celebrate the anniversary of the constitution granted on the 3d of May, 1793, to the people of Poland.

The sun gave the light of its glorious rays to the noble remnant of a nation as illustrious as unfortunate.

The hospital chaplain, M. Saaner, was at Zukwill to give his pious assistance to the noble refugees.

The religious ceremony over, the Poles left the temple, and knelt before the tomb containing the ashes of Kosciusko. It would be difficult to describe the solemnity of the scene on seeing the heroes of Grochen and Ostralsensky bathing with their tears the stone containing the ashes of the hero of Poland, and swearing to march in his footsteps. Perhaps at that very moment the vile slaves of despotism were insulting with their sardonic grin the unfortunate Poles who, on the borders of the Frozen ocean, are painfully eating the bread of slavery.

A Polish officer, in his mother tongue, briefly mentions the deeds performed by Kosciusko in behalf of his country, and gives out that noble warrior as the model they are to imitate. "Poland," says he "is not yet annihilated; whosoever beats a Polish heart, still exists the nationality of Poland." He then, in French, stated his satisfaction at being able to speak of liberty in the land of freedom; and to offer, in the name of his countrymen, his thanks to a nation that has given them welcome and entered into their pain and suffering. And—like the people who always turned their eyes towards Sion—the children of Poland turned their faces towards the north, and saluted their country from afar.

An inhabitant of Soleure replied to this speech; he expressed the wish of the Swiss population: union, fraternity, liberty and devotedness for those who have shed their blood in the defence of freedom.

Thus terminated a ceremony which affected deeply the numerous spectators it had called together.

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

We insert below a table showing the population, with the annual amount of produce and of the exports and imports, of each of the British West India colonies, drawn from documents laid before the British parliament. It will be apparent from this statement, how completely the produce, and consequently the property of these islands is dependent on slave labor. The number of slaves is nearly ten times that of the white population, and the colored persons out-number the whites in the proportion of one and a half to one.

THE GLORY OF THE CHURCH.

The following, from a late English paper, is not over-colored. But the English church is not worse than other established churches, in its principle, though more onerous in its operation, but yet more tolerant—provided always, the pecuniary requisitions are duly complied with!

MODERN BISHOP OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

But what are the labors, watchings, fastings, perils and difficulties of our baron-bishops? These holy men, perhaps, pass many a sleepless night in the first stage of their exaltation, by what possible means they may escape from Llandaff or Bristol, or some other poor see, with which they find themselves disagreeably saddled. By dint of voting and jobbing in the house of lords, the successor of the apostles finds his prospects brightened a little; for, after infinite exertions of soul and body, he is translated to Exeter, peradventure; whereby his apostolical pocket is replenished with a greater number of orthodox guineas. But not in Exeter is the godly man at ease; he is snit with a love of multiplication, and letter after letter is written to his patron and the minister, urging the necessity of a more advantageous translation. In the course of time Winchester or Durham is vacant—then do all the eagles gather together to the carcass; loud are the screams of the apostolical vultures, and the dismay of the first lord of the treasury, to know how to satisfy so much pious voracity; at last, after undergoing the threats of a dozen great lords, each eager for his own client, the premier makes selection of the hero of this picture, and crowns his hopes with twenty-five thousand pounds a year, and all the gorgeous dignities of the Durham episcopacy. After this, surely the man of God is contented at last? By no means, he has sons, and daughters not a few, and nephews very numerous. For all these there must be accumulated a store of good things full of marrow; the eldest son is to be the head of the family; for him, therefore, the parliament and the regular course of parliamentary jobbing is open; but for his younger brothers the church must open her nurse-like arms, and pour upon them a shower of benefices. My lord bishop speedily sends forth from his liberal urn a deluge of golden prebends, livings, arch-deaconries, residentiaries, precentorships, chanceries, sub-deaconries, perpetual curacies, fellowships, masterships and vicarage.

Bishop Tomline bequeathed seven hundred thousand pounds to his family, already well enriched with episcopal munificence.

BRITISH WEST INDIA TRADE.

Though there is nothing really new, or extraordinary, in the facts stated below—(for every one who knew any thing about the matter knew that they would happen), we give them a place; only requesting that our readers will refer to what we said about the "recovery of the West India trade," at the time when it was "recovered!"

From the New York Daily Advertiser.

We had occasion a few days since to notice this subject; since which we have had an opportunity to become acquainted more particularly with facts, and find that the injury done to American commerce, is much greater than we apprehended, owing to the great facilities afforded to the provinces. It is a fact that English vessels are constantly arriving here, from the British West India Islands, with rum, molasses, &c. which they discharge, and take in return cargoes of beef, pork, flour and other articles, proceed to Yarmouth, Halifax or any other port in the province, lie along side of the wharf twenty-four hours in some cases, roll out a few barrels into store, give a nominal bond that the cargo shall be landed in a British island, and then proceed on their voyage of destination, where they discharge their cargo free of all duty. It is estimated that the detention by taking this circuitous route is not on an average more than ten or fifteen days longer than to proceed direct from this port. The extra expense would be on a vessel whose disbursements are 400 dollars a month, for 15 days, 300 dollars; to this may be added some little extra pilotage, and perhaps help, half per cent. extra premium, which, on ten thousand dollars, would be fifty dollars. The whole difference may be set down at three hundred dollars. An American vessel of one hundred and sixty tons burthen, will take about fifteen hundred blis. say five hundred blis. of beef, five hundred of pork, and five hundred of flour. The duty on beef and pork in an English island is stated to be five dollars a barrel, making five thousand dollars; the duty on flour, calculating the difference of currency, one and a half dollars a barrel, or seven hundred and fifty dollars; making the whole duty on these articles alone, which is a very moderate cargo, five thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, which must be paid by the American bottom. The British cargo is admitted free of duty, consequently pays nothing, and is subject only to the before mentioned detention of about fifteen days, which may be set down, as before stated, at about three hundred dollars.

Thus the American vessel would have to pay $5,750
British 300

Difference

$5,450

Now every one who is familiar with the trade, knows that this difference alone is a much greater profit than is usually made in a West India voyage. In fact the British vessel would be making a handsome business, if she cleared $2,450 a voyage, while the American owners would be losing three thousand dollars a voyage. We have taken a vessel of one hundred and sixty tons, when it is known that much larger vessels are engaged in the trade, we have also taken these articles when it is well known that many more might be enumerated. We have, however, taken a case within compass for the sake of being easily understood. Is it at all surprising that the number of British vessels arriving here is constantly increasing? Is it at all surprising that the trade has nearly all passed into the hands of the British merchant. How can it be expected to be otherwise. Can American industry, enterprise and skill, pursue a trade against all these disadvantages? We presume no one will pretend that it can be done.

If we take another view of the case it is equally fatal to the American interest. Formerly the large British West Indianmen went out from England to the islands in ballast, depending on return cargoes of sugar, rum, coffee, &c. On the voyage out, as the vessels were empty, they earned no freight. Now the vessels come out to Nova Scotia, with passengers and some bulky articles which earn a fair freight, then take in a cargo of Picton or Sidney coal for New York, and thereby earn a second freight; here take in a cargo of provisions, touch at the provinces, and proceed to the islands; or take in a cargo of lumber and proceed direct—thereby earning three freights, where they formerly got nothing, and then be at the desired port, ready to take a home cargo at a high rate. Whichever view we take of it, wherever we turn, we see the American vessels entirely and effectually cut off from a trade which has the name of being free and reciprocal.

In the first commencement of this trade, before the route was taken to the provinces, for the purpose of turning good Duchess county pork into pork raised in the provinces, merely by a certificate, and when provisions were taken from here, and the duty paid, the British vessels in part, after earning two freights from England, and being on their way out to the islands, began to take freight at 50 cents a barrel, and even 35. The consequence was, that our own vessels, unable to carry freight out and home for 25 cents a barrel, were driven immediately out of the trade, and have never returned to it. They could not compete with vessels which had earned two freights already, and had a high freight waiting for them for England the instant they reached the islands.

How differently did this trade stand before this arrangement. Then, although the trade was prohibited, the American vessels enjoyed the whole without any interruption. As the vessels of neither country could go direct, and as there was no diminution of the consumption of American flour, lumber, provisions, fish, live stock, candles, soap, &c. &c. in the British islands, and as they must be had somewhere, then these articles were all carried by American vessels to St. Barts, St. Thomas, and other neutral islands in the neighborhood, and reshipped in drogers to the different British ports. It was found by official returns that the exports were as great as they ever were, and it was also proved that we were in the full and entire enjoyment of the carrying trade. It is now proved, beyond all controversy, that this valuable commerce is wholly or nearly lost.

DUTIES ON IMPORTATIONS.

At this season of leisure, we shall present some extracts from a document to which we have once or twice referred, being statements of the merchants to shew, THAT THE INCREASE OF THE DUTIES IMPOSED BY THE TARIFF LAW OF 1828 HAD NO EFFECT TO INCREASE THE PRICE OF GOODS IMPORTED! This was a beautiful confession from the merchants! It established our whole theory, concerning this matter—that increased duties do not necessarily increase the price of commodities, nor diminished duties necessarily diminish prices. And the fact, at present, we believe, exists—that every leading article, the duty on which was reduced by the act of 1832, now bears a higher price, in the market, than it did at this time last year. We shall revert to this subject on some future opportunity. The "philosophers" may speculate about these things as they please. We are practical, and are content with the facts as they have occurred, and will happen.

The document before us is No. 13, of the 22d congress, 2d session, and contains 24 large 8vo. pages. We have selected all the letters and statements that bear directly upon the plea of the importers—that they, and not the consumers, paid the extra duties imposed by the law of 1828! And a law was passed for their relief, the drain of which on the treasury is yet to be unfolded. We understand that the amount claimed is an "awful" one!—that it has been heaped up into a good many millions of dollars. "Nous verrons!"—"nous verrons!!" "nous verrons!!!"

TO EXEMPT MERCHANDISE FROM DUTIES.

Dec. 14, 1832. Printed by order of the house of representatives. Mr. Verplanck, of the committee of ways and means, presented the following documents on the subject of the bill "to exempt merchandise imported under certain circumstances," &c. No. 619.

Copy of a letter from S. D. Bradford to Samuel B. Barrell. Boston, 24th January, 1832.

Samuel B. Barrell, esq.

MY DEAR SIR: I have lost no time in presenting your letter of the 17th to captain Rich, and the other gentlemen, whose claims you have been selected to represent, and several have promised to address you. I enclose two letters by this post, and may, perhaps, at a future time, write you more fully upon the subject mentioned in yours. I am not a little surprised that any person who was connected in any way with the home or foreign business, should think of resisting our claim, on the ground that goods rose after the tariff of 1828 passed; and that, in this enhanced value, the importers were partly indemnified for the loss sustained by the sudden increase of the duties. All persons who were in trade in 1828, will testify that it was a year of very great depression in the price of domestic and foreign goods, and that nearly every article on which the duty was raised on the 30th June, rather declined than advanced in price. My house are large operators, and our commercial connexions are extensive with Great Britain, Russia and India; and we imported freely in 1828, and can truly say, that every article we imported was actually worth less to us after the 30th June, than in the previous year, 1827, under the old duty; and we had to sell nearly all the woollens we received, after the 30th June, at a heavy loss, as also our Russian goods, at cost or under. Many of the latter we exported or sold at under prime cost to exporters, whereas we should have made on our 700 pieces of ravens duck $1,050, had not the duty have been increased. We would apply the same remark to broadcloths, flushings, plains, kerseys, vestings, serges, flannels, and nearly every other article on which the duty was increased. We can prove this by our books, if called upon, and so can others who claim under your direction; but, as for congress ever being able to pass an act which cannot be executed without going into all these calculations, such an undertaking would be interminable and impracticable, and I should consider it as doing nothing. No plan will answer, or can be executed, which does not include, generally, the cases of all such as ordered goods previous to 1st May, or whose partners or agents ship them, not knowing that such a bill had passed, and which said goods arrived before 1st September, 1832.

The bill reported last year would meet my case, and that of most others, very fairly. I should like the wording a little altered, (as I once before said to you, and I gave the words I would substitute), as I think much doubt will be raised as to its real meaning. If a partner or agent in England, or Russia, or elsewhere, sent out goods to his house here before he knew the tariff had passed, or would pass, the duties on such goods should be given up, and they should be viewed as goods "ordered" from this country. Any bill proposing to return only a part of the extra duty, would be impracticable and unjust; the whole should be returned, no matter even if the goods had risen instead of having fallen. Why favor the importer of other kinds of goods? The importer of iron, knowing that the duty on that would rise on the 1st September, would of course, avail himself of that fact, provided any advance could be had; but no advance has taken place on iron or any thing else, as you will see by reading Henry Lee's report on the article; and the doctrine of Mr. Niles was, for once, verified, that laying a high duty often lowers the price of an article, and reducing the duty increases its value.* I hope, therefore, there will be nothing in the bill about "satisfying the secretary" about loss sustained. The mail is closing: I will write more fully in a few days. Yours, dear sir, very truly,

S. D. BRADFORD.

Extract from Mr. Bradford's letter of January 28th, 1832.

"Nothing can be more certain than that the extra duty laid in 1828 came, nearly all of it, out of the pockets of the importers. Some cases may have arisen, where some kinds of goods, sold, after the tariff was passed, higher than before; and certainly if this had not been the case, many importers would have lost half their capitals: but the advance was on articles on which the extra duty amounted to an increase of 40 and 100 per cent.; and it may be truly and safely asserted, that in all such cases the advance realized was only a fractional part of the extra duty imposed. Take, for instance, the article of English flannels, and suppose an importer to have received a bale on the 30th June, 1828, of 20 pieces, costing £45 sterling in England; the duty under the tariff of 1824, on this bale, (being 33½ per cent.) would amount to $73 26; by the act of 1828 the duty would have been $207.

"Now suppose the importer did realize, in July or August, 1828, 5 and 10 per cent. advance more on flannels than he would have done if the duty had not been increased, still is not his loss very heavy? It would amount to the difference there is between $207 and $73 26, (less the small advance obtained) and the profit he would have obtained on the sales of this bale, provided no extra duty had been imposed, and these two items will amount to more than the difference between the old duty and the new, which we claim to have refunded. In like manner, I could illustrate the same fact in many other articles. This country consumes largely of an article called "bookings," well known to the New England people, (Mr. ———'s assertion to the contrary notwithstanding), and many bales of this article were annually imported, costing, in England, 6d. per yard; the duty by the tariff of 1824, was 4½ cents per yard, and 22½ cents per yard by that of 1828; but I need not enlarge on this subject."

Letter from Benj. Rich and Son, in reply to S. B. Barrell's letter to Mr. Bradford, of January 17th.

Boston, January 23, 1832.

DEAR SIR: Your letter to Mr. Bradford of 17th is before us, and in relation to that part where it is said that the articles rose in price in proportion to the additional duty, and that the consumer paid it, we can answer for ourselves, most decidedly, that every article we imported from Russia rather declined than rose: clean hemp, which we had been selling at $225, we were obliged to take $220, or not sell at all; and ravens duck, on which the duty was increased upwards of four hundred per cent. we could not obtain for it any higher price than before, and we were obliged to export it, and work in every way possible to save ourselves, and, finally, had to submit to a loss on an article which we had previously made a fair mercantile profit. This we know to have been the case on many other articles, particularly wool, and some woollen goods. There is no better reason why congress should admit our claim, than that it was evidently their intention to have extended the time to the first of September on all articles the same as they did on iron.

Letter from Windsor Fay, in reply to S. B. Barrell's letter to Mr. Bradford, of January 17th.

Boston, January 24, 1832.

SIR: Mr. Rich has shown me a letter from you, requesting information to prove that the tariff did not cause a rise on the imported article equal to the additional duty; and I am happy that the facts in the case fully warrant the assertion that, in wool, the importer could not realize even the price at which it had before sold. I have before me sales by Whitewill, Bond & Co. of Smyrna and Adrianople wool, in December, 1829, at 12½ cents per lb. at which price the sale was stopped, and the lot afterwards closed at private sale at 11 cents; whereas the price of these wools, previous to the tariff of 1828, had been 14 and 15 cents, and the additional duty imposed by the tariff was about 5½ cents. The sale of wool to which I have referred, was among the first public sales of wools after the passage of the tariff: as there was hardly one bale of wool sold in this city

* This does not express our ideas—price and value are not synonymous terms, except on a merchant's book. ED. REG.

for nearly or quite a year, of course I refer to imported wools of Smyrna and Adrianople. Your obedient servant,

WINDSOR FAY.

S. B. Barrell, esq. Washington.

Extract from Mr. Bradford's letter of February 11th, 1832.

"We are gratified, but not surprised, that the documents which have been transmitted to you, to prove the decline in the value of goods in 1828, have produced conviction upon the minds of those who have perused them. No person who was engaged in commercial pursuits at the time, can doubt for a moment that all the statements which have been submitted to prove the decline in the price of imported goods, after the passage of the act of May, 1828, are literally and strictly true. We cannot turn over a price current of that year, which does not confirm it; and the losses which the foreign merchants sustained were neither few nor small. How, indeed, could it be otherwise? The new duties imposed, amounted, in many cases, to an increase of 80 a 125 per cent. above the old duty, and were prohibitory; so that no person has imported a bale of those articles since 1828.

"We are very sorry to find that any gentleman should have come to the conclusion, that the decline in the prices of goods in 1828, arose in consequence of 'overstocked' markets; and that the cause of this overstock was 'an expectation,' on the part of the merchants, that the duties would be increased; and that increased orders were sent abroad for goods in consequence of this expectation. The very reverse of this is the fact. The imports in the summer of 1828, and in the autumn of that year, were not large by any means, nor upon an increased scale; and it is a well known fact that very few persons believed that the tariff act of 1828 would pass, until they read its passage in the public prints of the day; and we are confident, that if any person believed it would pass at all, there was not a merchant in this country, who ever conceived, for a moment, that it would commence its action at once. All supposed that four to twelve months would be allowed for the merchants to prepare for so great and sudden a change, as had been done upon all previous occasions.

"We are pleased to find that Messrs. Lewis & Co. have forwarded to you the documents which we requested them to send. We could send you twenty more affidavits from this city, should it be deemed necessary; and as many more from New York; but we cannot think it expedient to multiply documents which may not be required. If, however, you are of a different opinion, we will forward you any number for which you may write to us."

Affidavits of sundry merchants of Philadelphia, showing a decline in the prices of goods subsequent to the passage of the tariff of 1828.

[One of these affidavits is sufficient—all the rest respond.]

Philadelphia, February 2, 1832.

I, Thomas C. Rockhill, of the house of Thomas C. Rockhill & Co. merchants, of Philadelphia, do hereby certify, that I am, and have been extensively engaged in the wholesale dry goods importing business in said city for many years, and sold large amounts of British cotton, woollen, and worsted goods, in the years 1826, 1827, 1828, and 1829; and, during those years, my experience satisfies me, that there was a continued decline in the value of such goods, and that the additional duties imposed on British manufactures in the month of May, 1828, did not create a general appreciation in the value of such merchandise.

T. C. ROCKHILL.

Statement of loss on three importations of goods by F. & R. N. Barker, collector for this port.

The above statement of loss is exclusive of the loss of interest. Upon the same description of goods, imported by us from the same house, in the corresponding period of the year 1827, we realized a profit.

F. & R. THOMPSON.

[This statement is supported by the affidavit of the clerk employed by the Messrs. Thompson.]

The loss on F. & R. Thompson's importations stands thus:
 Sterling cost of 9 cases cloths, £1,724 17s. 2d. or $7,666 02
 Amount of duties paid on same - - - - - 4,704 40
 Exchange, freight, insurance, and shipping charges 1,400 00
 Cost of the goods - - - - - $13,770 42

Loss of a merchant's ordinary profit on \$13,770 42, estimated at $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent. is - - - - - \$1,062 75
 Loss per statement - - - - - 833 84
 $1,896 59

The above statement shows that the loss only varied a few dollars from the amount of extra duty charged upon their goods.

Affidavit from Boston, showing a decline in prices in 1828, of articles upon which there was increased duty under the tariff act of that year.

We, the undersigned, being merchants of the city of Boston, do hereby testify and declare, that we have, for many years, been dealers in, and sellers of, cotton, worsted and woollen goods; were large holders of dry goods, of various fabrics, prior to the year 1828, as well as during that year in which the tariff act was passed; dealt freely during that year in flushings or fear-naughts, drab kerseys, broadcloths, woollen paddings, baizes, flannels, worsted, hosiery, blue, mixed, and green plains, blankets, printed calicoes, and most, if not all other articles of cotton, worsted, and woollen manufacture, on which the duty was greatly enhanced by the tariff of 1828. Upon the passage of said act, many persons supposed that those manufactures on which the duty was increased, would immediately rise in the market, and command prices proportionate to the said increase of duty; and, at the first view of the subject, such, perhaps, would appear as the natural result. Such, however, was NOT the effect of the tariff of May, 1828; for, instead of advancing, most, if not all, of the principal articles of cotton, worsted and woollen goods (on which the duty was increased) rather declined than improved in price after the passage of the tariff act of May, 1828, and would not, in many cases, bring so much in market as they had done the year previous, under the old duty. And these facts we are prepared fully to establish by full and complete extracts from our books, to which we had reference before expressing ourselves so fully as to the state of the market and the value of goods in 1828. The consequence of this state of things, was a great and heavy loss to such of the undersigned as had ordered goods under the tariff of 1824, but had them arrive under the tariff of 1828, as the increase of duty on many leading articles in the business of the undersigned was raised from 5 to 150 per cent. by the act of 1828, and for which they were unable to indemnify themselves by obtaining an increased price when they made sales of their goods after the passage of the act of May, 1828. The duty, for instance, on a yard of flusing, costing 2s. 3d. sterling in England, was increased from 18 cents to 21 per yard; on a yard of baize, costing 6s.* from 4 cents to 22½ cents; On a yard of drab kersey, costing 1s. 11d. from 13 cts. to 22½ cts. " " flannel, " 1s. " 8 " 17 " " broadcloths, " 7s. " 56 " 165 " " padding, " 10d. " 7½ " 104

Printed cotton from $\frac{7}{8}$ to 8½ cents per square yard. Some of these new duties were, in effect, prohibitory, and have since caused a discontinuance of importation of the articles on which the duty was thus increased; but still the undersigned had to receive, in 1828, such articles as they had ordered under the old duty, which arrived under the new, loaded with the increase of duty, and lost heavily on the sales of them. The undersigned could not undertake to decide what occasioned the DECLINE in PRICES which occurred in 1828. It may have arisen from sundry and various causes, but they are decidedly of opinion, it was not produced by an increased importation, occasioned by an expectation on the part of the American merchants, that the tariff would pass; on the contrary, they have found no evidence that the importation of those articles in which they deal, were upon an increased scale in that year, or greater, if so great as usual; and they are of opinion that, generally, the passage of that act was a matter of great and sudden surprise to the great body of merchants themselves. The decline in price in 1828 was not peculiar to the articles in which the undersigned deal, but the same occurred in the price of Russian manufactures, of raw wool, and many other, the necessary articles of living. The same is true of molasses, also, the value of which declined very much in the market, although the new duty was greatly increased.

The undersigned could go more into detail to establish the facts they would prove by various other illustrations, did they deem such a course necessary or desirable, but they are of opinion that the evidence already produced on this subject will be deemed sufficient.

Letter from A. & S. Henry, of Manchester, to Grant & Seaver, of Boston, in reply to Grant & Seaver's letter countermanding their orders for British manufactured goods.
(Per Manchester.)

Manchester, 30th June, 1828.

DEAR SIR: We duly received your esteemed favors of the 22d and 31st ultimo, and in compliance with your desire, we have used every effort in our power, and held out every inducement that could be reasonably proposed, to induce the parties with whom we have made contracts for your woollens, to accept of countermands, but we are sorry to say without the least success, and we shall be compelled to send almost every piece of them.

The fact is, that the manufacturers who had orders for the states, do not know what to do with the goods, for they are only calculated for that particular market, and unsaleable for any other; and whether the parties who gave the orders reside here or be in America, if they are at all responsible houses, their goods, so far as they have been prepared, will be delivered to them by the manufacturers.

We believe that is the case without a single exception, and in truth the equity of the case makes it but reasonable; for the orders that came forward, and which are at best of no great extent, would throw a dead and unsaleable stock upon some houses, which would, perhaps, ruin them, whereas, if distributed amongst the different parties who sent the orders, the inconvenience, or even loss, will not probably be very serious.

As to what we are preparing for you, being as we have said, obliged to take them, we have hesitated whether to ship them when ready, or to pack them up and let them lie in Liverpool for your further instructions; but we have finally concluded that the best course will be to ship them at once.

If they lay over they would lose the season, and of course be less valuable to you in the spring; and as to selling them in this country, either now or during the ensuing winter, we are very confident that the loss would not be less than 20 to 25 per cent. at least, exclusive of interest. We can scarcely suppose that in your mode of disposing of your supplies the loss would be so great as upon a sale here; on many articles there will be a positive loss, but still it can be no "break-neck" business.

There is also a chance that congress may remit a part of the high duties on such goods as the importers are compelled to take, and no doubt all the merchants will unite in endeavoring to obtain redress.

The law is a monstrous one, and it is difficult to believe it can be permanent. We are extremely sorry that a compliance with your wishes should be impracticable, but we trust you will see that (circumstances as we are) we are adopting the wisest course in sending you the goods: we are compelled to take, rather than keep them here waiting your further instructions.

Believe us truly, dear sirs, your most obedient,

A. & S. HENRY.

Messrs. Grant & Seaver, Boston.

Letter from Grant & Seaver to Samuel B. Barrell, esq.
Boston, January 31, 1833.

DEAR SIR:—By your letter of —, we learn that an opinion is entertained by some of the members, that goods imported under the tariff of 1828, were sold at advanced prices in consequence of said tariff, and that the consumers were sufferers instead of the importers.

We have carefully examined our invoices and sales, and now annex particulars of many leading articles of which we were importers to considerable extent, to wit:

Broadcloths—which cost from 9s. 6d. to 16s. sterling per yard: on this article we lost from 15 to 25 per cent. and, in some instances, 35 and 40 per cent. The advance of duty was enormous, in consequence of which we were induced to hold some of the goods for a time in preference to making so heavy a loss; the result has been, that we have now on hand; a considerable amount of the identical cloths in question, on which we shall lose, including interest, more than 50 per cent.

Cassimeres—The same remarks as those against cloths, will apply to this article, and add, that we received cassimeres charged at 4s. 6d. which would cost $1 60 per yard under the old tariff, which actually cost us, under the new, $2 12; and we find we sold a part of these goods at $1 50 and $1 55 per yard, in 1828, and finally closed them in February, 1831, at about the same sacrifice, exclusive of interest.*

Flannels—We suffered heavily on this article; have now on hand flannels charged at 39s. 6d. sterling per piece, which, under the old tariff, would cost $14 04, and under the new $19 25 per piece; these goods are now worth in the market about $12 50.† We, therefore, shall lose, including interest, from 10 to $11 on each piece, enormous, say from 3 to $400 on a bale of from 30 to 40 pieces.

Blanketing—Charged at 7d. sterling per yard, cost formerly 21 cents per yard, and under the present tariff, cost 39 cents per yard. On these goods, our loss was very heavy.

Kerseys—The operation of the tariff is such, that our kerseys which cost 1s. 7½d. were charged a duty on the 50 cents minimum, and on those which cost 1s. 8d. were charged with a duty on the 100 minimum; the consequence was that we actually lost on all our kerseys; and on those which came under the 100 minimum, our loss was exceedingly heavy.

Vestings, cassimere shawls, hosiery, &c. &c.—we also lost money on.

All orders since the passage of the tariff, have been given with a view of coming nearly up to, but safely within, the different minimums; for instance, orders for kerseys have been for those which do not exceed 1s. 7d. sterling, or to come under the 50 cents minimum, and also for a quantity very much better, to come up to the 100 minimum; the same case is also observed in ordering cloths, cassimeres, vestings, shawls, &c. &c.

"The fact is, our losses were heavy on our importation for the autumn of 1828, instead of making our usual profit of 12½ or 15 per cent. Under these circumstances, we feel that importers, and not consumers, are entitled to the full allowance of the difference between the established duties at the time the orders were given, and those which were charged on the goods at the time of their arrival; and that we should, in justice, also receive interest on the same up to the time of payment of such difference."

We have not, usually, been in the practice of selling goods at auction, but in the fall of 1828, and spring of 1829, finding it impossible to dispose of our tariff goods at private sale, were induced to offer a part of our importation of 1828, at Whitwell, Bond & Co's public sales, and we herewith enclose to you their affidavit respecting such sales; and, also, affidavits of our clerk: can likewise furnish affidavits of commission merchants of New York, if necessary, as we shipped a few goods to that market, but were reshipped, in consequence of being worth less there than in Boston. Respectfully, your obedient servants,

GRANT & SEAVER.

BANKING!

The following has been published as the true "democratic" plan of operations—when the bank of the United States shall wind up its affairs.

A substitute for each state, instead of a branch of the United States bank—increasing the capital of each state from one to ten millions, (to be owned and managed by the citizens of each state.)

New Orleans has on this plan	$8,000,000 with the accumulation of several millions more.
Alabama	1,000,000
and will increase it this year to 4 or 5 millions	4,000,000
Mississippi	1,000,000
and will increase it all the state requires	5,000,000
Tennessee with branches	4,000,000
Indiana will establish this season with 1 to 2 millions	2,000,000
Ohio ought to establish with branches	10,000,000
Kentucky 5 to 6 millions	5,000,000
Illinois in due time	1,000,000
Missouri	2,000,000
Virginia	5,000,000
New York (in one bank in New York)	10,000,000
Pennsylvania (in 1 or 2 banks)	10,000,000
Maryland (in one bank)	4,000,000
North Carolina	2,000,000
South Carolina, if they can sell their bonds	2,000,000
Georgia, " " "	2,000,000
New Jersey	1,000,000
	$79,000,000

Other states to be added.

Five per cent. stock of all the states having 20 to 30 years to run will bring par, and many a considerable premium.

The plan the same as the Union bank of New Orleans. See their charter.

With this project perfected how great would be the "division of the spoils" in presidencies, cashierships, directorships, clerkships, and all sorts of agencies—and the dealings in the stocks would employ a whole regiment of lazy sharpers, in New York only, and support 5 or 6,000 persons, doing nothing to add one cent to the wealth of the United States, or comfort of the people.

BOWDOIN COLLEGE.

The Boston Daily Advertiser, giving, in extenso, the long and learned opinion of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of this college, has also the following summary, which it may be useful to insert, as showing the point decided.

Case of Allen vs. McKean. We publish to-day the opinion of judge Story, in the well known and important case of the president of Bowdoin college, against the treasurer of that institution, for the salary and perquisites of his office, which he claims to hold notwithstanding the provisions of an act of the legislature of Maine, passed on the 31st March, 1831, by which he was ejected. That act ordained that no person should hold the office of president in any college in Maine, beyond the following commencement, unless he should be re-elected by the boards of trustees and overseers; and that any person elected to such office should be liable to removal at the pleasure of these boards. This was acquiesced in by the two boards, who proceeded at their meeting about the time of the commencement of 1831, to elect a president; but no person received a majority

*These cassimeres were sold for less than they cost, under the old tariff!

†That is—$1 54 less than their cost under the old tariff!

Ed. Reg.

Ed. Reg.

of the votes, and the institution has remained ever since without an acknowledged president. The questions presented in the case were, 1. Whether the action is maintainable against the defendant, as treasurer, supposing the plaintiff to be rightfully in office. 2. Whether the plaintiff, notwithstanding the act already mentioned, and the proceedings thereupon, is rightfully in office, so that he is entitled to recover the amount of his salary and perquisites, or either, against the college. The last of these questions is obviously the most material one; and the learned judge proceeds to discuss it at length: After a full statement of the provisions of the charter, and the various acts of the legislatures of Massachusetts and Maine, in relation to the subject, he lays down the principle, that the college is a private and not a public corporation, and proceeds to show, by a course of reasoning, of which we will not impair the effect by an attempt to give a cursory outline of it, that the act of the legislature of Maine is unconstitutional and void, and in addition to this, that president Allen is in office under a contract with the boards, which it is beyond the power of the legislature to impair. On this question therefore, the opinion of the court is expressed in favor of the plaintiff; and it is expressed with equal clearness in his favor on the other.

COMMODORE BAINBRIDGE.

This accomplished and gallant officer died at Philadelphia on Saturday last, and was interred on Monday evening with military and civic honors. We subjoin the following just tribute to his memory, which we copy from the National Intelligencer.

The last Philadelphia papers bring the sad intelligence of the death of the upright, honorable and chivalrous officer, commodore WILLIAM BAINBRIDGE, of the navy of the United States. For several years past afflicted by a lingering disease, the news of his death has caused more pain than surprise. We had been prepared for it, indeed, by the accounts of the state of health in which he had returned from the eastern states to Philadelphia, with the obvious desire to breathe his last in that city. We may be permitted, however, yet to express our sorrow for an event which has deprived the country of one of its best citizens, and the naval service of one of its brightest ornaments.

Commodore Bainbridge was in his sixtieth year, and might have been spared to us for many years to come, but for distressing complaints contracted in the service, which finally terminated his valuable life. He was a native of Princeton, in New Jersey, and was born on the 7th day of May, 1774. At an early age he was apprenticed to the sea-service, and behaved so well that he rose to the command of a merchant ship at nineteen years of age. From that time (1793) to 1798, he commanded merchant ships in the trade from Philadelphia to Europe; during which period, in the small ship Hope, with four small carriage guns and nine men, he had an engagement with a British schooner of 8 guns and 35 men, commanded by a sailing master in the navy, and compelled her to strike her colors, though, the two countries not being at war, he could not take possession of her. In July, 1793, he unexpectedly, and without any application on his part, received from the executive an offer of command in the rank of lieutenant in the navy. We shall not pretend to recapitulate his subsequent services. His capture, by the grounding of the frigate Philadelphia, under his command, in the harbor of Tripoli, his long imprisonment, his fortitude and courage under it, are matter of history, and need not be here dwelt upon. Let one anecdote suffice as illustrative of the character of the deceased hero: whilst he was in captivity, and the American general Eaton was advancing upon Tripoli, the pacha sent word to capt. Bainbridge, in no doubtful terms, that he had the means, which in case of extremity he should use, of injuring the Americans in the most tender point, by putting his prisoners to death, &c.—thus hoping to intimidate the captain, and induce him to write either to the commodore or to Mr. Eaton. Capt. Bainbridge's reply was, that he and his officers were in the power of the pacha, and that he might do with them as he pleased; that the United States had many other officers and seamen, and that, consequently, they should be no loss to the country. It may readily be conceived that, after this reply, he was importuned no further.

The event of his life, however, which has most familiarized our readers to his name, was his gallant achievement of the capture of the frigate Java, on the 29th December, 1812, being the third of those victories which established the character of the American navy. The action was a severe one, and among our wounded was the commodore himself. The generosity of the victor to the vanquished covered him with as much glory as his valor in battle; and for his honorable courtesy on that occasion the gratitude of the prisoners was expressed in the most feeling manner.

Since the conclusion of the war, commodore B. had commanded with great reputation and popularity at several naval stations, and for several years filled the situation of a commissioner of the navy board. Every where beloved and esteemed, he was no less so here than elsewhere. He commanded the respect and esteem of all who knew him, and formed friendships which nothing but relentless death could have severed.

The name of BAINBRIDGE, now added to those of DECATUR, PERRY and MACDONOUGH, will long be held in grateful and affectionate remembrance, not merely by their surviving associates in the perils and glories of the service which they adorned and elevated, but by the whole country, of which they were true citizens and faithful servants.

The following order, on the receipt of the melancholy intelligence at Washington, was issued by the navy department.

GENERAL NAVAL ORDER.

As a mark of respect to the memory of commodore WILLIAM BAINBRIDGE, who died at Philadelphia on the 27th instant, the flags of the navy yards, stations, and vessels of the United States navy are to be hoisted half mast—and thirteen minute guns fired at noon on the day after the receipt of the order.

Officers of the navy and marine corps are to wear crape for thirty days.

Navy department, 29th July, 1833.

MR. EDWARD EVERETT.

The subjoined letter was written in answer to inquiries proposed by the anti-masonic committee of Middlesex county, Mass. through their secretary, Herman Atwell, esq. and is interpreted as identifying the political interest of the writer with the cause of anti-masonry.

Charlestown, Mass. 29th June, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR—I have your favor of the 27th instant, addressed to me on behalf of the anti-masonic committee of the county of Middlesex, in which you request an expression of my views and opinions, relative to the institution of free masonry, and tendency of secret societies generally.

My public engagements, as you are probably aware, are of such a nature, as to make it impossible for me to attempt a detailed exposition of my views on this subject during the present week. Nor is this perhaps necessary. I notice in your letter that you quote one or two sentences from the letter of Mr. Wirt, of the 28th September, 1831, as containing the principles of the "large and respectable portion of my fellow citizens and constituents," on whose behalf you address me. In the correctness of those principles I fully concur. "The supremacy of the laws" is the fundamental principle of civil society. "The allegiance due to the country is the highest human obligation" of all men, who enter into civil society; and I conceive the institution of free masonry to be at war with both these principles.

With respect to this institution, I came to the conclusion, and expressed it repeatedly in public, several years before the present controversy arose, that its pretensions to antiquity were unfounded. It is probably the growth of the last century and a half. It has frequently been admitted to me by respectable members of the society, that it is useless; and that as such it had better be abolished. Its only avowed objects—charity and knowledge—can be much better promoted by public associations. If it be useless, it must be worse than useless, because it occasions a waste of all the time, attention and money—necessary to keep up its organization. The titular and ceremonial parts of it, as displayed before the public, appear to me strangely at variance with good taste, particularly in a republican community.

But the great objections to the institution lie much deeper. All secret societies are dangerous in proportion to the extent of their organization and the number of their members. A secret society, so widely diffused and connected as this, puts a vast power, capable of the most dangerous abuse, into hands irresponsible to the public. The secret ceremonies and rites as they have been disclosed, appear to me on many grounds, highly objectionable; and the oaths and obligations are open to the most weighty exceptions, on the score of religion, morals, and good sense. I am aware that some of these oaths must have been taken, by many great and good men. That does not alter their character. And as I cannot believe, that they could have stood a day before the face of public sentiment, had they been openly administered and received, it is not the least objection to the institution, that as a secret society, whose rites and ceremonies must be substantially unknown before hand, great and good men have been surprised into giving it a seeming sanction.

The force of these objections is immeasurably increased by the fact, that within a few years, the institution has been actually made the instrument of the greatest (the greatest because irreparable) evil, which can be inflicted on society, the destruction of the life of a citizen; followed up by systematic and successful attempts to screen the murderers, in defiance of the most rigorous efforts, on the part of the tribunals, to bring them to justice.

It is unnecessary to say, that I speak of the tendency of the institution, as evinced in cases that have occurred, and consequently may occur again, and not of a necessary effect in all cases. When I reflect that Warren and Washington, among the dead, and Marshall, among the living, and numbers of pious, virtuous and honorable men, in the community around us, (some of whom I have the happiness to count among my personal friends) are members of the institution, I cordially adopt the sentiment of Mr. Wirt, in reference to the same point, that "both justice and prudence demand discrimination;" and that it would be "an unjust proscription to involve innocence with guilt and treason."

Such are my views of the subject, very hastily expressed—which, in compliance with your request, you have my permission to make public. I am aware, from some little experience, that this may expose me to obloquy, which I would rather avoid. But if a man cannot safely venture on the expression of sentiments like the foregoing, it is idle to boast of the liberty of speech and the press. I am, dear sir, respectfully and faithfully yours,

Mr. Herman Atwell.

EDWARD EVERETT.

MR. GRUNDY'S ORTHODOXY.

Correspondence between Felix Grundy (a senator of the U. S.) and the president of the United States.

Nashville, May 6th, 1833.

DEAR SIR—I am duly aware of the impropriety, in general, of troubling you upon subjects not connected with your public duties, but in cases, where justice to individuals require it, I rely confidently that you will not withhold any thing within your knowledge which may prevent injustice. I therefore take the liberty of making the following inquiries of you.

1st. Whether you were not intimately acquainted with my conduct in relation to the great questions of nullification and secession during the whole of the last session of congress?

2d. Whether you had not full opportunities not only of knowing my conduct but also my private feelings on those subjects?

3d. Whether any member of congress labored with more zeal and assiduity to put down the doctrines of nullification and secession than I did?

4th. Whether my whole energies were not directed to sustain the administration in the great conflict in which it was compelled to engage on the above objects?

Yours with great respect,
Gen. Jackson, president of U. S.

FELIX GRUNDY.

Washington, May 19, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR—Your letter of the 6th May, with its enclosure, has been received. I am in some doubt whether I should reply to your interrogatories, as any answer I can give may not protect me from the charge of interfering in the choice of a senator soon to be made by the legislature of Tennessee. But the fear of this imputation ought not to prevent an answer so far as my knowledge of the relation in which you stand to the question proposed, may be necessary to do you justice; under this obligation, therefore, I feel at liberty to repeat now, what I have often said before in conversation, that your conduct during the last session of congress, in opposition to the absurd and wicked doctrines of nullification and secession, was highly useful and energetic; and throughout, as far as I could judge from your votes and conversation, no one could have manifested a greater zeal to give effect to the measures of the administration.

In stating this generally my opinion of your conduct in the senate on the subjects alluded to, I trust no one will infer that I have any other object in view, but that of satisfying you, that I am incapable of doing you injustice; with the choice which the legislature are called upon to make. I can have nothing to do. Believe me very sincerely, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. Felix Grundy.

NULLIFICATION—AND SO FORTH!

From the Richmond Whig, July 12.

Gen. Hamilton, of South Carolina, being invited to the same fourth of July celebration which Mr. Calhoun was prevented from attending, was also forced to decline from the state of his health, but transmitted in lieu, the following letter.

Pendleton, July 4th 1833.

GENTLEMEN—I cherished the hope until a late hour this morning, that my health would permit my being with you to-day, and that I might in person return you my sincere thanks for the very flattering and friendly invitation you have given me to unite with a large and respectable number of the citizens of Anderson, in the celebration of the anniversary of American independence; but being compelled to leave this for Charleston in the course of two or three days, I do not deem it prudent to put my convalescence to any previous trial by injudicious fatigue or exposure. I am therefore constrained to express my great regret that I am unable to accept an invitation thus kindly tendered. It might, under ordinary circumstances, be proper to conclude this communication with this apology, but the occasion itself, the deeply interesting crisis through which our state has just passed, and the relation I have borne to the latter, will, I am in hopes, excuse the few remarks with which I propose to trouble you. You will find in the sequel, that my purpose is not to indulge in a fruitless metaphysical discussion, but to discharge a more grateful, though mournful and affectionate office.

The celebration of the anniversary of the independence declared by the old thirteen free, sovereign and independent states, before even their confederation in 1778, cannot fail to produce a salutary moral influence, if regarded with a just estimate of the lesson this great event inculcates. If, for example, it invigorates a love for liberty itself, a just sensibility to every thing that looks like tyranny and oppression, and nourishes also attachment to the sovereignty of these states, under an abiding conviction that, as the great struggle for independence was waged and consummated by each of them, in its sovereign capacity, however conjointly they may have acted, furnishing, as it does, a type of their present relation towards each other, exercising again conjointly a sovereignty which flows from each, and by which the agent created by this sovereignty is responsible to each and all, it cannot fail in its lofty and cheering associations to make us better men and better trustees of that freedom which has been confided to our care.

But if, on the other hand, we set up false idols, and worship in a stupid spirit of bigotry—the mere effigy for the divinity itself—if, under the name of union, the substantial essence of liberty is to be lost sight of, and the very term itself is to be employed not only as a cloak for fraud, violence and injustice, but for the basest servility and man worship, we shall have learnt as little from our fathers as from the august moral which the day itself teaches, and find that we have approached not much nearer in our adoration of the real objects of the union, than the Egyptian did to his God in worshipping a crocodile.

Since our last anniversary, our state has passed through a severe trial. I thank God she did not falter. If our victory is not as complete as we could have desired, or as the justice of our cause would have justified, we have not, at least, ourselves to reproach. It is enough that substantial interests were secured, and, amidst almost unexampled difficulties, the point of honor was preserved by the single and unassisted efforts of our party. If we had been united at home, and if, after South Carolina had avowed in the face of the world her ultimatum, all her children had gathered around her in filial obedience and devotion, Lacedemon, at no period of the history of Greece, would have presented a more triumphantly glorious attitude, than this state would have done, small as she is in population and territorial extent. We should have had, not a bill of compromise, but a bill of plenary repeal and pacification.

The intestine dissensions which prevented such a consummation, are to be deeply lamented. But do not let us despond. Let us hold to the faith that is in us. Let us pause, gather strength, abstain from any unnecessary agitation of the public mind, keep our lamps burning and our ranks firm and unbroken. The eternal truths which lie at the foundation of our principles, must go on, waxing stronger and stronger, until the plantation states shall exhibit to the world the seemingly extraordinary paradox which antiquity has before revealed, that slave-holders themselves are the most vigilant guardians of the civil and political liberties of their country. Depend upon it, the day is not far distant when all our resources must be brought again into action. Our antagonist "is scathed not killed."

Whilst we thus guard the sanctuary of our principles, let us always remember with grateful affection, when the hand of death comes among us, who have worshipped at our altars. The javlin of the destroyer has brought down to the cold chambers of death, within the short space of a few weeks, two of our strong men, whom at this moment we could least have spared. Of him, who has found his last resting place within the bosom of his and our own mother land, I shall not now speak. This proud, yet painful office will devolve upon me elsewhere and at another time. But of him, whose grave is now turned to the last rays of that setting sun "whose broad disk he is never destined again to see burning in its declining beams—the blue hills of his own Virginia," I desire, in the fullness of my heart, to say one word.

John Randolph has left us at a moment when he was prepared to have served us most. If God had seen fit to have permitted him to have taken his seat in the next congress of the United States, and to have allowed him to enjoy even a temporary respite from his almost unrelenting disease, no period of his eventful life, (brilliant as it was), could have been contrasted with the splendor of those closing efforts, which I know it was his design to have made for the liberties of our country, or, if this failed, of rousing his own Virginia from her slumber, and re-kindling the long extinguished fires on her watch towers. Existing, as there was, between us, almost an hereditary friendship, during the whole progress of our struggle, I was in constant correspondence with this highly gifted and most extraordinary man. Whatever errors he may sometimes have supposed we had committed, from too much ardor in a good cause, he never flattered for one moment in the strong and affectionate interest he took in our fate and the success of our cause, or in the deep indignation which he expressed at the atrocious despotism of the proclamation, or the time serving profligacy of some of its supporters. In one of his letters, he remarked to me, "if I cannot be booted and mounted for the combat in your approaching conflict, I will at least be borne, like Muley Moluc, in a litter, to the field of battle, and die in your ranks."

I had designed to have sent you a letter which he wrote me a few hours after the president's proclamation had reached him, when he was stretched on what was almost his last bed of sickness, but, on more mature reflection, I have deemed it advisable to consult a mutual friend both of the deceased and myself, in Virginia, as to such parts of our correspondence as it might be proper to be made public, before any of his letters appeared. The letter, however, to which I allude, shall see the light. When it does, I promise you that Andrew Jackson, esq. will not have skin enough left upon his back to determine the color of his epidemics.

To have lost at this exigent moment one who, with such rare and extraordinary endowments for the crisis, possessed and exercised such a spell-like influence over public opinion in his own state, is a calamity that can only be contemplated with composure when we reflect that death came at last, to release this bright emanation of the ethereal spirit, from a broken tenement, long suffering, sinking and decaying from almost the first dawn to the last vestiges of life. Peace to his manes. The south never had, never can have, a more glorious, gallant, and highly gifted champion—one who was emphatically an honest man—one who knew no fear in the cause of truth, and stood forth in her defence in invincible armor, brandishing his burnished lance in the light of heaven, and reflecting high in its bright concave the beams that glistened on its polished shaft. It was thus accouted that he publicly stood forth before the world as the champion of the liberties of his country.

"It will be the more pleasing, if less useful, province of the faithful biographer likewise to bring us in closer communion with the thousand virtues which endeared him to those who, knowing him best, invariably loved him most. To reveal to us his gushing sensibility, his inbred tenderness of heart, his romantic devotion to the duties and offices of friendship, his paternal kindness to his slaves and dependents, whom he seemed, from the very humbleness of their allotment, to regard as his children, and withal, if the lambent beam of the evening lightning can be caught, the wit which sparkled in never ending flashes from his lips.

Let us then offer a libation to his spirit. I give you—

The memory of John Randolph, of Roanoke—In guarding the ashes of her highly gifted son, let Virginia remember his prophetic warnings, and be prepared to stand, where he always stood, in the trenches of the third parallel, in defence of the constitution and the liberty of his country.

I remain, gentlemen, with sincere respect, your friend and fellow citizen, JAS. HAMILTON, Jr.
To George Rankin, esq. and other members of the committee.

However unhappily for his country, we believe that John Randolph, for his own fame, could not have died at a happier period. The deep and unaffected apprehensions for the liberties of the country, with which the despotic principles of the proclamation, and their universal acception north of the Potomac, have inspired all who believe those liberties to depend upon the strict interpretation of the constitution, and the sanguine calculations made on the exertions and great abilities of Mr. Randolph, to procure a reversal of the fatal dogmas of the proclamation, have caused his untimely fate to be lamented with a liveliness and universality of patriotic sorrow without example. For the illustrious man of our land who had descended to the tomb before him died in the fullness of years, and when their country had reaped a full harvest of their virtues and of their talents; but John Randolph died before he had accomplished the last great service expected from him—which seemed peculiarly reserved for his peculiar powers, and which, we fear, the strength of none living is adequate to achieve.

The reader will look with peculiar interest for that letter of Mr. Randolph to which Gov. Hamilton refers, and which he declares it his purpose to publish.

COMMENTS ON THE ABOVE.

From the Globe, July 23.

Great doings at Slab-Town, South Carolina. The nullifiers, it seems, have resolved that SLAB-TOWN shall eclipse Colleton, where they began their revolutionary movements. War upon the proclamation—the force bill, and upon the man, who has triumphed by his vetoes, and before the people, over the American System in all its parts, is now the order of the day with the nullies, under the lead of Messrs. Calhoun and Hamilton; and at SLAB-TOWN, they have made some terrible slaps, indeed, at the president, and all who unite with him in the sentiment, that the union must be preserved. Some sixty or seventy toasts were drunk. Warren R. Davis was the McDuffie of the day. He urged the immediate enforcement of the test oath, to exclude the union men from the rights of citizenship in South Carolina, and but one wish seemed to animate the whole meeting, in which, we are told, "great unanimity prevailed," and that was most frankly avowed in the following toast, viz:

"May those who voted for the bloody bill to coerce South Carolina, a free and sovereign state, into shameful submission, never go down to their graves in peace."

The whole tenor of the proceedings go to show, that the honest gentlemen, who now take the lead in South Carolina, are of opinion that every man who favors the proclamation—the force bill—or, in other words, that all who are opposed to nullification, ought to be slapped-down, and not suffered even to "die in peace."

That most disinterested, consistent, unambitious, honest, quiet politician, John Calhoun, who sought to knit all the powers of government in the hands of the bank—blending it with internal improvements and the tariff—making it the receiver of the impost and the disburser—with Mr. McDuffie's high toned exposition of federal power, in "ONE OF THE PEOPLE," for its guide—this strait laced gentleman could not be present; but he wrote a letter to SLAB-TOWN. He is now no longer distressed about the money or the cotton of the south. But LIBERTY, LIBERTY, is lost forever! He says, "of all earthly things I place LIBERTY in the first rank." &c. &c. "I believe LIBERTY to be in imminent danger." &c. &c. "The proclamation and message of president Jackson, and the passage of the force bill at the last session, have laid the axe at the root of LIBERTY." &c. &c. "Unless the people should rise from their lethargy and put them down, OUR GOVERNMENT WILL SOON BECOME AS DESPOTIC AS ANY ON EARTH"—"Whether we are to be a FREE PEOPLE, depends on the fact, whether these GLARING and DANGEROUS ACTS OF USURPATION on the part of the federal government, are acquiesced in or not." "I willingly surrendered all personal considerations to oppose the approach of DESPOTISM." "It is not in the power of any single, or few individuals, to preserve LIBERTY." He then closes with a prayer to Providence, to "watch over us in this GREAT and DANGEROUS CRISIS, and so enlighten the people and inspire their hearts with the love of THEIR LIBERTY and country, that they may clearly see the danger," &c. &c.

This is the sum and substance of the whole letter—not a word about the tariff—the unconstitutional protection of coarse woollens—or cottons—or cash duties, in the entire epistle. Free trade itself is forgotten and nothing is thought of by Mr. Calhoun, but the right of nullification and secession from the union, to secure to the people of the south the "LIBERTY," says that is the word—the liberty of making him the dictator—the TEST OATH-MAKER for a fragment of that confederacy, the chief magistracy of which he so long sought, but now despairs of ever attaining.

The knight errant of nullification, general Hamilton, it appears, was on a visit to the metaphysical expounder of the Creed, and he, too, wrote a lubrication for SLAB-TOWN, or SLAP DOWN—a name, which seems more apt to the doctrine.

With regard to the union, the crusading general Hamilton says:

"If we set up false idols, and worship, in a stupid spirit of bigotry, the mere effigy for the divinity itself—if, under the name of UNION, the substantial essence of LIBERTY is to be lost sight of, and the very term itself is to be employed not only as a cloak for fraud, violence and injustice, but for the basest servility and man worship, we shall have learnt as little from our fathers as from the august moral which the day itself teaches, and find that we have approached not much nearer in our adoration of the real objects of the union, than the Egyptian did to his God, in worshipping a CROCODILE."

This is very figurative, and flighty. Brought down to the common level, we suppose it means, that the union is a "mere effigy;" that nullification is "the substantial essence of liberty;" that the union is preferred to the right of each state to nullify it, from spirit of "man-worship," or devotion to general Jackson on the part of the people—that general Jackson is "a CROCODILE," and the nation in "a stupid spirit of bigotry," idolize a monster; and for the sake of that monster are induced to feel an affectionate reverence for the institutions he watches over and would preserve. This indeed is a terrible slap at the American people and their president.

The general, in his next paragraphs, in effect, tells us that he would have given law to the whole country, by the sword, if his state had been united! He likes union on a small scale.

[Here the paragraphs referred to are inserted as they appear in the foregoing letter.]

The meaning of this is a little wrapped up, but as history tells us that Lacedemon, though a slave state, gave laws to all the little states of Greece—so South Carolina, being a little slave-holding state, would have been able, but for dissention, to have conquered by arms the freemen of the other great states, and added them, doubtless, to the number of South Carolina slaves. For the present, however, he is satisfied that he saved "the point of honor." It is true, with the proclamation before his eyes, he would not "go his death for his sugar." He paid the duty; but he lives to fight another day. "Depend upon it," says our death-doing general—"depend upon it, the day is not far distant when all our resources must be brought again into action—our antagonist is scotched, not KILLED." The next time the nullifiers will give no quarters.

We are then told by general Hamilton, that but for the untimely death of the knight of Roanoke, he would have joined nullification in the crusade against "the atrocious despotism of the proclamation." In one of his letters, (says the general,) he remarked to me—

"If I cannot be booted and mounted for the combat in your approaching conflict, I will at least be borne, like Muley Moluc, in a litter to the field of battle, and die in your ranks."

To shew the people of SLAB-TOWN how Mr. Randolph meant to deal with the president, the generalissimo was about to send to them a letter he received from the gentleman before his death; but declining it for the present, he gives the slap down people the following account of the matter:

"I had designed to have sent you a letter which he wrote me a few hours after the president's proclamation had reached him, when he was stretched on what was almost his last bed of sickness, but on more mature reflection, I have deemed it advisable to consult a mutual friend both of the deceased and myself in Virginia, as to such parts of our correspondence, as it might be proper to make public, before any of his letters appear. THE LETTER, HOWEVER, TO WHICH I ALLUDE, SHALL SEE THE LIGHT. WHEN IT DOES, I PROMISE YOU, THAT ANDREW JACKSON, ESQ. WILL NOT HAVE SKIN ENOUGH LEFT UPON HIS BACK TO DETERMINE THE COLOR OF HIS EPIDERMIS."

To be for one moment serious, we must say, that we do not believe that Mr. Randolph ever wrote such a letter, as is here described. If he did, what must the public think of the pretensions to open, manly candor and sincerity which his friends ascribe for him? Mr. Randolph wrote to the president the most friendly, nay, the kindest letters. Even after the proclamation appeared, he came to Washington—waited on the president—dined with him, and in his very last interview, evinced the same respectful, friendly regard, which characterised all his previous intercourse and correspondence. How then could Mr. Randolph, if he were an ingenuous, honest man, have harbored in his heart under all these shows of friendship, the malignant, deadly hate, which it is now pretended, characterize his letters to general Hamilton? We hope the general will feel himself called on by what we have said, to produce his correspondence, his whole correspondence, and nothing but his correspondence. This is due to the dead and the living.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 24—VOL. VIII.] BALTIMORE, AUG. 10, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,142.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ In the last paragraph of our article in the last Register under the head of "Religious Newspapers and Controversies," a mistake occurred which we deem it proper to correct. The word "insolent" should be "innocent," so as to read "the most innocent remarks, uttered in the most general terms" &c. The word will be found in the 6th line from the beginning of the paragraph.

CHOLERA. This disease still lingers at Pittsburgh. The board of health reported two deaths for the week immediately preceding the 30th ult.

In Missouri, the disease has been peculiarly fatal. Palmyra, a comparatively small village, lost between the 1st and 15th ult. upwards of 100 of its inhabitants. At St. Charles many of the best citizens had fallen victims. At St. Louis, the cholera was subsiding.

The Vandalia Whig says, the cholera still continues in Illinois, and although its progress is not rapid, deaths are occurring almost daily. At Carrollton it has broken out with such malignity as to suspend all business and clothe the town in gloom. At Galena, there had been between 30 and 40 deaths from the 19th June to the 12th July.

In Ohio the cholera prevailed in many places; at Cincinnati it was on the increase; 8 deaths occurred there on the 1st inst. It had declined at Columbus. In the penitentiary at that place there had been 29 cases and 7 deaths amongst the convicts, up to the 30th ult. Out of 203 convicts about 100 had had the premonitory symptoms.

In Kentucky, it had greatly subsided, though in some places it was making fearful inroads. In Bardstown the family of judge Rowan, late U. S. senator, has been severely visited by this inscrutable scourge. His sons William and A. H.; his son William's wife; grand-daughter, Miss Steele, and his sister Mrs. Kelly, had died, as also, several of his slaves. His son John was sick, but not dangerous. Maysville has sustained a serious loss in the death of Mr. Charles E. Wolf, its late mayor. He was buried on the 25th ult. with all the respect due to his station and eminent services as the chief executive officer of the city.

Hagerstown. Three deaths by cholera having at different intervals occurred there during the season, of persons from the line of the canal, a meeting of the citizens of this town recently took place, at which a committee of ten gentlemen of the first respectability was appointed to examine into the condition of its health. This committee report that after full inquiry and careful investigation, they find that from the spring of the present year, down to the 29th ult. the citizens have enjoyed good health, and that no case of epidemic cholera has originated there.

LATE FROM BUENOS AYRES. By the brig Amanda, capt. Yorke, Buenos Ayres papers have been received to June 22d inclusive.

The eleventh legislature of the province convened at Buenos Ayres, 31st May, on which day, governor Balcarce delivered a message containing among other paragraphs the following:

"The minister sent by the government of Washington, whose expected arrival was announced to you in the preceding year, and whom it was resolved to await in order to come to an explanation relative to the destruction by main force of the colony in the Island de la Soledad, (one of the Falklands), by the captain of the United States corvette Lexington, did in effect arrive, and was received in the character of charge d'affaires: you are, Messrs. Representatives, already acquainted with the state of this negotiation. The government, in order to follow it up, has appointed a minister, and has notified this appointment to that of Washington; and he will shortly be despatched with the competent instructions to obtain satisfaction and reparation for so great an injury.

"The re-settlement of the Falkland Islands was immediately resolved on, in the mode that the other attentions of the province allowed; but soon an event occurred as unexpected as disagreeable. The government has informed you that the captain of his Britannic majesty's sloop of war Clio, sustained by a superior force, took possession of the islands in the name of his sovereign. Then it likewise stated to you what would be its conduct. It has therefore directed its minister at London, that, energetically remonstrating against the violation of the most sacred principles of the law of nations, he demand the restitution, and seek such satisfaction as becomes the justice and honor of both governments, by those means which probity, good faith and sound reason dictate."

THE OPPRESSED SOUTH. Some of our southern fellow citizens complain that the laws passed by congress to counteract foreign legislation, and to protect our domestic manufactures, as well as American labor and capital, embarrass their trade, and are producing with them, poverty, distress and ruin. To all who will dispassionately examine the subject, these complaints will be found to be visionary and unfounded. It is the grain growing states, that have reason to complain still of the state of the markets and our foreign trade.

From 1st October, 1831, till 30th Sept. 1832, there were imported into Pennsylvania from foreign countries, goods, &c. amounting to the sum of $10,678,358.

And yet, from Pennsylvania there was exported in the same year, of domestic produce, $2,008,991
Of foreign do. 3,516,066
Whereas, in the same year, there was imported into South Carolina, 1,213,725
And the exports of her domestic produce were, 7,685,833
Do. Imports into Alabama, 306,845
Exports of do. 2,733,554

South Carolina, with a population of only 581,458, more than one-half of whom are slaves, has received during the last year of her agricultural produce, nearly eight millions of dollars, whilst Pennsylvania, with a population of 1,347,672, received for the whole export of her domestic produce and manufactures, little more than two millions of dollars.

Alabama, with a population of 308,997, more than one-third of whom are slaves, received as above for her cotton and sugar, nearly three millions of dollars. In this state of trade and commerce, who are the sufferers? Surely not the southern planters. It is to be remembered, that the greatest part of our imports are from England, which does not admit a barrel of our flour, or a bushel of our wheat, to be sold in her market. The duties on foreign flour and grain are so great, as to exclude them from the English market, except in a season of scarcity, to prevent a famine, and yet southern planters tell us that it is unreasonable to impose duties on British manufactures, for the protection of our own labor, capital and domestic manufactures.

The total of exports of product as stated, shows that the labor of the south is, under the existing laws, much better paid for, than in the grain-growing and free labor state of Pennsylvania, and even if the product of single plantations be considered, with reference to the labor used on them, they equally show the advantages of the southern planter over the grain grower of the middle states.

In the Savannah Republican of May 29th, is a statement of the produce for the last year, of three sugar plantations in East Florida.

The first plantation produced to each hand for the year, $372
 The second plantation, 370
 The third do. 475

The aggregate, as given, is, that 79 hands produced $30,600, which is 387 dollars for each hand, and greatly exceeds the average product of the free labor of the north. Is it not marvellous, that our southern fellow citizens, with the advantages which they possess, should complain of the market and commercial regulations? It is, however, with them, as it is with some individuals in every society, that those persons, who, by the bounty of Providence, have least cause to complain, are the ones who talk most of their imaginary evils.

BRITISH WEST INDIES. The Journal of Commerce has been permitted to copy the following extract of a letter from our consul at Jamaica, addressed to captain Newton, of the United States ship the St. Louis, on the eve of his departure from that port. By it we regret to find that the most distressing apprehensions are entertained for the safety of the white inhabitants, in consequence of the arrangements now making in the British parliament with respect to the emancipation of the slaves in the British West India possessions. We trust that our government will lose no time in placing a naval force in that quarter, for the better security of the lives and property of our citizens.

Consulate of the U. States, Kingston, Jam. June 30, 1833.

Dear sir—Having understood that you intend sailing to-morrow, I should do great injustice to my feelings if I did not testify to you my sincere and most grateful thanks for the courtesy and distinguished attention I received from you during my late visit on board the St. Louis, and without meaning to reflect in the least on the character of any one gallant officer in the service, have only to say that if similar attentions were more generally paid to our accredited agents abroad, it would add greatly to their respectability in the eyes of foreigners, and thereby enable them the more fully to secure the interests of their fellow citizens. [After some further remarks in high commendation of the St. Louis, her officers, and all pertaining to her as a ship of war, the letter proceeds—] Your departure from this place at such a critical moment as the present, is not only regretted by myself and family, but by the entire population of Kingston and its environs. You are aware, sir, that the views of ministers, as regards the emancipation of the slaves, &c. in the different colonies, have been received here, and it has not given satisfaction to either of the parties interested, and least of all the slaves. It is generally therefore believed, that as soon as the particulars shall have been promulgated throughout the island, poisoned as the minds of the negroes now are, that they will make an attempt to emancipate themselves, and the consequences in that case, cannot be otherwise than fatal to every white inhabitant, foreigner or otherwise. Whether these things will take place as soon as is generally expected, I cannot take upon me to say; perhaps from the precautions which the government are now taking, a considerable time may yet intervene, before the negroes venture to carry into effect their plans; and as there is a great deal of "American property and interest in the colony," it behooves our government to take every precaution for its security. I therefore most earnestly entreat you, to impress upon the mind of the honorable secretary of the navy, the propriety of keeping a vessel of war in this neighborhood, and occasionally to visit this port, to communicate confidentially with me.

Although your time has been very short here, I trust you have both seen and heard enough to justify the application I have made, for the presence of an armed vessel, as soon as possible, and if it should please the honorable secretary, from the known reputation of your character for gentlemanly conduct, combined as it is with all the necessary prudence which the commander of a ship of war should possess, coming here at such a time, and under such circumstances, I know no one who would be more agreeable to me, and the authorities generally, than you, sir.

With my best thanks to all your gentlemanly officers, for the kindness and attentions thus individually evinced towards me, during my late visit on board the "St. Louis." I am, dear sir, with best wishes for your honor and happiness, your very sincere friend and faithful servant,

 ROBERT MONROE HARRISON.

LATEST FROM PORTUGAL. Captain Howland of the brig Betsey & Jane, at N. Bedford, from St. Michael's, which he left on the 29th June, reports that four or five days previous to his sailing, a schooner arrived at that place, in four and a half days from Oporto, with a few wounded soldiers from Don Pedro's army. She brought accounts of Don Pedro having received an addition of troops from England and France, and that 5,000 soldiers had embarked on board steamers at Oporto, destination unknown.—These accounts were received with much satisfaction at St. Michael's, and hopes were entertained that the struggle would soon terminate favorably to the cause of Donna Maria. The accounts, however, previous to the above, were of a nature not very flattering to Don Pedro's friends, and these last, inspired them with new hopes. At Madeira, 14th June, there were 3,000 of Don Miguel's best troops. Every thing was quiet and the inhabitants did not entertain the least fear of Don Pedro's succeeding.

WELCOME OF GEN. CASS IN DETROIT. At a meeting of the citizens of Detroit, on the 23d ult. a committee was appointed, who in pursuance of their instructions, addressed a note to gen. Cass, then on a visit to that city, in the following terms:

"Detroit, July 24, 1833.

"Hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war.

"Sir—The citizens of Detroit, your neighbors and friends, who have so long had an opportunity of witnessing your important public services, and the admirable qualities which, happily blended, adorn your private character and worth, gladly avail themselves of the occasion which your temporary visit to this place affords them to solicit your acceptance of a public dinner, at such time as may best comport with your convenience.

"Cherishing, as we do, the recollection of the social and friendly relations and intercourse, that so happily characterized the period of your gubernatorial functions over the territory, an opportunity to revive, even temporarily, those happy recollections, would be gratefully appreciated, and particularly by that portion of our citizens who have long had the pleasure of an acquaintance with yourself and your excellent and amiable family.

"Happy in being the organ through which the citizens of Detroit respectfully present to you, sir, this small tribute of their respect, permit us to add the expression of our unalterable wishes for your health, welfare and happiness."

To this note the following answer was returned:

"Detroit, July 24, 1833.

"Gentlemen—Be pleased to accept for yourselves, and to communicate to the citizens of Detroit, my acknowledgments, for the kind invitation I have received, to accept from them a public dinner.

"The time at my disposal will not allow me the pleasure of meeting them upon such an occasion. But this proof of their regard is not less welcome to me, and is but a continuation of that kindness which for eighteen years I have experienced from them in the relations of public and private life.

"In whatever circumstances I may be placed, the recollection of what I owe to the confidence and good will of the citizens of Detroit will always be present with me. I am, gentlemen, with regard, your obedient servant, LEW. CASS."

IMPORTANT TO VOYAGERS AND SHIP OWNERS. A case was lately tried in the court of common pleas, New York, wherein an emigrant to this country brought an action for damages against the owners of a ship in which he had engaged a passage to this country from Liverpool. The ship with her cargo and passengers on board had actually proceeded on the voyage; but being materially damaged by a gale on the third or fourth day, to return or sink was found inevitable. The passengers were consequently disembarked at Liverpool; and therefore demanded another passage immediately by the same ship owners, or to have their paid fares returned. Neither was done; and the plaintiff in the suit engaged passage in another packet; and having arrived at New York, he brought his action to recover the amount of the fare paid; and of the expenses to which he was necessitated by the failure of the first voyage. The passage money was 16 dollars.

The learned judge in his summing up, charged the jury on the law and the facts, and laid it down as law, that in cases of the payment of passage money, and the consideration not being rendered, nor the passage completed, those contracting to carry the passengers, as common carriers, were bound to execute their agreement, and, if not done, they were liable for the amount paid them. That there was no distinction in law between freight and passage, both being alike in the same principle of maritime law, which requires the carrying of the freight and passage money as agreed.

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff of $16, with 6 cents costs. [Phil. Sentinel.]

THE INDIAN CHARACTER. The Richmond Compiler relates the following interesting incident, strikingly illustrative of that exalted trait in the Indian character which holds with unshaken firmness to the observance of a plighted faith, be the circumstances what they may under which the pledge was given:

When general Scott, in his late campaign arrived at the American encampment in the north west, he found three Indians prisoners—under a charge of murdering the whites. The evidence against them was slight—and an application had been sent on to Washington to obtain their discharge. But the president had gone to the Hermitage, and the secretary of war to Detroit. No answer was of course, obtained. In the mean time the cholera broke out among the American troops in the camp on Rock river. Many became victims. One of the three Indian prisoners also took it and died.

The general seeing the danger they were exposed to, determined on letting the two survivors out of confinement—and told them if they would confine themselves to the island in the river, he would permit them to go there. Their word being pledged, he directed them to go to the extreme part of the island, where they might keep somewhat out of the way of our troops. They accordingly repaired to the quarter where he had directed them to go; but they never once left the island—although they might easily have made their escape. Meantime the cholera spread, and the danger thickened. The general then told them that he would permit them to go to their tribe, upon condition that they would return to the camp as soon as he gave them notice that the cholera was gone. They assented to the terms and went home.

These men were under a charge of murder—and might have lost their lives if they were put upon their trial. But, notwithstanding this circumstance, the moment gen. Scott had determined to hold his great council with the Indians, he informed the two prisoners that they must come in—and they did not hesitate to do so. They repaired among the first Indians to the American encampment.

The reader will be pleased to hear that they were ultimately acquitted—though one of them had to pledge himself to attend as a witness against another Indian, who was charged with murdering the whites. This duty too he fulfilled, though at much inconvenience to himself.

INDIAN LANDS, &c. At the time of writing the following letter, Washington was president, and Mr. Jefferson his secretary of state:

Philadelphia, Aug. 10, 1791.

To general Knox.

Dear sir—I have now the honor to return the petition of Mr. Moultrie on behalf of the South Carolina Yazoo company. Without noticing that some of the highest functions of sovereignty are assumed in the very papers which he annexes as his justification, I am of opinion that government should firmly maintain this ground: That the Indians have a right to the occupation of their lands, independent of the states within whose chartered limits they happen to be: That until they cede them by treaty, no act of a state can give a right to such lands: That neither under the present constitution, nor the ancient confederation, had any state, or person, a right to treat with the Indians, without the consent of the general government; that that consent has never been given to any treaty for the cession of the lands in question: That the government is determined to exert its energy for the patronage and protection of the rights of the Indians, and the preservation of peace between the United States and them; and that if any settlements are made on the lands not ceded by them, without the previous consent of the United States, the government will think itself bound, not only to declare to the Indians that such settlements are without the authority or protection of the United States, but to remove them also by force.

It is in compliance with your request, my dear sir, that I submit these ideas to you, to whom it belongs to give place to them, or to such others as your better judgment shall prefer, in answer to Mr. Moultrie.

DARING ROBBERY. An extensive and daring robbery was committed in Rutland, Vt. on the night of the 24th inst. Some villain entered the dwelling house of William Page, esq. cashier of the bank, and stole money to the amount of nearly $7,000. The money was contained in a small trunk, which was carried to the bedroom of Mr. Page for safe keeping, regularly locked, and the key deposited in his vest pocket. The rogue must have entered the bedroom, taken the key from the pocket while the family were asleep, and departed with the trunk, which was found rifled in the north parlor; and the bank keys in the small yard in the front of the house. The bills were, we learn, mostly of the Rutland bank. One thousand dollars reward is offered for the recovery of the money.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT. In the British house of commons, on the 13th of June, the solicitor general moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the laws relating to debtors. We have not seen the bill itself: but the remarks of the solicitor general, on the subject of his motion, give a very general account of its provisions. He stated, that his principal object was to give a remedy against the property, instead of the person, of the debtor. The first provision of the bill would be, to allow immediate execution upon all bills and bonds, when they become due, dispensing with many of the proceedings at present in use. On a summons being issued, execution is to issue forthwith, unless security is given to the court. The debtor is to be brought before a commissioner, and if he refuses to exhibit and surrender his property, is to be committed to prison. The creditor is to be entitled to a remedy against all kinds of property possessed by the debtor. Power is to be given to debtors to make a surrender of their property, in which case, the creditors, by a majority of four-fifths, may give him a certificate of discharge. To obtain money with an intent to defraud, is declared a misdemeanor, as is also the absconding of the debtor, or the stating of a false account in the surrender of his property. Imprisonment for debt is proposed to be abolished, except in cases attended with fraud, but where a creditor makes oath before a magistrate that his debtor is about to abscond to a foreign country, the latter may be imprisoned. CATASTROPHE BY LIGHTNING. We have the following statement from a gentleman who visited the scene of the awful occurrence which it describes, the morning after it took place.

A respectable citizen of Hampshire county, Va. of the name of Arnold, who carried on the business of tanner, had been to Alexandria to sell a load of leather, was returning on Thursday, the 25th ult. travelling on horseback by the stage road, when about ten miles below Aldie, in Loudon county, the appearance of a heavy cloud warned him to seek shelter for himself and horse. He accordingly rode up to a stable at the side of the road, where the stage stopped to change horses and having obtained permission of the stage driver, put his horse into one of the stalls. The driver at this time had the four stage horses out before the door—three of them were in a cluster, and a few paces from the door, the fourth was detached a little distance from the rest.

Mr. Arnold was standing in the stable door, calmly viewing the threatening cloud as it thickened and rolled over head, flashing and roaring in awful and terrific grandeur. It was not long that he stood thus: a cataract of electric fire descended upon the stable, rending it from the ridge pole to the sill. Mr. Arnold was struck dead!—the three horses near the stable door were killed, and the driver knocked down and so stunned that he remained for a time, insensible—His life was evidently preserved by the accidental circumstance of his having a silk handkerchief in the crown of his hat.

Our informant saw the hat and handkerchief; the rim and the top of the hat were severed from the crown, a large piece taken out of the latter; the several pieces were cut asunder as neatly as if it had been done with a sharp instrument. The handkerchief was seared or scorched, as if a red hot iron had passed quickly over it. A small reddish mark was perceptible on one of the driver's cheeks, but whether from lightning or not was uncertain; besides this there was not the slightest appearance of its effect on any part of his body. He was entirely free from any pain about the head, though he complained of a soreness in his breast.

DISEASE AMONG CATTLE. The following is from one of our most respectable farmers in the county of Philadelphia.

[Penn. Inquirer.]

To the editor of the Inquirer.

Sir—A disease—name unknown to the writer—is prevalent among the horned cattle and horses in the neighborhood of Frankford, in this county; and my object in publicly stating this fact, is to elicit, if possible, through the medium of your journal, some information touching the disease, its cause, its cure, or what is most desirable, an "ounce of prevention." Within the last fortnight, or three weeks, upwards of nine cows and six or seven horses have died in the immediate vicinity of the village, and all, so far as I can learn, were carried off in the same way. The writer of this communication has lost, of a stock of four cows and three horses, two of the former and one of the latter, all having died within ten days. My cows and horse were apparently in health three hours previous to death, and in every instance they were found dead without exhibiting any symptoms of disease. I am told, however, that a horse of one of my neighbors exhibited uneasiness and a kind of vertigo a few hours previous to death, but that no symptoms of disease were visible in the morning—the animal having died in the evening. I had a post mortem examination of one of my cows, but could discover nothing in the stomach, bowels, or paunch to produce death—these parts of the animal exhibited a healthy appearance. The abdomens of the cows and horse were all much swollen after death.

B.

August 1st.

P. S. Cow well, apparently, at 2, P. M. dead at half past 5.

Cow well, apparently, at 10 in the evening; found dead and cold at 5, next morning.

Horse well at 2 o'clock, dead at half past 4.

ETYMOLOGY. The Nantucket Inquirer published the following extract from a lecture delivered at Boston, by John Pickering, esq. on the subject of languages generally:

"In geography, the name of Cape Horn is commonly associated with the idea of a horn; and we often hear of a vessel going round the horn, &c. But the true meaning of the word is altogether different; this extremity of the continent was called by the Spaniards Cabo de Horno, meaning cape of the furnace, or Cape Furnaces, which corresponds to the name of the adjacent land, called Terra del Fuego, or land of fire. In our own neighborhood, too, the name of Martha's Vineyard has been sadly corrupted; and upon that corruption has been founded an ancient story that it was given by an Indian chieft to his daughter Martha, as her portion.

"We will leave the story to our poets to embellish their works of imagination; but the sober truth of history is, that it was so named from MARTIN WYNGARD's land, now shortened to Martha's Vineyard.

"Again; the familiar exclamation on hailing, 'ship a hoy!' is derived from the same root, and is substantially the same word with the ancient exclamation used at the tilts and tournaments of the knights—that is, ho! or in French, ho la, that is stop. The same expression among landmen, is applied to vehicles moved on land by horses and other animals, but is corrupted into the well known exclamation, wo or hwo, that is stop or stand still."

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

From the Nottingham (England) Review.

On Wednesday forenoon, we observed placarded on the walls of this town an address from the earl of Lincoln, heir apparent to the dukedom of Newcastle, to the electors of the south eastern division of the county of Nottingham, offering himself as a candidate for the representation of that portion of Nottinghamshire, and at the same time stating that he should be at Newark market that day (Wednesday), at Bingham yesterday, and at Southwell this day. The same day's post brought us a long communication from Newark, being an alphabetical list of one hundred and thirteen persons who have been ejected from their houses in that borough, under the principle of "May I not do what I like with my own?" Probably we shall print the entire list before long; in the meantime we shall now make a few extracts, and the first name is—

Anderson, Peter, Balderton-gate, rent £4, self and family tenants for forty years, value of premises £40, voted for Wilde.

Bates, John, Wilson street, rent £7 10s. father and self tenants fifty-eight years, value £120. Wilde.

Birkett, Wm. Farndon road, £18 rent, father and self tenants fifty-six years—Wilde.

Beech, Wm. Stodman street, rent £35, self and family tenants for one hundred and fifty years, did not vote at all, having refused to take the oath.

Carver, James, sen. Norton Disney, not an elector, but known to be favorable to the independent cause. (His son's tavern was one of Wilde's committee houses).

Gardner, Thomas, Beaumont street, rent £18, did not vote, but was present at a dinner! Had expended £450 on the duke's premises.

Low, Mrs. Wilson street, £8 10s. son voted for Wilde.

Parkinson, Thomas, Wilson street, rent £8, self and father tenants 46 years—Wilde.

Rawden, Miss, Wilson street, rent £6—making favors for the blues!

Thorpe, James, Market place, rent £22, self, father and grandfather tenants 100 years, and expended great sums on the premises—voted for Willoughby and Wilde.

With numerous instances of this kind, where families have been ejected from tenements in which they have been resident time out of mind—where widows were turned out of their houses because of the manner in which their sons have voted—where persons had expended more than the full value of their premises in improvements, and yet were compelled to quit without remuneration—nay, where even the fact of a milliner having made favors for the opposite party, was deemed a sufficient ground for depriving her of her house—we wonder that any relative of the duke of Newcastle should have the effrontery to show his face as a candidate in Newark.

§3—The preceding is a fine specimen of English "liberty" which has been so much boasted of, for several centuries—not that persons were "reformed" because they had not pleased "his grace," the duke of Newcastle, in the manner of voting—for England is not the only country in which great men "reward their friends and punish their enemies," for opinion's sake! It is as severely demanded that persons should "kiss the black stone," and say "God is God, and Mahomet [or any body else] is his prophet," in the United States; as on the lands of the duke of Newcastle, or at the temple of Mecca—but, perhaps, not quite so generally complied with!! The pilgrims at Mecca, however, have this advantage—they know on which side to "kiss the black stone"—but our devotees are often required to kiss on both sides, and all sides—to kiss off, what they had kissed on—to watch the rolling of the stone, and kiss its very bottom!

But we insert this article chiefly to shew the condition of the English peasantry. The family of one man had been successive tenants for one hundred and fifty years, and so on! We have always thought that beautiful English song, "Ere around the huge oak," &c. exposed disgusting facts, in preferring as a boast—"The fields I now hold on your honor's estate, is the same that my grandfather tilled." Three generations, and a dependent still—with a hope that the fourth descent would also be dependent.

tion of their vessels and cargoes, during the years 1809, 1810, 1811 and 1812, and his Sicilian majesty desiring thereby to strengthen with the said government the bonds of that harmony not hitherto disturbed, the said government of the United States, and his aforesaid majesty the king of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies have, with one accord, resolved to come to an adjustment, to effectuate which they have respectively named, and furnished with the necessary powers, viz: The said government of the United States, John Nelson, esq. a citizen of said states, and their charge d'affaires near his majesty the king of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies; and his majesty, his excellency D. Antonio Maria Starella, prince of Cassaro, marquis of Spaccaforno, count Starella, &c. &c. his said majesty's minister, secretary of state for foreign affairs, &c. &c. who, after the exchange of their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed to the following articles:

Article I. His majesty the king of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, with a view to satisfy the aforesaid reclamation for the depredations, sequestrations, confiscations and destruction of the vessels and cargoes of the merchants of the United States, [and for every expense of every kind whatsoever, incident to, or growing out of the same] inflicted by Murat during the years 1809, 1810, 1811, 1812, obliges himself to pay the sum of two millions one hundred and fifteen thousand Neapolitan ducats to the government of the United States; seven thousand six hundred and seventy-nine ducats, part thereof to be applied to reimburse the said government for the expense incurred by it in the transportation of American seamen from the kingdom of Naples during the year 1810, and the residue to be distributed amongst the claimants by the said government of the United States, in such manner, and according to such rules as it may prescribe.

Article II. The sum of two millions one hundred and fifteen thousand Neapolitan ducats, agreed on in article the first, shall be paid in Naples, in nine equal instalments of two hundred and thirty-five thousand ducats, and with interest thereon at the rate of four per centum per annum, to be calculated from the date of the interchange of the ratification of this convention, until the whole sum shall be paid. The first instalment shall be payable twelve months after the exchange of the said ratification, and the remaining instalments, with the interest successively, one year after another. The said payments shall be made in Naples, into the hands of such persons as shall be duly authorised by the government of the United States to receive the same.

Article III. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged in this capital in the space of eight months from this date, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the parties above named have respectively subscribed these articles, and thereto affixed their seals. Done at Naples, on the fourteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two.

EMIGRATION TO CANADA.

The Canadian Literary Journal contains some curious statements respecting the character and extent of the recent emigration from Europe to the Canadas. Prior to the year 1830, the number of emigrants was comparatively small, and they were almost exclusively laboring men, wholly destitute of pecuniary resources, who came out for the purpose of procuring the means of subsistence. Within the last three years, the number of the emigrants has been three or four times as great as the average of several years preceding, and a large portion of them have been farmers of considerable property, professional men, and retired officers of the army and navy. The value of real estate in the provinces, says the Journal, has been every where materially increased, and that of wild lands in Upper Canada has been more than doubled. The number of emigrants in 1829 was 15,945; in 1830, 28,000; in 1831, 50,254; and in 1832, 51,746. Of this last number, 19,830 were males, 17,052 females, and 14,864 children under fourteen years of age. All of them were voluntary emigrants, excepting about 5,000, who received parochial aid. Thirty-five thousand went to Upper Canada, 10,000 remained in Lower Canada, 2,350 died of cholera, 850 returned to their own country, and 3,346 went to the United States. During the last four years, the increase of emigration from England has been five-fold, from Ireland three-fold, and from Scotland two-fold; and the emigration from England in 1832 was greater by 70 per cent. than that of the preceding year, while the emigration from Ireland in the same period was diminished by 15 per cent. Four years ago, the emigrants from England came principally from the northern counties; they now come chiefly from the southern. The professional men who came out during the last year, have established themselves in the towns and villages of Upper Canada; the officers have obtained, and in general settled upon, the lands to which they are entitled for their services; and the agricultural emigrants have purchased cultivated farms in different parts of that province. The laboring class have been settled on the wild lands belonging to the crown, a large portion of which are in the district of Newcastle.

It was in this district, that the first experiment was made of settling bodies of indigent emigrants upon these lands; and though various difficulties have been encountered, the Journal declares that it has proved eminently successful; the population of this district having increased since the year 1817 from 4,000 to 30,000. The advantages derived from emigration are attributed chiefly to the exertions of lieutenant governor sir John Colborne, who has not only done much to promote it, but has distinguished himself by his efforts to secure the comfort and prosperity of the emigrants.

THE FRENCH IN ALGIERS.

The occupation of Algiers by the French is not unattended with trouble. The Arab tribes of the interior, unsubdued and as hostile as ever, are a constant source of uneasiness to the French occupants. A late Paris Mouiteur says:

"Several hostile tribes had plundered our allies and neighbors, the Beni Urgins, of their cattle, and escaping with impunity, had been encouraged to enter by night into our establishments, and, being expert thieves, carried off some of our horses, mules and implements. General D'Uzer, the commander-in-chief at Bona, having learnt that the stolen property had been taken to the Oulet d'Attia, a tribe settled about five leagues off, resolved to chastise these depredators, and at the same time intimidate the Arabs by making a great display of force. Consequently, on the 21st, at midnight, he marched out of Bona an advanced guard of 520 cavalry and some light infantry, under the command of col. Perragraux, following himself, in half an hour, with 800 men, infantry and engineers, and a battery of artillery, moving in the deepest silence. At daybreak the tribe of Oulet d'Attia were completely surrounded; but, at the first musket shot, the tribe of Beni Acoub, one of our most hostile enemies, hastened with all the cavalry and infantry it could assemble. A brisk firing ensued, during which col. Perragraux hastened to send in the rear the flocks and cattle he had captured. This made the enemy attack us with increased fury, but they were completely routed by two brilliant charges of our cavalry, which left thirty-one Arabs dead upon the field, and made six prisoners. Upon this a retreat was made in the finest order; but after marching a short distance, colonel Perragraux halted his men, to allow them to refresh themselves, and afterwards returned to Bona without further interruption. General D'Uzer, after restoring to our enclosures eighty head of cattle that had been carried off, distributed fifty-three oxen to the Karesas, fifty cows, as many calves, and 100 sheep to the Beni Urgins, and twenty oxen to another tribe, which though called Oulet d'Attia, is friendly to us. He then returned to the guilty tribe of Oulet d'Attia the remainder of the cattle brought off, who, on their side gave up the horses and objects they had taken from us. The severe lesson these received has had a great effect in the country, so that several inhabitants of Bona, who, on their way from Constantine were plundered to a large amount by the numerous tribe of El-Cahal, have had all the stolen articles restored to them."

FRENCH AND ENGLISH AGRICULTURE COMPARED.

The following comparative statement, showing the amount of animate and inanimate power applied to agriculture and commerce in France and Great Britain, is given by Mr. Charles Dupin. He takes the population of France at 31,800,000, and England and Scotland at 15,000,000.

Applied to agriculture in France.

		Effective laborers.
Human race	21,056,667 equal to	8,406,038
Horses	1,600,000 "	11,200,000
Oxen and cows	6,973,000 "	17,432,000
Asses	240,000 "	240,000

Total 37,278,000

Applied to agriculture in England and Scotland.

		Effective laborers.
Human race	5,000,000 equal to	2,132,446
Horses	2,250,000 "	8,750,000
Oxen, cows, &c.	5,500,000 "	13,750,000

Approximating estimate for Ireland

7,455,717

Total for the United Kingdom 32,088,147

Applied to the arts, manufacture and commerce.

	In France.	In G. Britain.
	Men power.	Men power.
Animal force equal to	6,303,019	7,725,497
Mills and hydraulic engines	1,500,000	1,300,000
Wind mills	253,333	240,000
Wind and steam navigation	3,000,000	12,000,000
Steam engines	480,000	6,400,000

Total force 11,536,352 27,115,497

Approximating estimate for Ireland

1,002,667

Total force for Great Britain 28,118,164

By the above estimate, it appears that France, with a population of 32,000,000, employs in agriculture, the arts and commerce, a conjoined animate and inanimate power equal to 48,814,390 able men; and that Great Britain, with its population, (say 28,000,000), employs a power equal to 60,206,311. That the inanimate power applied in England and Scotland to agriculture is equal to twelve times the human force, while in France it does not exceed five times; that the inanimate power applied to manufacture and commerce in Great Britain, is four times greater than in France; and that the whole animate and inanimate power engaged in manufacture and commerce in Great Britain is nearly treble the amount of that so occupied in France.

PRODUCT AND CONSUMPTION OF COFFEE.

The following calculations concerning the product and consumption of coffee, will interest many of our readers, who are not concerned in a trade in the article. We think, however, that the estimated amount of the consumption, as well as of the production is a great deal too high.

From the Boston Courier.

Estimated consumption of Europe. The population of Europe is about 210,000,000. If one-tenth of this number be consumers of coffee, and each consume 15 lbs. annually, which is little more than $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. per week, the consumption will exceed 300,000,000 lbs. In most parts of Europe, the higher and middling classes, comprehending the nobility, high and middling clergy, legal and medical professions, merchants, manufacturing proprietors, landed gentry, rich mechanics, and naval and military officers, are generally consumers of coffee, and constitute more than one-tenth of the population. A large portion of all these being rich, and addicted to luxurious habits, consume as much coffee in proportion to numbers, as the wealthy or middling population of our cities; and the usual consumption of the latter is $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. per week, or 25 per year for each individual. Coffee is, perhaps, more generally consumed in Germany, the Netherlands, Prussia and Austria, than in other European countries. The whole population of these is about—

France	54,000,000	1-4 consumers	13,750,000
Turkey	31,000,000	1-5 "	8,000,000
Spain, Portugal & Italy	9,000,000	1-20 "	1,500,000
Denmark	30,000,000	1-10 "	750,000
Sweden	1,800,000	1-7 "	1,500,000
Switzerland	3,700,000	1-40 "	1,500,000
G. Britain and Ireland	2,000,000
Russia	21,000,000
	57,500,000
	210,000,000		27,000,000

But to reduce this number of consumers to 1 10 of the whole population, 23 per centum should be deducted, and say for round numbers

Which leaves for consumers	21,000,000
If each of these consume 16 $\frac{1}{2}$ pounds annually, which is 1-3 less than the quantity allowed above to the greatest consumers of our cities, the annual consumption of Europe will be	350,000,000 lbs.
	16 $\frac{1}{2}$

If one-seventh be deducted from this
The remainder, or least annual consumption will be

- RECAPITULATION.
1. The wealthy and middling classes of Europe exceed one-tenth of the whole population, are generally consumers of coffee, and consume as much in proportion to numbers, as the wealthy and middling population of our cities.
 2. Only one tenth of the whole are assumed as actual consumers, and are allowed, for each individual, only two-thirds of the quantity consumed in our cities.
 3. One-seventh of the quantity thus allowed to this amount of population at this reduced rate of consumption, is deducted for over estimate; and the remainder, or the least quantity that can be obtained from the most reduced rates of population and consumption, is 3,000,000 millions of pounds.

Whether coffee will rise or fall in price hereafter, must depend entirely upon the wants of the world and its means of supplying them. Upon either of these points certainty is not attainable, and approximation is all that can be rationally expected. The question therefore involves merely a calculation of probabilities, from data, of which, though many be facts, others are merely conjectures. The supply consists of production and stock. The production of some countries is ascertained; that of others nearly so; that of others merely conjectural, though known not to exceed certain quantities. The stock in first hands is generally capable of being ascertained; that in second hands is less so, though it is usually proportionate to the former; that in the hands of retailers, merely conjectural. The time necessary to produce coffee, or to renew deficient stocks from the produce of new plantations, is known exactly. The consumption of the world cannot be ascertained, but can be inferred from the amount of importations, sales and stock in first hands, in a period of several successive years. The following estimate of production is higher than any that has been published within the last four or five years.

Java now produces for exportation	40 mill. lbs.
The rest of India and Arabia	30 "
Brazil	80 "
Cuba	50 "
Porto Rico	15 "
St. Domingo	40 "
British West Indies	20 "
French do.	15 "
Dutch do.	10 "
Spanish Main	10 "

Total production of 1833 300 mill. lbs.
The stock in first hands, Jan. 1, 1833, in Europe, importing Asia, and the U. States, according to the most authentic accounts yet published, did not exceed 120 mill. lbs.

The stock in all second and third hands did not probably exceed 5-6 of this amount, or 100 " 220 "

Therefore the actual supplies for 1833 do not exceed 520 "
The annual consumption of Europe and importing Asia is not, probably, less than 300 mill. lbs.
And that of the U. States not less than 80 " 380 "
Leaving the stock, on the 1st of January, 1834, in first hands 76 4-11 mills. in all second hands 63 7-11 mills. and in all hands 140 "
If production does not increase, the crops of 1834 will be 300 "
And the supplies for 1834 440 "

If present prices continue, the annual increase of consumption in the U. States will not be less than 10 mill. lbs.
And as the annual increase of sales since 1829, as ascertained from the circulars of importers in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Antwerp, Hamburg, Bremen and Trieste, exceeds 6 mill. lbs. the increase of all Europe and the Levant may be estimated at not less than 10 "

And the whole consumption of 1834 400 mill. lbs.

Which will leave the stock in all hands, on the 1st of January, 1835 40 "

If production still be stationary, the crops of 1835 will be 300 "

And the supplies for 1835 340 "
Prices being still stationary, and consumption increasing as before, the consumption of 1835 will be 420 "

And the deficiency for 1835 will be 80 "
But the reader will pronounce this calculation inadmissible, for at these rates, two years will not elapse before the world will not contain a pound of coffee except that growing on the trees, and will require 80,000,000 lbs. more than the supply. But this result depends upon a continuance of these rates—that is, of production and consumption. Will these rates be altered? for nothing else can alter the result. Production is known to be increasing in no countries excepting Brazil, Cuba and British India; and the increase of the first does not amount to 10,000,000 lbs. annually, nor of the second to 5,000,000, nor of the whole to 20,000,000. In St. Domingo, Porto Rico, the British West Indies, Dutch do. the Spanish Main and Java, it is known to have decreased since 1829, and the present rate of decrease is not less than 20,000,000 annually. In no countries except Brazil, has planting been extended since 1829, and in the Spanish Main, Porto Rico, British West Indies, Dutch do. and Java, old estates have been neglected. Should new planting begin in all countries in 1833, the produce of it would not reach the market for sale till 1837, nor in great quantities till 1838. Production will not therefore be augmented during 1834 and 1835, and consequently that rate will not be disturbed.

Will the assumed rate of production continue? This will depend upon a continuance or fall of present prices. Nothing then but an advance of present prices will check the present rates of consumption, and preserve the balance between demand and supply, till production can be augmented from new plantations. The present prices in Europe, exclusive of duties, are 100 per cent. higher than those of 1830; yet consumption since then, calculated from sales, has increased 10,000,000 lbs. annually. The price of 1819, in Europe and the United States, were from 100 to 125 per cent. above the present; and coffee then cost to the consumer, 25 cents per lb. in Boston, 36 cents in Hamburg, and in London 48 cents for British plantation, and 65 cents for St. Domingo. The reader is left to his own conclusions.

From the Baltimore American.

Coffee.—This article can no longer be classed among the luxuries of the country; it enters so largely into the daily consumption of almost every family, rich and poor, that its appropriate place is now a prominent one among the necessities of life in the United States. Within a few years, especially, the consumption of coffee has increased rapidly, and it has at length attained a point which renders it a matter of some interest, both to the importer and dealer, to ascertain the aggregate quantity required annually for the wants of the country. A statement in a late number of the Boston Courier, prepared for the purpose of ascertaining this fact, sets down the annual consumption of the United States at 91 millions of pounds. A friend who has examined the Courier's statement, pronounces the estimated consumption to be greatly exaggerated, and in order to show as nearly as practicable the true quantity, and thus to counteract any overwrought or unreasonable expectations which the Boston estimate may lead to, has furnished us with the following statement of the actual imports and exports of coffee, and the estimated consumption, for the last twelve years up to the first of October last. The items of import and export for each year are correctly copied from the official returns to the treasury department.

Years.	Import.	Export.	Consumption.
1821	lbs. 21,273,659	lbs. 9,387,596	lbs. 11,886,063
1822	25,782,390	7,267,119	18,515,271
1823	37,337,732	20,900,687	16,437,045
1824	31,224,296	19,427,227	11,797,069
1825	45,191,630	24,512,568	20,678,062
1826	37,319,497	21,584,713	25,734,784
1827	50,051,986	21,687,789	28,354,197
1828	55,130,697	16,037,064	39,156,733
1829	51,130,538	18,083,843	33,046,695
1830	51,488,248	13,124,561	38,363,687
1831	81,757,386	6,056,629	75,700,757
1832	91,722,329	55,251,158	36,471,171

From which the following facts are gathered:

The nett importation or consumption for the first six years, was	lbs. 104,948,294
Do. do. for the last six years	lbs. 351,096,240
Increase 25 millions per annum	lbs. 150,147,946
Aggregate nett importation for 1827, 8 & 9	100,560,625
Do. do. 1830, 31 & 32	150,535,615
Increase—nearly 17 millions each year	49,974,990
The aggregate nett importation for 1829 & 30	71,413,382
Do. do. 1831 & 32	112,171,928
Increase 20 millions for each year	40,758,546
Aggregate consumptions for four last years about 180 millions, average 45 millions
Do. do. two last years about 110 million, average 55 millions.

And the following division of the consumption of each year, corresponds with either view, viz:

1829, consumption 30 millions,
1830, do. 40 do.	} 180 millions.
1831, do. 50 do.
1832, do. 60 do.

At the same rate of increase, the consumption of the present year will be 70 million pounds.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.

May not a part of the seemingly increased consumption, just above stated, be in an increased stock on hand? We do not think that the annual consumption in the United States much exceeds 50 millions of pounds. Coffee recently paid a duty of 5 cents per lb. but is now free; yet the price of the article has not fallen with the fall or abolition of the duty, and hence the consumption has not been increased on that account.

A NEWLY INVENTED PUMP, OF GREAT POWER.

From the American Daily Advertiser.

Mr. Poulson—It is but little known to us, that we have a great curiosity in this way at our Philadelphia navy yard, the invention of the ingenious commodore Barron.* It is placed into the river, on the wharf-platform, in the rear of the Pennsylvania man-of-war, so as to be ready at any time to demonstrate its power and perfection of operation. It is not bored in the usual manner into a log, but is formed of plank, forming a four sided box. Whilst seeing it giving up its barrel of water at every stroke of the quick and easy lever, I could not forbear to think what numerous sea vessels, of the merchant service, might be saved from foundering and loss, if it were once adopted in our commerce! In the naval service it would of course prove of saving value in all cases of destructive leaks from balls in the hull. Our chamber of commerce, and our marine insurance offices, have much interest in this matter, and ought, we should think, to endeavor to get its general use into our merchant service. It might be the saving of millions, in time, in sea risks, and, above all, the preservation of numerous lives of our mariners!

When we read lately of the "one hundred horse power" applied to the draining of the dry dock at Boston, for the late presidential visit to the "Old Ironsides" there, we could not forbear to think that four such pumps as commodore Barron's, set by crank to a one horse power each, would have effected the same purpose at much less expense. With such pumps, the contractors and engineers on our numerous railways, canals and public works, would facilitate their labors in draining required places—and mines subjected to water inundations, like our silver mines in North Carolina, and of the companies working in Mexico, would be saved the heavy sums they now disburse to keep them dry. Some that have been abandoned in South America, by their accumulation of water, might be again worked to profit. The same idea will enable us to contemplate the means of bringing morasses inland, and many water lands along our rivers, into a practicable means of draining them, and so making them capable of grass production. On the whole, as we have the demonstration of such a pump, so much needed, in so many of our operations, we hope hereafter to hear of its adoption generally throughout our country. With the inventor it is probably but a secondary concern, followed out to its accomplishment, as an amusement to an inventive mind; but with such powers as it possesses to benefit the public, it becomes matter of regret to contemplate it as resting in its present restricted use. I have only to add, that I hope the distinguished gentleman concerned will suffer this commendation from an unknown hand.

UTILITY.

DR. SMITH'S MAGNETIC NEEDLE.

From the National Intelligencer.

Respecting this article, for marine and surveyor's compasses, of which, a manufactory has been established in this city, the evidence which he has exhibited satisfies us that it is a valuable invention. Its advantages are so well described in the following letter, selected from several we have seen on the subject, that every one interested will comprehend them without further explanation:

Washington, 20th May, 1833.

SIR: I have the honor to report, agreeably to your instructions relative to the examination of the improved needles of Dr. Smith, that I have had them for some time past under examination, and have carefully tested their qualities by a variety of experiments, and believe them to be very superior to the common needles now in use.

In the manufacture of the common needles, there has always been great neglect both in providing a suitable material, and adopting a regular form, it being left for the most part to the convenience and fancy of the workmen, and the size and shape of the material, which is, no doubt, one of the many causes of the great discrepancies observed in their action and results.

This is very far from being the case with the needles manufactured by Dr. Smith: he has adopted a form which he has found by long experience to be the most fit, and most tenaciously adheres to it: his material is of the first quality, and carefully worked, great attention being paid to magnetizing it. He also supplies his needles with what he calls feeders, small pieces of soft iron that slide on it, placed near its ends, thereby concentrating all the small magnets, (which exists more or less), near its points, giving more steadiness, and a greater directive power to his needles, and avoiding, in a great degree, the local attraction to which his needles may be subjected.

I ascertained this last to my entire satisfaction, by subjecting the same needle with and without feeders, to an attractive force, in the following manner, viz: One of his needles was suspended on a fine point, placed in the centre of a number of concentric circles, drawn around it half an inch apart on a table; when the needle was approached armed with its feeders, I found that I could approach much nearer to it with an attractive force without disturbing it, than when it was unarmed, or without the feeders; the difference I found was generally about two of the circles, or an inch, when the body approached was a strong magnet, and a much greater force to cause deviation than they would ever be subject to on ship-board; proving conclusively that they were a protection, or security against local attraction, and this security appeared to be in proportion as the feeders were placed near to, or farther from the centre of the needles; the feeders appeared in some cases too small, the proportion between the feeder and needle not being in my opinion as yet well ascertained. The needles are remarkably active, and possess much more directive power than those of the common kind now in use, (with which they were compared), when drawn aside settling again very quickly on the magnetic meridian.

Dr. Smith's manner of restoring deranged needles by concussion with his "electric rod," is simple, and effective by one who is experienced; he seldom, if ever failed himself; but I am not able to impute to myself so much adroitness in applying the proper degree of force required; I am disposed to think, by a little practice, it may be easily acquired; one thing is most certain, it is the manner of restoring a deranged needle, so simple, and in the possession of all, that when once known, few will be willing to leave untried.

I beg leave to add, that I feel indebted to Dr. Smith for the obliging manner in which he has shewn me the whole process of manufacturing his needles, and satisfying my numerous inquiries, and feel confidence in recommending him to your notice, believing, from the trials and tests to which I have subjected his needles, that they are a valuable improvement, and highly deserving your patronage. With great respect, &c.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report of the operations of the mint during the year 1832.

JANUARY 21, 1833—READ AND LAID ON THE TABLE.

Washington, 19th Jan. 1833.

I transmit to congress a report from the director of the mint, exhibiting the operations of that institution during the year 1832.

ANDREW JACKSON.

To the hon. the speaker of the house of representatives of the U. S.

Mint of the U. States, Philadelphia, Jan. 15, 1833.

SIR: I have now the honor to submit a report on the general transactions of the mint during the last year, ending 31st December.

The coinage effected within that period amounts to $3,401,055, comprising $798,435 in gold coins, $2,579,000 in silver, and

*The same gentleman has a model of a ship, to be formed wholly of logs, for war service and steam power, of such massive thickness, (of solid bulk), as to encounter singly any force of a hostile fleet, and to burn them with red hot balls. The idea is, if I understand it, with such protection in our waters, to make our usual expenses in fortifications unnecessary.

$23,620 in copper, and consisting of 9,128,387 pieces of coin, viz:

Half eagles	157,487	pieces making	$787,435
Quarter eagles	4,400	do. do.	11,000
Half dollars	4,797,000	do. do.	2,398,500
Quarter dollars	320,000	do. do.	80,000
Dimes	522,500	do. do.	52,250
Half dimes	965,000	do. do.	48,250
Cents	2,362,000	do. do.	23,620

9,128,387 $3,401,055

Of the amount of gold coined within the last year, about $80,000 were derived from Mexico, South America, and the West Indies; $28,900 from Africa; $678,000 from the gold region of the United States, and about $12,000 from sources not ascertained.

Of the amount of gold of the United States, above mentioned, about $34,000 may be stated to have been received from Virginia; $458,000 from North Carolina; $45,000 from South Carolina; $140,000 from Georgia; and about $1,000 from Tennessee.

The following statement exhibits the quantity of gold received from those districts of the United States which have thus far produced it in quantities sufficient to attract notice, commencing with the year 1824. Up to that period it had been received at the mint only from North Carolina, from which quarter gold was first transmitted for coinage in the year 1804. During the interval, however, from 1804 to 1823, inclusive, the amount had not exceeded 2,500 yearly.

	Virginia.	N. Carolina.	S. Carolina.	Georgia.	Tennessee.	Alabama.	Total.
1824	—	5,000	—	—	—	—	5,000
1825	—	17,000	—	—	—	—	17,000
1826	—	20,000	—	—	—	—	20,000
1827	—	21,000	—	—	—	—	21,000
1828	—	46,000	—	—	—	—	46,000
1829	2,500	134,000	3,500	—	—	—	140,000
1830	24,000	204,000	26,000	212,000	—	—	466,000
1831	26,000	294,000	22,000	176,000	1,000	1,000	520,000
1832	34,000	458,000	45,000	140,000	1,000	—	678,000
	86,500	1,190,000	96,500	523,000	2,000	1,000	1,913,000

It is rendered highly probable, by estimates entitled to great respect, that the quantity of gold of the U. States, delivered at the mint within the last year does not much exceed the one-half of the production from the mines—nearly an equal amount being supposed to have been exported uncoined, or employed in the arts. If this conjecture be nearly correct, the production of gold from the United States, during the year has not been less than a million and a quarter of dollars. This may be regarded as equal to one-sixth part of all the gold produced, within the same period, from the mines of Europe and America, estimated according to the results of recent years, as given by the best authorities.

The prevalence of a fearful epidemic in this and other cities of the United States, was sensibly felt in a diminution of the usual demands on the mint, and its productiveness within the third quarter of the year. In every department of the institution labor was, during the prevalence of the danger, more lightly exacted; and it is stated, with much pleasure, that no individual employed in the establishment, became a subject of the disease.

Operations, I have now the satisfaction to say, have been commenced in the new mint for the proof of the machinery; and all the departments of the institution will be transferred in a few days to that edifice.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL MOORE.

The president of the United States.

PRIZE ESSAY ON A CONGRESS OF NATIONS.

From the Calumet.

It will be seen by the report that seven essays (of the thirty-seven which have been presented for the premium), were selected by a committee appointed by the board and transmitted to the umpires. The following is the decision which was received the 7th of May last:

The subscribers, according to the request of the committee of the American peace society, have carefully read the several essays, which have been transmitted to them by the committee, for the purpose of awarding the prizes authorised by the society for the two essays.

Upon full consideration, they are of opinion that five of the essays possess very high merit; and that their merit is so nearly equal, and yet of so distinct a character, that injustice would be done by awarding the highest prize to any one, to the exclusion of the others. With a view, therefore, to a just distribution of the prizes, and, as the best means of accomplishing the important objects of the society, they respectfully recommend, in lieu of the prizes, as proposed by the society, that the whole sum of six hundred dollars should be equally divided among the authors of these five essays; and that each of them should be published for general distribution.

In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this 29th day of April, 1833.

JOSEPH STORY,
WM. WIRT,
JOHN McLEAN.

As this decision does not meet the views of the society or the donors of the prize, it being too much to print and publish the five essays, and must also disappoint the expectations of the writers, it is judged inexpedient to accept it as the final decision. While the society and the donors of the premium are grateful for the services of the umpires, they are happy to know by communications from two of them, that it will meet their approbation to consider the decision as not made, as it was their united opinion that no other judgment could justly be passed on the essays submitted to their inspection, no one of them having the desirable superiority.

It being determined also to renew the offer of the premium with an increase of the prize, it is judged inexpedient to open the letters of the five selected essays, or to publish the motto.

To those who have favored the society by writing for the cause, respectful acknowledgments are cordially made, and their renewed efforts earnestly solicited. They are requested to look at the conditions of the premium, with particular reference to the wishes of the donors.

L. D. DEWEY.

Recording sec. A. P. society.

June, 1833.

$1,000 PREMIUM.

By the liberality of two friends of the cause of peace, the board of the American peace society are enabled to offer the premium of 1,000 dollars for the best essay on a congress, or court of nations, for the amicable settlement of national differences and the abolition of war. Should two essays be of equal, or nearly equal merit, the premium will be divided in correspondent proportions between them, if both are esteemed worthy of the prize.

The conditions are, that the essay contain from 60 to 150 octavo pages, or about these limits; all the manuscripts to be at the disposal of the society, both the successful and rejected essays. The essays to be transmitted free of expense to the office of the peace society, 129, Nassau street, New York, directed to L. D. Dewey, before June 20th, 1834.

The wish of the society, and of the donors of the premium is, that the essay may, under God, effect, as to the subject of war, a revolution in the public mind—may, if possible, produce in the sentiments men have on this subject, a change radical and entire—may effectually demonstrate that war is needless; that, in fact, it is as practicable as rational, for nations to decide their differences by reason; that resort to the sword is irrationally brutal, and cruel, and wicked, and absurd. As rulers, acting accordingly with public opinion, do now require those whom they rule to settle their differences peaceably; so, the change that is desired being wrought, the people by the resistless power of their united calls—the energetic influence of the popular voice rightly expressed, shall cause that statesmen become true ministers—the nation's servants shall adjust all difficulties of the nation, in the same right and legal way. The essay which shall carry conviction to people and governments, that national differences can be settled without recourse to arms—ought to be, if men are rational beings—and must be, ere the full reign of the Saviour on earth can commence, is the one sought for. It needs then to show how unadapted to adjust national differences is the brutal force of war, that teeming source of human ills—to show, in reference to this adjustment, the perfect fitness of a court of nations, its advantages, its feasibility.

Should not the gentlemen who examined the essays before, find it in their power to act as umpires again, other distinguished gentlemen will be selected.

Cor. sec. A. P. S.

RUSH'S MEMORANDA.

Mr. Richard Rush, formerly our minister at London, and more recently secretary of the treasury of the United States, has just published a volume entitled "Memoranda of a residence at the court of London," from which it is probable that we shall make some liberal extracts.

Our present purpose, however, is to introduce the following notice of an important subject, as we find it neatly prepared in the "Baltimore American."

Speaking of Mr. R.'s narratives of diplomatic conversations, &c. the "American" observes—

"The question of impressment was one, the settlement of which, by treaty or convention, was a subject to which the attention of Mr. Rush was especially directed. As it is one of great importance, and one of the points still in controversy, it may be acceptable to our readers to know the precise terms which Mr. Rush was empowered to offer, and did offer to the British government, and the grounds upon which they were refused. We doubt whether any such offers will ever be made again."

Mr. Rush's first and least favorable proposition for the British side of the question was, that both nations should reciprocally enter into stipulations imposing restraints upon the naturalization of the seamen of the other, and excluding from their service all seamen not naturalized. After reciting the provisions of the act of congress of 1813, Mr. Rush promised that the U. States would further provide "that every British subject desiring to become a citizen, should be bound to appear in person before the proper tribunal, once a year for the term of five years, until his right should be completed," or adopt some other more pragtical and satisfactory mode of ascertaining that his residence had been bona fide and uninterrupted. The United States were further to agree that no British seaman who might be in their territory at the time of the stipulation, should be admitted into public or private ships till after the expiration of the regular term of naturalization. In return, a distinct provision was asked from Great Britain, not to impress out of American vessels. This offer was made by Mr. Rush, April 18th, 1818. The answer of lord Castlereagh, dated June 11th, was short. He said that "on full consideration of the proposal, the cabinet had not found it practicable to forego, under any arrangement, the execution of which was to depend upon the legislative ordinances of another country, the right of Great Britain to look for her subjects on the high seas, into whatever service they might wander." In reply to an inquiry from Mr. Rush, whether any proposals would be submitted on the part of Great Britain, lord Castlereagh answered that he was prepared with none that did not assume as a basis the right of entering our vessels; but he offered to enter into stipulations for a tender exercise of this right, restricting the boarding officers to those of rank not below lieutenants, giving "responsible receipts" for the men taken out, &c.—which were declined upon the general ground that the United States would not admit the right of entry at all for any such purpose.

On the 20th June, 1818, Mr. Rush thereupon made another and final offer—and truly it seems to us that concession could not possibly go further. He proposed that both nations should rigidly exclude from all vessels, public or private, all native born subjects or citizens of the other. The same precautions, as in the former offer, to be taken to prevent imposition; seamen already naturalized to be excluded; and each party to have power to grant licenses to its own seamen to enter the service of the other. By such an agreement all British subjects in the United States, not naturalized at that date, or who should arrive subsequently, were to be peremptorily excluded from the ships of the United States, public or private. In return, the stipulation not to enter American ships was required of Great Britain. This proposition was also rejected, and afterwards reconsidered by the British, and two conditions annexed; one of which was refused by the American negotiators and withdrawn by lord Castlereagh. The other was accepted. It was a stipulation that the treaty should be revocable at short notice by either party.

The negotiation being opened, the British brought forward a counter project. This project accepted all the terms of the American project, as to the exclusions and exceptions of seamen. Other requisitions were made and debated, agreed to or withdrawn, but they are not material, as the whole negotiation went off on two points. The British proposal required that each nation should furnish the other with a list of the names of persons to be excepted out of the exclusion from sea service—specifying the place of birth and the date of naturalization of each, and that none but those whose names were on the list should fall within the exception. The Americans proposed as a substitute, that no person should be entitled to the exemption "unless he produced proof of his having been duly naturalized prior to the exchange of ratifications of the treaty"—which was rejected on the other side. The other point upon which the question went off was, the demand of the British commissioners that the treaty should take effect from its "signature"—which the Americans could not constitutionally consent to, and proposed, from the "exchange of ratifications"—which was also refused. This seems to us so trifling a point to be insisted on, that the inference is natural that the British ministry had no serious intention of making a treaty on the subject at all. On these two points the negotiation, in the language of Mr. Rush, "fell to the ground."

—••••• DIPLOMATIC HISTORY.

Most of our readers, we suppose, are apprised that there is in the press, at the office of the publishers of this paper, a compilation of public documents communicated to or emanating from congress, which, under the title of "American State Papers," embraces the whole documentary history of the United States, from the beginning of the government to the present day. Few, however, would, without particular examination, realize the value and interest of this compilation, which is under the direction of the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives, and is sanctioned by the authority of congress. The papers are divided into classes, the first class being that of foreign relations. Of the papers belonging to this class, many have never before been seen by the public eye, having been communicated originally in confidence, the reasons for which have now ceased. Some of these documents are curious enough. We have just lit upon the subjoined, which recalls to the mind old times and circumstances which are rapidly fading from memory. It is as amusing a sample of diplomacy as one would desire to see on a summer's day. [At the date of this letter, it will be bore in mind, DON ONIS was here as minister from the cortes of Spain, but not recognized, king JOSEPH being at the head of the government of that country.] We dare say our readers will be instructed as well as amused by it, and so we here insert it.

CONFIDENTIAL.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States: I communicate to congress, in confidence, the translation of a letter from Louis de Onis, to the captain general of the province of the Caraccas.

The tendency of misrepresentations and suggestions, which, it may be inferred from this specimen, enter into more important correspondences of the writer, to promote in foreign councils, at a critical period, views adverse to the peace and to the best interests of our country, render the contents of the letter of sufficient moment to be made known to the legislature.

JAMES MADISON.

January 10th, 1811.

Translation of a letter from Luis de Onis to the captain general of the province of the Caraccas, dated Philadelphia, 2d Feb. 1810.

The administration of this government having put the stamp upon the servile meanness and adulation in which they stand in relation to their oracle Bonaparte, the day before yesterday, by their direction, Mr. Eppes, the son in-law of the former president, Jefferson, made a proposition, that a minister should be immediately sent to Joseph Bonaparte, at Madrid: this was supported in the committee in which the house then was by Mr. Cutts, who is the brother-in-law of president Madison. There were various debates: there were howlings in the tribunals: there were sarcasms against the supreme central junta, and many trifling observations from one party and the other, among which mention was made of the arrival of a minister from the supreme junta, and of this government's having wisely refused to receive him; and at length a vote was taken, from which it resulted that, for the present, no minister was to be sent to Joseph.

In the annexed paper you will see all the debates, which, for want of time, I have not been able to have translated: if your excellency should not be informed, by my former despatches, of the mode of thinking of the present administration, this alone will show the little hope there is of obtaining any thing favorable from it, but by energy, by force, and by chastisement.

The facility, I again repeat it, and I will repeat it a thousand times, with which American vessels are admitted into our colonies, preferring them to our own, makes these people believe, that our weakness does not permit us even to talk to them on equal terms, much less to take measures which may injure them. From hence springs the great opinion (la grande opinion) they have, that the intruder, Joseph, will rule in Spain and her colonies; and hence the incitement to their scandalous conduct in promoting, by every means in their power, the machinations of Joseph, to make himself master of our colonies; as if upon that depended their happiness.

The determination of making war on England, and of treating Spain with contempt, supposing that her nullity did not entitle her to any thing else, was taken by the present administration some time since, though it was not in them the determination of reason. To accomplish it, they thought of forming an alliance, offensive and defensive, between France, Russia, Denmark, Sweden and the United States; and some even suppose that it is formed. With this object, they have sent Mr. Adams to the court of Petersburg, in quality of minister plenipotentiary, directing him to examine on his way (haciendole recorrer al paso) the courts of Stockholm and Copenhagen; but, notwithstanding this, if England should display her energy, in however small a degree, and if, on our part, some vessels should be sent to their coast, and some troops should draw near to Louisiana, there is reason to believe that we should see these provinces separated and divided into two or three republics, and consequently they would remain in a state of perfect nullity. We should soon have from the republic of the north, which would be our friend, all the supplies which are now drawn from the others, who would perish, from poverty and quarrels among themselves.

This country is now without a cent, with a deficit of four millions of dollars in her revenue; with not more of an effective army than 6,000 despicable men—of whom 2,500 that they had at New Orleans, are reduced by death to 600; and, although they have passed a law for 100,000, much time and money will be necessary to organize them. Its navy is, for the most part, disarmed, although they propose to arm it, and the whole of it is reduced to eight or nine frigates. The blindness of these people is such, that the secretary of the treasury, Gallatin, speaking with colonel Joseph de Guzales, late governor of Puno, who, from his having come from the Havana, Mexico and other provinces, he believed (not knowing his integrity) to be one of the many emissaries of Napoleon (the cast which abounds most here) offered to him the constitution of Paine, and other papers relative to the liberty which here they dispute about, persuading him to send them to Mexico, and our other colonies, and that he should endeavor to induce them to unite themselves to this republic: that here they were ready, if this succeeded, to move near to them, or even to place in their country the seat of government. These, sir, are the ideas with which this administration is animated. Notwithstanding, at the time they observed this conduct, they sent general Sumter, in the character of minister plenipotentiary, to Rio Janeiro.

God preserve you many years.

Several of the above harbors will not require any more expenditures to complete them beyond what has been appropriated. The engineer estimates for further appropriations to complete those of Buffalo, Erie, Cunningham creek, Ashtabula and Black river. The appropriate committee in congress report for $33,000 to carry on the works at Buffalo. These harbors when finished will have cost probably half a million of dollars. The engineer's report in reference to the above work, says, "the plans adopted for deepening channels at the mouths of rivers which were choked up with sand, have afforded, in their execution, a result far exceeding the expectation of all who were acquainted with their situation prior to the commencement of their improvement." Works of a similar character, it may be observed, have been known in other parts of the world for many ages; but here they have had all the difficulties of an experiment. The artificial harbors of Ramsgate and Yarmouth in England are said to be of a like description with those of Lake Erie. The one at Ramsgate was not completed for forty years from its commencement, and cost $2,600,000—the piers built of stone. The one at Yarmouth has been rebuilt seven or eight times, and the annual cost of keeping it in repair is $9,000.

Herod, the great, built an artificial harbor at Casaria to secure vessels from the strong south west winds of the Mediterranean sea. He first formed a strong mole or break-water, somewhat like the one now building in the Delaware below Philadelphia, by sinking stones of fifty feet long, eighteen feet wide and nine feet deep, and which therefore must have weighed about 600 tons each. On this arose a pier 200 feet wide defended by a wall and towers.

We notice in the engineer's report the improvements making in the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers in removing snags, sawers, &c. In the Ohio the deepening of the channel by means of "wing dams" promises to be a great benefit to the navigation of that river. The superintendent says, "that work which was formerly viewed as an experiment is now reduced to a practical certainty. The bars throughout the whole extent of the Ohio river can be removed in such a manner as to produce a safe and uniform navigation at its lowest stage of water with steam boats drawing four feet of water. The five bars that have been operated on were by far the most difficult and shoalest in the Ohio from the mouth of the Scioto to the Mississippi river, and had but two feet of water at the lowest stage of the river." It is auspicious that these improvements in the lower Ohio are making in conjunction with the completion of the Ohio canal, thus facilitating transportation and travel, which will be indefinitely augmenting; and at the same time perfecting the LONGEST LINE OF INLAND NAVIGATION OF WHICH THE WORLD IS SUSCEPTIBLE.

FRANKLIN.

THE FLORIDA KEYS.

A writer in the Charleston Mercury is presenting the public with some interesting sketches of Florida. We extract the following notices of the cotton, torchwood, manchinele and mangrove trees.

The cotton tree is indigenous, not only to Florida keys, but also to the main as far north as the latitude of Charleston harbor. It resembles in color, (being yellow), the East India nankens; the texture is woolly, and the plant perennial. It grows 10, 12 and 15 feet high. I am not aware that any experiments have been made in the cultivation of this cotton. May it not be the same plant, seed of which has been sent to the states under the name of Peruvian cotton?

The torchwood tree, as its name imports, is used for torches, it burns bright like lightwood; and in combustion emits a pleasant odour resembling frankincense. From its pleasant smell, it is much used for smoking out mosquitoes.

The manchinele, when cut, emits a milky fluid, which, if applied to the human body, is peculiarly irritating, and by some held to be poisonous. I recollect an anecdote which proves that the irritating properties may be communicated to the human body without actual contact, and that it may be driven off by decomposition resulting from heat. A number of men were engaged clearing a road, they had cut down and set fire to several manchinele trees. Three or four men of the party incautiously sat down to leeward of the burning trees; the smoke being conveyed to them by the wind, produced a violent inflammation in all parts of their bodies which were uncovered. The inflammation, however, was most acute about the face and eyes. They were led home like blind men, in a "pretty pickle." They were very soon relieved by a solution of sugar of lead and opium, applied constantly with wet cloths, until the heat and pain subsided. I have never known fatal consequences to follow the application of the manchinele.

Mangrove—I must not forget to mention this tree, and its connection with the collection and formation of soil, to which it is admirably adapted. A beautiful illustration of the formation of earth from the sea, is exhibited on the Florida reef and keys. In fact it may be traced from the incipient formation of various sponges coral, &c. to the establishment of dry land. So soon as the sponge, coral, or even a sand bank approaches within a foot or eighteen inches of the water, the mangrove attaches itself. The seed of the mangrove resembles a long bean 12 or 14 inches in length. As soon as ripe, it falls from the tree into the water, one end being heavier than the other, it floats about perpendicularly, until it reaches some shoal spot, when it fixes itself to the bottom, takes root, and becomes a tree. The roots of this tree in process of time form a complete network, in which all floating materials, sea weed and sand are collected. I have seen mangrove islands, (as they are called), of several acres in extent, which did not contain one single foot of dry land. Nay more—I have seen channel ways of 12 and 14 feet deep, passing through these islands, over which a natural bridge had been formed, by the mangrove roots. In other places, I have known a few mangrove trees, by attaching themselves to a small sand bank, collect large beds of sand around them, upon which the sea deposits its shells and birds of the air their eggs, and the seed of various plants which they may have collected in their migrations. In process of time, when a soil capable of supporting a stronger growth is formed, the mangrove having performed its destined use, dies and is supplanted. There can be no doubt, but that the whole of the Florida keys have been formed in this way. That is to say: by the growth of coral and sponges, the drift of sand by currents, the growth and offices of the mangrove, and depositions of the sea and of birds.

A naturalist, who is well qualified for the task, might reap an abundant harvest at Key West and along the reef. Many plants have been discovered on the keys, peculiar to the West Indies, and not known as indigenous to the United States, which have undoubtedly been brought over by birds from the tropics. These birds must be found by the naturalist who has time and patience to spend the whole year in this section of country, as they probably migrate at particular seasons. Several birds have already been found not hitherto known or described as inhabiting the United States. And why not others? The birds peculiar to the Florida keys may be had in great quantities, and shells and coral by cart loads, provided one is an adept at obtaining them.

SALT MANUFACTORY.

From the Barnstable Journal.

The manufacture of salt by solar evaporation whether regarded as a source of individual wealth, or as a branch of our national industry, is one of no little importance. Necessity compelled the inhabitants of this country to engage in it; and under the fostering care of our government, they have been encouraged to invest a million and a half of dollars in this manufacture. We shall give a history of the establishment of the manufacture in this country; an account of the improvements which have from time to time been made in the manner of constructing salt works; and, of the present condition of the manufacture.

Sixty years ago, there were many small establishments in this county for boiling salt from sea water. That of Messrs. Obed E. Smith and Job Chase, at Harwich, consisted of twelve kettles, of sixteen gallons each, set in mason work, and protected, by a low building, from the weather. At first they raised sea water by a hand pump, afterwards by a wind mill, and conveyed it in spouts to the boilers. This establishment was continued till after the close of the revolutionary war, a period of more than twenty years. In Falmouth and Barnstable there were similar establishments. In fact, the restrictions imposed on our commerce by the British parliament for several years prior to the revolution, by cutting off the supply of foreign salt, compelled almost every man on the seaboard to become a petty manufacturer. The exorbitant price of foreign salt, and the distress occasioned by the revolution, obliged many to continue this petty business, and induced others to adopt other means for making salt for their own consumption. Soon after the close of that war, boiling salt was discontinued, and has not since been resumed in this county.

The salt made by boiling was a very inferior article. It was fine grained, and imperfectly separated from the lime salts of the hither, and other impurities contained in sea water. Of the labor and expense of boiling salt, we may, without entering into an exact calculation, form a very correct estimation. In order to obtain a single bushel of salt, eight barrels, or 252 gallons of sea water had to be evaporated, for the most part, in kettles ill adapted to that purpose, hanging over a fire, or set in mason work unprotected from the weather.

An apparently unimportant observation, one of those small incidents which often pave the way to great discoveries, established the fact that salt could be made in this climate by solar evaporation. Several salt boilers at Harwich remarked that some clam shells on the sea shore contained minute crystals of salt. These they concluded must have been formed by the drying away of the water left in them by the tide. The correctness of this opinion they soon ascertained by filling several and setting them on posts. Mr. Amiel Weeks, of that town, made another experiment, which was more satisfactory. He constructed a shallow box, open at the top, six feet in length by two in width, and divided into three compartments by narrow strips of a board placed crosswise on the inside. This he filled with sea water, and exposed to the sun's rays in fair weather, and at other times kept it covered. With this simple apparatus he manufactured salt sufficient for his own consumption. This experiment was made in the year 1774 or 1775, and was probably the first salt made in New England by solar evaporation.

About the same time that Mr. Weeks made his experiment, an unsuccessful attempt to manufacture salt was made at the Isle of Shoals. A vat about ten feet square, and a foot in depth, was scooped out in the ground, and made tight with a layer of clay. Over this a rude frame was placed, to support the boards that were laid over it to form a covering on the approach of a storm.

The first attempt to manufacture salt in works constructed on the plan now generally adopted in this country, was made in 1776 or 7, by John Sears of Dennis. He was a poor man and had previously led a sea-faring life. Possessing an inventive genius, he conceived a plan for manufacturing salt by a less tedious and less expensive process than the boiling down of sea water. Wanting the means to test the practicability of the plan, he associated himself with Edward Sears, Christopher and Edward Crowell. The latter had seen the works at the Isle of Shoals, to which reference has been made; but it does not appear that John Sears had any knowledge that salt had ever been made in works similar to the ones he proposed building.

The situation which they selected for the erection of their manufactory, is on Quivet Neck, in the northerly part of Dennis, (then Yarmouth) at a small distance from the sea shore. The vat, or bottom, as it is generally called, was constructed 100 feet in length and 10 in width and all on the same level. The flooring was white pine plank, laid on oaken sleepers, the latter running crosswise, and the former lengthwise. The gunnells were also of plank, eight inches deep and secured on the flooring by upright pieces mortised into the ends of the sleepers, and by knees passing under the flooring and on the outer sides of the gunnell pieces. The corners of the vat were also secured by knees. The roof was curiously fashioned. Rafters grooved on each side were permanently fastened to the gunnells, at the distance of from five to six feet of each other. The doorgs were made of a corresponding width, and consisted of several boards of the same length with the rafters, clamped together like a common door. These were slid obliquely upwards and downwards, in the grooves of the rafters, when occasion required, and they were prevented from sagging in the centre by slender rafters placed between the principal ones. It was soon found necessary to have a separate vat for crystallizing the salt. A partition was accordingly placed across the original vat, dividing it into two.

For the two first years, water for the supply of his salt work was brought in pails from the sea shore; it was then removed about three-fourths of a mile, to the situation on which one-fourth of it now stands. A little before the close of the revolution, Mr. Sears procured one of the pumps of the British ship of war Somerset, wrecked on the coast of Cape Cod, and erected it for the supply of his manufactory with water, and to avoid the labor of bailing. About 1790 he constructed a mill on the plan of those now in common use.

Like other inventors, Mr. Sears did not escape the shafts of ridicule. For a long time his manufactory was known by the appellation of "John Sears' Folly," and to avoid the sneers of the vulgar, he constructed his mill in secret.

In Brewster, then Harwich, Mr. Scott Clark, and rev. Mr. Dunster, commenced the manufacture a little before the close of the revolution. Their works were built on "Broad Point," in the north part of that town, and were constructed like Sears', except they were divided into three vats. They had no pump for several years—afterwards one constructed like a common hand pump. These works are now in good repair, and owned by Mark Clark. Mr. Nathaniel Freeman, of Brewster, also built salt works about the same time.

In Barnstable, the first salt works were built by Mr. Admo Hinckley and Nathaniel Gorham, in the year 1779. They were constructed on Mr. Sears' plan, about fifty feet in length and ten wide, and divided into two vats. The water for the manufactory was carted from the sea shore, about a fourth of a mile distant from the works.

In other parts of the county, there were works similar to the latter, for the manufacture of salt by solar evaporation, but they were all broken up soon after the close of the revolution.

SALT FORMATION

IN THE VALLEY OF THE OHIO.

The fifth article in the last number of the Journal of Science and Arts is entitled "Observations on the saliferous rock formation in the valley of the Ohio," by Dr. S. P. Hildreth, of Marietta. It conveys much curious and valuable information, parts of which we copy for the benefit of our readers.

"For many years after settlements had been commenced west of the Alleghany mountains, the inhabitants were entirely dependent on their brethren east of the Appalachian ridge for salt; an article so necessary to the existence and comfort of civilized man. It was transported, with immense labor, through narrow defiles, and almost impassable roads across the mountain ranges, on the backs of horses. Long trains of these useful animals might be seen toiling up the steep sides of the mountains, their uncouth pack-saddles laden with kegs of salt, iron ware, and other merchandise, destined for the use of the early settlers. This for a long time was the only mode of transportation. At length rude roads were constructed which could be traversed with wagons, and they caused some reduction in the cost of transportation, but it was not until the completion of the 'National or Cumberland road,' that travelling in carriages could be effected with either ease or safety. From the year 1788 to the year 1800, the price of salt varied from four to eight dollars per bushel; and it was supposed by the inhabitants, that its cost would always prove a serious drawback on the prosperity of the country. The upward navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers was long and tedious, requiring from four to six months to accomplish the voyage from New Orleans, and the outlet being owned by a foreign nation, forbade the expectation of relief from that quarter. Iron, so indispensable in agricultural pursuits, was another heavy item of expense, and was, for many years, transported in the same tedious way, until iron ore was discovered in the Laurel mountains and furnaces were erected. From that period, they have been gradually extending down the river, until no portion of the United States is more cheaply or more abundantly supplied with iron than the valley of the Ohio. Salt, so valuable and so scarce in these early days, as to be looked upon almost as a luxury, has now become so abundant as to sell for half a cent per pound. The all-wise and beneficent Creator, who formed this earth for the habitation of man, has stored it with all things necessary for his comfort and happiness. In every region remote from the ocean, he has deposited in the bowels of the earth, vast magazines of salt. The interior of Africa, Asia and America, contains, in the form of rock or native salt, or of springs, fountains or lakes, or of efflorescences, a sufficient supply for the wants of all the inhabitants. The valley of the Ohio, from its head water to Shawneetown, in Illinois, may be said to be based on a saliferous rock, affording an abundance of water, highly charged with muriate of soda, and affording it in abundance, wherever perforations have been made, of a sufficient depth to reach the precious deposit. There are many evidences of its extending, along the course of the Alleghany range, for more than one hundred miles in breadth, and for several hundred in length. The salt rock commences near its western and northern base, in the coal and sandstone region, and extends as far north and west as some two interesting formations are found. In Ohio, sandstone and coal are abundant, from the mouth of Big Beaver to some miles below the mouth of the Scioto, and they cover a tract of country, between these two points, from forty to eighty miles in width on the northern bank of the Ohio. If the salt deposit extends as far north as Lake Erie, it is probably very thin, or else it descends deep into the earth; as few or no indications of salt are found north of these boundaries. A few miles below the mouth of Big Sandy, the Ohio takes a more westerly course and the sandstone is left on its southern shore. At the western and northern termination of the sand rock, the lime rock commences and continues with little interruption to the Mississippi river, and the great northern lakes. Salt water can doubtless be found in all that region, where sandstone prevails, as the two formations are known to accompany each other. The superincumbent strata, composed of sandstone, argillite, marl-slate, &c. as will be more fully shown in another place, varies in thickness from five hundred to twelve hundred feet; and it appears to sink deeper into the earth, on or near the Ohio, as the salt rock is reached at less and less depth, as we ascend the streams discharging their waters into this river. This is especially the fact with the salt wells in the Muskingum and Big Kenhawa rivers. A few miles above the falls, at Zanesville, the salt rock is found short of two hundred and fifty feet, while thirty miles below it is eight hundred and fifty feet to the lower salt stratum. From several circumstances, it would seem to be a fact that the ancient inhabitants of this valley were not unacquainted with the use and the manufacture of salt. In wells at the Sciota Salines, and at the Blue Licks in Kentucky, the beds of furnaces, and large fragments of broken pots, made of coarse earthenware, were repeatedly found, at considerable depths below the present surface; affording strong presumptive evidence, that the quality of the water was known, and that it had been applied to the wants of man in ages long since passed away. Tusks and grinders of the elephant and mastodon, were also found in digging the salt wells at both these places. The attraction of wild beasts to these salines, probably first brought them to the notice of man. At the licks on the Kenhawa, several indications were discovered of their having been in use long before they were known to any white man.

"The first attempt at manufacturing salt in Ohio, was made about the year 1793, at what is now called the 'Old Scioto salt works.' This spot is in Jackson county, on the banks of a small creek, called Salt Creek, a tributary of the river Scioto. The wells were dug near the creek to the depth of twenty or thirty feet, and the salt water rose into the excavations from crevices in the rock below. The present mode of piercing the rocks was not known until many years after. The water thus procured was but weakly impregnated with salt, and required from six to eight hundred gallons to make a bushel of fifty pounds weight. It was also very dark colored, and filled with the bitters, composed chiefly of muriates of lime and magnesia; the manufacturers not giving it time to drain, but transferring it immediately from the kettles to the pack horses of the purchasers, who, transporting it into the various settlements, sold it to the inhabitants for three and four dollars per bushel, as late as the year 1808. This saline was thought to be so important to the country, that when this territory was erected into a state in the year 1803, a tract of six miles square was set apart by congress for the use of the state, embracing this saline. Two other tracts of six hundred and forty acres each, were also reserved for the same purpose, one on Salt Creek in Muskingum county, and one in Delaware county, as too valuable to fall into the hands of individuals, lest they should create a monopoly of the article; these being the only places then known in Ohio where salt could be made. A special act was passed by the legislature, in the year 1804, regulating the management of these salines, and an agent appointed to rent out the small lots to manufacturers, laid out on the borders of the creeks, where salt water was found most abundant. The rent demanded was sixteen cents per year on each gallon of capacity in the kettles, and no one person was allowed to use more than four thousand, nor less than six hundred gallons in each furnace, guarding here also, carefully, against monopoly. The agent was authorised to inspect the salt before it was offered for sale, and to lay off suitable wood lots for the use of the furnace holders, free of expense. The amount manufactured in any one year, never produced a revenue to exceed five hundred dollars. As other and much better saline springs were discovered on the navigable streams, the works at the agencies went gradually to decay; and finally, in the year 1836, the 'salt reservations' were sold and the proceeds placed in the treasury of the state. In the year 1803, a new era commenced in the manufacture of salt. Previously to this time the water had been obtained from wells sunk no deeper than to perforate the superincumbent earth to the rocks below, through some crevice in which it had made its way to the surface. But now, attempts were made to come at the sources of the fountain, by boring, or drilling through the rock formations, to the saline deposit itself. The first trial of this kind was made on the Big Kenhawa, six miles above Charleston, and only to the depth of seventy or eighty feet; on further trials, it was discovered, that the water became stronger as they descended, and the first wells were gradually deepened to three hundred and fifty feet, with the most satisfactory results. Water was obtained of such strength that seventy-five gallons would make a bushel of salt of fifty pounds weight, or as much as four hundred gallons from the old surface wells; producing an immense saving of time and labor to the manufacturer, and a much better article to the consumer. The space, now occupied by the salt wells, extends to the shores of the Kenhawa, and is about seventy miles from the mouth of the river. The upper wells reach the salt rock at two hundred and fifty feet. The lower wells strike it at a number of feet deeper, the rock dipping to the north as it recedes from the mountains, or descends the river."

SHIPMENTS ON THE OHIO.

Law case before the supreme court of Ohio, at Cincinnati, at May term, 1833.

Josiah Lawrence, vs. James and Robert McGregor.

Assumpsit brought against defendants as owners of the steam boats Tecumseh and Amazon, to recover the value of certain goods shipped at Cincinnati for New Orleans and lost at Louisville. Plea non assumpsit. The bill of lading, on which the action was founded, was for goods shipped on the Amazon for New Orleans, but there was a memorandum on the left hand margin of the bill, in these words:—"Shipped in Cincinnati, on board steamer Tecumseh, to be re-shipped at Louisville per steamer Amazon." It was admitted that the defendants owned the boats Tecumseh and Amazon, and that the goods were actually shipped on the Tecumseh, the Amazon then lying at Shippingport, below the falls of Ohio; and also that the latter boat being of the larger class, was, at low water, employed below the falls, and the Tecumseh above, and in taking freight to the boats below.

A great number of witnesses were examined before the jury. From the testimony, it appeared, that until about the year 1819, it was the general custom to transport merchandise, at low water, around the falls on drays. About that time, some carriers began to use flat boats in carrying goods over the falls; and from thence to this time, the use of flat boats for that purpose was continued by some, and was on the increase. Both methods were still used; and it was now somewhat uncertain which mode was most in use. The transportation over the falls in flats was preferred by many, because it kept the goods cleaner, exposed them less to the heat and sun, left them in a better state for the market in the lower country, and was less expensive. That way of passing the falls was more hazardous than by drays, but that, in the opinion of many engaged in the trade, was counterbalanced by the superior condition of the goods. The insurance offices charged 1-8 per cent. increased premium for risks that were intended to pass the falls in flats. Owners frequently obtained permission of the shipper to pass the falls in flats—either given verbally, or by memorandum on the bill of lading; though flats were often used without such leave. It was more convenient to the carrier to pass in flats. It was the custom of the trade to consider the memorandum on the bill of lading, as to shippers in other boats, or flats, as a part of the bill of lading.

It was also proven, that when the Tecumseh arrived at Louisville with the cargo in question, the state of the river was such as to raise a doubt about taking her safely over the falls and back again. The pilot declined taking her over, though some witnesses testified that at that time, and for several days afterwards, there was sufficient water for her to pass. The goods were moved from the Tecumseh and laden in flats, but, owing to the state of the wind, the pilot refused to take flats over the falls. They were then moored for the night and properly guarded. Early the next morning, the steamboat Lady Franklin run foul of the flats, sunk them, and although every exertion was made to save the goods, they were lost. The net loss to the plaintiffs was admitted to be $994.

In the progress of the case, the plaintiff called a witness to prove the agreement of the parties to this bill of lading, that the goods should be carried over the falls in the Tecumseh. Storer, for the defendants, objected to this evidence, and the objection was argued by Storer, and by N. Wright and C. Hammond, contra. The court held it incompetent to vary the terms of a written contract by parol evidence, and rejected the testimony. The testimony, the court said, was not offered to establish a general usage, but to vary this particular bill of lading.

The cause was argued to the jury, by N. Wright and C. Hammond for plaintiffs, and by Storer & Fox for the defendants.

Judge Wright, in giving the cause to the jury, stated: That the bill of lading, which was the contract between the parties, was prima facie the true contract, and to be continued according to its terms and legal effect, though if there were any general or common usage of the trade, affecting the manner of executing such contracts, that usage would be regarded as a part of the contract, and within the contemplation of the parties. A compliance with such contract in accordance with such general usage, would in law satisfy its stipulations. But a usage to affect such a contract, must be common, and of general notoriety, not fluctuating, or dependant upon whim, caprice, or any such circumstance. Where the bill of lading is in the usual form, and a carrier would reserve to himself the privilege of deviating from the usual course of the trade, he should stipulate for the privilege and vary the contract accordingly. The bill of lading is to be taken altogether, including the memorandum—in this case the contract includes the memorandums as to the employment of the Tecumseh to take the goods from Cincinnati to the Amazon. Its legal effect obliges the carrier to take the freight from Cincinnati, in the Tecumseh, to the Amazon, below the falls; but as the usage of the river when the water is too low for the small boats safely to pass over the falls, admits the transportation from Louisville to Shippingport by other means; that usage the law regards as incorporated into the contract, and within its stipulations.

A carrier is in general liable for all injury to freight entrusted to him, which does not result from the act of God, (inevitable accident) or the enemies of the state. He undertakes for the safe keeping of the goods, the safe conduct of the vessel, and the consequent employment of the proper means, navigators, lights, watch, &c. for her preservation. He is bound not to expose the freight to any extraordinary hazard or peril. And although while in the customary course of the trade, the carrier is excused from making good losses resulting from inevitable accident or the public enemies of the state; yet if he deviate from that course and expose the freight, and loss accrue, even from these causes, before he has returned to the course of the trade, it falls upon the owner. Such excuse from responsibility is only available while the carrier is in the prosecution of his voyage in the usual route. You will then inquire, what was the state of the water when the Tecumseh arrived at Louisville, and if satisfied there was sufficient for her safe passage over the falls, it was the duty of the defendants under their contract to carry the plaintiffs' goods over in that boat. And if with sufficient water for the Tecumseh to pass the falls, the defendants chose to employ flats or any other means of transporting the freight for their own convenience or profit, and the goods were lost by such transit, by inevitable accident or public enemies, the loss would be that of the carrier, because of the deviation from the contract and the exposure of the freight to increased peril. If you find this to be the case on the evidence, it will not be necessary to inquire further, for the plaintiffs' right to recover would be complete.

If you shall find the stage of water to be such, that when the Tecumseh arrived at Louisville, it was unsafe for her to pass the falls, then it was lawful for the carriers to overcome that obstruction to the navigation in the manner adopted in the common course of the trade. If that common course is to light the boat over the falls by unlading a part of the cargo into lighters, or to unlade the whole cargo and transport it around the falls on drays, or carry over in flats, the carrier must adopt the usual course at his peril. But if two ways are in common use of overcoming the obstacle, one known to be more hazardous than the other; the carrier adopts the most hazardous method at his own risk, and if loss intervene, it is his loss. This results from the nature of the employment—he has the entire control of the goods and those employed in navigating the vessel, and although for some purposes the carrier is agent for others than the owners, he is not permitted for his own convenience to subject freight entrusted to him to any but the common and known perils but at his own responsibility.

It is not disputed but there are two ways of transporting goods past the falls of Ohio in low water in use, one by drays, and the other by flat-boats. It is urged that the whole current of the testimony, the price of insurance and the nature of the transportation itself, conclusively show the use of flat-boats the most hazardous course, and therefore not presumed to have been contemplated by the parties, and at the risk of the carrier. It is for you to judge from all the circumstances in proof, and if you find the use of drays the least perilous, the defendants are responsible for the consequence of adopting the other course; and the circumstance of the increased hazard of the transport by flats being counterbalanced in the estimation of some, by the more cleanly appearance of the goods or their less exposure to the heat of the sun, does not affect the question, although it may afford good reason for those having the power of choice to incur the increased hazard in the expectation of realizing the advantage. The right of the shipper, and the liability of the carrier remain untouched. If on the other hand you find the known general course of the trade to be to employ flats at low water to transport goods over the falls, then and then only, would the carrier acquire the right under the contract, in case the water was too low to go over with the Teumessah, to land the merchandise in that kind of craft, and only in such case can you be called to inquire whether the flat-boats were properly moored and safely manned and guarded. If the goods were so laden without the contract, and while they remained without, a loss even if occasioned by inevitable accident, would fall upon the carrier. If so laden within the contract, as being according to the known custom of the trade, or the least perilous course, then if proper care was bestowed for the protection of them, and loss resulted from inevitable accident, it is to be borne by the shipper. In either case if the loss resulted from negligence or the wanton act of the navigators of the Lady Franklin, the defendants are responsible to the plaintiffs and they have their remedy over, against those concerned in the Lady Franklin.

Verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment.

BOLTON vs. CALDER & WILSON.

This was an action of trespass on the case, against the defendants as the proprietors of the Reading and Harrisburg stage coach, tried before Justice Rogers, at a circuit court for Dauphin county, Pennsylvania, the 16th April, 1833.

When his honor summed up the evidence in pointed terms in favor of the plaintiff, the jury found for the plaintiff $1,200 damages. On appeal to the supreme court in Bank, the cause was argued for the plaintiff by Fisher and Krause, and for the defendants by Wiedman and Norris.

Chief Justice Gibson delivered the opinion of the court—

Among the reasons assigned for a new trial, there is but one which deserves to be noticed; and there is so little even in it, that were it not necessary to correct an apparent misapprehension on the subject of it, and in a matter of very general concern, it would not be made a subject of remark. The movement of carriages passing on our turnpike roads in opposite directions is regulated by special enactment; but there is no positive law to regulate the passing of those who are travelling in the same direction. The defendants gave evidence of its being a custom in the latter case, for the leading carriage to incline to the right, the other making the transit at the same time by the left; whence it is attempted to be shown that the injury suffered by the plaintiff, had been occasioned by his own neglect of this custom which was said to have acquired the consistence of a law, but which was very properly exploded by the court. Nothing should be more pertinaciously resisted than these attempts to transfer the functions of the judge from the bench to the witnesses' stand, by evidence of customs in derogation of the general law, that would involve the responsibilities of the parties in rules, whose existence, perhaps, they had no reason to suspect before they came to be applied to their rights. If the existence of a law be so obscure as to be known to the constitutional expositors of it, only through the evidence of witnesses, it is no extravagant assumption to take for granted that the party to be affected was ignorant of it at the time when the knowledge of it would have been most material to him; and to try a man's actions by a rule which he had not an opportunity to become acquainted before hand, is the very worst species of tyranny. The probability of actual ignorance in respect to this particular custom, is greater than in respect to almost any other that can be imagined, as the traveller might reasonably suppose the whole law of the road to be comprised in the statutory admonition that meets the eye at every gate and bridge. The use of parol proof has been, to say the least, sufficiently extended by suffering it to control the private written laws which individuals establish between themselves for the regulation of their rights in particular transactions, without suffering it to control the general law of the land. The judge, therefore, did a valuable service to the stability of the law by freeing the cause from a matter so entirely foreign to it. It remains therefore to be seen whether the rule laid down by him, is founded in the principle of justice and reason. It was not pretended that the mail coaches are entitled to precedence, or the enjoyment of any particular privileges. They are indeed protected by an act of congress from being wilfully and wantonly obstructed or delayed; but in every other respect they are on a footing with all other carriages; and it is right perhaps that they should be so. Experience proves that the drivers of them are not the most eligible depositories of power; and there are few who have not to do with them either as passengers or travellers. The public consequently has an important interest in having them in common with the drivers of other carriages, held strictly to the measure of their rights; and this can be done only by making their employers sureties for their good conduct, as far as the law permits, and liable for their acts. They are seldom of sufficient estate to respond in damages to any considerable extent; and to treat them as exclusively liable, would in most instances be a denial of redress. With these considerations in view, the judge stated the law to be that a traveller may use the middle or either side of the road at his pleasure, and without being bound to turn aside for another travelling in the same direction, provided there be convenient room to pass on the one hand or on the other. And why should it be otherwise? The law to regulate the deflection of those who are travelling in opposite directions was designed for the specific case mentioned in it, the object being to avoid, by a preconcerted movement, the collision which might otherwise ensue from the mutual misapprehension of intention frequently observable between foot passengers. But this uncertainty is productive of no collision between carriages travelling in the same direction, and the principle of the enactment is therefore not to be extended to it. It is certainly but reasonable that the traveller to be accommodated should be at the pains to give his carriage the proper direction to enable him to profit by his superior speed, and if there be convenient room to pass on any particular part of the road, he ought not to complain. If there be not, it is doubtless the duty of the other to afford it, on request made, by yielding him an equal share of the road, if that be adequate and practicable; if not the object must be deferred till the parties arrive at ground more favorable to its accomplishment. Should the leading traveller refuse to comply, he would be answerable for it. But to effect the passage by a forcible collision with him is not to be justified, redress being demandable only by due course of law. Conformably to this, it was impossible to doubt that the injury entitled the plaintiff to his action, and as it clearly appeared to have been the effect of negligence, the verdict was properly rendered for such damages as will probably induce the proprietors of mail coaches to take care that their drivers be more attentive to the rights of others, for the future.

Judgment affirmed.

SLAVES, AND SLAVERY IN VIRGINIA.

From the (Richmond) Farmer's Register.

The editor considers the question of slave-labor and slavery as coming fairly within his province, and accordingly we have in this number large extracts from two articles on the subject, (both written in Virginia) which first appeared in the American Quarterly Review. From one of these we quote the following paragraphs, which, so far as they relate to the public lands, express the views of a rapidly increasing proportion of the people of Virginia.

We believe that means may be found to colonize the annual surplus of the slaves of Virginia, and to purchase such a portion of that surplus as it may be necessary to purchase.

The annual increase of slaves in Virginia (leaving out of view the 6,000 supposed to be taken off to the southern markets) is less than 5,000. If this number of slaves be valued at the average of $200 per head, the sum necessary to purchase them will be about a million of dollars. To defray the expense of their deportation to Africa and subsistence there for some months will, on the satisfactory calculation of Mr. Mathew Carey, to which we must refer, at $25 per head for adults and children, require $125,000—add to which the cost of deportation of 1,200 free blacks, (their annual increase), $30,000, and we have the sum of $155,000. That the state of Virginia has no possible means of purchasing 5,000 slaves per annum is obvious. But were the entire cost, that of transportation only, $150,000, we should insist that the legislature take it into serious consideration how far that expense exceeds its means. In any event, our adversaries will allow us to set down the item of transportation to the charge of the state; if this be all, it is to offer no insurmountable embarrassment. Perhaps it may be thought best to deport the free negroes first, and then the whole expense is that of transportation. Where, however, shall we find that greater fund which will presently be needed for the purchase of the surplus of the slaves, and before long for the purchase of a part of the capital number? There is not far off a fund to which we believe our eyes may be turned. We have come to the conclusion that such a fund is the proceeds of the public lands in the treasury of the general government; and we do now invite the friends of the removal and colonization of the negroes to fix hereafter their thoughts, and to press their pretensions on this fund. The annual income to government from the public lands is now estimated at three millions. Let one-third of this amount be demanded for this object, to be under the entire management of the state authorities.

In coincidence with the known opinion of Virginia, we are not willing to demand a simple appropriation of money from congress. But we are inclined to think, that an appropriation from the receipts of the public lands would not be liable to the constitutional objection, which would forbid a grant of money raised by taxes. We have an unfeigned respect for constitutional scruples, but we are not ambitious ourselves of entertaining more scruples than Mr. Madison. Let us hear, then, what that greatest living authority says upon the subject, in his letter to Mr. Gurley, of December last:

"In contemplating the pecuniary resources needed for the removal of such a number to a great distance, my thoughts and hopes have been long turned to the rich fund presented in the western lands of the nation, which will soon entirely cease to be under a pledge for another object. The great one in question is truly of a national character, and it is known that distinguished patriots not dwelling in slave-holding states have viewed the object in that light, and would be willing to let the national domain be a resource in effecting it. Should it be remarked that the states, though all may be interested in relieving our country from the colored population, are not equally so; it is but fair to recollect that the sections most to be benefitted are those whose cessions created the fund to be disposed of. I am aware of the constitutional obstacle which has presented itself; but if the general will should be reconciled to an application of the territorial fund to the removal of the colored population, a grant to congress of the necessary authority could be carried, with little delay, through the forms of the constitution."

Before any one condemns us for looseness of construction of the constitution, we beg further that he will read Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Sparks, (vol. iv. pp. 388-391); we adopt all the qualifications therein mentioned.

Judge Marshall most properly suggests that the objection, in a political view, to the application of this ample fund, is very much lessened, in his estimation, by the fact that our lands are becoming an object for which the states are to scramble, and which threatens to sow the seeds of discord among us, instead of being what they might be—a source of national wealth.

A great part of the proceeds of the public domain once appropriated to this object, there would soon be found no insurmountable difficulty in the removal of the necessary number in Virginia. But it is said that were congress disposed to give a million annually for the specific object of the removal of the slaves, it would feel bound to bestow it proportionally on all the slave-holding states, or if all be not inclined to receive it, then on those which would be. We answer, that if congress should consent to pledge a certain share of the revenue from the lands for the purchase and removal (under the laws of the states) of the slaves of the United States, we have no doubt it would be thought wise to begin with the effectual relief of the greatest sufferer first. A minute's attention to the following statement of gen. Brodnax, will shew the immense claims of Virginia.

"The state of Virginia contains, by the last census, less than one-fiftieth part of the whole white population of the United States; it contains more than one-seventh of the free negroes; and it possesses between a fourth and a fifth of all the slaves in the union.

"Virginia has a greater number of slaves than any other state in the union—and more than Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Tennessee, all put together—and more than four times as many as either of them. Louisiana and South Carolina are the only states in which the slaves are more numerous than the white population; and Virginia has more slaves, without estimating her great and unfortunate proportion of free persons of color, than both these states put together. Nay, one half of the state, that which lies on the east of the Blue Ridge of mountains, itself contains nearly as many."

But if congress should decline to grant from this fund for the specific purpose of the removal of the blacks, and prefer to distribute among the states the portion of money severally assignable to them, let such portion as would fall to Virginia, be earnestly claimed of the legislature for this object. The annual receipt of between two and three hundred thousand dollars, which Mr. Clay's bill (limited to five years duration), would assign her, would not be adequate for compensating masters on the foregoing plan, but it might suffice for doing an immense deal of good on the plan in Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Sparks, the purchase of the children at a small but just price, the children to be disposed of either according to the particulars of that plan, or under any other plan which might be speedier, and less burdensome to the persons to be charged with rearing them.

We believe that before half a million of blacks were conveyed to Africa, there would not remain a master obstinately resolved to retain his slaves, except in the most southern and south western states, where slave labor is next to essential (we hope not absolutely), for the cultivation of the good lands.

We exhort the people of Virginia, then, first to seek aid from their own legislature to the extent it can be afforded; second, to insist on the passage of permanent laws going as far in the subject as public opinion will justify; and third, to assert their claims to a share in the proceeds of the public lands. Let it not, by her fastidiousness, be made true, that she ceded an empire to the general government, under a virtual condition that she alone was to derive no benefit from it.

Suppose then, means be thus found to defray the expense of emancipating and transporting them to some other country, the next question is, where a suitable asylum may be found to which to convey them? We answer, that Africa affords the most eligible situation for such an asylum, and that we hope Virginia would avail herself of the noble beginning which has been made by the American colonization society at Liberia.

JUDGE CLAYTON AND THE UNITED STATES BANK.
From the Georgia Journal.

Athens, July 15, 1855.

MESSRS. EDITORS—A report is prevailing, and to which wide circulation has been given by the newspapers that I have changed my opinion on the bank question. Lest silence on my part might seem to give it even the semblance of truth, I am constrained reluctantly to appear in your paper to contradict such an unjust and unfounded suggestion. Such report, as I understand, has gone forth by reason of a letter addressed to some individual in Philadelphia through the agency of one of the directors of the branch of the United States' bank at Washington city, by giving information of a transaction in that bank relative to myself, which it shall be the purpose of this communication to explain, and will, I have no doubt, be perfectly satisfactory to every human being, of the least liberality, who shall do me the justice to read it. When I left home in November last, to take my seat in congress, I carried with me a large sum of money, in Georgia currency, to fulfil a contract for machinery in the city of New York. I applied at the above bank to exchange it for United States bills, but upon being informed that a premium of 7 per cent. would be demanded, I declined it, and determined to send it back to Augusta, for the purpose of purchasing a bill of exchange, where, as I was informed, one could be obtained for one and a half per cent.—Accordingly, by a safe private conveyance, I forwarded it to an individual, with an earnest request to effect the purchase and return the draft without delay, as by my contract I was to be entitled to a deduction of three per cent. for prompt payment. This took place on the 13th of January, and on the 28th of the same month, I received a letter from the bearer of the funds informing me of their delivery, and enclosing the receipt of the person to whom they had been remitted. From this last individual I could learn nothing, though repeatedly addressed. Thus strongly threatened with a heavy loss, and still more harassed by the consequences it was likely to involve, I, of course, awaited the event with unusual anxiety, and, as might well be imagined, with no little interruption to my public duties. I was held in this suspense during the whole session of congress, and, finally, was informed by a friend, to whom I had written on the subject, that my agent had used the money and had failed.

This information I received on the 5th March, the day after congress adjourned, and two days after I had voted, in a minority of 41, that I believed the bank of the United States an unsafe depository of the public money. It is impossible, if it were necessary to describe the state of my feelings at the moment. A large sum of money faithlessly embezzled—an urgent contract claiming performance—without the means of satisfying the demand—from home, and consequently away from all my resources—in a land of strangers, and compelled by circumstances to remain at Washington, it may readily be conceived what was my situation, and that situation may be safely submitted to the reflection of a liberal community. I had sufficient proof, at the time, what generous minds will do under such an unlooked for difficulty. As soon as I read the letter announcing my misfortune, I handed it over to some one of the gentlemen with whom I boarded, and mentioned the distressing perplexity it occasioned in the failure of my engagement, a matter of much more concern to me than the loss itself. In an instant, and unsolicited, general Robinson, a senator from Indiana, stepped aside to a table, and knowing the amount I wanted, (being considerably less than I had lost), drew a note for it, endorsed it himself, and was immediately and voluntarily succeeded in that kind and magnanimous act by Judge Mangum and general Hawkins, of North Carolina, Judge Bouldin, of Virginia, colonel King, of Alabama and captain McIntire, of Maine, who returned and presented it to me, remarking that they hoped it would relieve my present embarrassment. In the glow of feeling which such a generous act inspired, and certainly in violent contrast with those under which but a few moments before I had suffered, I accepted their kind offer, though it was to borrow money from a bank against which, politically, I was and am still opposed, not however without expressing my apprehension that their friendly interference would be unavailing, or that an improper construction would be placed upon the transaction. To obviate which colonel King, with that readiness demanding my most unqualified acknowledgments, repaired with the note to the bank, explained fully all the circumstances under which the loan was asked, and was wholly instrumental in procuring the accommodation. The bank asked, and I have no doubt expected nothing else but an ample security for their money. And though the above endorsers are worth two hundred thousand dollars, yet to observe strictly the rules of the bank, its officers required of me a town endorser, or what was tantamount to it. This was complied with. But a day or two after, general Van Ness, the president of one of the city banks, hearing of my loss and the great inconvenience to which it subjected me, very generously offered me the same accommodation. Thus then a loan sought in consequence of an urgent and unforeseen necessity, created by an unexpected act of perfidy—acquired in the most open manner—upon the best security—from an institution whose business it is to lend money for gain—professing to be impartial in its favors, and made in strict compliance with its rules, has been tortured into a peace offering, designed and so received by me, to quiet my opposition to its re-establishment! Language fails me to express, in a sense of becoming self-respect, the scorn which is due to such heartless illiberality. I will, however, do the officers of the bank the justice to say, I do not believe they intended their agency in this matter, to have any such effect, and therefore cannot be so illiberal as to expect it, whatever may be the views of a single director, in the unkind and not less false suggestion to which his gratuitous information has given rise.

I have taken the liberty to mention the names of my endorsers, with no motive of an ostentatious display of the high character with which my credit has been supported, but to avail myself of their distinguished reputation to sustain the facts of my statement, so far as connected with the bank transaction; and to a public not always too credulous or indulgent towards a narrative intended to refute a slander, I have thought it not amiss to tender a list of the witnesses. A. S. CLAYTON.

P. S. It is reasonably expected that this communication will find a place in all those papers where it has been deemed a matter of such public interest to convict me of inconsistency.

COLONEL DRAYTON'S SPEECH.

WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

At the celebration of the fourth of July, in the city of Charleston, by the Washington society: one of the vice presidents gave the following toast:

The hon. Wm. Drayton—The patriot "without fear and without reproach,"—estimable in private, illustrious in public life—all the ends he attains at, are his country's.

When the enthusiastic plaudits with which this toast was received had subsided, col. Drayton rose and spoke as follows: FELLOW CITIZENS—Although you have been induced, by personal kindness, to speak of me in a manner which I am very far from meriting, I yet receive your flattering complacency with the most grateful feelings, not because it is flattering, but because it manifests your approbation of my conduct, and your opinions, that the exertions which I have made in the cause of our country, and for the preservation of your rights, however inefficient they have been, have been all that my humble abilities enabled me to render, and that they have been directed by purity of intention. But, fellow citizens, any thing relating to myself, is unconnected with the object of this meeting. We have met for the purpose of celebrating the anniversary of the Declaration of our Independence; of giving utterance to the deep and heart felt emotions which are associated with the recollection, that by the toils, and the sufferings, and the valor, and the blood of our ancestors, we were raised from colonial vassalage to sovereign power. Whilst thus rejoicing, we ought, also, to remember, with emotions scarcely less intense and reverential, that our ancestors, after experiencing the evils of an embarrassing and feeble confederacy, framed that constitution which was ratified by the people of the United States, to secure the blessings of independence, liberty and union, to themselves and their posterity. Greater blessings than independence, liberty and union, were never bestowed by man upon man; and yet have we witnessed a period, when some of the posterity of our glorious ancestors would have hazarded the possession of these inestimable treasures, to promote the triumph of a pernicious sophistry, first promulgated in the "exposition and protest," which was published by the order of the legislature in December, 1828. These observations are not made by me, as prefatory to an elaborate investigation of the odious doctrine of nullification—a doctrine so paradoxical, as to involve in its mere statement the palpable contradiction that a single state, under no other restraint than her own discretion, can, within her limits, annul the laws of a government, which the people of all the states have solemnly bound themselves to obey, as "the supreme laws of the land?"—that a state can exempt herself from the burthens, and participate in the benefits of the union—can be a member of the body politic, and absolve herself from the obligation which it imposes—that these gross incongruities might be sustained, what have we not endured? Whilst the accomplishment of nullification was in progress, the practical effect of which, it was alleged, would be a peaceful and constitutional remedy for our grievances, can we ever forget that clubs were organized in every city and hamlet, by whose irresponsible will, the constitution and the laws were controlled—that thousands of volunteers were raised, holding themselves ready, at a minute's warning, to march and to fight, as if a foreign enemy were hovering upon our coast—that large sums of money were expended by the legislature for the purchase of arms and ammunition, to reimburse which, we must be heavily taxed—that our youth were allured from their appropriate avocations, and the softer sex from their characteristic pursuits, to mingle in the strife of political contention—that ancient friendships were dissolved, the ties of blood rent asunder, and the domestic circles, where affection, and harmony, and confidence should reign, embittered by party rancor—that a portion of our citizens were proscribed and disfranchised, because they would not take an unrighteous and unconstitutional oath—that our whole state was convulsed to its centre—and that even the horrors of civil war were anticipated by those who deprecated it as the direst calamity with which an offending people could be visited by an avenging deity?

These, fellow citizens, were some of the bitter fruits of nullification. What are the benefits which it has conferred upon us? We were told, that it was resorted to in order that we might be relieved from the intolerable oppressions of an unconstitutional protective tariff; and yet the convention which annulled all the protective tariff acts, by their ordinance in November, 1832, formally repealed that ordinance in March, 1833, although a tariff act was then in existence, which enacted, that protective duties should be levied until June, 1842, which, therefore, perpetuated the protective system as the settled policy of the country, so far as it could be perpetuated by legislation, in the event of a uniform duty of 20 per cent, producing a revenue beyond the expenditure of the government, which substituted cash in lieu of credit duties upon all imports, and which introduced the innovation of the home valuation of imports, thus increasing, by 40 per cent, the amount upon which the duties are to be assessed after the year 1842; and although that convention, in the "address to the people of South Carolina," resolved that until these abuses, (the protective tariff acts), "shall be reformed, no more taxes should be paid here," and in the "address to the people of the United States," declared, "if we submit to this system of unconstitutional oppression, we shall voluntarily sink into slavery, and transmit that ignominious inheritance to our children. We will not, we cannot, we dare not submit to this degradation, and our resolve is fixed and unalterable, that a protecting tariff shall no longer be enforced within the limits of South Carolina. We stand upon the principles of everlasting justice, and no human power shall drive us from our position." That position, nevertheless, has been abandoned—the ordinance of nullification, founded upon "the principles of everlasting justice," has been repealed by the convention which ordained it—and "a protective tariff" is now "enforced within the limits of South Carolina." I shall make no further comments upon the conduct and the acts of the convention of South Carolina. No powers of eloquence could more vividly exhibit their character, than a bare reference to what they have done, and what they have undone. I take no pleasure in dwelling upon so humiliating a topic, and shall quit it, with simply expressing my fervent hope, that our sad experience of the evils of nullification, and the rejection of its dogmas by every legislature in the union which has considered them, may operate as a solemn and salutary warning to deter others from imitating the example of those, who, had they not been "driven from their position," would have plunged their state into all the miseries of anarchy, and bloodshed, and civil war, and, ultimately, have subjected themselves to the degradation of submission to the government which they had resisted, or of dependence upon a foreign power.

If the convention which assembled at Columbia, in March last, had limited their acts to the repeal of their ordinance of nullification, the wounds which have been inflicted upon our distracted state, might have been healed by the lenient hand of time; the wrongs and injuries which a minority have suffered, might have been forgotten, or forgiven, and gradually, that harmony might have re-appeared which formerly prevailed among us. But, unfortunately, with that convention originated another ordinance, declaring, "that the allegiance of the citizen of this state, is due to the said state, and that obedience only, and not allegiance, is due by them to any other power or authority; and empowering the general assembly of the said state, from time to time, when they may deem it proper, to provide for the administration, to the citizens and officers of the state, or such of the officers as they may think fit, of suitable oaths or affirmations, binding them to the observance of such allegiance, and abjuring all other allegiance; and also to define what shall amount to a violation of their allegiance, and to provide the proper punishment for such violation." With such an ordinance as this, to be enforced in the discretion of the legislature, to talk of our rights and liberties is an insult to common sense.

I am aware of the argument which is relied upon by our political opponents, that test oaths are required in several of the states, and that a state may, unquestionably, insist that the citizens, in the form of an oath, shall manifest their obedience to her constitution and her laws. These positions I do not controvert. I except not to a test oath, in the abstract, but to the purposes to which it has been applied. The federal constitution was as directly ratified by the people of this state, as was the constitution of the state. The allegiance of a citizen of the United States to the United States, is as substantive and obligatory, as is that of a citizen of the state to the state. Within the sphere of federal allegiance, the United States are supreme; within the sphere of state allegiance, the state is supreme. Federal and state allegiance are perfectly consistent instead of interfering with, they mutually strengthen each other. Notwithstanding the distinction which is drawn in the ordinance of the convention, between allegiance and obedience, (suggested, I presume, by the same spirit of paradoxical subtlety as the dogmas of nullification), their meanings are identical. Allegiance is the obedience which every citizen owes to the constitution and laws of his country. A citizen of South Carolina is also a citizen of the United States, consequently, he owes allegiance to the constitution and laws of South Carolina, and to the constitution and laws of the United States. Should he, nevertheless, be involved in any difficulty, proceeding from an apparent or real variance, between the laws of the state and of the United States, by the constitution of the latter, "the laws of the United States made in pursuance of the constitution, shall be the supreme law of the land;" should doubts arise, in the judgment of the citizen, whether a law of the United States has been "made in pursuance of the constitution," those doubts, by the provisions of the federal constitution, are to be resolved, in the last resort, by the federal judiciary. Keeping steadily in view the true meaning of allegiance, and these provisions of the constitution of the United States, no citizen can be embarrassed by the subject of his allegiance. When, therefore, the state, by an ordinance, requires her citizens to take a test oath, by which they abjure all allegiance, excepting to herself, it is obvious, that they must either violate that allegiance, which they are constitutionally and conscientiously bound to observe towards the United States, or by refusing to do so, be rendered amenable to any pains and penalties, (extending even to death and confiscation of property), which may be imposed upon them by the legislature of the states. It is against such a test oath as this, that I enter my protest—a test oath, unconstitutional, vindictive and cruel, exhibiting a melancholy proof of the reckless extremes, into which a dominant party will rush for the attainment of their object, when misled by narrow prejudices, blinded by exclusive feelings, and infuriated by burning resentments. Until the ordinance containing this test oath, be annulled, it must be execrated by all who recognize the federal constitution as a constitution. It usurps the exercise of a power which no state, in the union, can grant—invasades the sanctuary of the heart—tramples upon the sacred rights of conscience—and prescribes to citizens of South Carolina and of the United States, to abjure that allegiance from which they cannot be absolved, excepting by expatriation or revolution.

The radical error which pervades all the reasonings of the advocates of nullification is this—they have not distinguished between constitutional and natural rights—between rights under the constitution and beyond it. As this state always acknowledged the federal constitution, she could not be relieved from a protective tariff, upon the ground of its being unconstitutional, otherwise than in some of the modes warranted by the constitution, among which nullification was not included. When, by her sole authority, she undertook to annul a protective tariff, she exercised an extra-constitutional and revolutionary power, derived from the rights of man and of nature, paramount to all constitutions, although she never declared that she had seceded from the union. Had she made this declaration, and acted upon it, she would have been entitled to adopt such measures as she deemed necessary for the accomplishment of her object, for in revolutions self-preservation is the supreme law. She might then have called upon her citizens to renounce their allegiance to the union, and have nullified the constitution and all the laws of the union. Placed in this situation, she must either have settled her differences with the United States peaceably, by treaty, or failing in this, she must have appealed to arms, and abided by the issue of the contest. In this struggle, she might have considered those citizens who were not for her to be against her, those who were not her friends to be her foes, and her citizens would then have been compelled, at their peril, to choose the side which they would maintain.

Before resuming my seat, I will offer to you a few remarks upon a subject which has created no little excitement. I allude to the "act" "further to provide for the collection of duties upon imports," for my vote in favor of the passage of which, the harshest epithets of censure and crimination have been lavished upon me. When that act was passed, the ordinance of the convention was in force, by which all protective tariff acts were declared "null and void, and no law, and all contracts, promises and obligations made or entered into with purpose to secure the duties imposed by the said acts, and all judicial proceedings which shall be hereafter had in affiance thereof, shall be held utterly null and void." This ordinance came into operation from and after the 1st day of February, 1833, from which period, it interdicted "appeals from the state courts to the supreme court, in any cases within the purview of the ordinance," required "all persons holding, or hereafter elected to any offices, civil or military, under the state, (members of the legislature excepted), to take an oath to execute the ordinance," and forbade jurors to be impannelled, unless they swore "well and truly to obey, execute and enforce it." If this ordinance was constitutional, congress had no right to interfere with it. If it was unconstitutional, they were bound to endeavor to defeat it. For the reasons which I have already submitted to you, as well as for many others which are familiar to you, congress entertained no doubts as to the unconstitutionality of the ordinance, they had, therefore, only to deliberate upon the expediency of the measures which they should adopt to prevent its enforcement. Had they been quiescent, they would, implicitly, have conceded, that the ordinance was constitutional, and that the federal government could not protect itself: that government would, then have been annihilated, for a government which cannot execute its laws, ceases to be a government. Upon the passage or rejection of the act of the 2d March, 1833, depended the momentous alternative, whether the federal constitution should exist, or be prostrated at the feet of a dominant party in a state. Happily for the integrity of the union, and the honor and salvation of the country, congress was faithful to the trust which was reposed in them, and in their performance of it, kept themselves within the pale of their legitimate powers. Those parts of their act which authorise the employment of military force, (which can, only, be defensively employed), are sanctioned by precedents upon our statute books, during the administrations of gen. WASHINGTON and of JEFFERSON, (the constitutionality and expediency of which are admitted), authorising the employment of that species of coercion, under less guarded restrictions, and under circumstances much less impetuous; and those parts of the act, for which no precedents have been furnished, because the exigencies demanding them had not, previously, occurred, were introduced for the purposes of preventing collision between our citizens, and the shedding of fraternal blood, and to counteract the ordinance of the convention, which set the laws at defiance. Had the president, who is bound to "give to the congress information of the state of the union," and to "take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed," not informed the congress of the desperate legislation of South Carolina, and not recommended those means which were expedient, in order "that the laws might be faithfully executed," he would have been guilty of the violation of his official oath.

Had congress, who, by the constitution, "have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers vested in them, and "in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof," not passed an act, without which, the laws of congress could not have been carried into execution, they would have been guilty of a violation of their official duty. The act which was passed in pursuance of these high obligations, (the true character of which, upon a candid examination, will be perceived to be such as I have stated it to be), has, nevertheless, been stigmatized as inconsistent with the principles of freedom, as subversive of the rights of the states, as unconstitutional, ferocious and bloody, as having been recommended by the president, in the spirit of a fiend, that he might execute it, with the malignity of a demon.

The repeal of the ordinance of nullification of November, 1832, must have been produced by some measure of the federal government. But two measures were resorted to by the government; the passage of the tariff act of 2d March, 1833, and of the act for the collection of duties on imports of the same date. It cannot be presumed, that the repeal was owing to the first mentioned act, because it enforces a protective tariff, in diametrical opposition to "the fixed and unalterable resolve of the convention" "that a protecting tariff should be no longer enforced within the limits of South Carolina;" the conclusion, consequently, is irresistible that the repeal is to be attributed to the latter act. By the passage, therefore, of that act denounced by the convention, as "unauthorised by the constitution, subversive of that constitution, and destructive of public liberty," the monster nullification was strangled, the march of misrule and anarchy arrested, the supremacy of the constitution and the laws maintained, and the cheering assurance afforded to those who venerate the constitution and the laws, that our representatives will not be found slumbering upon their posts when the citadel of our liberties is menaced, either by internal foes or by foreign enemies.

Some of the observations which I have submitted to you may appear to be alien to the occasion for which we have met. But it seems to me, that on the anniversary of our national birth day, we ought to take a comprehensive view of the good and evil by which we are surrounded. Thanks to the discernment and patriotism of the people, and to the wisdom and energy of our government, we have been delivered from the miseries of practical nullification, with which we were recently threatened; but the storm which was raised by its agitators has not yet subsided; the angry passions which they generated have not yet sunk into repose. We have heard it iterated and reiterated—that the battle with the general government is not over, that it has just commenced—that the state cannot protect herself without being armed for resistance—that no state can be sovereign, which permits appeals from her judiciary to the federal courts—that the protective system constitutes but a small part of our controversy with the general government; and in the convention at Columbia, in March last, it was said by a delegate, "if a confederacy of the southern states could now be obtained, should we not deem it a happy termination of our long struggle for our rights against oppression?" When sentiments and declarations such as these are avowed, unabated firmness and vigilance are still requisite on the part of those who believe that the federal constitution is calculated to effect the great objects for which it was formed, in order to counteract any open or secret machinations, by which we may be deprived of the inestimable benefits of that constitution, and by which the union may be torn into fragments, and a southern confederation created from its mangled members. Vigilance and firmness ought to be exacted by all, who would deprecate the success of a revolution, of which the inevitable concomitants and consequences would be—anarchy, intestine war, and military despotism. The members of this society, which bears the name of WASHINGTON, are particularly called upon to be foremost whenever the union is endangered. Professing ourselves to be disciples of Washington, we should imbibe a portion of that spirit which animated him when alive; like him, in the worst of times, we should never despair of the republic; like him, we should dedicate our days and our nights, our hands and our hearts, to the preservation of the honor and the security of our common country, and like him, we should resolve, either to conquer in the cause of independence, liberty and union, or to perish in the glorious conflict.

Colonel DRAYTON concluded with a farewell address to the society, in which he spoke in appropriate terms, of their meritorious exertions to serve the cause which they had espoused, in spite of the terrors of proscription, and the discouragement inseparable from an organized majority, which controlled and directed the power and patronage of the state—gratefully thanked them for their disinterested and persevering support of himself—requested them to receive his warmest wishes for their individual welfare and happiness, and to believe that he entertained towards them, personal respect and esteem—expressed his fervent hopes that the dark clouds which now lowered over our political horizon, would be dissipated, by the interposition of the Omnipotent and merciful Being, who wielded the destinies of man and of nations—assured the society, that wherever he might be, and whatever might be his lot, he should always rejoice in the prosperity, and mourn over the adversity of South Carolina, and that he should be ready and willing in any future crisis, to identify himself with her fortunes, and to render to her all the aid, within the sphere of his limited means and talents.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 25—VOL. VIII.] BALTIMORE, AUG. 17, 1833. [VOL. XLIV. WHOLE No. 1,143.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS. In North Carolina, the following gentlemen have been elected: Jesse Speight, Thomas H. Hall, M. T. Hawkins, Abraham Rencher, James McKay, Dan'l Barringer, Edmund Deberry, Lewis Williams, William B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Henry Conway.

In Mr. Branch's late district, the contest has been between Andrew Joyner and Jesse A. Bynum. Report says the latter is elected.

The district last represented by Samuel P. Carson, is the only one in the state yet to be heard from.

For Tennessee, John Bell, John Blair, Cave Johnson, James K. Polk, David W. Dickinson, Baylie Peyton, Pryor Lea, — Bunch and col. Standifer, are elected to congress.

For Kentucky, Chilton Allan, Thomas A. Marshall, Amos Davis, John White, Richard M. Johnson, are elected. In the district lately represented by gen. Adair, the contest has been a close one, and the result not ascertained, though a postscript in the Lexington Observer gives a report that judge Letcher had beaten Mr. Moore, 150 votes. In the Louisville district the result is also uncertain, though it is thought that Mr. Crittenden has succeeded. No certain intelligence from the other districts.

CHOLERA. The last Galenian states, that an express had arrived at Galena from col. Dodge, with information that the cholera had attacked the rangers under his command.

Missouri. The St. Louis Republican says the western mails bring melancholy tidings of the spread of the cholera.

A letter from St. Charles represents the month of July to have been one of great distress. Upwards of sixty of the most temperate, cleanly and excellent citizens had been taken off, while the intemperate had scarcely been touched. The village was nearly deserted and the cholera would soon have no subjects to act upon. Twelve entire families had been swept away. The congestive fever, a disease, if possible, more stubborn and fatal than the cholera had also affected the people of St. Charles, and it was no ordinary circumstance to see every member of a family stretched upon the floor in one room sick, and many had died for want of medical aid.

In Indiana and Illinois it still prevailed though in a mild form.

Kentucky. Several of the towns and villages in this state were still suffering under the disease.

In Ohio it was gradually extending itself into the interior of the state. At Cincinnati the disease still continued.

The cholera had left Pittsburgh, the number of deaths from that disease up to the 8th instant was but 52.

The cholera was raging at Vera Cruz on the 3d ult.

The great mortality from cholera among the slaves on the estate of gen. Wade Hampton, in Louisiana, is contradicted in an August paper. The number of deaths is there stated at 20.

CAMPEACHY. The schooner Eagle, capt. Farley, arrived at Boston on Friday, the 9th inst. from Campeachy. The captain reports to the editor of the Patriot, that the cholera appeared there on the 21st of June, and had destroyed about 400 persons before his departure on the 30th. When he left, from 120 to 140 deaths were daily occurring. The disease was principally confined to the poor. The Americans resident there were all well, and the American physicians in constant attendance upon the sick.

FRIENDS' TRIAL. To the editors of the Philadelphia Gazette. Trenton, Monday evening, August 6th. Mr. Wood closed his argument this morning, at 12 o'clock. In taking leave of his subject, he was strong, clear and eloquent; and his conclusions are irresistible, granting him his premises. He spent the morning in expatiating upon the breaches of discipline and order, on the part of the Hicksites, in the establishment of their new yearly meetings; and pointed out to the court what would be the consequences, if such a spirit of disorganization and reorganization, should receive the sanction of the courts of this state.

Mr. Frelinghuysen commenced his argument this afternoon. He commenced by concurring with the gentlemen who preceded him, in their view of the great importance of the cause, now before this honorable court. He then endeavored to give his views of the powers of the court in such cases as the one it was now hearing. Then he took up the subject of doctrines, and enlarged upon the idea which the other party adhered to, that the light within is a fundamental principle or guide, and labored to prove that it was not considered by the early fathers in the church, as a sufficient dependence. He said, that this light within is an ignus fatuus, which will lead to bewilder, and dazzle to blind. He was endeavoring to prove, when the court adjourned, that the early Quakers held doctrinal views in strict consonance with the other denominations of Christians.

Mr. F. is rapid in his delivery, though very easy and truly eloquent in his style. He will probably finish by to-morrow evening, or Thursday morning, when he will be followed by the able and eloquent advocate for the Hicksite party, the honorable Samuel L. Southard.

It is thought that Mr. Southard will occupy the court until Saturday evening, or Monday morning. The court room, which is very capacious, is nearly filled. The galleries are occupied by ladies.

As to the result of this important trial, we cannot even conjecture; and so far as our intercourse with both parties will enable us to judge, we think that neither is very sanguine. Very respectfully, yours, &c.

JUDGE CLAYTON'S LETTER. From the National Intelligencer. We are authorised and requested, by the cashier of the office of the bank of the United States in this city, to state, that if judge Clayton intended, in the letter recently published, to say that the bank demanded a premium of 7 per cent. in exchanging notes of the said bank for those of the Georgian banks, he, the judge, is under a wrong impression. The office here has never received nor demanded any premium for exchanging its notes for those of other banks. When, at the commencement of the last session of congress, judge Clayton applied at the bank to make the exchange he mentions, the cashier (who then did not know him, even by sight) promptly told him that it could not be done, and he exhibited a price current in which notes of the banks in Georgia were quoted at 7 per cent. discount. The judge observed that the notes held by him were as good as the notes of the bank of the United States—to which the cashier answered that he did not question their goodness, but that it did not suit the purposes of the bank to receive notes which were at such a discount in the market. Nothing further passed on the subject, and it was only after the judge had left the room, that the cashier was informed by a member of congress who was present, that the gentleman who had requested the exchange was judge Clayton, of Georgia. The cashier has a distinct recollection of what occurred at the time; and when judge Clayton's letter appeared, he wrote to the cashier of the parent bank a statement of the transaction as here detailed. The following is an extract from the answer, just received, viz:

"I was aware, when I first saw Mr. Clayton's letter, that he was in error in saying that a premium of 7 per cent. was demanded by you; if indeed his expression, which is rather a vague one, was intended to convey that meaning. I recollected your having stated to me, when I was in Washington last winter, the circumstances of your conversation with Mr. Clayton, just as you relate them now; and I expected, therefore, to hear from you on the subject."

BANK UNITED STATES. The following is a copy of the circular addressed to the different state banks on the subject of the government deposits:

August, 1833.

Sir: I have been appointed by the secretary of the treasury, at the request of the president of the United States, to confer with state banks in relation to future deposits and distribution of the public revenue.

It is deemed probable by the government that the bank of the United States will not be rechartered, and that no other institution will be established, by congress to supply its place as agent of the treasury.

As it is now less than three years to the expiration of its charter, the president thinks it his duty to look to the means by which the service it now renders to the government is thereafter to be performed, and if sufficient reasons shall exist, the government may desire to employ another agent, or other agents, at an earlier period.

The sole object of my appointment is, to ascertain on what terms the several state banks may be willing to perform the service now rendered by the bank of the United States to the government, should it become necessary or expedient to employ another agent, or other agents, that the secretary of the treasury may, in that event, be able to make a judicious selection.

In pursuit of this object, I have the honor to inquire whether the bank over which you preside, is desirous, should a change take place, of undertaking that agency, or a portion of it, at ———.

If this inquiry should be answered in the affirmative, I am authorised to communicate with you further on the subject.

It is, however, to be distinctly understood, that nothing which may pass is to be considered a pledge on the part of the government, to remove the deposits from the bank of the United States, before the expiration of its charter, or to employ your bank in any event, or to make any final arrangements upon the conditions which may now be proposed or received.

If it be convenient, I shall be happy to know the disposition of your board of directors on the subject; if not, will you do me the favor to give me your own, leaving an expression of the wishes of the board to some more convenient opportunity. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

THE POPULATION OF THE UNITED STATES. The Boston Journal has some interesting suggestions on this subject, derived from the last Quarterly Register.

The greatest population to a square mile is in the District of Columbia, where it is 393; in Connecticut, 63; in Rhode Island, 72; Massachusetts, 81; Maryland and New Jersey, 40; Ohio, 24; New York, 41; Pennsylvania, 60.

The population of New York in 1840, it is supposed will be 2,500,000, or 200,000 more than that of all New England, and about equal to that of all the north western territories. That of Pennsylvania is rated at 1,700,000; of Ohio 1,300,000. That of Virginia is put at a few thousands more. And thus the oldest settled of the states, which in 1790, had a population of 747,000, will have been overtaken by a state which had no government of any kind until one year before that date, did not become a state until 1802, and had in 1790, a population of only 3,000. Indeed, Ohio has the resources within itself for growing into the greatest state of the union. It can support, without difficulty, a people as dense as that of Holland.

Ohio contains but 39,000 square miles, while Virginia contains 64,000, which is within 1,000 of the whole area of New England, and makes Virginia the largest as well as oldest state. The next in order is Georgia 62,000, and Missouri 60,000. Illinois contains 55,000, Florida 50,000, New York 46,000, Pennsylvania 44,000, North Carolina and Louisiana 43,000 each. Delaware contains 2,120, and Rhode Island 1,350.

The most rapid increase of population we observe is in the case of Ohio, which increased from 3,000 to 45,000 in ten years, and in the next ten to 230,000. This last was at the rate of 409 per cent. in ten years, whereas the average rate of the whole union for the last ten has been but 33 per cent. and that of New England but a little less than 19. That of New York was never greater than 72, of Maine, 53; Indiana, 194; Illinois, 350; Indiana, 500; Michigan, 764; Arkansas, 1,344. The most rapid increase, has, of course, been in the early settlements.

The population of the United States in 1840 is rated at 17 millions. What it will be a hundred years hence, it is not easy to calculate. What it may be, however, is inferable from the fact that our territory is immensely extensive; that a vast amount of rich land is yet unoccupied; that lands now cultivated may be made vastly more productive; that a large portion of our country is under tropical climates, and that if the whole country should support but 230 inhabitants to a square mile, as England now does, we should have, as the editor of the Register observes, more than four hundred and fifty millions.

STATISTICS OF CONNECTICUT, FOR THE YEAR 1832. Through the attention of the comptroller of public accounts, we have been furnished with the following highly interesting statistics. It would be both gratifying and useful, would some one or more individuals in each state furnish similar tables. There certainly can be no great difficulty in obtaining them, and the labor that they might cost would be more than counterbalanced by the information they would afford.

Of the expense of government.

The population of the state by the last census, was 297,711; and the ordinary expense of the government was $60,852; being a proportionate expense of twenty cents and a half for each inhabitant. But the state during this time, received $27,053, interest on her three per cent. stock and dividends on bank stock; $12,446 from the state prison, forfeitures, fines, &c. and $2,817, for taxes on bank stock owned by non-residents; all amounting to 42,316; which being deducted from the ordinary expenses of government, left the sum of $18,536 to be paid from direct taxes.

This balance of $18,536, would require a contribution by each inhabitant of the state of less than six cents and three mills; and a tax less than three-tenths of a mill on each dollar of valuation and assessment returned by the assessor.

Of the school fund.

The whole capital of this fund, productive and unproductive, was reported by the commissioner in 1832 to be $1,902,957 87. The interest arising from it, is irrevocably dedicated by the constitution, to the support of primary schools, and by law, is apportioned to them, according to the ratio of persons between four and sixteen years of age belonging to the respective school societies. The whole number of those persons in 1832, was 86,252; and the amount of interest distributed for that year, was $81,939 40, being ninety-five cents for each of those persons, and equal to 23 cents for every inhabitant. Thus while the state was distributing for the benefit of schools a sum equal to twenty-eight cents for each person in it, the ordinary expenses of the government required of them only a ratio of contribution less than six cents and three mills.

BOSTON IMPROVEMENTS. Among the most important improvements carried on by the enterprise of the Boston merchants for years, is the splendid block now going up on what is called "Exchange wharf," (built last season), under the charge of a company of that name. There are thirty-two stores in the block, the length of each being 22 to 25 feet, with the exception of those at the two ends, which are more spacious. The breadth of the block is about 60 feet, the total length about 800. Rooms are provided in the upper end for an insurance company, and for the Granite and Hancock banks, incorporated last winter. The whole south front and the back basement story of this block are of rough Quincy granite—the window caps, &c. of the same material, "dressed." Nearly 100 feet of solid wharf are to be added at the end of the block, and at the end of that about 170 feet of platform wharf, including a slip, so as to accommodate six ships at once. The contract cost of this improvement is rated not far from half a million, and it is believed that the same work could not now be procured for less than $100,000 more than that sum.

GIMBLETS. The Yankees are in a fair way to destroy John Bull's gimblet trade with this country. The new twist gimblet is almost as much superior to the old English gimblet, as the screw auger is to the old pod auger.—There is a gimblet factory at West Whately, which employs 15 hands, about half of them females, and manufactures 25 gross per week. The steel is imported from England in round rods; the handles are turned out in the vicinity. There is a gimblet factory in Buckland, one in the northern part of Franklin county, one in Keene, N. H. and one more in Connecticut.

CROPS. For many years past there has not been a better prospect for corn and tobacco in this neighborhood. The weather has been very seasonable, with fine showers every few days, which have, upon the high lands particularly, ensured abundant crops. But this state of things is not universal.—In the south part of Pittsylvania, and in some parts of Bedford and Botetourt, complaints are made of too much dry weather. We likewise see in the Tennessee and Alabama papers, that the crops have suffered much by the long continued drought.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY. We have met with a singular article in a late number of the Journal de Smyrne, received at the office of the Baltimore Gazette. It states that a most interesting discovery has recently been made in Moldavia, which consists in extinguishing every kind of fire or conflagration by throwing chopped straw upon it. The agricultural society of Brunn, on the 27th January last made several experiments to test the truth of the discovery, which were attended with complete success. It was found that on pouring into a fire, grease, pitch, or spirits wine, already burning in jars, and afterwards throwing chopped straw upon the whole, the fire was almost immediately extinguished. The society also caused a large fire to be made with straw, billets of wood, faggots, paper, and sheafs of wheat, and, when the whole was well kindled, the fire was extinguished in a moment by the same means as before. It was somewhat remarkable that the chopped straw used in these experiments, so far from being consumed by the fire, was found, on the contrary, almost untouched, and could be used a second time for the same purpose. A bar of iron heated red hot, and thrust into a basket filled with chopped straw, not only failed to set the straw on fire, but became sensibly cool. A last trial consisted in putting into a heap of chopped straw, some inches in depth, a bag of wheat, upon which was spread a quantity of gunpowder, covered with sheets of paper, and then covering the heap with bundles of straw, which were set on fire in different places—after the straw was entirely consumed and the ashes swept away, the chopped straw underneath was found untouched, and the bag, with the powder and paper, was withdrawn from the heap without having been in the slightest degree affected by the fire.

It is to be remarked that it is necessary to throw the chopped straw with some force upon the flames, and to stir it afterwards, if possible.

RAIL ROAD IN FLORIDA. The Floridian of the 27th ultimo, states that a subscription has been started in Tallahassee and more than nine hundred shares, at twenty dollars each, have already been taken, for the purpose of establishing a rail road from Tallahassee to some point on the St. Marks or Waukulla river. Three-fourths of the subscribers have said they would double the amount of their subscriptions, if necessary. Application will be made to the legislative council for a charter, at its next session, and to congress, for the necessary appropriations of land, &c. &c.

QUO WARRANTO CASE. The Tuscaloosa, (Alabama) Intelligencer, of the 27th ult. contains the decision of the supreme court of that state, on an application made by the attorney general, by direction of the governor, for a quo warranto against John W. Paul, the object of which was to inquire into the legality of his election to the office of judge, by the last legislature of that state. The case was argued by the attorney general and Mr. Hopkins for the state, and by Messrs. Gordon and Goldthwaite for respondent; and the court unanimously decided that it had no right to inquire into the legality of an appointment made by the legislature, the constitution having confined this duty to that department of the government.

The ground on which application for the interference of the court was made, is, that the constitution prohibits the appointment of members of the legislature to offices created during their term of membership, and that Mr. Paul was a member of the legislature at the time of the creation of the judicial circuit on which he was chosen to preside. His friends take the ground that the office of judge was not created, by the addition of a new judicial circuit, and that therefore he is eligible.

DESTRUCTIVE EFFECTS OF LIGHTNING. A thunder storm, more than usually destructive in its effects, passed over Newport R. I. on Sunday week. The lightning struck in various parts of the town, doing great damage. The Mercury gives these particulars—A house in Broad st. occupied by Mr. Robert Franklin, jr. was struck with lightning, and his wife, and a child, the daughter of Mr. John Almy, were instantly killed. Mrs. Franklin was sitting at the time near the fire place, with the child in her lap, and a dog by her side, when the lightning descended the chimney, and they were all found dead in that position. The house of Mrs. P. Mumford, on the hill, was also struck and much injured, the lightning having struck both chimnies, and forced its way down the side of the chamber and lower rooms, from whence it passed out of the window. Three houses on the point were also struck, but were not much injured. In Middletown, the lightning also struck in two places. On the farm of the late John Chase a stack of grain was struck, and entirely consumed; and on the farm of Mr. Pardon Brown a stack of hay was consumed.

CURE FOR THE BITE OF A SNAKE. The following simple and efficacious mode of counteracting the effects of the bite of a rattlesnake, is related in a note addressed to the editors of the Miners' Journal, by M. Robinson, esq. civil engineer:

As a party of assistants engaged, under my direction, in the location of the Phillipsburg rail road were occupied, a few days since, in protractations at their encampment, information was given them that an axe man attached to the party had been bitten by a rattlesnake. One of the assistants, Mr. Henry Hopkins, of Massachusetts, immediately hastened to the spot, and applied his lips to the wound, sucking it for some time, and as long as it appeared to him that the treatment could be of any service. The hand and arm of the man nevertheless swelled excessively; but in the course of a day or two the swelling went down, and neither the assistant nor the man have since experienced the slightest inconvenience. The case seems to be a very conclusive one in favor of the efficacy of such treatment, where an individual happens to be at hand sufficiently resolute to administer it, as the snake had been previously very much irritated, and the wound in the hand was a deep one. It is scarcely worth while to mention that the assistant took the precaution, after resigning his patient's hand, of giving to his own mouth the benefit of a pretty thorough ablution. Respectfully your obedient servant.

PRINTERS' ENTERPRISE. The New York papers state that the Harpers, of that city, have 17 presses in their printing establishment—one of which working by horse power, equals the work of 6 or 7 common presses; that they have 140 persons directly in their employ; that their printing costs 100 and their paper 200 dollars a day; and that they turn out on an average, every day of the year, a book of the size of the "Family Library." Their postage bill is said to amount to 1,000 dollars, annually.

In reference to the prosperous condition of these publishers, the editor of the Albany Evening Journal states a fact in their previous career, with a view of teaching young mechanics, what may be accomplished by industry, intelligence, and enterprise:

It is, (says the Journal), but a few years since the Harpers were journeymen printers. In 1816, the editor of this journal was a press-mate of James Harper, in the office of alderman Jonathan Seymour, of New York, a man that honors our craft, and who is remembered with esteem and affection by all who ever held situations in his office. At that day, Harper was known as a "driver," and well we remember the many long and hard pulls he gave us at the bar. Nothing short of 12 tokens a day would satisfy him. His brother John worked at a press in the same room, and was a chip of the same block. Dead horses were never found upon their banks. It required no gift of prophecy to see, from these young men's manner of taking time by the fore-lock, that they were destined to "make a spoon or spoil a horn." We are happy to learn that they have made a "spoon," with which they are diligently employed in extracting honey from the "horn of plenty."

A NEW MARRIAGE CEREMONY. Married at Bolton, July 31st, by the rev. J. W. Chickering, Mr. Gustavus U. Richards, of New York, to Miss Electra B. daughter of S. V. S. Wilder, esq. of Bolton. The ceremony of the above marriage was performed in the meeting house, in the presence of a large assembly convened to witness it. When the minister had concluded his services, the father of the bride arose and presented her a splendid bible, accompanying it with some pertinent remarks on her newly assumed duties; then turning to the bridegroom, he delivered him a letter, which probably contained a draft for some of his hoarded thousands. The multitude were then invited, without distinction, to repair to a neighboring grove and partake of the marriage feast. Forming a procession, they marched to the grove—on entering which, a band of music concealed in a bower, struck up an enlivening air. Fruits and cake and lemonade were profusely scattered about the grove, to which every one had free access. The company retired at an early hour, and the bridegroom and his lady took their departure for New York, by the way of the springs.

THE BITER BITTEN. A few days ago, as one of our merchant tailors in Market street was patiently waiting the calls of customers, a robust, honest looking fellow, stepped into the shop, who looked as though he needed an outfit, his habiliments being rather the worse for wear. After the usual inquiries as to prices, &c. he concluded to rig himself with a new suit. He doffed his old coat and vest, and very soon found substitutes for them among the various samples spread out before him by the accommodating supplier. Having found pantaloons that pleased him, he walked into the back room to see whether they were of sufficient length and breadth, which being the case, he very unceremoniously kicked his old ones out of the way, and made for the back window. With wonderful dexterity he leaped over the different walls, wood piles and high fences that obstructed his progress, and was soon farther than "speaking distance" from the tailor's shop and his tattered rags. The honest shop-keeper began to wonder at his delay, and proceeded to the room where he had left his customer; but lo! the bird had flown, and left "not a wreck behind," save his thread-bare breeches—no very profitable exchange for the absent new suit. He in vain looked through the window for the rascal, or peered into his own and the adjoining yards, and soon made up his mind that he might as well set down customer and clothes as "among the missing." After thus disposing of the absentees, he very naturally and mechanically proceeded to ransack the pockets of the old trowsers which were left, where he soon found a pocket-book, forgotten, doubtless, by the gentleman in his haste to secure the spoils, upon opening which his glad eyes were greeted by the cheering sight of bank notes. When he unrolled them, he counted ten dollars—three dollars more than the garments were worth which the unfortunate rogue ran off with!

A BRACE OF ORATORS, AMERICAN AND ENGLISH. The following is an extract from a letter of the Washington correspondent of the Portland Daily Advertiser. "It is difficult to give the reader a vivid idea of Mr. McDuffie's eloquence. The majority of men say he is not eloquent, and affect to be, or are, disgusted with his style, and yet will listen to him with intense attention for hours. One thing is certain, he has a very bad manner, bad so far as good taste or propriety is concerned. He hesitates and stammers, he screams and bawls—he thumps and stamps like a madman in bedlam. But yet he is eloquent, and often eloquent, with little or nothing to say. I will attempt to give you an idea of his manner in the report of a few periods, putting in brackets as well as words will admit, his modulation and gestures. 'Sir, [a thump on desk upon a quire of paper heavy enough to echo over the whole hall] sir, S. Carolina is oppressed, [a thump.] A tyrant majority sucks her life blood from her, [a dreadful thump.] Yes, sir, [a pause] yes, sir, a tyrant [a thump] majority unappeased, [arms aloft] unappeasable, [horrid scream] has persecuted and persecutes us, [a stamp on the floor.] We appeal to them, [low and quick,] but we appeal in vain, [loud and quick.] We turn to our brethren of the north, [low with a shaking of the head] and pray them to protect us, [a thump] but we turn in vain, [prolonged and a thump.] They heap coals of fire on our heads, [with immense rapidity.]—Thy give us burden on burden; they tax us more and more, [very rapid, slam-bang, slam—a hideous noise.] We turn to our brethren of the south, [slow] with a solemn, thoughtful air. We work with them; we fight with them; we vote with them; we petition with them; [common voice and manner] but the tyrant majority has no ears, no eyes, no form, [quick] deaf, [long pause] sightless, [pause] inexorable, [slow, slow.] Despairing, [a thump] we resort to the rights [a pause] which God [a pause] and nature has given us, [thump, thump, thump.] &c. &c. &c. This is no caricature, but gives you a little idea of Mr. McDuffie's manner than I could give you in sheets of description." So much for the American, now for the English orator. Mr. M. Attwood, whose motion on the state of the country, or rather, on that of the circulation, occupied the attention of the house of commons three nights during the last week, is one of the most ungainly speakers we ever saw. While speaking, he throws his arms about as if he were a blacksmith wielding a hammer, or a thrasher wielding a flail. He generally comes to the table, which he thumps most unmercifully, first with one hand, and then with the other; his body undergoing every variety of contortion, and his legs occasionally crossed the one over the other. The Times, of Tuesday last, thus describes Mr. Attwood's action:—"All that we could say of the honorable member was, that, if he was not a convincing, he was a striking speaker; and that, judging from his manual vehemence, he must have made a deep impression on the table, if not on his audience. A reporter, who had some curiosity and a few minutes to spare, timed the honorable member's thumps upon the table, and found that the honorable member inflicted no less than two hundred knocks in a quarter of an hour. At this rate Mr. Attwood must have struck the table no less than three thousand times in the course of his speech. Few orators have ever before made so many hits in so short a time; and the 'poor' preacher, who dangled the inside out of six bibles in the course of a year's preaching, was nothing to Mr. Attwood." [Engling paper.]

FROM TAMPIO. The Gaceta of July 10th, received at New York, says "The insurgent troops of Metamoraz took possession of the capital of this state on the 5th inst.—the government troops and militia first retiring in good order." The insurgent force was estimated not to exceed 300 or 400 men.

The town of Queretaro was occupied by a division of government troops under gen. Mejia, on the 26th June.

There is little doubt that the insurgents will be finally put down, and the authority of Santa Anna restored throughout the republic.

BRIEF NOTICES.

The U. S. ship of the line Delaware, Henry E. Ballard, esq. commander, arrived in the offing off the harbor of New York on Friday, the 2d instant, and was towed up on the following day to anchorage in the North river. Mr. Livingston who is to go out in her as minister to France had arrived at New York, and the Delaware it is said was to have sailed on Thursday last.

Twenty-four valuable horses have died within three weeks, at Utica, New York. This extraordinary mortality was at first attributed to disease, but is now believed to be the effect of poison, as arsenic, in considerable quantities, was found in the stomach of one of the horses.

A singular instance of intrepidity in a youth occurred a day or two since in New York. A child of 3 or 4 years of age fell from the wharf at the foot of Northmore street, into the water, Thomas Bennet, (son of Jeremiah Bennet, No. 53 Lispenard street) a lad 14 years old, immediately jumped overboard with all his clothes on to rescue him. The Indian who committed the murders was immediately shot, by order of a chief, called the Little Priest.

This last statement is doubted by the Missouri Republican. A writer in the Litchfield (Conn.) Enquirer, is endeavoring to prove that the spirit, instinct or intelligence of a beast, is as likely to be immortal as the soul of man.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, having called upon the editor to know when the public will have the pleasure of reading the speech delivered by Mr. Webster, at the dinner recently given him by the citizens of that place, the editor in reply remarks, that "No person took notes of Mr. Webster's speech. He said he would make an abstract from his own notes, when he got to Lancaster. There he found it impracticable. Whether he will furnish the abstract when he reaches home, I cannot say. The hope is entertained that he will do it."

A paper called McDowell's Journal, conducted by the rev. Mr. McDowell, has been commenced in the city of New York. Its object is said to be the dissemination of information concerning the courtisans of that city. Some of the papers condemn its publication as indecent and immoral in its tendency.

E. lost 100 bushels of wheat, and it was with the greatest difficulty he preserved the large stock of grain in the yard.

A man named Winters entered the house of Mr. Utzler in Harrison county, Indiana, and finding no person at home but the wife of the latter, drew a knife and stabbed her six or eight times, when Mrs. Utzler disengaged herself and fled; she had not gone far before she fell and expired. Winters then left the house, closely pursued by several persons in the neighborhood, and finding his escape beyond the shadow of a hope, drew the knife with which he had murdered Mrs. Utzler across his own throat and died immediately.

An old maiden lady of the name of Witman, of Mountjoy township, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in the 80th year of her age, a few days ago, mowed and made an acre of grass into hay. The Olive Branch from which we copy the above, adds: "Well may the county of Lancaster be denominated the garden of America—when her fair daughters are able and willing, at such an age, to undergo such industry." "I would much sooner," exclaimed the immortal Franklin, "see a spinning wheel than a piano—a shuttle than a parasol—a knitting needle than a visiting card." 'Tis in the country—the farm houses—and among our good old dames such pleasing sights may be seen.

Stedson, of the brig Cherokee, from Pernambuco, states, says the New York Commercial, that he was informed by Mr. Crabtree, a merchant of Pernambuco, that he had received a letter from the English merchants at a small place about sixty miles from Pernambuco, stating that the Brazilians had risen upon the British merchants and massacred about fifty persons. It was said the difficulty arose from some question touching the currency. A United States schooner was at Pernambuco—when the captain heard the news, he immediately got under way to protect the merchants and property at that place.

Young Frothingham whose disappearance from the Oneida Institute, (N. Y.) a few months since was made the subject of much public comment, as he was supposed to have perished, has recently been heard from. Letters from him, dated Liverpool, May 27, are published in the Salem Gazette. He states that owing to the effect of close application, at the institution, he felt occasionally that his thoughts were wandering. About the 5th of April, this occurred more frequently than before, and he knows not how he spent much of the time between that date and the 8th; he observes that every thing is confused in his recollection. He remembers only, that finding himself in a strange place he inquired where he was, and was answered in Montreal. He remembered nothing further until he found himself, in May, on board a vessel bound from Quebec to Liverpool. He appears to have wandered for a considerable time, and to have embarked for England without any consciousness of what occurred.

Col. Drayton, of South Carolina, (says the New York Mercantile), reached here a few days since in the Sutton. W.

A Mr. Thomas Hart, innkeeper of Bustleton, Philadelphia county, was waylaid on the road a few days ago, attacked by three men armed, and so benten and stabbed that his life is in great danger. He was left by the villains for dead. He has recovered so far, however, as to make oath to the identity of the men, and they have been secured in prison.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and a committee forthwith appointed, one of whom is chief justice Marshall. God speed the good work!

The New York Journal of Commerce states that the committee of assistant aldermen on police, watch and prisons, have reported in favor of establishing a house of detention in that city, for the reception of persons retained in custody for further examination or trial. They recommend that no communication whatever be allowed between persons so detained, but that each be furnished a bible, and placed in solitude to commune with his own reflections. "In this way," they are of opinion, "that if our prisons were not rendered schools of virtue and religion, they would, at any rate, cease to be what they now are—SINKS OF DEPRAVITY AND SEMINARIES OF CRIME."

The following characteristic anecdote is given of the veteran defender of liberty, in a late French paper:

A few days ago, general Lafayette and count Pozzi di Borgo, met to sign as witnesses to a marriage contract. The general signed first, and on handing the pen to the Russian ambassador said, "I imagine, count, this is the only treaty we shall ever sign together." "Who knows?" said the count. "God grant, then," replied the general, "it may be the treaty declaring the independence of Poland." The diplomatist said no more, and here the colloquy ended.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Liverpool papers to the 8th ultimo.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

In the house of lords, on the 5th July, the marquis of Lansdowne brought forward certain resolutions for rechartering the East India company, which had previously received the sanction of the other house; after debate they were agreed to.

The following are among the leading details of the bill, which will be pressed through the present parliament:

The China trade is to be opened to all British subjects from and after April next.

The company is entirely to lay aside its commercial character, and assign to the crown all its commercial assets, of whatever kind.

Full liberty is given to all British born subjects to go to, and reside at, all ports and places now belonging to the company, without license; and this liberty may hereafter be extended by the governor general to other places.

Liberty is also given to all British born subjects to hold land for any term not exceeding 60 years; and, by consent of the governor general, either by law, regulation, or license, for any longer term.

Slavery is to be totally abolished in all the Indian possessions within four years; and in less time, if it can be effected by regulations under the authority of the governor general in council.

No difference of religion, birth, descent, or color is to be an obstacle, per se, to the holding of any office, place or emolument whatever.

As regulations of minor importance—the great principle of equal laws and rights to all classes being clearly defined and recognised—the presidency of Fort William is to be divided into two; two bishops are to be added to the present one, to be in subordinate authority to the metropolitan—the bishop of Calcutta, he being under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury. The salaries of these bishops, of the governor general, &c. &c. are all fixed, and are to be paid by the company, which is to retain the patronage, and, under the control of parliament, and of the board of control, as the organ of government, is to exercise, during the continuance of the charter, the sovereignty of India.

A confident belief is entertained, that the act, the principles of which are enlightened and liberal, calculated to extend commerce, and elevate the moral character and condition of the subject, will, in all its most important enactments, receive the sanction of parliament.

The bill concerning the church temporalities in Ireland underwent further discussion in the house of commons on the night of the 5th ult.

Mr. Stanley brought forward "a bill for the abolishment of slavery in the West Indies" on the same night, which was ordered to a second reading on the 10th.

Lord Ashley brought forward his long expected motion respecting the regulation of the labor of children in factories; the lord chancellor proposed to refer it to a committee, and after debate his motion was lost.

On the 4th of July Lord Lyndhurst brought in a bill to alter the disposition of the celebrated "Thellusson property," to prevent the constant consumption of large portions of it by chancery, trust and other expenses, and to divert parts of the property to the living descendants of the testator, now in a distressed or destitute condition.

Thellusson, it will be recollected, was a watchmaker in London, and accumulated a large property, which at his death he bequeathed in trusts, so as to lie for near a century to accumulate further, before it could be enjoyed. The principal heir has been created lord Rendlesham, and his portion of the estate is estimated at sixteen millions of pounds sterling. Lord Lyndhurst entered into remarkable details to show the effects that were experienced from compliance with the terms of this will, and the enormous sums that were constantly deducted from the accumulating property, while many descendants were in want. No final disposition was made of the subject.

Mr. Bucking moved, on the 2d July, in the house of commons, to appoint a committee to consider the practicability of paying off the national debt, by its conversion into terminable annuities, at gradually diminishing rates of interest, so as to lessen the burden every year. By the following extract, it appears that the impediments which exist at the post office, tending to obstruct the prompt circulation of the continental newspapers in England, are now extended to the American papers, which had hitherto been exempt from these inquisitorial visitations:

"Liverpool, June 25. The letter bag from New York is landed, but, by an order from the postmaster, all the parcels of newspapers must undergo a scrutiny before they are suffered to come on shore. Even the consignee's private bag has been overhauled!"

The disease in the eyes of prince George of Cumberland, had so far subsided as to justify the belief that a speedy cure would be effected.

By the return of persons imprisoned for debt in 1832, in England and Wales, it appears the gross number was 16,470—of whom 4,099 maintained themselves, three fourths being too poor to provide for themselves. By the fourth report of the common law commissioners, dated the 1st March, 1832, it appears that of persons in execution for debt in 1831, more than 25 per cent. were for debts under £20, and more than 45 under £30.

At the late fancy fair in London, her majesty bought, at one of the stalls, a handsome purse, which she displayed to the duke of Wellington, and asked the opinion of his grace on it. The duke said he thought it very handsome. Her majesty replied she was glad he thought so, for she purchased it for him, and forthwith presented it.

Ninety-four thousand Protestants have emigrated from Ireland during the last four years.

The cholera had re-appeared in Edinburgh.

The iron trade was pretty brisk at the prices fixed on April quarter day, and an advance was expected.

The committee now sitting on the subject of the naval and military expenditures intend to make sweeping reductions.

It is contemplated to establish a new line of British built packets between Liverpool and New York. They are to be about 300 tons register, and constructed for rapid sailing. They will be built by private hands, the post office contributing a portion of their cost.

The new stamp duties bill, reducing the duties on advertisements and sea insurances, reopening altogether the duty on pamphlets, on receipts for sums under five pounds, and on insurances for farming stock, came into operation on the 6th of July.

The boards of stamps and taxes have been consolidated into one board, or head of "stamps and tax office," and C. Pressly, esq., is appointed secretary.

The Friends in their annual epistle stated their continued opposition to the system of tithes and bear testimony against all ecclesiastical demands. The amount of distrains, almost exclusively on these accounts, is £13,000.

The great East India house of Fairlie, Bonham & Co. London, whose engagements amount to a very large sum have failed. In the course of a day or two, upwards of £62,000 in annuities became due against them.

FRANCE.

A royal ordinance has been issued dividing the sinking fund among the different stocks.

A modification of a temporary kind had been made in the export and import duties on various articles of commerce.

It was reported that the chamber of deputies would be dissolved and a new election ordered.

SPAIN.

The cortes of Spain met on the 20th July and took the oath of fidelity to the young princess of Asturias.

Don Carlos and family are said to have arrived at Civita Vecchia, where it was supposed they would fix their permanent residence.

PORTUGAL.

The latest advices from Oporto represented that an armament was fitting out by Don Pedro, whose destination was not known. It now appears that between three and four thousand troops embarked on board steamboats on the 21st June, accompanied by some ships of war. These had proceeded down the coast, passed by Lisbon, and effected a landing at Lagos in the province of Algarves, situated at the southern extremity of the district. The inhabitants are represented as favorable to Don Pedro's cause. This movement had occasioned a great excitement at Lisbon.

It is stated that these propositions were discussed in Don Pedro's council, viz:—

1st. That an army of 4,000 men commanded by the regent in person, should make a descent on Lisbon—2d. That an army, under the command of a general, should proceed to the Algarves in the hope of being joined by a numerous body of Spanish malcontents and deserters, and thence proceed to Lisbon, while Don Pedro awaited the result at Oporto—and 3d. That the whole army should make a sortie from Oporto against the besieging forces, and if successful, march on to Lisbon.

Marshal Solignac strenuously advocated the latter proposition, but the second being adopted he resigned his command of the army. Don Pedro has nominated him grand cordon of the order of the tower and the sword, as a remuneration for his services in the cause of Donna Maria. Gen. Saldanda was immediately appointed to succeed him.

The enlistment for the service of Don Pedro was going on actively in Paris; and among the enlisted are a large number of Polish and Italian refugees.

The friends of the constitutional cause are much dispirited, in consequence of the landing of Don Pedro's troops at Lagos, so great a distance from their original point of destination—Lisbon—and it is generally considered as displaying a great want of generalship on the part of the leaders of the liberal army.

The occurrence portending most disaster to the cause of Don Pedro, at present, we deem to be the acquisition of the services of Marshal Bourmont by his adversary. That officer, formerly minister of war to Charles X. has arrived in London with his aids-de-camp and staff, on his way to Lisbon to take command of Don Miguel's army. Marshal Bourmont is an officer of great military talents.

At the latest dates, the Miguelite fleet continued in the Tagus. Several of the officers continue to desert. Every exertion is making to get the fleet to sea, but the prevailing opinion is, that the crews will not fight. The government of Lisbon has been made acquainted by telegraph of a militia regiment having bodily deserted from Mafra, but no certain information has been received as to where they had gone.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The Dutch troops captured by the French in the citadel of Antwerp, have returned to Holland.

Brussels papers state that the governments of Austria and Prussia have determined on sending accredited ministers to the court of Leopold.

The queen of Belgium is said to be in that state that "ladies wish to be who love their lords."

The Belgian ministers have a majority in the chambers.

RUSSIA.

The king of Prussia begins to entertain suspicions of the persons depicted as missionaries to convert the Jews, and he has, accordingly, issued a cabinet order confining these persons to the strict letter of their commission, abstaining them from political interference of every kind.

His majesty had also issued an order against those Polish insurgents who might seek a refuge in his kingdom.

GERMANY.

The German papers represent this country to be in a very unsettled condition. Several arrests had taken place, and two executions, for political offences.

POLAND.

The Russian accounts from the frontiers of Poland are still harping upon the discontented impatience which is but ill suppressed in that country, and ascribing it to the machinations of the propagandists of France. The "leniency," as it is called, with which the Poles have hitherto been treated is now thought to have had a bad effect upon them, and henceforth a new system is to be adopted, under which even the nobility are not to be exempt from the degradation of corporal punishment. This, no doubt, will be a refinement in the tactics of the cruel autocrat.

Several letters from the frontiers of Poland announce that the young lady Hawecker, aged 18, was recently shot at Lubin by the Russians, accused of having furnished provisions to the insurgents; she proceeded quietly to the place of execution without a file of Russian soldiers. Count Michel Wollowicz having returned from France put himself at the head of the insurgents in the environs of Grodno; engaged in a skirmish with the Russians, was wounded, taken prisoner, and immediately hung at Grodno.

The citadel of Warsaw was nearly completed, and Kiew was also to be strongly fortified.

TURKEY.

The Egyptian army had made a retrograde movement from Asia Minor, and were at the last advices continuing their march over Mount Taurus; in consequence of which the Russian army was to be immediately withdrawn from Constantinople.

LATER NEWS.

Since the above was in type, London papers to the 9th July have been received at New York.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The royal assent by commission was given to the £15,000,000 exchequer bill's bill, and national debt reduction bill.

The lord advocate brought up the Irish church temporalities bill in the house of lords on the 9th ult. when the duke of Buckingham said there was something in the bill which affected the king's prerogative as the head of the church, and he wished to know if earl Grey had the king's permission, and contended that the king's permission should be made known by a special message.

Earl Grey replied that his majesty's permission had been obtained, and he now made the declaration as minister of the crown, and contended there was no necessity for a formal message. The bill was then read and ordered to a third reading on the Monday following. It passed the house of commons on the 8th.

It is stated from a source entitled to consideration, that it has been fully determined by the high tory peers, to give this bill an unqualified opposition in the house of peers, and thus at once bring the question whether the lords form a substantive and efficient branch of the legislature, to an issue. Should the duke of Wellington bring his forces thus in opposition to the ministry on this question, the crisis will have arrived which will determine the strength of earl Grey, and probably, also, the still greater question of a revolution. The conservatives appear to think that the sooner this crisis arrives, the better for themselves, if not for the country; and they anticipate it with a good degree of confidence.

Looking forward to such a crisis in the lords, it is stated that earl Grey has in his pocket, ready to produce on occasion, fifty-six proxies; and that, on the other hand, there are nearly seventy at the disposal of a dual ex-premier. The administration has lost two votes by the demise of the earl of Pomfret and lord King, and as the earl of Mulgrave, by his absence from the country, has not been able to take the oath and his seat in the present parliament, his vote cannot be available.

"The fact is," says one of the leading journals, "ministers, to use a homely phrase, are on their last legs, and they know it. When they are to go is a mere question of policy on the part of the opposition. To the right about, however, they march ere long."

The bishop of Bristol presented a petition against the bill, and protested against it as the death blow of the Protestant faith.

A letter from Fernando Po, states that accounts had been received there that the expedition to the Niger was in great distress—that the natives at the mouth of that river had refused provisions to the crew of the brig left there with supplies for the steam vessels; that the brig had been plundered, and that the engineer of the steamboat and one of the captains had died.

The bill for the emancipation of the West India slaves had been postponed for a few days on motion of Mr. Stanley.

The indemnity to the West Indians is said to be estimated at one third value of the slaves—viz: one third of an able bodied slave £55, ditto one past his prime, £25; ditto, a child, £10. Putting the three sums together, the amount is £90, which gives £30 as the average; and £30 multiplied by 700,000, gives £21,000,000 as the third part of the whole, old and young.

The wheat trade had improved and sales were effected at an advance of 1s. per quarter on previous rates.

PORTUGAL.

The affairs of Don Pedro had brightened. All the cities, towns and villages, forming the kingdom of Algarves from Villa Real to Lagos and Sagres, comprising the whole line of the sea coast, obey already the government of the queen, as also those in the interior. In Olipas, Albufeira and Villa Nova, the people had spontaneously proclaimed the queen even before the arrival of the troops. The governor, viscount Molleboro, had retreated. Great numbers of the officers and soldiers of Miguel's army had joined the army of Don Pedro. The duke of Terceira was following up the enemy, and had taken the military chest containing £6,000, as also forty pieces of artillery. The bishop of Faro had sent in his adhesion.

Captain Napier had determined on immediately blockading the Tagus, and it was believed that his squadron was equal to the contest if Miguel's squadron should fall in with it.

Marshal Bourmont had left Falmouth to take command of Miguel's troops.

The Lisbonians were disappointed in the non-appearance of admiral Napier in the Tagus, as they believe the war would, in that event, have been terminated without bloodshed in favor of the liberals.

Accounts from a source favorable to Miguel's cause represent the affairs of Don Pedro in a different light.

The other intelligence brought by this arrival is not important. Capt. Clark, of the brig Splendid, arrived at New York from Tarragona, reports "that Don Pedro's squadron had captured that of Don Miguel, and had put the whole coast under blockade." Capt. Clark passed Gibraltar on the 11th and received this report from the brig Commerce, for Tampico, which came out of Gibraltar that morning. This report derives confirmation from the fact mentioned by a Gibraltar paper of the 8th July received in Boston, and quoted by the papers of that city, which says that a vessel arrived there on the 6th, which stated that on the morning of the 4th, about 15 miles from Cape St. Vincent, the Miguelite and the patriot squadrons were seen sailing in two parallel lines, though wide apart, in the direction of Cape St. Mary—the former consisting of eleven and the latter of nine vessels—and that after they had been lost sight of, the report of cannon was heard.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF MARYLAND.

From the Baltimore Gazette.

We were pleased to notice the return, within a day or two past, of professor Ducatel and the gentlemen who accompanied him on the late expedition to the Alleghany coal region. They describe their visit and examination as full of interest both personal and public. How far, however, the state with its yet imperfect internal communication will be able to avail itself and its people of objects of such interest is a point upon which these gentlemen of course do not touch—which we think upon with anxiety.

The coal district which is said to exist in the vicinity of Frederick, in the Parr Spring Ridge, did not come at this time under examination. We understand it will be taken in review very shortly. It would certainly be of advantage to have so valuable a mineral in such near vicinity to us—yet so far as it would, if discovered, tend to increase the amount of the capital of the state in that article, it is a matter of small importance. The wealth of the Alleghanies may be said to be inexhaustible—and if the fire of patriotism, supposing it capere is coal in Maryland to supply fuel for the third generation from this might burn themselves to death in the spirit of seventy-six amid the anticipated perpetuity of their institutions.

The region which has been examined commences on the western slope of Davis' mountain. This mountain may be defined on the map as a ridge beginning under that name at a gap in Will's mountain about seven miles S. W. of Cumberland—and then bounded in Maryland by the Potomac and George's creek—in Virginia by the New creek and the same Potomac—it runs nearly through both states, abounding in each in this valuable deposit—and after it has ceased to be called by that name, and is blended with the masses of Will's mountain, it by no means loses its carboniferous character, for the district of Frostburgh yields in abundance and excellence to none.

The Chesapeake and Ohio canal location was made at a distance in a direct line of about 5 or 6 miles from the Frostburgh mine, and surveys for rail roads were extended along the valleys of Jennings' run and Braddock's run, both tributaries of Will's creek. The distance by the former was ascertained to be 9 miles—by the latter 7-5. Some idea of the facilities presented there by nature for internal improvement, and of the consequent prospect of our improvement companies, may be formed, when we learn that by the first and longest route is overcome an elevation of 1,020 feet, by the latter one of 1,103 feet.

At Westernport on the Potomac—which will become a sort of depot for the wealth of Dan's mountain, which we have already mentioned—the canal is to pass about a mile from the mines. Some of our enterprising fellow citizens have been already sagacious enough to avail themselves of the advantages of proprietorship in that neighborhood. How far the coal region extends it is impossible to say now. It has been traced as far as the banks of the Yohogany, that mingles its waves with the western waters. The examinations, however, were of course principally and particularly made as near home as possible.

We have been unintentionally so diffuse upon this matter of the coal deposit, as to leave us no room for speaking of other interesting matters, which will, we suppose, be embraced in the report to be made this winter to the legislature. The framers of that report have it in their power to be the instruments of a great amount of good to the people of this state—and if the information which we expect will be developed in the communication at the next session, had been only by some chance, or Providence more kind than chance, revealed before, there is no knowing how favorable the effect would have been in the direction and laying out of our internal improvement energies. We fervently hope that the time has not yet passed for the production of that effect, at least of some portion of it—and in endeavoring to further it while we leave those who are already engaged to prosecute and propound their geological inquiries, we shall please ourselves and we hope our readers, by our examination in detail, of the political bearing which the situation and the proper wealth of Maryland is calculated to have. To examine the philosophy of these bearings—to ascertain the mechanism of cause and effect connected with them, and to embrace their certain results of wealth and happiness will require an extended and patient review—and all the details of the subject. Such details as we ourselves may have we shall not fail to employ—we look for the rest to the kindness of those who feel the subject to be one of interest and have made it one of consideration.

VISIT TO MR. MADISON.

From the correspondent of the Portland Advertiser.

Orange Court House, Va. May 23, 1833.

I left Charlottesville a little before midnight in the mail stage, and found myself here by day light this morning, distance thirty miles. As Mr. Madison's plantation is only five miles distant from this, I resolved to stop, and to visit almost the last of the Romans. I took a horse, raining though it was, and after going over a Virginia road, about three miles, which you probably know is one of the worst in the world; for here it is "unconventional" to have good roads, I came to a bye-path, a sort of a carriage road that led into the woods, when I kept on riding and riding for nearly two miles, or one and a half, passing one gate that led to a plantation, till I came to another where I met an old negro, who told me the way, and added that his "old master would be glad to see the young gemman," that "Mr. Madison raised him," and that he (the negro) was now "sixty-one years of age," and that "Mr. Madison was a good master," and "would not let his overseer make fight with the men," thus running on with communicative loquacity, seeing he had found a white man to listen to his talk. I rode on then through a well-built gate—on the road-way—leading through an immense field of rye—by yet another gate—and came at last to a large and elegant brick house, built in the Virginia fashion, with wings, a projecting portico, a walk in front, &c. &c.

What on earth could send a man here, I said to myself—here, so far from the road, so far from neighbors, so far from the village, the postoffice—in this hide-and-go-seek place in the woods, where it is difficult to find a dwelling, no matter how conspicuous it may be. But such is the Virginia fashion. The Virginians get off from the road with the same zeal that we crowd on—and here you may travel where there are no signs of life, but where, if you were to sound a trumpet to call men together, they would jump up as from the earth. Truly this is retirement, this habitation in such a field—in such a valley—with the morning music of the whippoorwill and the evening song of the high-tingale—undisturbed but by the little bustle in the neighboring negro camps, or the solitary traveller who, perchance, strays here, as I have done, to pay the homage that is due to character, to patriotism, to an upright and well-done political career. As I fastened my horse, and drew near to the door of the yard, with a well fitted and well painted fence, I was musing much on the changes that come over a man in the course of a long life. How can we accustom ourselves to such a solitude after all the bustle of an active life to which we have been habituated? How can we withdraw and forget men and things, and live and feed on the thoughts within us, and with the few and unvarying companions that our own home affords. Cicero, in that admirable treatise of his—De Senectute, puts into the mouth of Scipio, I think it is he, but my memory of the readings of other days is even now growing rusty—the true lesson for enjoying a happy old age, or a change of life, or meek submission to circumstances. It was not long before I saw a living exemplification and practiser of all these lessons—with yet another aid for the enjoyment of a happy old age than Cicero has spoken of.

I rapped at the door. A servant, courteous, well bred and well dressed, came to my call. I sent in my card, for not expecting to return home this way, I had refused letters offered me by friends in Washington to Mr. and Mrs. Madison. The card was carried to Mr. Madison—and I was invited into the parlor, in the centre of the building, full of the portraits of eminent individuals, among which were those of Washington and Jefferson, and Lafayette, I think, but am not certain—and of paintings also, representing different scenes and passions, but chiefly of a religious character. The furniture was of that rich old cast, which, while it keeps up the idea of magnificence, carries us back to other days, and reminds us that we are in the houses of our ancestors, or our fathers. Mrs. Madison soon appeared, and after a little conversation, carried me into her husband's room, and presented me to Mr. Madison. He was lying on his bed, in a thick silk robe—reading—with the book near at his side, and his spectacles put in to preserve the place. His reception was generous and courteous. His conversation fluent, agreeable, vigorous and frank—and displayed, even on common topics, instruction and interest.

There is no decay of mind—not the least visible decrease of that intellectual vigor which ever distinguished him. His memory seems to be as good as ever—and he speaks of trade, of improvements, of public health, and of the different sections of the country, with all the interest of a man who is calmly but zealously surveying what his countrymen are doing. In speaking of his eyesight, he remarked that it was but a short time since he began to use spectacles. He attributed the long duration of his visual powers to the fact that he was near-sighted—and I was interested in hearing his argument to sustain the position, founded as it was on an intimate knowledge of the science of optics. Of course I avoided, as all persons would, intimate friends excepted, any allusion to the passing politics or scenes of the day—though I should have been interested in hearing him speak of his own Virginia. As to his health, he said it was as good as could be expected, though he was slightly afflicted with rheumatic pains. Old age was his chief disease. He then enlarged the air and climate he lived in, and Mrs. Madison remarked, that there were in this vicinity a large number of very old people. These remarks reminded me of a conversation I had at breakfast at a tavern in the mountains west of this. I inquired of the lady of the house, "What are your prevailing diseases?" "We have none." "Any consumptions?" "No." "Fever?" "No." "What do you die of?" "Oh, of old age." Such being the good reputation of the air and climate in this part of Virginia, I hope Mr. and Mrs. Madison will live many, many years yet.

I tarried as long as politeness would seem to justify. Both pressed upon me with a hospitality distinguishing almost every Virginian, a continuance at dinner—which, though I would have gladly accepted for the sake of a few minutes more conversation with the venerable man, I felt constrained to decline. I parted with both—they offering me their hands, and wishing me with great kindness a prosperous journey homeward.

The character of Mr. Madison I have ever pre-eminently admired. I think him the model of what an American statesman ought to be. Among all our great men, he is my favorite, if not the chief, at least one of the chief. And surely as I look at his fine plantation, his well-housed and happy negroes, his flourishing fields of grain, his flocks of sheep, and see him in his old age, though stretched upon the bed, there nourishing his mind with books, and amassing his idle hours, which else would hang heavily upon him, I cannot but think he is enjoying the true otium cum dignitate, and realizing the picture of a happy old age that Cicero has so touchingly and beautifully described—thus adding to the character of the statesman and the patriot that of the philosopher.

I have said Mr. Madison has yet other aids for the enjoyment of a happy old age, than Cicero speaks of. Added to his own resources, his own house and plantation, he has for a companion, his wife, a lady who even now well sustains her old reputation, that of being one of the most accomplished women in America. With such a companion, he ever has society, interest and conversation by his own bed side. The picture of domestic enjoyment they now exhibit, is one of the most attractive I ever witnessed. How sweet must even old age be when thus softened and watched over! How glorious and good the life of a man after such services, ending thus, with such a companion to administer to his wants and comfort! The fame Mr. Madison has won, the glory he bequeaths to posterity, and the bright pages which his name is to occupy in his country's story, are, after all, not of so much worth to him, as the possession of such a wife.

B.

MR. MADISON.

From the National Intelligencer.

We acknowledge ourselves no little indebted to the highly respectable gentleman, from whose letter to us (dated 15th instant) we have permission to extract the following:

"It will give you pleasure to hear that Mr. Madison, though still confined to his room by rheumatism and general debility, has improved lately in health, and that both his spirits and mental vigor are still unimpaired by age or disease."

"I lately made him a visit in company with Mr. R.—, our late —, and we both agreed that we had scarcely ever before seen his intellect so bright and clear, and had never found him so interesting. He was in a talking vein, and fully verified what Mr. Jefferson used to say of him, that his conversational powers were unrivalled. He amused us with anecdotes of his early contemporaries—answered our inquiries about the olden time—cleared up doubts in our domestic history—and occasionally intermingled reflections on the principles of our government, which were conceived in the spirit of true philosophy, and were expressed with a precision and propriety of language for which, on such subjects, he has no equal. He seldom descends to speak of party politics, and when he does, it is never in a tone of asperity. The sneers of the political pigmies who have discharged their puny shafts at him because he would not sanction their false views of his own text, are of course unheeded by him. His thoughts seem to run rather on principles than individuals—on the great national interests, present and future, rather than on this or that measure of policy. Some of these general remarks appeared to me to be as original as they were just."

Thus he said that so far as the love of power and distinction influenced the feelings of our politicians towards the general government, it had produced contrary effects in the north and the south. In the north the leading men felt a jealousy or apprehension of that levelling, disorganizing spirit, which is impatient of all control, and in its excess threatens the sacredness of property; and that therefore they view the general government with favor and gratitude, and were disposed to enlarge its powers which defended them against the spirit of insubordination at home. But in the south, where there is no ground for such apprehensions—the class of persons without property being here filled by slaves—the leading men regarded the general government as diminishing their relative importance, and consequently were inclined to circumscribe its power within as narrow limits as possible.

"He also remarked that there were three circumstances which contributed to make the value of the union less sensibly felt now than formerly. One was, the greater strength of the several states, arising from their great increase in population and wealth. Another was, the diminished danger from abroad; and the third was the increase of men of talented ambition—though he left it to us to trace the operation of these three changes in our situation, and to make their application. Nor did he venture to predict the future effects of the same circumstances, all of which will obviously continue to increase.* His conversation was throughout a high intellectual treat, and I know not when I have passed two days more delightfully. It is indeed a most gratifying spectacle to see that the luminous mind of this venerable sage and patriot sheds as clear and almost as brilliant a light as it ever did in its meridian, and that the envious clouds which would obscure its mild radiance serve but to make it more beautiful and interesting."

"Mr. Madison will leave, when he shall be inter astra relaxus, an invaluable legacy to posterity in his debates of the convention which formed the federal constitution; for, according to Mr. Jefferson, the only person perhaps to whom the author has ever shown them, never were the proceedings of a deliberative body reported with equal fidelity. But as nothing could induce him to publish them in his life time, I hope it will be many years before the public has this gratification."

*It is to be hoped that we shall find in the growing intelligence of the people, a sufficient counteraction.

VIRGINIA—AND THE CULTIVATION OF TOBACCO.

The Lynchburg Virginian, a paper conducted with a degree of ability, moderation and decorum, of which there are not many examples, contains the prize essay on agriculture in Virginia, by C. W. Gooch, esq. of Henrico county. This is instructive for every agriculturist and American politician. It confirms the remark of ours, at which the Richmond Enquirer took umbrage, that it would be better for the Virginians to concede to objects of public economy, such as husbandry and internal improvements, much of that time and concern which they give to metaphysical discussions of state rights and hyperbolic panegyric of state oracles. Let us make some extracts from Mr. Gooch's essay, that carries with it authority. [Nat. Gaz.]

"If you examine the plantation of the tobacco-maker, you find every appearance of poverty or unpardonable neglect. The owner will acknowledge that things ought to be and might be better; but that he has no time to spare, owing to the pressure of his crops, particularly his tobacco crop, which interferes with all other operations throughout the whole year. There is much truth in his excuses; for, in January, February and March, he is clearing new grounds; preparing and burning plant-beds; fencing, manuring and fallowing tobacco lots; sowing oats; ploughing and preparing corn land; and, either stripping or prizing tobacco; perhaps both. In April, May and June, his toils begin to assume more interest, and require more exertion: his whole crop of corn is to plant, replant, thin weed and cultivate; the tobacco hills are to be made, turned, cut off, and the first plantings made. The old crop of tobacco is yet to finish prizing, and hauled to market, if not previously done; experience having proven that the longer it is kept before prizing, the sounder and better cured it will be—especially for shipping. Harvest is now at hand; but that period of industry and festivity to the mere farmer, brings with it sleepless toil and accumulated cares to the planter. The replanting tobacco, the topping of that which stood well, and the most careful tillage of the whole with the hand hoe, press him on the one hand; whilst, on the other, his late corn is not yet laid by, and his grain requires cutting. From the pressure of the corn and tobacco, the grain is too often literally mowed down and shocked about the field in a still more hurried and slovenly manner, to be half destroyed by winds and rains. Throughout the months of July, August and September, not a moment's respite is enjoyed. The tobacco crop has to be gone over more than a dozen times in the laborious operations of topping, succouring, worming, working, cutting, piling, removing to the houses and curing. The small grain must be hauled up and stacked, and when the deprecations of the weather leave no other alternative, the wheat is gotten out and carried to market. The fodder soon has to be secured, and this comes on just with the cutting of tobacco. During the other three months of the year, the better securing of the fodder, the gathering and housing of the corn, and the sowing of the next year's crop of winter grain, leave no leisure time to the poor planter. The tobacco, although housed, must be closely watched; the latter cuttings cured; and then commence the tedious operations of striking, stripping, assorting and bulking away. Besides these conflicting objects of attention, there are many others that demand the care and attention of the planter. The whole circle of the year is one scene of bustle and toil, in which tobacco claims a constant and chief share. No time can be devoted to the planting of fruit and ornamental trees—to ditching—cleaning up waste and reclaiming galled spots—making and spreading manure on the grain fields—deep and careful ploughing—sowing clover and plaster—or providing comfortable shelters for stock in the winter. The dwelling house, yard and garden enclosures and all the out buildings too often fall into decay for the want of some trifling repairs, which the crop hands might make, if they had time. The plantation soon looks tattered and almost desolate—galled and gullied hill sides, and sedge, briary fields show themselves in every direction. The profits from the destruction of one plantation are applied to the purchase of another, and more negroes. The new one is put in charge of an overseer on shares, who soon brings it to greater sterility and desolation. It is in this way that most of the best lands in Virginia have been brought to their present condition, and have been, then, deserted by the destroyers."

"But the existence of negro slavery among us, has, in a great degree influenced the mode of destroying our lands, and hastened its accomplishment. In former times, the exactions of the master were only limited by his cupidity. In this respect, a favorable change has taken place. Our slaves are now as well fed and clothed, and enjoy as many comforts, as the laboring class in other countries; and they have improved proportionably in their appearance and intelligence. It is not my purpose to touch the dark question which involves their future destiny. Its agitation has, already, on two occasions, roused a state of feeling which verged to desperate extremes. Whatever evils may attend it, the right of property can never be permitted to be questioned by others."

"The possession of slaves has had too great a tendency to make the owner and family unwilling to take upon themselves any part of the drudgery of out door business; and too many of our people think it disreputable to labor. We have been accustomed to be waited upon from our infancy, and, consequently, keep about us too many wasteful and almost idle domestics. Exempted from labor and even from the common cares of business by the employment of agents, we imbibed habits and modes of thinking unfavorable to physical improvement or successful agriculture. The unfinished houses, and projects half executed, which are to be seen throughout the state, are evidences of the meaning and truth of this remark. That the ease in which we have so long indulged, favors the attainment of literary and political knowledge and personal accomplishments, is manifest from the acknowledged proficiency of Virginians in these respects. But, whilst we are all politicians, to a man, it is to be regretted that our achievements in the arts and sciences bear no just proportion to the opportunities we have had. May not this arise from the ill-judged devotion of too much time to pleasure and dissipation? It is unfashionable for a genteel or educated Virginian to apply himself to the details and cares of the humble, but useful vocations of life. And hence it is, that the most of the sprightliness and genius of the state have been applied to one of the two learned professions. The pulpit is of late, putting in its claim to the aspirations of our youth. Have not agriculture and the arts been too long robbed in this way, of their just share of talents—of men whose intellectual endowments might have given a more winning countenance to the venerated mother of us all.

"The white man who has to labor for his support, does it with an unwilling spirit. He sees the exemption enjoyed by others, and if he does not fancy himself equally entitled to it, is too apt to repine at his lot, or migrate to some new state, where he will be upon a footing of greater equality with his neighbors."

"But, independent of the enervating and paralyzing effects of slavery upon all of our white population, there are pecuniary losses, arising from it, that are heavy drawbacks to the agriculturist. Most of the labors of agriculture have been confided to careless operators. The slave feels no inducement to execute his work with effect. He has a peculiar art of slighting it, and seeming to be busy, when, in fact, he is doing little or nothing. Nor can he be made to take proper care of stock, tools, or any thing else. He will rarely take care of his clothes, or his own health, much less of his companions when sick and requiring his aid and kindness. There is, perhaps, not in nature, a more heedless, thoughtless human being than a Virginia field negro. With no care upon his mind, with warm clothing, and plenty of food, under a good master, he is far the happier man of the two. His maxim is, 'come day, go day, God send Sunday.' His abhorrence of the poor white man is very great. He may, sometimes, feel a reflected respect for him, in consequence of the confidence and esteem of his master and others. But this trait is as remarkable in the white as in the black man. All despise poverty, and seem to worship wealth. To the losses which arise from the dispositions of our slaves, must be added those which are occasioned by their habits. There seems to be almost an entire absence of moral principle among the mass of our colored population. But details upon this subject would be here misplaced. To steal and not to be detected is a moral among them; as it was with certain people in ancient times, and is, at this day, with some unenlightened portions of mankind. And the vice which they hold in the greatest abhorrence is that of telling upon one another. There are many exceptions, it is true; though this description embraces more than the majority. The numerous free negroes and worthless, dissipated whites, who have no visible means of support, and who are rarely seen at work, derive their chief subsistence from the thefts of the slaves. These thefts amount to a great deal in the course of the year, and operate like leeches on the fair income of agriculture. They vary, however, in every county and neighborhood in exact proportion as the markets for the plunder vary. In the vicinities of towns and villages, they are the most serious. Besides the actual loss of property occasioned by them, they involve the riding of our horses at night, and the corruption of the habits and the injury of the health of the slaves; for whiskey is the price generally received for them. These evils have been always felt; but they have become so great of late, that the legislature ought to provide a more efficient remedy. The statute book would seem to contain one.—'Whether the defect be in the law or in its execution,' is not for me to decide. It sometimes happens that the head thief on a farm is in partnership with the overseer; and when this is the case, the husbandman has no chance for profit."

"Albemarle is the native county of the writer; yet he is not blind to the beauties, the advantages and value of lower Virginia. Its great misfortune has been, the facility with which subsistence could be procured without much labor. The palatable productions of the air, the land, and the water, have too much enervated, may I not say, paralysed the energies of the people. At one time, the monopoly of property and the proud aristocratic feeling of the Dons, kept every thing subservient to them; and, to them, and their pride, and practical anti-republicanism, lower Virginia is more indebted for her drooping appearance, both in the general aspect of the country, and the general mind, than to any thing else. The effects of emigration would not have been so serious in lower Virginia, but for the pride of the 'untitled nobility.' Thank God, that there is now some hope for a change! The revolutions of fortune have left but few of the old gentry, who are not more or less disposed to mingle, without conscious disgrace among the common people; and, always, when they want office or public favor: and those who do remain of that caste, whilst they may justly feel the pride of pedigree, must feel also a conviction that their ancestors have a little over-stepped the mark in this subject. But, things are getting right; and, it is unseemly to talk too much about a depriving shade! We ought to let it pass; because we have more recent, and now more formidable pretensions to combat." * * * *

"We have too long trod in the old and beaten track of our ancestors. Has not the time arrived when the agricultural community ought to rouse from this lethargy—avail themselves of the wonderful improvements of the age—at any rate show a disposition to avail themselves of all new discoveries, and to better their condition? Why should we permit every thing else to get so far the start of us? Our neighbors to the north, and even to the west, deride and shame us, by their superior skill and industry, and the consequent superior advantages and comforts they enjoy! Then, let us 'be up and doing.' We have the climate, the soil and other superior advantages that a kind Providence has bestowed upon us. We have every thing necessary for the exhibition of enviable scenes of rural beauty, prosperity and happiness—yes, every thing but the industry—and a disposition to do so. How long will we submit to so just a reproach!!?"

"LIBERTY OR DEATH!"

Providence, (R. I.) July 12.
"Twas some poor fellow's skull said he,
Who fell in the famous victory."—Southey.

A few days since, as the laborers employed by the Providence aqueduct, were employed in excavating the earth in the rear of Dyer's block, Broad street, they fell upon the bones of a human being, apparently belonging to a man of the age of thirty or forty years. The finding of the bones elicited a variety of conjecture, and whilst one was of opinion, that they belonged to some poor creature who fell a victim to inasonic vengeance, another was decidedly impressed with the belief, that they were the bones of one who had been murdered for his money.

In the midst of all this speculation, the venerable captain Turpin Smith, from the stores of his memory shed a flood of light on the subject. According to captain Smith the bones unquestionably belonged to an unfortunate negro, who preferred the repose of the grave to a life of suffering and bondage. Thus was captain Smith's story.

About the year 1758, seventy five years ago, a sloop came to this port, from the island of Curacao, commanded and manned by free men of color, descended from the fathers of Africa. The sloop, in consequence of some informality in her papers was seized, and the companions of her voyage, were adjudged to be "contraband goods," and it was decreed by the colonial courts, that they should be sold into perpetual bondage, for the benefit of his majesty of England.

The day of sale at length arrived, and the unoffending negroes were offered for sale at public auction "at the foot of the hill," near the place where the bones of which we have spoken were found. When the auctioneer, had commenced the sale, one of the blacks stepped forward, and in the presence of the throng that had assembled, said, that if he were sold, he would kill himself on the spot, and thus escape that slavery to which he was not entitled. The auctioneer, considered the avowals of the black were rant and bravado, and in a few minutes sold him to a speculator in "bones and sinews." The moment the auctioneer had declared the sale, the indigent and despair stricken negro, thrust a dagger to his heart and instantly died on the spot! A hole was soon dug into which he was thrust without ceremony, and there he has probably reposed until removed by the excavation a few days since. [City Gazette.

"FIRST TEMPERANCE MOVEMENTS."

More than a year ago we noticed an allusion to the first movements in the cause of temperance, by the editor of the New York Journal of Commerce, who represented that "the individual who first entered the field of temperance efforts, was Little Turtle, the Indian orator of the Wabash. In 1802 or 1803, he attended the legislature of Kentucky, accompanied by Capt. Wells as his interpreter, who was afterwards killed at Chicago. He got a committee raised on a petition for the passage of a law to prevent the sale of whiskey to the Indians. The same effort was made to the legislature of Ohio, where Little Turtle made an eloquent speech, but the law failed in that state."

Little Turtle may have been the pioneer in the west, in the great cause which now attracts so much interest, and has become truly a national cause; but his were by no means the first temperance movements. So far from it, indeed, the first temperance movements of which we have any account, were made as early as 1668, by the chiefs of the Penacook Indians, in which year we find a formal complaint against "Capt. Walderne" and "Peter Coffin" to the general court, for "trading liquors with the Indians, fearing that thereby the Mohawks would take advantage of them when they were or should be drunk, and kill them."

Capt. Richard Waldron, having obtained license to locate a "trucking house" at Penacook, a white man was killed by an Indian in a fit of intoxication. These same chiefs, Tahanto, Paucokawntee, Pekagan, Sumkeegannough, Nohow, and others, among other matters depose, "that in or about April or May last past, (1668) when they did hear that captain did intend to sit up an house, and place Englishmen in it for trading, they, the said examnants went to ye said captain Walderne's house at Pascataqua, and intreated him not to send, or suffer any liquors to be sent to ye said house." This entreat having been disregarded, inasmuch as captain Waldron did subsequently load four Indians with liquors, "these said examnants agayne (as they say) went to them with many more, and intreated them that they would send noe more liquors to them, or suffer any to be sent, &c."

We also find among these same "Penacooke" papers (published in the 3d volume of the Collections of the New Hampshire Historical society) the deposition of John Page, Robb Pains, Thomas Tarhall and Joseph Blond, in relation to the murder before mentioned, wherein they represent that in "going to Penacooke" they met some Indians belonging thereto; inquired of them "how and whether the Indians were drunk when the Englishman was killed, and they answered all Indians were drunke, or else they had not killed Englishman. And further we evidence TAHANTO, a Sagamore, being afraid that we had brought liquors to sell, desired us if we had any, that we would power it uppon the ground, for it would make ye Indians all one drill!"

"Little Turtle (says the Journal of Commerce) drew some striking features of "whiskey drinking amongst his people. He portrayed the Indian tradings in as strong colors as may now be drawn of the grocery keepers, stripping the poor Indian, who had a wife and children dependent on him, and starving at home, though stripped of his skins, his gun and his shirt."

But the arguments of Little Turtle are all included in the brief and simple objection of TAHANTO. The effect of strong drink is the same upon all; it makes both white man and Indian "all one drill!" [N. H. Statesman.

USE OF THE EYES.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

The last number of the Biblical Repository contains a long and interesting article, written by Dr. Edward Reynolds, of this city, entitled Hints to Students on the Use of the Eyes. We are prevented, by the length of this article, from transferring it to our columns: but, as some of the suggestions contained in it are at variance with the notions commonly entertained upon the subject, it may gratify our readers to know the results to which the experience of Dr. Reynolds has led him, even unaccompanied by his full and various illustrations. The present period is marked by an unusual prevalence of diseases of the eye; and it is generally believed, that a studious course of life has an almost necessary tendency to produce them. This is declared by Dr. Reynolds to be a mistake; these diseases arise, not from the proper, but the extravagant use of the organ; in other words, from the abuse of it; in many instances, unconsciously. One of the most common and least suspected causes of weakness of sight, is the exposure of the eye to the frequent alternations of weak and strong light. In order to avoid this, the eye should never be exposed suddenly to a strong light, on awaking from sleep: the apartment selected for a study should be well lighted, as well by day as in the evening; and no person, who devotes the evening to study, should previously sit for any considerable time in darkness, with the mistaken view of giving rest to his eyes. In reading and writing, the eye should have that moderate degree of light, which produces distinct vision, unattended by any unpleasant sensation: the light of the room should be as equally distributed as possible, but not reflected nor concentrated. The danger of exposure of the eyes to a highly concentrated light is shown by reference to two cases of incurable blindness, in individuals, who watched the progress of the late solar eclipse with the naked eye. As respects the quantity of light best adapted to evening study, Dr. Reynolds recommends the use of the common Argand study lamp without the dark shade. If any shade be used, one of oiled paper is preferable to the usual one of ground glass, the light produced by which is too concentrated. The practice of wearing a shade before the eyes, in reading by candle light, is pernicious, because, by keeping them in an unnatural state of darkness, it exposes them to the evils arising from the sudden change from a weak light to a strong one; but this habit is less pernicious than that of reading and writing by twilight. Gazing at the moon for a considerable time, or at the lightning, is highly injurious. Reading and writing by a side light, should also be avoided; the best light is that, which is sufficient for distinct vision, and which falls over the left shoulder, in an oblique direction from above, on the book or study table. Among the evil habits arising from neglect of these precautions are those of sitting with the back to the window, and holding the book or paper before the eyes, and holding of a candle between the eye and the book. Dr. Reynolds also observes, on the subject of light, that the brim of the hat, in summer, should be unfashionable enough to protect the eye from the direct rays of the burning sun.

The morning is the season of the day when the eyes can best endure severe labor; but it is unwise to go immediately from the bed to the study table. Much use of them after a full meal should be avoided, as well as all labor of study, which strains the eyes, when the body is in a heated condition. The straining of the eyes by artificial evening light is pernicious. When the student is obliged to use them much by candle light, he should select such reading or study, as is not necessarily connected with great mental effort. Writing, when it is not attended with much intellectual exertion, is preferable to reading. Among the preservatives of the sight, the enjoyment of free, pure air—daily and regular exercise—the arrangement of the dress so as not to interfere with the freedom of the circulation—strict temperance—a proper quantity of sleep—and a sufficient amount of use or action of the eyes—are enumerated as the most important. When the signs of an improper use of them are experienced, they should be allowed a season of repose, which is better accomplished by a change than a cessation of labor. Simple washing with the hand in cold water, is, in general, the best means of strengthening the eyes. There are some prevalent habits among studious men, by which they are very apt to be injured. Among them, is the practice of rubbing them on awakening from sleep—the exposure of them to strong currents of wind—of reading when the body is in a recumbent position—of using them too early after the system has been affected by severe disease—of employing them in the examination of very minute objects—of using tobacco, which affects the nerve of the eye, as well as other parts of the system—and of habitually wearing green glasses, which increase the weakness they are intended to relieve. The use of eye waters should be avoided, at least of any stronger than good river water.

There are some other subjects treated in this article, among which are the signs which determine the time when the use of spectacles is attended with advantage, and an examination of the question, whether the Greek and Hebrew type affect the eyes injuriously, to which we have room at present only to allude. The above is quite an imperfect sketch of the contents of the article, but we have thought that, even in this form, a view of it might be agreeable to our readers.

"THE WONDERS OF THE DEEP,"

WITH "FISH STORIES."

Having no present pressure of urgent matter upon us, we take an opportunity to give a little more variety to the contents of our pages, and offer a few interesting articles concerning the "wonders of the deep."

HISTORY OF THE SEA-SERPENT.

From the Boston Mercantile Journal, of July 9.

The earliest account of an animal of this general description is furnished by Pantoppidou, bishop of Bergen, in Norway, and author of an old natural history, in the first editions of which is a picture of the serpent. This gives him a name—an appearance doubtless caused by his rapid motion through the water. He says, it lay on the water, when it was calm; and when it moved, parts of the back were to be seen in the line of the head. The color was dark brown, variegated with light spots or streaks. The animal appeared regularly many years off the coast of Nordland, in July and August, where all the inhabitants were familiarly acquainted with him, though the bishop doubted the whole story for a long time. He represents the length to have been 600 feet, and the size that of two hogheads!—a statement which furnishes rather curious food for discussion. It was at least an immense exaggeration of the ignorant peasants and fishermen.

The bishop also cites a letter, dated 1751, from a captain in the Swedish navy, De Ferry, relating to a snake seen by him near Molde, on a calm hot day in August, 1746. He fired at it, on which it immediately sunk. Observing the water to be red, he supposed he had wounded it. The head, he relates, was like that of a horse—and a grayish color—the mouth was quite black and very large. He also mentions the bright mane. The eyes were black, and there were seven or eight thick folds, about six feet distance from one another. This letter was sworn to before the Bergen magistrates.

In 1804, Alden Bradford, esq. then of Maine, addressed a letter to J. Q. Adams, then secretary of the American academy, transmitting documents to shew that a large sea serpent had been seen in and about Penobscot bay. The academy laid them aside, and they first appeared in Siliman's Journal, in 1820. One was a letter from the rev. Mr. Cummings, of Sullivan, Me. dated August, 1803; and another was dated August, 1804. The animal was seen by Mr. Cummings, his wife, daughter, and another lady, as they were on their passage to Belfast, between Cape Rosol and Long Island. It was in the month of July; the sea was calm; there was very little wind; and the first appearance of the serpent was near Long Island. Mr. C. supposed it to be a large shoal of fish, with a seal at one end of it; but he wondered the seal should raise out of the water so much higher than usual; as he drew near, they discovered the whole appearance to be one animal in the form of a serpent. He had not the horizontal, but an ascending and descending serpentine motion. This account also refers to the description given by other persons of similar animals.

A letter of March, 1781, from captain Little of our navy, to Mr. Bradford, states that in May, 1780, as he was lying in Broad bay, (Penobscot), in a public armed ship, he discovered at sunrise, a large serpent coming down the bay on the surface of the water. The cutter was manned and armed; he went himself in the boat; and when within 100 feet of the serpent, the mariners were ordered to fire on him; but before they could make ready, he plunged into the water. He was not less than 45 to 50 feet long; the largest diameter of his body was supposed to be 15 inches; and his head, nearly the size of that of a man, he carried four or five feet out of water. He wore every appearance of a black snake. He was afterwards pursued, but they never came nearer to him than a quarter of a mile. A Mr. Joseph Kent, of Marshfield, says captain Little, saw a like animal at the same place in the year 1751, which was longer and larger than the main boom of his sloop, of 85 tons. He observed him within ten or twelve yards of the vessel.

The declaration of Eleazer Crabtree is then given, who lived at Fort Island, in the bay of Penobscot, in the year 1777 and 1778. He had frequently heard of a sea monster frequenting the waters near the shore; and doubting the fact, he went one day upon receiving information from a neighbor, that he was then in the sea near his house. He saw a large animal in the form of a snake, lying almost motionless in the water, about 500 feet from the bank where he stood. His head was about four feet above the surface; he appeared a hundred feet long; and he supposed him to be three feet in diameter. Many other inhabitants, upon whose veracity he could depend, had also declared to him that at other times they had seen such an animal.

A letter from "captain Crabtree" (probably the same person as above), was published in the papers of 1793, relating to a snake, about 60 feet long, which he saw near Mt. Desert, in June of that year.

In a letter of 1817, from the rev. Mr. Jenks of this city to the hon. Judge Davis, he states, on the authority of Mr. Cummings, that the British saw the animal in their expedition to Bagaduce, (New Castine), and that various other persons at different times have beheld him.

In June, 1815, the serpent was seen off Plymouth, Mr. Finney, a respectable old whaler, deposed on oath, that at first it showed a length of about thirty feet; but in turning, about half a mile off, it displayed at least one hundred feet. It afterwards came nearer, when it stopped and lay entirely motionless on the surface for five minutes, or more. The appearance was like a string of buoys—thirty or forty of which, of about the size of a barrel, were exhibited. He was seen by Finney and others again soon after.

In August, 1817, he frequently visited Gloucester. Those persons, who saw 60, 70 or 90 feet of his length, all mention his joints, rings, bunches or swells; and one gentleman in particular, who saw him lying still, observed these bunches very distinctly, about one foot in height, upon his back. Capt. Tappan, and two of his crew, on board the Laura, of Newburyport, saw his head within 30 or 50 feet, and described it with minuteness. It was formed like that of a serpent's; his tongue was thrust out, and appeared about two feet in length; this he raised several times over his head, and then let it fall again; it was of a light brown color, and the end of it resembled a harpoon.—The eye was like that of an ox, and there appeared to be a small bunch over it on each side of his head. The animal did not appear to be disturbed by the vessel, and his motion was much swifter than that of any whale. He was certified also to have been seen by Beverly, Salem and other mariners. A horse-mackerel was taken by a Boston party, which cast some ridicule on the believers in the real serpent.

The most distinct affidavits were made in 1818, by the most creditable witnesses, of his appearance off Cape Ann and we may name especially those published in the Hallowell Gazette and Advocate.

The Centinel of August 28, 1819, contains a long statement of a similar spectacle from Samuel Cabot, addressed to col. T. H. Perkins. A letter from Marshall Prince to Judge Davis, to the same effect, also appeared, and another from the hon. J. T. Austin. Mr. Prince saw him at Nahant. He says, "His head appeared about three feet out of water. I counted 13 bunches on his back—my family thought there were 15. He crossed three times at a moderate rate across the bay, but so fleet as to occasion a foam in the water. My family and self, who were in a carriage, judged that he was from 50 and not more than 60 feet in length. As he swam up the bay, we and the other spectators moved on and kept nearly abreast of him. I had seven distinct views of him from the long beach, and at some of them the animal was not more than 100 yards distant. On passing the second beach, we were again gratified beyond even what we saw in the other bay, which I concluded he had left in consequence of the number of boats in the offing in pursuit of him." The Evening Gazette furnished some additional documents authenticated by Mr. Bradford.

We will add to this history a paragraph from the Kennebunk Gazette of July, 1830: "The coast in our immediate vicinity has at last received a visit from the fair famed sea serpent. He was seen by three men, who were fishing a few miles distant from the shore, on Thursday afternoon last. Two of the men were so much alarmed at his nearness to the boat, that they went below. The third, however, Mr. Gooch, a man whose statements can be relied on, remained on deck and returned the glances of his serpentship for a considerable length of time. He gives the following account of the interview: The fish was first seen a short distance from them, and shortly after he turned about and came within six feet of the boat, when he raised his head about four feet from the water, and looked directly into the boat, and so remained for several minutes. Mr. Gooch noticed him attentively, and thinks he was sixty feet in length, and about six in circumference." &c.

The reader will find further details in Gray and Bowen's edition of Buffon. We are free to say that they leave little doubt on our own mind of the existence of a sea serpent. For the present our belief must be singular. The recent additions to the story remain to be discussed.

From the Boston Centinel of July 9.

A party of 80 to 100 ladies and gentlemen embarked yesterday morning in the steamer Connecticut, for the purpose of taking an excursion in the lower harbor, with the expectation of getting a view of his serpentine majesty. About 12 o'clock, when the steamboat was half way between Nahant and the Graves, the monster was seen approaching. A number of gentlemen took the small boat and made directly for it, but unfortunately did not run upon the animal as was intended, owing to a little mismanagement in rowing. The serpent came within an oar's length of the boat, and without appearing at all alarmed or uneasy, took a slight curve towards the steamboat, passed under her stern within fifty or sixty feet, and then disappeared. We understand it was the opinion of those in the small boat that he might easily have been struck, but unfortunately there was no harpoon on board. At this time his motion was not undulating as has sometimes been stated, but rather like the movement of an eel or common water snake. It has been reported that there have been three or more of these strange creatures seen lately, one of which is supposed to be 150 feet long. The one seen yesterday, was from 60 to 70 feet in length. We would recommend some of our sporting friends who are skilled in the management of a whale boat, and use of the harpoon, to make an attempt upon the liberty of this marine monster, and there is but little doubt he might be taken.

The foregoing account is furnished by a gentleman who was one of the passengers, and had a good opportunity to see the serpent from the small boat, and whose certificate is annexed. This statement in its material bearings is also corroborated by several other gentlemen with whom we have conversed, who were on board the steamer. The excursion of yesterday, has afforded a much better opportunity of seeing this strange animal, than has occurred for years, and it is not inconsistent with the whole tenor of the statements that have been made at different times by great numbers of persons for the last fifteen years, since a monster of this description was first announced in our waters, it is admitted on all hands that the appearance of a marine animal of this description, would be still more extraordinary, if so many witnesses should be so grossly deceived, as would be the case, if no such animal had appeared. One or the other of these extraordinary difficulties is presented for the belief of the public, and we are of opinion that it would not require so great a stretch of credulity to believe in the existence of such an enormous sea serpent, as to believe that so many persons could be so greatly deceived. We learn that a gentleman fired at him with a musket from the steamer, but without effect. The shot was given before he had approached so near the steamer as he did a few minutes afterwards. The first thing that attracted the attention of those who were in the steamer, was a peculiar appearance in the water at a distance supposed to be occasioned by a shoal of small fish that he was apparently pursuing. Three distinct appearances of this kind were observed at the same time afar off, and the steamer made for one of them, in pursuit of which the serpent appeared to be. It is therefore inferred by some of the passengers that there are three of the strange animals, as has been before stated.

We the undersigned, passengers on board the steamboat Connecticut, do hereby testify that we were in the small boat which put off from the steamboat, and approached within ten feet of a sea monster, which passed under our bow at a very rapid rate. As near as we can judge from the view we had of him, his head resembled that of a pickerel. His head only appeared on the surface; as to the length of it, it is impossible to determine. The motion was not like that of the porpoise, but resembled that of a common snake.

Benjamin H. Norton, James W. Hale, William Tewksbury, jr., Samuel S. Williams, George W. Proctor, passengers.
Thomas Purcell, James Gahagan, oarsmen.

The Nantucket Inquirer, in reference to the late reports respecting sea serpents seen in Boston bay, says—

"If the object or objects seen were not a shoal of porpoises, a regiment of horse-mackerel, or an Indian file of swordfish rapidly circumnavigating a certain space inclosing their intended prey, as in their wont, then possibly there may have been upon the premises a quarter of a mile of sea-snake, coiled like a cable, in the condition represented. At all events the news came so credibly attested, that quite an excitement agitated some of our veteran harpooners—and a proposal to go and take him, nolens volens, was started yesterday with what success we have not yet learned. Should the enterprise be actually undertaken, we shall soon put his marine majesty in a pickle somewhat less congenial to his feelings than that of 'the salt sea ocean.'"

THE SEA ELEPHANT.

From capt. Fanning's voyages, lately published at New York.

These amphibious animals, at the proper season, come up out of the sea in various numbers at a time, and on reaching the beach, lay in rows along the same, such being what are technically called rookeries, though some contain many more than others. The full aged males alone have the proboscis, and some of these are truly enormous animals, varying from twelve to twenty-four feet in length, and with a proportionate height and breadth. The females, at this season, come on shore to shed their coat (as do also the males) and bring forth their young; they have generally one, sometimes two, never more at a birth, and rarely, if ever, even at full age, do they attain over half the size and dimensions of the male.

On land, the elephant is a very loggy (a sea term, meaning heavy in their movements) animal, and except among themselves, or in their own defence, never make a battle. They are taken for their oil and tongues, which are considered a delicious dish and more luscious than neat's tongue. When first coming to their favorite shore, (a sandy or pebbly beach) the animal is exceedingly plump, and very fat, the full grown generally yielding about three barrels of oil; but in a few weeks it falls away, becomes lank and poor, and by the time to go off comes about, would not give above half that quantity.

In taking the younger, a club is commonly used, and for the old ones, a lance; yet in order to overcome the largest bulls, it is necessary to have a musket loaded with a brace of balls; with this, advancing in front of the animal, to within a few paces, they will rise on the fore legs or flippers; and at the same time the mouth opens widely to send forth one of their loud roars; this is the moment to discharge the balls through the roof of the upper jaw into the brains, whereupon the creature falls forward, either killed, or so much stunned, as to give the sealer sufficient time to complete its destruction with the lance. They are frequently discovered sleeping, in which case the muzzle of the piece is held close to the head, and discharged into the brain. The loudest noise will not awaken these animals when sleeping; as it is not unusual, though it may appear singular, for the hunter to go on and shoot one without awakening those alongside of it, and in this way proceed through the whole rookery, shooting and lancing as many as are wanted. The quantity of blood in these animals is really astonishing, exceeding, in the opinion of the author, double the quantity found in a bullock of the same weight; when killed, the whole thickness of the blubber or fat, with its skin, is cut into strips of from five to ten inches in width, according to the animal's size; and thus cut from head to tail, torn from the carcass and separated from the lean flesh, are then washed clear of the blood and taken to a mincing table, where the skin is taken off, while the blubber, after being cut into pieces about two inches or less in size, is thrown into a kettle and tried out: the oil thus produced being put into casks, the scraps always furnishing plenty of fuel for the try kettle; a new cask after being filled with the boiling oil is then started and coopered, necessarily, from not being fully shrunk, requiring to be filled again with the boiling oil, and even the third time, if it has not done shrinking after the second filling, which can easily be discovered; this course being particularly attended to, it may finally be cooped and stowed away in the ship's hold, to be filled up by the hose, and will remain tight for the voyage, in all climates, nor require wetting for any length of time, or lose a gill of oil of shrinkage. This it is presumed would be the case as to the casks with sperm or other oil; the author is also of opinion that without this careful method, a much greater loss will take place from leakage than is experienced by this process of shrinking the casks with the boiling oil, even though the casks are frequently wet, to do which in a ship's hold at sea, in any weather, is always an unpleasant job, and requires a vast deal of labor. In the maws of the sea elephant, a quantity of gravel or sand is generally found.

THE SWORD FISH.

From the Nantucket Inquirer.

It is not commonly known by dwellers in metropolitan cities and other remote regions, that the swordfish, the natural enemy of the whale, is often taken in this vicinity, and that its flesh is held in such great estimation by piscivorous epicures, that it always commands a high price in our fish market. To those who delight in devouring the inhabitants of the deep, a slice of this formidable sea-warrior affords a meal of great delicacy. In shape, the swordfish is nearly cylindrical, handsomely tapering from the head downwards, and terminating in a wide scolloped tail, in which, as in Samson's hair, lies his chief strength. It has a black and shining skin, without scales, similar to that of the spermæti whale. They are commonly from 10 to 15 feet in length, weighing from 200 to 500 lbs. The sword, as it is called, or bone, projecting horizontally from the head, is the principal instrument which it employs, either as a weapon of attack, or as a means of procuring food. This 'sword' is extremely hard, with a rough, grating surface, some 4 to 6 feet long, 5 or 6 inches wide, two-edged, and through the centre about two inches in thickness. This weapon seems to answer the purpose of the swordfish, as cleverly as the trunk of the elephant subserves the convenience of that sagacious animal.

Instances are quite common, of whales being found wounded on the under side, doubtless by this instrument; and whale ships have frequently been attacked in like manner. We have seen a plank taken from the bottom of a whaler, through which the sword of one of these fish had penetrated, leaving nearly a foot inside the vessel, and twice that length outside. Unable to withdraw it, the weapon of course became forfeit, and the head of the adventurous assailant must have experienced much pain in parting with it—for it was found broken off near its junction with the skull. So tightly did it remain in the wood, that no perceptible leak occurred in consequence, though the ship must have had still a considerable portion of her voyage to accomplish. From this fact, an idea may be formed of the tremendous force exerted by the swordfish, by means of his peculiarly formed tail, when ascending in a perpendicular direction through the water.

Of the habits of this fish, very little has hitherto been known. An experienced fisherman has lately stated to us some facts in the premises, with which we were much interested. They live upon mackerel, or any smaller fish which swim in shoals—obtaining their prey in a most singular manner. Commencing their pursuit in a roundabout style, like some cunning logicians, they take a wide circuit, gradually lessening the periphery of their circumnavigation, and increasing their speed, until the numerous objects of their appetite are huddled into a close mass—when the pursuer bolts for the centre, sinking a moment, then coming up swiftly, sword first, and commonly transfixing three or four victims. Some species of whales, we believe, are in the habit of surrounding their prey in the same manner. After the swordfish has secured one or more of the smaller fry, in the mode above related, he may be seen with his head partly above water, leisurely thrashing his prize about, as it were in play, until the victim is torn in pieces, when, and not before, he sets about devouring it secundum artem. In almost every other respect this fish appears to evince but very little sagacity. It must indeed be a stupid exploit to stick one's horn through a ship's bottom, without the power of extraction—and the sluggish indifference with which they regard the harpoons and lances employed against their own lives—often coming as it were voluntarily, to receive a second or third wound, instead of going off at full speed to the ends of the earth, argues no sort of discretion.

When these fish are brought to market, they are cut into transverse slices, of the ordinary thickness of a beefsteak—and cooked after any of the divers fashions applicable to any other fish. There is less bone in the body of the swordfish than in the halibut—the back bone, or rather centre bone running through without branches or ribs, from stem to stern, like the wick of a candle. Their eyes are much larger than those of the largest whales. We have seen them, when stripped of the external coat, big enough to fill a tea cup. When first taken from the head, they may be made to answer the purpose of a powerful burning glass. With a swordfish's eye we once set fire to a cigar in less than half the time usually required to perform that operation by means of a common glass lens.

One of these gigantic warriors of the deep was captured on Saturday last, on the south shore of our island, in a manner somewhat remarkable. He had probably given chase to some straggling bluefish or scuppaug (pauggy, as the New Yorkers call them) which instinctively fled towards shoal water, where the pursuer got aground; when the surf rolled him further up the strand, subjecting his head and fins to exposure in another element. In this situation he was discovered by two females in a calash from Siasconet. It certainly required some nerve to attack a monster of his dimensions, grovelling and floundering just within his native brine; and the elder of the two felt rather disinclined to engage in such sport. But the younger went manfully to the scratch, and her companion followed. They took him by the horn, and by the dorsal—but he wouldn't stay taken, in that ignoble style. At length, after tugging and struggling for half an hour—the tumbling billows the only witnesses, to see fair play, and clear the ring—all the parties being alternately half in and half out of water—the amphibious combat terminated in favor of the assailants. Swordfish had unluckily got entangled sideways, just as one of his antagonists was advising an abandonment of the battle-ground; but the younger of the fair amazons, vowed she'd cut his throat first—and seizing this auspicious moment, she plunged into his gullet the deadly weapon—her scissors! It was all she could do for the glory of the conqueror! So leaving him with an awful gash in the thorax, wading upon the beach, the victors trudged half a mile to the nearest farm house, where they procured more effective implements, and returning, finished their work, by decapitating the prostrate sea-dragon, chopping him into portable sections, and sending about half "the spoils"—upwards of two hundred weight—to market. When the women first told the story of their having taken this prize, they were asked if they felt sure that the fish was not already dead when discovered? One of them replied, "I guess you wouldn't ha' thought so, if you'd ha' seen the sand fly." "Well," added the inquirer, "none would have attempted to secure so huge a subject, with just such a weapon, except a woman, or an editor."

MEHEMET ALI AND HIS SON.

It is natural to the human character that a desire should exist to become acquainted with the personal history, habits, and domestic affairs of those who have been instrumental in achieving great events. To gratify that curiosity, we subjoin two articles from British periodicals of the last month—the first relating to Ibrahim pacha, the conqueror of Syria, from the New Monthly, and the other, describing the amusements of his reputed father, Mohammed (or Mehmet) Ali, pacha of Egypt. They are written with spirit and elegance, and we presume with fidelity:

AMUSEMENTS OF THE PACHA OF EGYPT.

"Sans un petit brise d'amour,
On s'ennuie meme a la cour."

The approach to the ancient city of Grand Cairo is enchanting; contrasted with the barren sands of Alexandria, it appears a terrestrial paradise, and the eye of the traveller rests with delight on the broad majestic hills, its verdant fields, and their groves of graceful palms and sycamores.

The city itself is a most miserable place, and although containing a population of three hundred thousand souls, does not possess a single street that in Europe would be deemed worthy of that appellation. Most of the public buildings, and even some mosques of great magnificence are situated in mere lanes, while the dirt and rubbish with which they are encumbered render walking almost impossible. What most surprise the European at Cairo are the singular contrasts it every moment presents to his view, and the opposition in the manners, costumes, garb, and complexion of the inhabitants to every thing similar in his own country.

The pacha resides in the citadel. The new palace that he has constructed is unquestionably the most splendid in the Turkish empire; its internal decorations combine the magnificence of the east with the classical taste of the west—the talents of some of the first artists from both quarters having been employed in its embellishment.

The only objects worth seeing in the vicinity of Cairo, though very different in their nature, are—1st, The ancient sepulchres of the caliphs, which by good Judges are considered as the purest specimens of the groves of Egyptian architecture; their elegant domes peering above the groves of cypresses, and glittering in the sun, produce a magical effect. 2nd, The Shabra, the favorite palace of Mohammed Ali, about three miles from Cairo, on the banks of the Nile. The palace itself is small, but the gardens are vast and magnificent. In the middle of an orange grove is a kiosque, one of the most elegant and fantastic erections that, even in the east, the eye can light on. Ascending by a magnificent flight of marble steps, you enter a beautiful portico; when this portico is past a beautiful quadrangular colonnade of white marble is discovered, surrounding a piece of water upon which there are two or three barges, gilded in the most costly manner, and attached by silken cables to the columns. A highly ornamented balustrade surrounds the whole, from which several flights of steps lead down to the water, guarded by statues of crocodiles, of colossal dimensions. Off this colonnade are several splendid apartments, the entrance to which is concealed by purple curtains of silk and gold, that beautifully contrast with the dazzling whiteness of the marble columns.

It is here that the pacha comes to repose from the toils of the divan, and to recreate among his women. Happy the Circassians who are admitted to the kiosque—it is considered as the highest mark of favor that their haughty master can show them. The pacha takes great delight in rowing them about the piece of water, and, on reaching the middle he upsets the bark, lightly clad in a calico caftan and a juba. He has no difficulty in reaching the colonnade by swimming, where he throws himself on a heap of luxurious cushions spread for his reception, and contemplates the scene with an air of mock gravity, while the black eunuchs are seen precipitating themselves from the balustrade into the water, to rescue the half-drowned Odalisco.

How strictly in character with Turkish barbarity is this cruel diversion of the pacha's! Mohammed's virtues, it would appear, are, after all, but merely superficial, for if we penetrate their polished exterior, we discover a core of unleavened barbarism. Like all his countrymen, he looks upon the loveliest part of the creation as the mere instruments of his brutal pleasures, as inferior beings in the scale of creation, brought into this world to please him by their beauty, and to gratify his caprice.

What a fine subject for a picture in the hands of a skilful painter the above scene would make! The splendid kiosque, with its marble colonnade, the black forms of the eunuchs skimming the glassy surface of the wave, to rescue the terrified Circassians, who, in their fright, expose those charms which modesty seeks to conceal; while the haughty pacha is seen on his luxuriant couch, fastening his eyes on their half-naked charms, and enjoying their cries.

The court of Egypt fully realises the vivid description of oriental grandeur and magnificence that we read of in the eastern tales, and carries back the mind of the spectator to the days of Haroun Alrachid. The Nubian guard, mounted on beautiful white Arabian horses—their splendid dress of scarlet and gold—and their jet black and glossy skins; the crowds of public functionaries and pages in their rich costumes; the pipe bearers, with the gilded appurtenances of their office, present an ensemble of oriental and picturesque effect that dazzles the imagination. Mohammed Ali is both costly and magnificent in his habits; he is fond of fine and richly caparisoned horses, and of lofty dromedaries, and he spares no expense to gratify his favorite taste.

The court is never so brilliant as during the feast of the Bairam, when the pacha retires to the shabara, and shuts himself up among his favorite women. At this time, the apartments are brilliantly illuminated, the colonnade filled with the pacha's officers, some reclining, smoking on the rich divans, others conversing and examining their costly arms. At night, when the moon rises, silvering with her rays the glossy surface of the placid water in the centre, you may behold groups of young Turks, in their blood-red shawls, casting an envious and voluptuous eye on the element still warm from the charms of the beautiful Circassians; while the breeze from the Nile wafts the sweetest perfumes, and the air resounds with the delicious strains of Mozart and Rossini, played by the military bands of the pacha. The effect of such a scene is more in character with the legends of fairy land and romance than with the sober realities of the nineteenth century.

To obtain a clear view of contemporary history is always difficult, but the future historian will unquestionably rank Mohammed Ali as one of the most extraordinary men of his age. He has shown, that in the hand of the skilful politician the most different means may be applied to the same ends. In Egypt, a studied aggregation of every abuse that can tend to desolate and oppress, to break the spirit of a nation, to damp its industry, had for centuries been in full operation. The difficulties he has had to overcome were immense, and his labors have evinced the power of a single mind in overcoming obstacles, which inflexibly applied to the pursuit of a single object.

When we were at Cairo, pioneers were at work constructing a carriage road between that city and Alexandria, and, since our return to England, we understand that a diligence, on the plan of the American stage coaches, has already been sent out, for the purpose of running between the two cities. But the most important feature in the history of Mohammed's career is the labors of two English engineers, who, by boring have discovered water in several places of the desert. The absence of this element in those immense regions has been the greatest barrier to the civilization of Africa, and directly proves how correct were the conjectures of many learned antiquarians, that the ancients were acquainted with the art of procuring this necessary element. Indeed, it would be difficult to account otherwise for the immense and magnificent ruins that strike the eye of the traveller, in various points where, at the present day, no water exists.

The person of Mohammed Ali is imposing—a dark piercing eye, a clear marble oriental complexion, a long white beard that imparts a patriarchal air to his whole exterior, and a benignant smile. The spectator, while gazing on him, can scarcely imagine that he is looking on a man, who conceals the most profound dissimulation under the guise of frankness, possesses steadiness to pursue his ends, flexibility to vary his means, and the art of coloring his own ambition with the most specious pretences of justice and public utility. But it must be recollected that Mohammed is a Turk, and we ought to measure him by the standard of his own country, ere we too hastily form an erroneous estimate of his character.

IBRAHIM PACHA, THE CONQUEROR OF SYRIA.

While Europe rings with the history of civil change, we have only to cast our eye to another quarter of the globe to witness the progress of events equally mighty, though by no means less new. Ibrahim pacha has conquered all Syria, and is marching unresisted through the peninsula of Asia. By the last advice of the city of Kouieh, within two hundred and fifty miles of the famous capital of the Turkish empire, had opened its gates to him, and Europe is prepared for what a year ago would have been considered the incredible event of the Egyptians marching triumphant into Constantinople. Nearly half a century has passed since the rise of the Wahabees in Arabia threatened the destruction of the Mohammedan faith. These bold, perhaps philosophic, votaries of a sublime creed, declared for the unity of the Godhead, and against the authenticity of the prophet. They plundered the great caravan of Mecca—they captured the pious Hagees—they defeated the lieutenants of the sultan, who endeavored to vindicate the united interests of religion and commerce. For a long period the authority of the sultan was dormant in Arabia and Syria; Egypt was threatened, and the treasury of Stambul shrank under the influence of the victorious heretics. At length this same Ibrahim, son of the Egyptian viceroy, offered his services to resist the torrent. At the head of an irregular force he penetrated into the midst of Arabia, delivered the holy cities, defeated the Wahabees even in their own country, and finally, after having granted peace on the most severe terms, carried their princes as hostages to Cairo. For these services Ibrahim was made pacha of Mecca and Medina. In an appointment which, in the Ottoman empire, gives him precedence before all other pachas, even his own father.

After the conquest of the Wahabees, Ibrahim commenced the formation in Egypt of a regular army, disciplined in the European manner; and by engaging the most skilful naval architects from Toulon, laid the foundation of the present very considerable naval force of Egypt. Utterly discomfited in Greece, the sultan at length applied for assistance to his Egyptian vassal. Immediately, the young pacha poured into the Morea at the head of his army, and supported by a powerful fleet; and such was his progress, that nothing but the famous treaty of London and its consequences—the battle of Navarino—could have prevented Greece from again becoming a Moselman province. We have been assured, however, by the highest authority, that it was not the intention of Ibrahim to have restored the Morea to the sultan. The overthrow of the Egyptians by the allied powers only stimulated the exertions of Ibrahim in his return to his country. In the confusion of the porte, he appropriated to himself both Candia and Cyprus, the finest islands of the Mediterranean. In the autumn of 1831, the Egyptian army consisted of ninety thousand disciplined infantry, perhaps not inferior to the Sepoys, and ten thousand regular cavalry. All the world who knew any thing about Egypt, ridiculed the unthriftly vanity of the pacha, and laughed at the ludicrous disproportion between such a military force and the population and resources of Egypt. By the autumn of 1832, however, Ibrahim has conquered all Syria, and almost the whole of Asia Minor, and is nearer Constantinople than the Russians. Ibrahim pacha, therefore, is a great man. He is the great conqueror of his age.

He is without doubt a man of remarkable talents. His mind is alike subtle and energetic. He is totally free from prejudices, adopts your ideas with silent rapidity, and his career demonstrates his military genius. His ambition is unbounded; his admiration of European institutions and civilization great; but he avoids, with dexterity, shocking the feelings and prejudices of the Moselman. A mystery hangs over his birth—he is said to be only an adopted son of the present pacha of Egypt, but this is doubtful; at any rate, the utmost confidence prevails between Ibrahim and his professed father. The pacha of the holy cities is a great voluptuary; his indulgence, indeed, in every species of sensuality is unbounded. Although scarcely in the prime of life, his gross and immense bulk promises but a short term of existence, and indicates a man sinking under overwhelming disease, and incapable of exertion. His habits are sumptuous: he delights in magnificent palaces and faulciful gardens, and is curious in the number and beauty of his Circassians; but his manners are perfectly European. He is constantly in public, and courts the conversation of all ingenious strangers. His chief councillor is Osman Bey, a renegade Frenchman, and an able man. Less than twenty years ago, Ibrahim pacha passed his days in sitting at a window of his palace with a German rifle, and fired at the bloated skins borne on the backs of the water-carriers as they returned from the Nile. As Ibrahim is an admirable marksman, the usual effect of his exertions was in general only to deprive the poor water-carriers of the fruits of their daily labor: sometimes, however, his bullet brought blood, instead of the more innocent liquid—but Egypt was then a despot country. It is not so now. It is not known among us, that the old pacha of Egypt and his son, in their rage for European institutions, have actually presented their subjects with "the two chambers," called in the language of the Levant the "Alto Parlamento" and "Basso Parlamento." These assemblies meet at Cairo; and have been formed by the governor of every town sending up to the capital, by the order of the pacha, two good and discreet men to assist in the administration of affairs. The members of the "Alto Parlamento" have the power of discussing all measures; but those of the "Basso Parlamento" are permitted only to petition. Their highnesses pay very little practical attention to the debaters or the petitioners, but always treat them with great courtesy. Yet they are very proud, (especially the elder pacha,) of these institutions; and the writer of this article has heard Mehemet Ali more than once boast that "he has as many parliaments as the king of England." In the mean while these extraordinary events have wrought singular revolutions in manners—we have for the first time a Turkish ambassador in England. MARCO POLO, Jr.

A card. The editor yet remains absent from home—but expects to resume his duties at the desk early next week—with a renewed power and an increased ability to perform them more acceptably; and while asking the indulgence of his friends for the present relaxation, which seemed necessary to the continuance of his health, he hopes, by greater exertion, to merit the kindnesses conferred upon him. He has seen and heard much which, being profitable to himself, may, perhaps, be rendered useful to others.

CHOLERA.

Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri were still afflicted, though the cholera was abating. In Ohio this disease still continues; in Columbus it had nearly disappeared, there had been 42 deaths by it there, including those in the penitentiary. In Dayton, Chillicothe, New Richmond and Ripley occasional cases occur. The number of deaths from it at Cincinnati from May 1, to August 7, was 307. The deaths during the week immediately preceding the latter date had decreased more than 50 per cent.

The mayor of Charlestown, Va. officially announces there had been seven deaths between the 9th and 13th instant, and adds there had been no new case reported for the twenty-four hours preceding the last named date.

Four cases are reported to have occurred at Harper's Ferry, and four deaths in Hagerstown of a disease resembling cholera, three whites and one colored person. The Torchlight adds the town is blessed with unusual good health for the season.

The Fredericktown Herald, states that a man from the line of the canal entered that city on the 21st instant, affected with the premonitory symptoms, and while passing through the streets became quite ill, was removed beyond the limits of the city, humanely attended by the physicians, is now out of danger and will recover. The editor affirms that the city is quite healthy, and that no case of cholera has originated there.

The official report of the deaths by cholera in Lexington, (Ky.) prepared by order of the common council, from the 1st of June to the 1st August, is as follows: whites 252; slaves 174; free blacks 48—Total 502. This is an awful mortality.

ELECTIONS. Members of congress elect, in Tennessee. John Blair, Samuel Bunch,* Luke Lea,* James Standifer, John B. Forrester,* Bailie Peyton,* John Bell, David W. Dickinson,* James K. Polk, Wm. M. Inge,* Cave Johnson, David Crockett,* Wm. C. Dunlap.*

Those marked thus, * new members.

North Carolina. In the remaining district of this state, James Graham has been elected in place of its late representative, Samuel P. Carson.

Indiana. The following gentlemen, says the Indiana Journal, are supposed to be elected: Ratliff Boon, John Carr, Amos Lane, Edward A. Hannegan and George L. Kinnard.

Kentucky. The returns come in so slowly from this state, that we cannot give the result with any thing like certainty. It appears, however, that Robert P. Letcher, national republican, has beaten his opponent, maj. T. P. Moore, Jacksonian, by a small majority, and that Mr. Pope, Jacksonian, in the Louisville district, has been elected over Mr. H. Crittenden, national republican, by a majority of 8 votes. Mr. Boyd is said to have succeeded over Mr. Lyon, late member—both Jacksonians. Mr. Hawes is said to have been re-elected, as also Judge Tompkins; and report also says that Martin Beatty and Benjamin Hardin, both national republicans, have been elected. In the Mount Sterling district, James Love instead of John White, as stated in our last, is elected by a small majority—both national republicans.

FRIEND'S TRIAL—CONCLUDED. To the editors of the Philadelphia Gazette. Trenton, Thursday evening, August 15. The case which has occupied the court of appeals during the last month, is now closed. With this, we send you the opinion, which was recorded in short hand, as delivered by governor Seely.

Messrs. Wood, Green, Bourd, McDowell, Clark, Merkle, and the governor voted, affirming, and Clawson, Holmes, Campion and Townsend, reversing the opinion of judges Ewing and Drake. Very respectfully yours, &c.

Opinion. The case of Hendrickson, vs. Shotwell, the court have had under advisement, and being fully aware of its great importance, it has given it a very close and laborious investigation, both in relation to the law and testimony applicable to the case.

I am authorised to announce as the opinion of a majority of the members of the court, that the decree of the court of chancery, in this case, be affirmed, without the payment of costs.

The court would most earnestly recommend to the parties interested, to make a speedy and amicable adjustment of all disputes and difficulties. I have always regretted to find religious controversies brought into courts of justice; it has a demoralising effect upon society, is a stumbling block to the unconverted, and a source of joy and rejoicing to the infidel. It is therefore sincerely desired by all good men, that no effort will be spared by this society to effect a speedy compromise of their disputes, on such just and equitable principles, as shall prove them to be influenced by the light within, operating on sincere and honest hearts.

NEW YORK CUSTOM HOUSE. We copy the following from the Daily Advertiser:

Extract of a letter from the secretary of the treasury, dated Washington, 7th Aug. 1833.

"It is the duty of the government to see that all those who have business at the custom house, shall have their affairs promptly attended to. The government has the power and the inclination to employ and liberally compensate all agents necessary for the public service; consequently, if those who have business at the custom house are obliged to give private pay to custom house officers, it must be because there are not officers adequate to the duty, or, because, if numerous enough, they do not perform their duty. I respectfully request you, therefore, to make known to every officer and clerk in the public employment in your custom house, that the practice of receiving, from merchants or others, compensation for services of any kind, is utterly condemned; and, that no person who shall accept private compensation, shall be retained in service after proof of the fact.

"I need not enumerate the evils likely to result from a continuance of the practice to which you refer. If a merchant cannot get his business transacted as it should be, it must be the fault of the government; if he has to pay a public clerk, he has a just cause of complaint against the government; and a strong temptation is held out to public agents to create delay and difficulty, in order to coerce a merchant into the payment of private fees. One abuse of this kind will lead to others; and at last there will be a laxity of moral feeling utterly inconsistent with the character of the country, and the honor of its government. It is altogether a mistake that the receipt of private compensation is, as one of your officers supposes, a private affair between the officer and the merchant; and I consider it my duty the more strongly to say this, as that gentleman is attached to the custom house. As the head of the most important establishment in the country, I look to you for all the aid that may be requisite, to put an end to a practice which no time or authority, according to my notions, sanction or justify. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"W. J. DUANE, sec'y of treasury.

WAR AGAINST OUR MERCHANTS. A greater excitement than that now existing among the merchants and commercial men of this city, in reference to the proceedings of the custom house against the cargo of the ship Globe has probably never been known. The case is not regarded as affecting the interests of a few alone, but as bearing upon the rights of every merchant and every shipper in Philadelphia. If the proceeding of the surveyor of this port, is sustained in this instance, it may be sustained in others, and a system of espionage and surveillance will be established, among our respectable and intelligent merchants, disgraceful to any community. A public meeting of shippers and others, to express their decided indignation, and to enter their protest against the course pursued by the surveyors, is in contemplation.

The result of the conference between the surveyor and the consignees of the Globe, has been entirely unsatisfactory to the latter. The surveyor was asked whether he had received any information implicating the manifests of the ship. He replied in the affirmative. He was desired to mention whether the suspicion rested upon any particular invoice, or upon the whole cargo—to which he replied that it rested upon the whole freight. He was then requested as an act of justice to the consignees, and to enable them to detect the authors of the fabrication, to give the source whence his information had been received, but he refused to give any information on the subject!

Notwithstanding this want of courtesy, the two principal shippers, immediately gave their consent that the boxes should be opened and examined, by the custom house officers, and they offered to pay the expenses of freighting their part of the cargo to and from the custom house, as well as the cost of opening the packages, that the tea and boxes might not be injured by boring. The same sacrifice would no doubt have been made by all the consignees, but the tender was refused, the surveyor declaring that he should insist upon the boring system. The consignees then proposed, with a view of mitigating the damage consequent upon boring, that a certain number of boxes to be selected by the inspectors, should be taken from each invoice, and bored. This too was refused!

There being no possible way of satisfying the scruples of the surveyor, which had arisen, we doubt not, from misapprehension, the discharging of the cargo has been recommenced, as the ship cannot be detained. The loss to the consignees will be at least twenty per cent. from the injury received from the teas and boxes, from the boring instruments of the inspectors. A large purchaser has already refused to receive his invoice, and the consignees will be obliged to dispose of it at depreciated prices.

To show the extent of damage likely to be sustained, we may mention that one of the boring agents was yesterday discovered making an opening with his auger, in a box of Chinese embroidered shawls, which he had mistaken for a tea chest.

In consequence of the proceedings detailed above, the sale of the cargo of the Globe, has been postponed one week. [Philadelphia Gazette.]

THE WEST INDIA TRADE. The Wiscasset Yankee, gives the following statements as to the operation of the negotiation effected by Mr. McLane, under the instructions of Mr. Van Buren.

"No sooner were the British vessels permitted to take cotton from our ports, than the British government changed the old duty of 5 per cent. ad valorem, to a specific duty of five-eighths of a penny per pound; and at the same time cotton freights from the provinces paid but one twenty-fifth of a penny per pound. Thus any British ships may sail from any of our ports with a cotton freight, and merely touch at Halifax, Bermuda, or any convenient place in the provinces, and pay but one twenty-fifth of a penny on her cotton; while American freights must pay five-eighths of a penny. It is clear then that the British vessel has nearly three-fifths of a penny per pound advantage over the American."

NOTICE TO PUBLISHERS OF NEWSPAPERS. Post office, New York, August 15, 1833. The following circular was received this day from the post office department, and in conformity with the instructions therein contained, the postage will in future be required upon all papers sent to the British provinces, unless paid at the United States post office on the frontier.

CIRCULAR.

Post office department, northern division, Aug. 15, 1833.

Sir: It being communicated to the department that the post masters in British North America have been instructed not to collect, nor be accountable to this department for the United States postage on newspapers sent by mails from the United States into the British provinces, it becomes necessary to require that payment of such postage be made in the United States. You will, therefore, inform the publishers of newspapers, sending from your office to subscribers in the British provinces that it will be necessary to pay the postage in advance at your office, or cause it to be paid at the United States post office on the frontier, which despatches such papers across the line, otherwise they will be detained at said frontier office. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

STATE RIGHTS. The following letter was addressed by the hon. Nathaniel Macon, late U. S. senator, to Samuel P. Carson, esq. of North Carolina:

"Buck Spring, 9th Feb. 1833.

"Sir: I have received your letter of the 24th ultimo. There can be no doubt that the U. S. are in a deplorable situation, and that the publication of the opinion you desire would be useless. It has never been a secret, and always stated to those who wanted to know it. In the year 1824 the constitution was buried in the senate—the senators who were then present, will, it is believed, recollect the fact—and never afterwards quoted by me while I continued in the senate. The opinions of gen. Washington, Mr. Jefferson and gov. Clinton are known but not respected. I have never believed a state could nullify and remain in the union, but have always believed that a state might secede when she pleased, provided she would pay her proportion of the public debt, and this right I have considered the best guard to public liberty and to public justice that could be desired, and it ought to have prevented what is now felt in the south—oppression.

"The proclamation contains principles as contrary to what was the constitution as nullification. It is the great error of the administration, which, except that, has been satisfactory in a high degree, to the people who elected the president. When confederacies begin to fight, liberty is soon lost, and the government as soon changed. A government of opinion, established by sovereign states, for special purposes, cannot be maintained by force. The use of force makes enemies, and enemies cannot live in peace under such a government.

"The case of South Carolina is as different from that of Pennsylvania as any two cases can be. In 1816 the system that now oppresses the south was begun. It was then opposed. In 1824 the constitution was buried. Senators who were then in the senate, will no doubt recollect—(Repetition—old age will show)—Time to quit. Yours, very truly, NATH'L MACON."

A CHOICE BIT. The following is part of an oration delivered recently in South Carolina, by THOMAS GRIMKE. It is a beautiful extract, and we commend it to the attention of our readers. Mr. Grimke is extensively known, and wherever he is known he is esteemed.

[U. S. Gaz.]

Our country! Our whole country! How affecting are the ties which bind us to thee; how venerable is thy claim to our faithful services, to our purest affections! What indeed is our country, but a parent, by obligations the most sacred and sublime; by associations the most delicate and comprehensive; by prospects the most animating and delightful! In our American creed, what article then is of higher authority, of deeper interest, of more enduring value, than the precept, which commands us to reverence and love our country? Are we bound to father and mother by relations, which God himself has ordained and enforced? So are we to our country. Are we bound to our parents by all the sanctions of civil society, coeval with its origin, expanding in its progress, and destined to endure while social life shall last? So are we to our country. Are we bound to our father and mother by all those natural affections, which make them the most venerable of human beings, and home, the happiest spot upon earth? So are we to our country. The parents, whom nature has given us, die, and are laid in the earth, by the hands of their children; but our father-land protects us in life and hallows our graves. Our parent country still survives her children. She is immortal. Shall we not, then, in the spirit of gratitude, reverence and love, engrave on our hearts some maxim, not less beautiful in its moral, if we regard our duty, than eminent for its wisdom and truth, if we consult only our interest? And where shall we find a precept more venerable for its antiquity, more commanding in authority, than the inscription on the table of stone? "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Our country is indeed a father, to be revered in the authority which commands our obedience; and a mother, to be loved with all the enthusiasm of gratitude and affection. No voice from heaven has indeed proclaimed, amidst the thunders, and lightnings, and clouds of another Sinai, "honor thy country, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." No miraculous hand writing has denounced against us, the sentence of destruction for unfaithfulness to her commands, for hypocrisy in our affections. No prophet or apostle has recorded with the pen of inspired truth and by divine authority, "thy country is thy parent—by all that is most solemn and binding in duty, by all that is most eloquent and holy in love." But the voice of nature and the testimony of all experience; the brightest and the darkest pages of history; the wisdom of philosophy, the energy of eloquence, and the enthusiasm of poetry, all, all attest the truth, "thy country is thy parent."

EXCERPTS. Opinions on secession, &c. In a letter to Mr. Carrington, in 1787, Mr. JEFFERSON said—"Where two parties make a compact, there results to each a power of compelling the other to execute it. Compulsion was never so easy as in our case, when a single frigate would soon levy on the commerce of any state, the deficiency of its contribution."

In 1811, Mr. JEFFERSON said, in a letter to Mr. Tracy, "That certain states, from local and occasional discontents, might attempt to secede from the union; but it is not probable that local discontents can spread to such an extent, as to be able to face the sound parts of so extensive a union."

The editor of the Richmond Enquirer, 1814, held the following opinions:

"No man, no association of men, no state, or set of states, has this right to withdraw itself from the union of its own accord. The same power that knit us together, can only unknit. The same formality that forged the links of the union is necessary to dissolve it. The majority of the states, which form the union, must consent to the withdrawal of any one branch of it. Until that consent has been obtained, any attempt to dissolve the union, or obstruct the efficacy of its constitutional laws, is treason—treason to all intents and purposes."

"Any other doctrine, such as that which has been lately held forth by the federal republicans, that any one state may withdraw itself from the union, is an abominable heresy."

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO THE PRESIDENT. From the Norfolk Herald. The court and common council of the borough of Norfolk appointed a joint committee from their respective bodies, last week, to wait on the president of the United States at the Rip Raps, and tender him an invitation to visit the corporate authorities and citizens of the borough, at such time as might suit his convenience.

The committee accordingly waited on the president on Friday, and were received by him with peculiar courtesy and affability; he postponed giving an answer to the invitation, however, till the next day, though he intimated to the committee that it would probably be out of his power to accept it. On Saturday evening the president's answer was received by the committee, declining the invitation in consequence of his previous arrangements for returning to Washington in the early part of the week. We have been favored by the committee with a copy of the letter of invitation, and the president's reply, which we subjoin.

Norfolk, August 15, 1833.

Gen. Jackson,

Sir: The corporate authorities of the borough of Norfolk, have charged us with the pleasing duty of waiting on you in the name and on the behalf of their fellow citizens, to tender their most respectful salutations and kindest wishes for your continued health and happiness, and to invite you to visit them at such time as may best suit your convenience; and we beg leave to assure you that your acceptance of their invitation would afford them an opportunity very anxiously desired, of paying to you, in person, those civilities so eminently due to your official and private character. We have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

WRIGHT SOUTHGATE,
ISAAC TALBOT,
JOS. H. ROBERTSON,
NATHAN C. WHITEHEAD,
JOHN CAPRON,

Committee.

Gen. Andrew Jackson, president of the U. S. Rip Raps.

Rip Raps, August 17, 1833.

Gentlemen: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the polite invitation of the corporate authorities of the borough of Norfolk, which you were charged as a committee to tender me, together with their respectful salutations and kind wishes for my health and happiness.

For the kind wishes expressed for my health and happiness, I make a tender to you individually, and through you to the citizens of the borough of Norfolk, of my grateful thanks, with the assurance that nothing would afford me greater pleasure than to visit and shake my fellow citizens of Norfolk by the hand. But my public duties call me to Washington at an early day. I know not at what moment the conveyance for which I have written may approach my retreat, and in the mean time the state of my health admonishes me that I ought to remain free from bustle and fatigue, and avail myself of the benefit of the pure air, the sea bathing, and the repose which I have sought in this insulated spot of your beautiful bay, for the short period that my public duties permit me to withdraw from Washington.

These considerations, will I trust be received by my friends in Norfolk, as a sufficient apology for my declining their polite and gratifying invitation; at some other time and under different circumstances, I may have the pleasure which is now denied me.

Receive, gentlemen, for yourselves individually, and present to those whom you represent, my best wishes for your prosperity and happiness. ANDREW JACKSON.

Messrs. Wright Southgate, Isaac Talbot, Jos. H. Robertson, N. C. Whitehead and John Capron, committee.

PRINCE GEORGE'S COUNTY, Md. A communication in a late Marlborough Banner, from Edward W. Belt, esq., whose opportunities of ascertaining may be relied upon, estimates the exports of the products of this fertile county, the last year, at 11,000 hogsheads of tobacco, valued at $550,000; and 220,000 bushels of wheat, valued at $275,000. Making $825,000 for those two articles only, in one year. "This," says Mr. B. "is more than one fourth of the exports of domestic produce from Maryland, and is to the exports of domestic produce of the United States, about one to 73. Our village (Marlborough) last year exported 2,110 hogsheads of tobacco, worth $105,000."

PITTSBURGH. We find the following article in the Pittsburgh Advocate—we know nothing of the circumstance which called forth the card—but all data for calculations furnish conclusions that Pittsburgh is and must long continue to be prosperous in an eminent degree; and indeed no place more deserves general prosperity. Enterprise, activity, punctuality to business, and that kind of true liberality which consults the good of all, must result in individual and general success; long may they remain the attributes of our western metropolis, and and long may her citizens enjoy their results.

Pittsburgh, August 7, 1833.

The undersigned, engaged in manufacturing and mercantile pursuits in the city of Pittsburgh and vicinity, have noticed with extreme regret the publication in one of our newspapers, entitled "hard times," which mentions information of "failures among our heaviest business men." Although the intention of the publication may have been praise worthy, its construction abroad may be of the most dangerous tendency to our credit as individuals and a community. We therefore feel ourselves called upon to repel all imputations which may affect us as men of business.

We assure the public at large, east and west, that at no period within our knowledge, has the character of our city deserved to stand higher for solid capital, for mercantile punctuality and integrity in the engagements of its traders. We protest against the conclusions drawn from one single failure, and against involving the credit of others in this individual misfortune.

MASSACHUSETTS FISHERIES. The Charleston (S. C.) Courier, in noticing Dr. Smith's recent work on the "Massachusetts fisheries," makes the following abstract from the book:

Many of the towns in the colony of Massachusetts began, at an early date, to cultivate their river fisheries. In 1641, 300,000 dry fish were sent to market. Previously to the American revolution, the cod fishery of Massachusetts employed 28,000 tons of shipping and 4,000 seamen; making an annual value of industry and enterprise of about $1,000,000. In 1775 Great Britain broke up this profitable employment, by prohibiting the colonies the exercise of the right of fishery on the banks of Newfoundland. The restoration of peace with Great Britain, after the achievement of American independence, revived this branch of industry and hardy enterprise, which was further stimulated by a bounty granted by congress in 1779, on exported fish, and a few years after, to vessels employed in the business. In 1807, 71,000 tons of shipping were employed in the cod fishery alone, and the average value of exports from this country, of the productions of the sea, for that and the four preceding years, was estimated at $3,000,000. The unwise restrictions then imposed on our commerce, caused the fisheries to diminish in value, from that period until the close of the second war with Great Britain. The return of peace again effected their revival, and the very next year 68,000 tons of vessels, employing 10,000 seamen, were again upon the ocean. In 1804 the number of barrels of mackerel packed in Massachusetts was 8,079; in 1811, 19,000. The war nearly destroyed this business; but in 1815 it rose again to 16,000 barrels. In 1820 the increase was so rapid, that the number of barrels packed amounted to 236,243. This was before the separation of Maine. In the subsequent year, Massachusetts alone packed 111,000 barrels—and in 1831, the amount had swelled to 348,750 barrels. The number of vessels employed in 1831, was near 400, and the seamen probably exceeded 4,000. The probable value of the mackerel fishery for 1831, exceeded $1,500,000.

NEW DISCOVERY. Mr. Mariner, of N. York, has made an important discovery for the use of persons exposed to fire or water. It is a process by which he is enabled to coat over leather, cotton, linen, silk, &c. or any like material, into durable India rubber garments, wholly impervious to water, without being rendered heavy or clumsy. The editor of the New York Advocate says he has examined a coat and pantaloons made of cotton cloth, covered in every part with the India rubber, without a stitch except in the button holes. These must be excellent articles for firemen, stage drivers, and travellers in open waggons. Ladies' and gentlemen's boots and shoes may be made of any of the above named materials from the coarsest leather or the finest silk. The India rubber cloth may be obtained on application to George Spring, No. 55 Pine street, New York. In making, it is recommended that care be taken to avoid a few pin and needle holes, and seems as possible.

POWER OF THE HYDRANT. An experiment was made yesterday for the purpose of ascertaining the height to which water can be carried by the power of the hydrant, without the intervention of engines. A hose was attached to the stock at the corner of William street and Exchange Place. The power was found sufficient to throw the column of water fairly upon the roofs of the tallest buildings in the neighborhood, most of which are four stories high. The water was thrown with great force in an almost unbroken column against the underside of the copings, and when the hose was carried up to the roof of the new stores in William street, it was still thrown fifteen or twenty feet higher in a perpendicular direction and across the street so as to drench half a dozen houses on the other side. Our hydrant has cost a large sum of money, but it has already saved property enough from destruction by fire to reimburse its cost, and has won the public favor completely. The property in the city is at this moment worth more by ten times and for aught we know a hundred times the cost of the hydrant, on account of the security growing out of its existence. The risk of insurance against fire is reduced materially, and the premiums would be, were they regulated upon the principles of that beautiful system—free trade.

NEW SYSTEM OF FRAUD. A novel system of fraud has recently been practised in New York and Albany. A person went to one of the New York banks and deposited $250, and drew his check for the money which the cashier certified as good for the amount. The check holder then altered the word two into twelve, and placed a figure 1 before the 250, presented the check at another bank and drew $1,250. He next made another deposit, again altered the certified check, and drew more money in Brooklyn; a third time he deposited money, and drew $1,250 each from the Mechanics' and Farmers' bank and the Canal bank at Albany. In all, the swindler obtained from $5,000 to $7,000, from his $250. He selected the sum of $250, in each case for deposit, as the words and figures of the check could be most easily altered to answer his purpose. At one bank in New York where he presented a check, the cashier noticed something wrong in it and pointed it out to the presenter, who said, very coolly, that he had taken the check without examining it, but he then saw it was wrong, and would return to the bank in which he had deposited, and get it corrected—and he went out for that purpose. Of course he was not heard from again. [Poughkeepsie Telegraph.

MAIL ROBBERY. On Saturday morning, the 10th inst. a man rather shabbily dressed went into a tailor's shop in the upper part of the city to purchase some clothing, and took from his pocket to pay for them a draft drawn by the cashier of the Easton, Penn. bank, for $60 dated August 1st, and in favor of a person whose name we did not learn, residing in Kingston, Esopus. The draft not being endorsed, the tailor suspected that all was not right, and detained the man until he could send to the house of the cashier of one of our banks who lived in the vicinity. On his arrival the man was searched, and another draft for $2,000, drawn as above, and in favor of a respectable commercial house in this city, in the way-bill of the Easton, Penn. post office, which stated that about 13 letters were mailed, were found upon him. An officer was immediately sent for, but before he arrived the man escaped.

Information was given to the police magistrates, and the way-bill was handed to justice Hopson. Inquiry was then made at the post office to know if there had been a mail robbery, and the officers were told that the Easton, Penn. mail bag had been robbed, and that the bag had been found in Washington street near the battery, and several letters had been picked up in the street, broken open which had contained the drafts above alluded to.

On Saturday afternoon a man was arrested for some petty theft, and on him were found papers or letters which proved him to be the same man who had attempted to pass the above drafts in the morning. He is committed to prison for further examination and trial.

LOSS OF THE SHIP MENTOR. The ship Mentor, of New Bedford, under my command, was lost on the Pelew Islands, on the 21st May, 1832, and eleven of my crew were lost at the time, in attempting to leave the ship in one of the boats, viz: Thos. M. Colesworthy, 1st officer; Peter O'Connor, 2d officer; Benjamin F. Harkell, James M. Fisher, David Jenkins, boat steersmen; Lewis Burgoine, John Bailey, James Blackmore, Thomas Taylor alias James Holiday, William Jones, seamen; and the cook, a black man. The remainder of my crew arrived at Pelew on 24th May, in latitude 7 41 north; the ship was lost on a reef in lat. 8 18, and long. nearly 135 east. We remained on the island until the 23d day of November, when the natives gave us a canoe and a whale boat belonging to the ship, with such provisions as the island afforded, with which we left, in hopes of reaching the island of Ternate, or any other of the Dutch settlements. We left at Pelew as hostages, James Meader, Calvin Alden and Horatio Davis, taking with us two chiefs and one man, natives. On the 29th November, the canoe sunk in a squall. After taking all the men into the whale boat, continued our voyage until the 6th December, when at day-light we discovered Lord North's Island, the natives of which came off in canoes and made us all prisoners, broke the boat in pieces, and stripped us of all our clothes, but otherwise offered us no violence. We remained with them until 3d of February, 1833, when the Spanish ship Sabina, captain Somes, from Calcutta, hove in sight, when myself and B. J. Rollins succeeded in getting on board, leaving Horace Holden, Milton Hewlet, Benjamin Nute, Charles Bowkett, William Sidden and Peter Andrews, with the three Pelew men. Captain Somes being short of provisions, could not wait to get the rest on board, not knowing how long he might have to detain himself, and the natives not wishing to part with us. Captain Somes has done every thing in his power to render our situation as comfortable as possible during our stay on board the Sabina, for which I beg to return him my most grateful thanks.

We may attribute our kind treatment at Pelew to the presents they received from the British government, for the kindness and hospitality shown to captain Wilson when he lost his ship on the same island; and no doubt the two chiefs accompanied us in the canoe expecting a reward from the American government for taking care of us, building us a canoe, &c. &c.

Given under my hand at Macao, China, this 24th day of February, 1833, EDWARD C. BARNARD.

U. S. SHIP INDEPENDENCE. A serious disaster had nigh befall the Independence 74, which is lying in the stream at the Navy Yard, in Charlestown, on Wednesday, 14th inst. Early in the morning, com. Elliott went on board to give directions about having the ship well moored against the arrival of the equinoctial gales, and while on deck, it seemed to him that she lurched more than usual. He ordered the pumps to be tried, which being done, it was ascertained that she had four feet of water in her hold. Some rogue had broken off the brass cock fixed on one of her sides to let in salt water occasionally, and the ship was filling rapidly. But for the timely discovery, she must have sunk during the afternoon or night, in a depth of 50 feet of water.

THUNDER STORM. During a violent thunder storm which occurred yesterday, the marine hospital, a new edifice not yet completed, was stricken and considerably injured. It is probable that the electric fluid entered at the south east chimney, the top of which it tore off, and then separated into three streams, one descending the south east corner, splintering and scorching the window frames, tearing out the iron pullies attached to them, and breaking the glass. The second stream descended the middle of the eastern wall, and destroyed a portion of the plastering on the inside, which being fresh, showed the marks of the splinters which were stripped off and dashed against it. It then descended to the ground, tearing off a part of the lower eastern door. The third stream descended through the centre of the building, shattering some of the studs to pieces, and stripping off the plastering, leaving marks of its having followed the direction of the nails, which secured the lathing. The circumstance of there being no lightning rod erected for the protection of the building, will probably account for the different directions taken by the fluid in its passage to the ground. There were, we understand, no persons in the edifice at the time of the accident.

The house of R. M. Allan, esq. on Sullivan's island, was also struck about the same time, and the inside very much shattered, but providentially without injury to any of its inmates. The clap was severe, and the escape wonderful. Mrs. A. who was sitting near the side of the house where the lightning entered, with her infant in her arms, was stunned by the shock, and the infant fell on the floor—but without further injury to either.

THE TEA SHIP. The following call upon the patriotic citizens of Philadelphia is—from its nature and date—a curiosity in this day. We have seen the original—probably the only one extant—and could not but view it with strong feelings of the great events which followed the apparently trifling cause to which it refers. It was posted as a play card around the city, and proves that the art of printing was, at that remote day, well understood here:

Monday morning, December 29, 1773.

The tea ship being arrived, every inhabitant who wishes to preserve the liberty of America is desired to meet at the state house, this morning, precisely at ten o'clock, to advise what is to be done at this alarming crisis.

TRIBUTE TO WASHINGTON AT THE DUBLIN THEATRE. Mr. Hackett, the actor gives the following account of an occurrence at the Dublin theatre. "The first night of Rip Van Winkle, when in the midst of the scene where he finds himself lost in amazement at the change in his native village, as well as in himself and every body he meets, a person of whom he is making inquiry mentions the name of Washington. Rip asks 'who is he?' The other replies—'what! did you never hear of the immortal George Washington, the father of his country?' The whole audience from pit to gallery seemed to rise, and with shouting, huzzas, clapping of hands and stamping of feet made the very building shake. These deafening plaudits continued some time, and wound up with three distinct rounds. To describe to you my feelings during such an unexpected thunder-gust of national enthusiasm, is utterly impossible. I choked—the tears gushed from my eyes, and I can assure you it was only by a great effort that I restrained myself from destroying all the illusion of the scene by breaking the fetters with which the age and character of Rip had invested me, and exclaiming in the fullness of my heart 'God bless old Ireland.'"

POISON FROM NEW HONEY. A son of nine, and a daughter of six years, and only children of Samuel York, of Farmington, Mass. died a few days since in consequence of eating new honey. They lived about thirty-six hours.

It is, perhaps, not generally known, (says the Kennebec Journal), that honey recently gathered by bees at a certain season of the year, from the flowers of some poisonous plants, possesses their deleterious qualities, in a highly concentrated state, when fresh, and may prove fatal if taken in sufficient quantity. It has been ascertained that the poisonous effects of some plants, as for instance the Lambkill, so called, depend upon a certain agent, named by chemists, prussic acid. It is also found that this acid very soon loses its hurtful properties by decomposition; so that honey containing such an agent at first, would of itself become pure in a short time, being suffered to remain undisturbed. Occurrences of death from this cause, are, no doubt, exceedingly rare.

FACTORY LABOR BILL. It has been already stated, that a proposition made by the chancellor of the exchequer in relation to this bill, was rejected by the house of commons; but the precise character of the proposition was not known when the statement was made. His object was, to confine the limitation of the period of daily labor, specified in the bill, which is eight hours, to children under 14 years of age. This was opposed, as an attempt to deprive the laborers of legislative protection at the very age when it was most required. Among its opponents was Mr. Brotherton, whose remarks were heard with much attention by the house. He said among other things, that "It had been said that young persons above 14 years of age could make their own bargains; but it was in evidence that such young persons were obliged to work 15 and 16 hours a day, and when they had urged the inability of their strength to do so, had been told to quit; so that they must either comply with those hours of labor or starve. He must be permitted to state that he felt strongly and was deeply interested in this important subject, and he was not ashamed to say, even in this house, that he himself, from the age of 12 to 16 years, had worked in a factory from 12 to 14 hours a day.—(Hear.) He had endured all the privations now suffered by those young persons whose case was now under discussion, (hear)—and for them he could not but feel a deep sympathy.—(hear)—for although he had been elevated by his fellow countrymen to the high honor of a seat in the British house of commons, he could neither forget the situation in which he had once stood.—(hear)—nor could feel otherwise than much disposed to stand by his order.—(Hear, hear.) If he could accomplish any relief to that class from the grievances under which they at present labored, he should feel satisfied that he had not lived in vain." (Hear, hear).

A METAPHYSICAL HORSE-WHIPPING. Those of our readers who have attended to the contest between Don Pedro and Don Miguel, may remember, that some months ago, the former, from dissatisfaction with the commander of his fleet, admiral Sartorius, sent his aid-de-camp, sir John M. Doyle, to put him under arrest. When, however, the aid-de-camp stepped on board the admiral's ship, he himself was arrested, and kept in confinement. For the indignity of this proceeding, the soldier called upon the sailor for explanation; the sailor's reply was, that sir John could hardly have calculated upon any other treatment, when he ungraciously volunteered on such a mission, but that if brother officers think he (the admiral) owes any satisfaction to sir John, he would be happy to afford it to him, whenever they might meet at home or abroad, he (the admiral) being then about to proceed to France: thereupon, the knight, after expressing his regret at the necessity of the case, thus writes to the admiral:

It now becomes an imperative but painful duty on my part to request your excellency will do me the favor to conceive that you have been horse-whipped by sir J. M. Doyle, K. C. B. and K. T. S. who laments that your unaccountable and unwarrantable conduct should oblige him to adopt this as the only step your intended flight from the scene of your gallant exploits has left open. But should your excellency, on more mature reflection, revoke your intention of proceeding forthwith to France, I shall be most happy to receive you at the Foz whenever you are pleased to appoint, and to assure your excellency that every attention and requisite accommodation will be provided for you during the short period that your residence may be necessary on that occasion in Portugal.

Hereupon, the London Times, in the paragraph we copy, suggests a way out of the quarrel, without compromising the honor of either party:

"Sir John Milley Doyle, with a finished politeness and an amusing naivete worthy of those distinguished heroes, major O'Flaherty and sir Lucius O'Trigger, requests his excellency vice-admiral Sartorius 'will do him the favor to conceive that he has been horse-whipped by sir John Milley Doyle, K. C. B. and K. T. S.' Now, there is a precedent, and a very celebrated one, in the French code of honor, (and no code is more sensitively delicate), which the vice-admiral may at once readily adopt, and thus honorably settle this inauspicious quarrel. Let him answer, in the words of the precedent, that 'he (the vice-admiral) begs the favor of sir John Milley Doyle, K. C. B. and K. T. S. to be assured that he (the vice-admiral) has run the said sir John through the body.' Thus this metaphysical duel will end as it began, in an imaginary collision. How much better than the reality for both parties!"

BRIEF NOTICES.

A wonderful invention it is said was discovered by a Frenchman named Batineau in 1765, by which vessels at sea can be discovered 250 leagues off. The instrument is called nauscopie, and an account of it is given in the London Monthly Magazine. A nebulous satellite, according to the invention, precedes a ship for several days, which can be seen. The French government did not patronise Batineau, and he was living in obscurity in 1810.

The Buffalo Journal states, they were the finest looking raw recruits we ever saw; all New Yorkers, selected by capt. S. himself from the northern and western counties of the state, within the age of 25 years, and as nearly as possible 5 feet 8 inches in height. All possessing a good English education and of strictly correct habits. Such youth, with such a commander, who permits the performance of no menial service from any member of his detachment, and fires as they fire, cannot fail to prove useful and become an ornament to the service.

An affray took place at the rail road on Monday evening last. It appears that certain colored persons wishing to go to the lake, took possession of the cars appropriated to white people; that they were turned out of them; went away and armed themselves, returned and attacked Mr. Reeves, the clerk of the road, by firing pistols at him, &c. Two of them have, we understand, been apprehended and bound over to appear at the next session of the criminal court. We should think it was high time a stop was put to the outrages of this class of gentry.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Liverpool papers to the 16th July.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The great and all absorbing question, the Irish reform bill was to have been brought up for consideration on the 18th ult. The duke of Wellington had given notice that it would be opposed on its second reading. It is said that it is supposed that the duke's party would be able to out vote earl Grey, and that the Tories were so certain of victory and of causing ministers to resign, that they had made arrangements for a new ministry, in which neither the duke of Wellington nor sir Robert Peel would be included. The speaker of the house of commons, Charles Manners Sutton is named as the intended premier.

Lord Brougham's bill reforming the local courts had been rejected. Lord Hill, the commander-in-chief voted against it, and it is intimated that should he repeat his refractory spirit he would be compelled to resign.

Mr. Ferguson had moved in the house, "an address to his majesty that he will be graciously pleased not to recognize, nor in any way give the sanction of his government to the present political state and condition of Poland, the same having been brought about in violation of the treaty of Vienna, to which Great Britain was a party."

Lord Palmerston, in reply, admitted the truth and justice of all the observations and details made by the hon. mover; but, at the same time, deprecated the pressing of the motion, on the ground that, if carried, a war with Russia would be inevitable.

Lord Althorp followed in a similar strain, and moved the previous question.

Lord J. Russell hoped, that though ministers might concur in the sentiments of the mover, he would withdraw the motion, on the ground that when the unanimous opinion of the house went forth to the world, it would have more effect than if a division took place and a large majority voted against it.

He was followed by Mr. Hume, Mr. Attwood, Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Sheil and several other members, who argued in favor of the motion, as being due to the character and feelings of the country; and by Lord Palmerston and Mr. Stanley, who, as well as Mr. Warburton and sir Robert Peel, argued against it, as being likely to involve the country in a war, for which it was not prepared. Mr. Cuthbert Pergusson replied, and the house divided, when the numbers were—for the previous question, as moved by lord Althorp, 177; against it, 95; majority 82.

Rapid progress was making in the bill rechartering the East India company.

Mr. Bulwer moved an address to the king calling for copies of papers respecting the measures pursued by Russia in her interference with the state of Turkey. He asked if there was any government in the country. (Lord Althorp—here we are). It did not follow, said Mr. B. that because they were here, that they constituted a government. He condemned ministers for having taken no share in the affairs between Turkey, Russia and Egypt. No one could doubt that the object of Russia was to reduce Turkey under her dominion.

Lord Palmerston replied and said a correspondence was now going on on the subject, and the motion would be productive of inconvenience; he doubted not Russia would preserve her faith, and hoped that confidence might be reposed in government, on this subject, for a very short time longer.

Mr. Bulwer in consequence of lord Palmerston's statement withdrew his motion.

On the 12th July, the lord Chancellor introduced his bill founded on the report made by the commissioners of inquiry into ecclesiastical courts. By this bill about 300 diocesan courts will be abolished and their business transferred to the ordinary jurisdictions. The court of peculiars—does any body out of the profession know any thing of it, even the name?—is to be abolished, and criminal actions for brawlings, &c. are to be transferred to the judges, these offences being made misdemeanors.

The statute of frauds, also, is to be extended by it to the probate of wills, and real property thereby put on the same footing as personal. The marquis of Westmeath, who has had some experience of the present system in the ecclesiastical courts, and the bishop of Lincoln, approved of the principle of the bill, which was read a first time.

At an adjourned meeting of the West India proprietors, at the Thatched House tavern, the earl of Harewood in the chair, resolutions were passed, declaring—"That the meeting was anxious to adopt the principle of the resolutions of Mr. Stanley; that they had always been ready to offer to his majesty's government their local knowledge and practical experience; that the proposed bill meditated an unnecessary interference with the rights and privileges of the colonial legislatures; and that a committee consisting of the agents of islands, and other gentlemen, should be appointed, to examine into the details of the bill, and report hereafter upon it.

PORTUGAL.

The news of the capture of the fleet of Don Miguel by that of Don Pedro, under rear admiral Napier, has been confirmed. The Liverpool Times of July 16th contains positive accounts to that effect. The Birmingham steamboat arrived at that place on the night of the 15th bringing Senior Mendizabal, bearer of despatches, who landed and proceeded immediately for London. The following is said to be the substance of his despatches.

It appears that rear admiral Napier, with his squadron, consisting of three frigates—the Rainha da Portugal (flag), Don Pedro, and Donna Maria; a corvette, a brig, and a schooner, sailed from Lagos on the 2d instant, and on the 4th came in sight of Don Miguel's fleet, consisting of nine ships, but there being no wind, the admiral was not able to bring the enemy to action, upon which he called on the steamers to tow his ships towards the enemy which they declined, unless the value of the steamers was secured to the owners. On Friday the 5th inst. however, a breeze sprung up, when rear admiral Napier bore down on the enemy and commenced the action about 3 o'clock in the afternoon by attacking the Da Rainha, mounting 74 guns, which he carried in gallant style. The Don John, alarmed at the capture of her consort, made all sail to escape a similar fate. Admiral Napier, having secured the Da Rainha, immediately pursued the flying ship, and after a long chase, during which the Don John kept up an incessant fire from her stern chasers, came up with the enemy, who at once struck his colors.

The Princess Real, 50 guns, was captured by the Donna Maria, of 38 guns, after a short but smart engagement of twenty minutes, in which we regret to say captain Goblet, commander of the latter ship, was killed. A store ship, after a desperate conflict with the Don Pedro, likewise surrendered, as did two of the smaller ships. The remainder of the enemy's fleet, consisting of three brigs and a schooner, effected their escape. Thus terminated an action which proved the destruction of Don Miguel's naval force, and which in its results is of the utmost importance to the cause of the legitimate sovereign of Portugal. Besides the loss of capt. Goblet, the constitutionalists have to deplore the loss of captain George, and lieutenant Woolridge, flag lieutenant to rear admiral Napier, and several other officers, also a considerable number of officers and men wounded. Among the latter is the son of rear admiral Napier. On the return of the squadron with their prizes to Lagos, (where they will be immediately refitted for the service of her majesty Donna Maria), the corporate body presented admiral Napier with a crown formed of laurel.

The whole of the province of Algarves has declared for the young queen, and the constitutionalists now feel certain of establishing Donna Maria on the throne of her ancestors. The Tagus is blockaded. The number of troops which have declared for the queen in the kingdom of Algarves is differently represented, from 3,000 to 7,000. Adding these to the troops of marquis Palmella and count Villa Flor, it makes their army to amount to between 7,000 and 10,000 men, with which they were rapidly moving towards Lisbon. The war was expected speedily to be brought to a close.

The Birmingham called off Oporto with despatches for Don Pedro on the 10th, and communicated with the transport off the bar, the commander of which came on board the steamer, and stated that an attack had been made on Oporto by Don Miguel's forces on Saturday last, which was repelled with great loss to the enemy. During the voyage home, the Birmingham fell in with the George the Fourth, steamer, which sailed hence for Lisbon last week with Marshal Bourmont on board, and communicated the intelligence of the capture of the fleet.

RUSSIA.

Despatches from St. Petersburg, as also the St. Petersburg Gazette, received in London on the 14th of July, mention a plot against the life of the emperor of Russia, on the part of some Polish exiles, who left Paris a short time ago, and bound themselves by an oath to effect his assassination. It was first made public by a journal which gave an account of the reception of a deputation which waited upon the emperor in Finland to congratulate him on the frustration of the conspiracy. It seems that the Russian authorities did not wish the matter made public, but on this account appearing deemed it right to allude to it in the Gazette. The sensation created throughout Russia is very great, and all sorts of precautions are employed to protect the emperor in his various visits to the frontier towns.

TURKEY.

The Egyptians were still on the retreat. Ibrahim pacha's vanguard was on the other side of Koniah.

STILL LATER.

The ship Governor Troup, arrived at New York, brings Liverpool dates to the 17th July, which states "that the duke of Palmella has received full powers from Don Pedro to place himself at the head of a regency at the Algarves, and that in that capacity he may be expected to make a formal application to the British and French governments for the recognition of Donna Maria as queen, de facto, of Portugal. Indeed some surprise has been caused by his not having done so already. There is said to be great dissimulation on the part of some of the members of our cabinet to take any step in favor of the Portuguese constitutionalists on a direct application of Don Pedro, but it is highly probable that the regency established in the Algarves will not make a fruitless application, when it is considered that the only grounds of objection hitherto assigned by our government for the non-recognition of the regency are removed, and that the capture of the Miguelite fleet by admiral Napier, has entirely changed the complexion of the contest."

The landing of Don Pedro's troops in Algarves had given great alarm to the cabinet of Ferdinand of Spain, and report says, that they immediately hurried off troops to the frontiers. The cortes were dissolved on the 4th of July.

The London, Liverpool and Leeds markets continued brisk, the demand for some articles were entirely beyond the supply.

LETTER FROM A POLISH OFFICER.

The following extracts are translated from a letter from a gallant Polish officer, to a friend of ours in Boston, who has for years past felt a deep interest in the affairs of that brave and unfortunate nation. The name of Wodzinski is a sufficient guarantee for the truth of what is said. [N. Y. Com. Adv. Chateau de Montargis, April 1, 1833.]

My dear friend:—You will have learned by the journals, that since my last, the national Polish committee, presided over by Lelewe, has been dissolved by an arbitrary order of the French ministry, on the formal demand of the Russian ambassador. Subsequent orders, entirely in the Russian spirit, obliged all of us exiles, to leave Paris, and to abandon entirely the affairs of our brethren in exile as a body. But a new committee has been attempted under the presidency of our gallant friend Dwernicki; unhappily, however, the choice was made in haste, just before the breaking up of the committee, only a few members being present, and those the ones whose conduct had been so unpopular with the exiles that they were obliged to resign. Still, we hope we shall soon succeed in forming a new committee, that we may preserve at least a rallying point, and the shadow of a political existence, which, however, the Russian ambassador is striving to destroy, even on the soil of France.

You know how shamefully we have been treated: how, cooped up in small and retired places, it has been forbidden us to leave them: how our unfortunate youth, who wish to profit by the advantages of Paris, in finishing their education, have a thousand and a thousand difficulties thrown in their way. But alas! this is not the worst: it seems the coup d' grace is to be given, for the minister of war has published a circular to the Polish officers, saying that the French government will endeavor to obtain an amnesty for them, so that they may return to their homes! You know, my dear sir, the cruel tendency of this measure, which the world will call a generous and magnanimous one! Oh God! it boots man to have more than a soldier's patience, to support such a horrible situation; and yet, my countrymen seem to have it, I know not how, but yet they keep up their hearts and their hopes; they have got up little schools among themselves, and seem determined to make most of their sad exile.

I will spare your sensibility, and not give you the detail of the sad and sickening news we receive from our unhappy country;—enough, that it is the same old system—the same persecution—the same confiscations—the same outrages and transportations, which freeze the blood to think upon, and which our ruthless tyrants follow up with hellish perseverance. One must have much faith, much strength of mind, when with thousands, innocent as himself, he is suffering such persecution, not to doubt the existence of eternal justice.

It is the tyrant of the north, who has revived the spirit of the holy alliance—for it is this spirit which governs and oppresses all Europe. You know the state of France, and the men who have seized upon the reins thrown down at the revolution of July—men who have done nothing during the past year, but make bad worse. There is no meanness, no cowardice, no deception, which Louis Philippe has not practised to strengthen his seat on the throne of the barricades; and at the same time to make the other thrones forget the popular origin of his own, and to unite it more firmly with theirs.

Public opinion in France seems to be in a state of complete lethargy; men seem almost to despair of better things, for although the present ministry is condemned and hated by the vast majority of the people, it still exists, and still goes on in its course, unopposed by aught but silent indignation. This state of things cannot exist long, but it is impossible to know when it will terminate.

In England, where public sympathy was at one time so strongly awakened in our favor, every one is occupied at present with more intense interest about their own internal affairs, and more fully awake to the true character of the soi-disant ministry of lord Grey; the late measures against Ireland seem to arouse the people to observation at last. On the whole, the political situation of England does not differ much from that of the rest of Europe.

As for us, our minds are made up upon the course we must follow. There seems nothing to hope from the actual state of things—nothing from the darker policy of Europe, which seems to be that of arresting the march of mind, and of retarding the progress of civilization and humanity. We agree perfectly with what you tell us, that there is little to hope for our country, but from a general effort which shall break up the oppressive system which at present broods incubus like over all Europe; and we believe, too, with faith, that although appearances are now against it, it must be broken up; that the progress of light and reason, founded as they are upon the immutable laws of God, must work its effects, in spite of the artificial barriers erected against them.

That which you tell us about the sympathy of the American people for our sufferings and for our cause, serves to confirm us in our hopes, while it consoles us in our misery. We know that the American people can do nothing for our country, until the knell of vengeance shall have tolled, and the day of struggle shall have again dawned. They have done for us already, much more in proportion, than those nations of Europe who ought to have succored us as much, in gratitude for services done them, as in regard of their own interest; and they have done it from pure sympathy, and noble sentiment—for, not for America, as for France, have two hundred thousand Poles given their best blood. The Americans have not partaken of the hospitality and eaten the bread of Poland, as did the French emigrants and the soldiers of the grand army; the liberties and commerce of America were not menaced by Russia, as were those of France and England. In counting, then, upon the sympathy of the American people, we shall never forget what we owe them for the voice of sympathy and the welcome supply sent in the dark hour of our agony. We shall not forget what her agent suffered in the prison of Berlin, for having carried consolation and hope to our poor soldiers in the forests of Posen, nor shall we forget that even to this hour, they interest themselves in our situation, and pray for our deliverance. * * * * *

WODZYNSKI.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

Correspondence between Mahlon Dickerson, senator in congress from New Jersey, and William H. Crawford, esq.

Suckasunny, (N. J.) 4th Oct. 1832.

MY DEAR SIR: I owe you many apologies for not having sooner answered your letter of the 30th of June last—but, overwhelmed with the business that crowded upon me at the close of the session of congress, I omitted writing an answer 'till I should reach home; and here I found my business so much in arrear, in consequence of my long absence, that I was completely occupied for a month—when my house was filled with my friends who had escaped from the cholera, since which, my time has been entirely occupied. And these circumstances must account for my apparent neglect.

Your letter, although written with the most friendly intentions, could have no effect in influencing my vote upon the tariff, as it was not received 'till after that subject was settled in the senate. On the 29th of June we received the tariff bill of the house of representatives, and on the 7th July, passed our amendments to a third reading.

Your letter is postmarked the 1st of July, and reached Washington on the 8th, (Sunday) although, in consequence of my absence, I did not read or see it 'till the next day.

We afterwards had a committee of conference, of which I was a member, in which I assented to a report, by which we yielded to the house of representatives, and abandoned a part of our amendments to which they had disagreed, some of which ought to have been adhered to—but I was not willing to hazard the loss of the bill, by a vain attempt to oppose a majority of the conference—greatly as the bill was calculated to injure many important manufactures in the United States, I thought it better to pass it, if it would be considered as a measure of conciliation by the south, as we were assured it would—an assurance we considered as fully justified by the final vote.

Of my high estimate of your character and opinions, you have many proofs. If any one could persuade me to abandon my principles of protecting the agricultural, commercial and manufacturing industry, it would be yourself—and the preservation of the union, which you urge, would be the strongest argument that could be offered: but this I could not do, without betraying the trust reposed in me; and in my humble opinion, there is more danger to the union from abandoning the protective system than from adhering to it.

There is no difficulty in reducing the revenue to the exigencies of the government, by repealing, or greatly diminishing the duties upon unprotected articles, without affecting the important articles of manufacture now protected by law; and this would be precisely as great a relief from taxation as if the reduction took place upon the protected articles. This, however, would not answer the views of those who are determined that we shall import from Great Britain manufactures to the amount of 12 or 15 millions of dollars a year, in addition to the enormous value of those we now import.

To prevent this mode of reducing the revenue, a plan was devised, that the duties should be equalized: in the language of gen. Hayne's amendment to Mr. Clay's resolution, "so that the duties on no article shall, as compared with the value of that article, vary materially from the general average."

This scheme of a general average of duties was as ingenious as it was novel, and had it been carried into operation would have destroyed the most important manufactures of this country, for the sole benefit of Great Britain.

There is nothing that betrays a more deadly hostility to the interest and prosperity of the eastern, western and middle states, than this plan of a general average of duties—if such an average could be just under any circumstances, why was it not adopted when it was necessary to raise twenty three millions of dollars a year by duties? If not proper heretofore, why is it proposed now, when we propose to raise but thirteen millions by duties?

It was always expected that on the extinction of the public debt, there would be a reduction of revenue to the amount of ten millions of dollars a year; but it was not anticipated in the eastern, western and middle states, that this was to be the period of abandoning the protective system. If it was right to protect manufactures, when we were in debt, it is equally right when we are out of debt. Are the millions of property accumulated while in debt, to be sacrificed when the debt is paid? Is the prosperity of agriculture, commerce and manufactures to depend upon the national debt? Are all engaged in those interests to be sustained while we are in debt, and crushed when we are no longer so?

The national debt does not give the power to protect the industry of the country, nor does its extinction take away that power.

The southern states now make remittances of their produce, in exchange for which they obtain foreign merchandise, not only sufficient for their own consumption, but also to the amount of more than twelve millions of dollars a year for the consumption of the eastern, western and middle states; thereby rendering those states tributary to them. And it is a subject of deep complaint that those states do not consume of such merchandise to the amount of twelve or fifteen millions more, as they would be compelled to do, but for the manufactures of this country, and for which the cotton planters would pay in their produce, as they verily believe—and this is truly the cause of the great struggle which now agitates the states, and which has produced an excitement in the south, that may be attended with the most disastrous consequences.

The grain growing and manufacturing states do not expect so to regulate the commerce of the United States, as completely to countervail the restrictive regulations of Great Britain and other European governments, so that the produce of those states shall be received in exchange for their whole imports, which to them would be an immense advantage; but they think that the southern states ought to be satisfied with the advantage they now enjoy, of paying in their produce to the amount of twelve or fifteen millions of dollars annually, for imported articles consumed by them, the grain growing and manufacturing states. This, to the southern states, is one of the benefits of the union, which they would most certainly forfeit, should this union be dissolved.

We are making no struggle to pay by our exports, for articles to be consumed in the south, but we struggle to prevent any further addition to the amount of imports for our consumption to be paid for in the produce of the south, and to nations, which exclude our productions under prohibitory duties. And for this we are accused of pillage, fraud and robbery, even upon the floors of the two houses of congress, in terms the most gross and insulting. And although terms of recrimination have not been applied to gentlemen from the south, it is a lamentable fact, that this unceasing clamor and abuse have produced the most indignant feelings in many sections of the country, that may throw insuperable difficulties in the way of an amicable adjustment of the unfortunate controversy.

If the prices of goods of kinds manufactured in the United States, had increased in consequence of the tariff, there would be some cause of complaint; but this is not the fact, except in case of coarse woolsens, and this is in consequence of the votes of the gentlemen from the south. On the contrary, the prices of most of these have decreased, and that in consequence of the foreign and domestic competition, and are in fact much lower than they would have been, had no such competition taken place.

A very small portion of the citizens of the eastern, western and middle states are engaged in manufactures; they have to pay the same price for manufactured articles, foreign or domestic, that is paid in the south; and if these were enhanced by the encouragement given to manufactures, they would as soon complain as the gentlemen of the south; and yet upon this subject, there is no complaint among them, for the plain reason, that there is no cause of complaint.

You consider as a delusion, the idea that the duty upon imports is a tax upon the exporter, as such;—yet this delusion has had a most decided effect in producing the excitement in the south, and although the delusion has passed away, the excitement remains.

It is believed in the south, that if the protective system should be abolished, they would be enabled to add from thirty to forty per cent. to their sales of cotton—that in that case, Great Britain would purchase of them a world of cotton, that she does not want—and I have heard gentlemen from the south, of excellent understanding and apparently in their sober senses, declare it as their decided opinion, that if a separation of the states should take place, the property of the southern states—houses, lands and slaves would immediately raise fifty per cent. in value. That this delusion prevails extensively in the south, I have no doubt—and if so, it is not strange that a love of the union should yield to the prospect of such immense gain. Indeed it seems necessary that some such powerful cause should exist, to account for the agitation of the whole southern section of our country, (the state of Louisiana always excepted). The revenue from imports may easily be reduced to thirteen millions of dollars a year, without a further reduction of the duties on protected articles. This would be one dollar per head for the people of the United States, paid for the important benefits resulting from the union. Such a tax for such an object, cannot be considered so oppressive as to drive people to madness. Indeed, the people of the south are willing to pay their share of this tax, but demand that the duties shall be laid upon all articles of import by a general average; and they are about to dissolve the union, not because they are called upon to pay this amount of tax, but for the difference it makes to them, whether they pay the duties upon tea and coffee or upon sugar and molasses; upon quicksilver and opium, or upon cotton and woolsens. The excitement of the south cannot be owing to a cause so totally inadequate.

I have no doubt, that there is a fixed determination of a large majority of the people of the United States, to protect the industry of the country against foreign regulations, and against the labor of the paupers of England, supported in part by the parishes in the manufacturing districts, working for less than the value of their necessary food and clothing, and thus enabling the British manufacturer to export his goods, at less than cost. This majority are willing to make every concession to the southern states, which they can do, without ruin to the establishments that have grown under the protective policy, here—tofore advocated by many of the ablest statesmen in the south. But if the concession made in the late tariff bill, he considered as nothing, I see but little prospect of satisfying those who are in favor of nullification, or even those who are in favor of a southern convention.

Anxious as I am to see the extinguishment of the national debt, I have long considered it as a most dangerous crisis in our affairs. I did not apprehend, however, that it would impair the protective system of our country; but I feared it would lead to increase the number of those who live upon the public treasury; that it would lead to the creation of new and useless offices—that it would lead to the increase of salaries, and to a wild, ruinous, partial and unjust system of internal improvements, by roads and canals, under the legislation of congress, and under the officers of the general government, giving to them a dangerous power, with which it was not the intention of the federal convention to invest them.

Not that I am an enemy to internal improvements by roads and canals: on the contrary, I am decidedly in favor of such improvements, if they can be conducted with moderation, and upon a system of equal justice to all the states, without adding to the powers of the general government, and without absorbing the time of congress in an endless labyrinth of legislation.

The power of congress to make roads and canals through states, without or with their consent, I deny—but I have never denied their power to authorise subscriptions in the stock of road or canal companies, established in the states. For such subscriptions I have voted.

You think it strange that I should advocate the power of congress to authorise the states to make roads and canals, a power which they could not exercise themselves. I proposed to divide the surplus revenue, not wanted for the purposes of the general government, as being in fact the property of the states, from which it was taken—the states to do as they please with it—the states, having the money, would want no power from congress to make roads and canals with it. I have no doubt of the power of congress thus to dispose of the surplus funds; and I am surprised that any one can doubt it, who thinks it right to vote for a subscription on the part of the United States, in any road or canal company.

In your second letter you say, that I have been represented, as having made a speech or report in support of the tariff, on the principles of equalising the advantages which the southern states enjoy over the eastern and northern states, in soil, climate and productions.

In a speech upon the tariff of 1834, I exhibited a calculation to show how much the grain growing states suffered from the circumstance, that they consumed two-thirds of the imports into the country, while the produce of the south, in which but one-third of such imports was consumed, paid for two-thirds—that in fact the produce of the south paid for all the imports consumed in the southern states, and half of all consumed in the other states. This statement I quoted in a speech on the late tariff bill, for the purpose of shewing that in 1834, I assumed the same facts to prove that the grain growing states were suffering from the circumstance, that the southern states were exporting so much, and they so little, in exchange for our imports, that the author of the famous South Carolina exposition in 1828, took to prove how much the southern states were suffering from the same condition. To this it was replied, that my argument went to prove that the advantages which the southern states enjoyed over the northern and eastern, in climate, soil and productions, should be equalized. But I said no such thing—not any thing to justify such an inference, beyond what you will find in pages 22, 23 and 24, of my speech, which I send you. In page 28, I give a sufficient explanation of my meaning—a very different one from that assigned to me.

The situation of those in the southern states, who are opposed to the tariff, and at the same time opposed to the violence of the nullifiers, must be extremely unpleasant. This I take to be your situation. If you encourage rash measures, you endanger the peace of the country;—if you oppose them, you become unpopular, and labor under the imputation of being more friendly to the north, than to the south. My own situation has been rendered unpleasant by a somewhat similar cause. When the interests of the south, particularly of Georgia, were assailed in congress, and throughout the eastern and middle states, so far as my votes would go, I sustained those interests, and, by so doing, forfeited the good opinion of many of my best friends, who were in favor of strong measures, which, if adopted, must have led to civil war. I believed Georgia in the right in principle, but censurable, for some of the means adopted to secure her rights. The course I adopted, was, in my opinion, best calculated to preserve the peace and harmony of the union—I am satisfied with the votes I gave, to sustain the interests of the south, although in opposition to the opinions of a great majority of the people of the eastern and middle states.

Your wish to preserve the union cannot be more sincere than mine—and I trust it will be preserved.

No man has more the power, or more the disposition, to sustain the union, than our present chief magistrate. On his prudence and energy, to conduct us through our present difficulties, I place great reliance. He occupies a position that enables him to see the whole ground; and to perceive, that the danger of dissolution is not altogether on one side of the question.

Whatever may be the issue of the present controversy, I cannot believe, that, in the course you may pursue, you will be governed by any but just and patriotic motives.

I do not attempt an argument in favor of the tariff; all that can well be said upon the subject, is already before the public. The sentiments I have expressed to you, are to be disposed of at your pleasure: upon this great question I have no views to conceal.

With sentiments of the most sincere regard and esteem, I am your friend and humble servant, MAILLON DICKERSON.

The hon. Wm. H. Crawford.

Mr. Crawford's reply to Mr. Dickerson.

Wood Lawn, 4th Feb. 1833.

MY DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 4th October, 1832, was received by due course of mail, and would have been answered sooner, but I have been unable, until a few days past, to obtain the journals of the federal convention, Yates' secret debates of that convention, and Luther Martin's report to the legislature of Maryland, of the part he had acted in that convention. The perusal of these books was thought to be indispensable to a full and satisfactory examination of the various and important topics presented in your letter. When the federal government was first organized, the statesmen of the United States were divided in opinion touching the constitution. The federal party believed the powers granted in the constitution, were not sufficient to enable the federal government to fulfil the objects for which it had been created. They, therefore, endeavored to infuse into it by legislation, that vigor which they believed necessary to enable it to answer the end for which it had been devised. To succeed in this, they resorted to a latitudinarian construction of the constitution; but they fell far short of the republican party when they came into power. This party, while the federalists were in power, had contended for a strict construction of the constitution, and opposed with talent and eclat, the efforts of the federal party to make the federal government, in practice, a consolidated government. It was principally owing to this opposition, and to the extremes to which the federal party carried their construction of the constitution, that the republican party obtained a triumph over the federal party in 1801, and obtained possession of the federal government, and have retained it, at least nominally, ever since. At the conclusion of the war in 1815, the debt of the union exceeded $120,000,000; and required that a large revenue should be collected to discharge the interest of the debt, and provide for the gradual extinguishment of the principal. For that purpose, the tariff act of 1816 was enacted; and although it was strictly a revenue act, and was voted for by a large majority of the members of congress as a revenue measure, and was strictly justifiable as a revenue tariff, yet one member from the south supported it as a measure for the protection of manufactures, and openly contended that congress not only was vested by the constitution with power to protect manufactures, but was under the most solemn obligations to exercise that power at that time. Yet, strange to tell, that very member is now at the head of the nullifying party in South Carolina, and that party has nullified the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832, because they were intended to protect manufactures.

Shortly after the war, which terminated in eighteen hundred and fifteen, there was an effort made to amalgamate parties in the union. Many men of doubtful political principles assumed the political garb of republicanism, and were admitted into the republican ranks. These men uniformly voted for extending the federal rule as much as possible, and aided by men who had always been known in the republican ranks, but who had always shewn a marked predilection for a splendid national government, among whom the gentleman before alluded to shone conspicuous. In addition to the protective tariff, a splendid plan of internal improvements was devised and supported, not only by the gentleman previously referred to, but by a gentleman from the west, who had the address to appropriate to himself the credit of the system. Under the guidance of these two distinguished gentlemen, the doctrine of latitudinarian construction has so deformed the constitution, that if its framers could arise from their tombs, they could not be made to believe that the present government existed under the constitution they had formed. Posterity will be placed in the same situation. When they shall read the constitution, (if indeed it is destined to descend to posterity), they will be unable to account for many acts of the government under that constitution, and will be ready to conclude that those acts have resulted from a very different constitution, which has been lost in the lapse of ages. The strict principles of construction contended for by the republican party, from the year 1789 to the year 1801, when Mr. Jefferson was elected president, where are they at this day? Do the republican party occupy the same ground this day that they did in 1801? No. They have abandoned that ground, and have adopted the most visionary and wild theories of construction that ever degraded the human understanding. I recollect to have heard a member from Pennsylvania, when I was a member of Mr. Monroe's cabinet, derive the power to make internal improvements from the power to regulate commerce.

As I consider your letter presents the grounds upon which a protective tariff rests, and as I am not convinced that those grounds are defensible, I feel it my duty, in the present crisis, to endeavor to prove by evidence, if not demonstrative, at least morally certain, that the framers of the constitution did not intend to invest congress with the power to protect manufactures, and did not believe that they had invested congress with that power. In page 139 of the journals of the federal convention, the following proposition was submitted to the consideration of the convention: "to establish public institutions, rewards and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, trades and manufactures." Here the question was distinctly brought under the consideration of the convention. The proposition, nor any thing similar to it, was sanctioned by the convention, as is proven by the journals and by the constitution. I presume you will admit that generally, where a grant of power has been proposed to the convention and has not been granted in the constitution, it is evidence that the convention did not mean to grant it. Now, unless the refusal to grant this power can be shown to be an exception to the general rule I have laid down, the power to protect manufactures must be abandoned by congress. The onus probandi in this case lies upon the party relying upon the exception. But if I am not greatly mistaken, I shall be able to shew, before this letter is concluded, that the case under consideration is not an exception to the general rule. In your letter to me, you state that you have not attempted to prove the constitutionality of the protective tariff, because you are satisfied with Mr. Madison's opinion on that subject. You, at the same time, inclose me a speech of yours, in which the constitutionality of that measure is defended. Mr. Madison's opinion and yours, are entitled with me, at least, to as much deference and respect, as the opinions of any two men in the world. But upon a question like this, I cannot resign my judgment to any authority except reason. Now, as I am not satisfied with the reason assigned by Mr. Madison, I must be excused for differing with such a great and good man. Mr. Madison's opinion is partly the result of reason, and partly of memory. I shall here state my objection to the reasoning part of it, and then the evidence to show that his memory has deceived him. I have not his letters to Joseph H. Cabell, esq. before me; but if my recollection be correct, he treats the idea that the power to lay duties upon imports by a state with the consent of congress, was intended to enable the states to protect the manufactures, with something like derision. He says the imposition of such duties would destroy its commerce, which no state can be presumed to desire. Now it so happens that the manufacturing states are precisely in the situation to desire to sacrifice their commerce to their manufactures, provided the commerce of their co-states is sacrificed at the same time. It may be well conceived, that when for revenue, congress shall have levied duties nearly to the point of prohibition, a state having a large amount of capital invested in manufactures, equal at least, to the supply of its own consumption, may be disposed to levy duties so as to prohibit the importation of those articles that it can supply. Such a measure will exempt it from contributing any thing to the treasury of the United States, and will only subject it to the payment of the duties which it shall have imposed, which it will pay to the manufacturers according to my theory, but according to the manufacturing theory, which you seem to have adopted, will subject them to no higher price, but absolutely procure those articles at a cheaper rate than they obtained there before the imposition of the prohibitory duties. I think Mr. Madison clearly wrong in his reason. Let us now see if he is more fortunate in his memory.

Luther Martin, in his report to the legislature of Maryland, page 41, 4th volume, Elliot's edition, says: "By this section (10th of 1st art.) every state is also prohibited from laying any imposts or duties upon imports or exports without the permission of the general government. It was urged that, as almost all sources of taxation were given to congress, it would be but reasonable to leave the states the power of bringing revenue into their treasuries by laying a duty upon exports, if they should think proper, which might be so light as not to injure or discourage industry, and yet might be productive of considerable revenue. Also, that there might be cases in which it would be proper, for the purpose of encouraging manufacturers, to lay duties to prohibit the exportation of raw materials, and even in addition to the duties laid by congress on imports for the sake of revenue, to lay a duty to discourage the importation of particular articles into a state, or to enable the manufacturer here to supply us on as good terms as they could be obtained from a foreign market. However, the most we could obtain was, that this power might be exercised by the states, with, and only with, the consent of congress, and subject to its control; and so anxious were they to seize on every shilling of our money for the general government, that they insisted even, the little revenue that might thus arise, should not be appropriated to the use of the respective states where it was collected, but should be paid into the treasury of the United States; and accordingly so it is determined."

This report is dated January 27th, 1783, only a few months after the adjournment of the convention. Mr. Martin was an active and intelligent member of the convention; remarkable for his comprehensive and tenacious memory; was dissatisfied with the constitution formed by that convention, and particularly because he could not obtain a more efficient protection of manufactures, as appears by the foregoing report to the Maryland legislature. The clause of the constitution giving to congress the power to regulate commerce, is in a section of the constitution preceding that which Mr. Martin says was inserted to enable the states to protect their manufactures and had been adopted previously. If the convention had believed that the power to regulate commerce carried with it the power to protect manufactures, Mr. Martin would have been told that the power had been conferred upon congress, and there was no need of vesting the power in the states. But the provision was inserted, which proves, I think, satisfactorily, that the convention did not believe that the power to regulate commerce did invest congress with the right or the power to protect manufactures. If this report of Mr. Martin proves that the convention did not believe that they had vested that right in congress, by the grant of the power to regulate commerce, the extract from the journals of the convention, previously cited, proves as conclusively that the convention did not intend to vest any authority in congress to protect manufactures. It appears to me, that the extract from the journals, and that from Mr. Martin's report, cover the whole ground, and that there is no room for doubt, or hesitation upon the subject. It is true that the evidence is principally dehors the constitution. The journal of the federal convention is but one degree removed from the constitution itself, and in all cases of doubt is the best evidence that can be offered to remove that doubt. The evidence of the journal then, in the present case, is the highest evidence of which the case admits, and that evidence is conclusive against the right of congress to protect manufactures. The testimony of Mr. Martin is supported in some degree by the constitution itself. The provision which he declares was inserted to enable the states to protect manufactures, is in that instrument, as he represents it, and was not in any original proposition presented to congress; and no attempt has been made to account for its insertion for a different purpose than that ascribed to it by Mr. Martin, which has within my knowledge been made public. Mr. Madison, in rejecting Mr. Martin's account of it, has not attempted to assign any other office to the provision. Considering that Mr. Martin's report was made shortly after the adjournment of the federal convention; that in the report he accounted for his conduct, to his constituent, the legislature; and that he states a transaction in which he appears to have taken a deep interest, there can, I think, be no room for doubt in receiving his account of the transaction in preference to Mr. Madison's, which is made known more than forty years after the adjournment of the federal convention. A careful consideration of the federal constitution will lead to the same conclusion as the evidence which I have just submitted and examined. Upon a deliberate examination of that instrument, I think it is apparent that its powers were given principally for exterior objects, and those which are necessary for the proper management of those objects. That there do not appear to me more than two grants of power in the constitution which authorises congress to interfere with the great mass of individuals, and their interests or concerns. The revenue, or rather that part of it which authorises congress to lay taxes and excises, and the power given over the militia; both these powers are necessary to the management of the exterior relations of the United States. The state legislatures, in the scheme of the federal government, were considered as exclusively charged with the domestic relations and interests of individuals, except in the two cases before mentioned. When the convention first met, very different views appear to have been entertained of the powers which ought to be vested in it. As the federal government has been administered, it would have been much better to have adopted Mr. Hamilton's plan of the legislative powers of congress, which was to pass all laws that they should deem necessary. If that plan had been adopted, I verily believe but one law would have passed which has not been enacted. Under Mr. Hamilton's plan, it is possible, nay, probable, considering the fanaticism which has been displayed in some states, that a law would have passed for the emancipation of slaves. In the enactments of congress they have devised the means of passing all laws, which, in their fantasy, they deemed necessary.

I admit that if the United States were governed by a consolidated government, the power to regulate commerce would, in the absence of the journals of the convention and Mr. Martin's report, have authorised the protection of manufactures. If the state government and state lines were obliterated, the protection of manufactures might be effected under the power to regulate commerce, because it has been done by most of the civilized states in the world. But the tariff is clearly a measure of consolidation, and so are measures of internal improvement which have been carried on by congress without the shadow of authority. It is this reckless legislation of congress that has produced the present alarming crisis in the affairs of the union, and the present is but a commencement of difficulties of that kind, unless a speedy return to the true principles of the constitution be effected. The difficulty of warding off the blows aimed by South Carolina ought to admonish the federal government of the necessity of moderation and rigid adherence to the powers granted, and such as are necessarily incident to them, and without which they cannot be carried into effect. The publication of the journal of the federal convention, and other documents connected with it, has thrown much light upon the powers of the federal government. I verily believe, if they had been published before the organization of the federal government, neither the bank of the United States, the assumption of the state debts or a protective tariff, would have ever been found in the federal statute book.

When I made up my opinion upon the bank question in 1811, that opinion was founded exclusively upon the constitution. The publication of the journals, which I have now perused for the first time, has changed that opinion. You formed your opinion upon the protective system in the same way, before the publication of the journal, and probably without having seen Luther Martin's report.

Review, I beseech you, the whole ground; lay aside during the review all pre-conceived opinions upon the subject, and I entertain a hope that we shall agree in the conclusion. You say the revenue may be reduced to the necessary expenses of the government, by reducing or entirely abolishing the duties upon unprotected articles; that this course will relieve the nation from a large portion of its burdens, and ought to be acceptable to the states. This is a mistake. Such a reduction will only increase the inequality which already exists. But the tariff states are wholly mistaken; they think the murmurs of the south are principally produced by the revenue collected for the use of the government. No; the people of the south have never complained of paying what was necessary to support the government; but they complain, and will complain as long as congress, by its legislation, shall enable the manufacturers to levy contributions upon them equal to those they pay to the government; and rest assured, if these exertions are continued much longer, the union will be dissolved. But you say if the protective system be abolished, the union will be more certainly dissolved, than by its continuance. This is possible. I can offer no opinion upon it; but if it be so, look at the difference in the situation of the southern and tariff states. The former say, hands off, "Laissez nous faire." The latter say, if we are not authorised to fleece the southern states ad libitum, we will dissolve the union; or, as Hezekiah Niles says, "we will present a million of muskets in defence of our legal rights, secured to us by the tariff." You disbelieve that the tariff does operate oppressively. You say no complaint arises against it any where but at the south, for the simple reason that there is no oppression. I can verily imagine many reasons why there is no excitement against the tariff in the tariff states. Most of the men of wealth and influence in those states have capital invested in manufactures. Wherever there is a manufacturing establishment, a market is furnished to a certain distance around it, for every article that can be raised on a farm. All those who furnish the market are compensated, and more than compensated for the burdens of the tariff. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the location or extent of the manufacturing establishments in those states, to determine upon the relative proportion of the population thus benefited by those establishments. Besides these two classes, all those who are employed in those establishments, and their families, are reconciled to the tariff. But, independent of these classes, there can be little doubt that the popular name with which the tariff has been dubbed, has had a tendency to render it popular. In Kentucky, there can be no other cause for its popularity, aided by Mr. Clay's address and influence. It may be safely laid down as a general rule, that manufactures cannot be beneficially introduced into any country, except where there is labor and capital which cannot find employment without their introduction. In Kentucky there is neither a superabundance of capital or labor. Manufactures can only exist there as a hot-house plant, and must be supported at an expense greatly beyond the value of the article produced. The tariff system has been introduced in disregard and defiance of the principles of southern political economy.

You say that manufactures to the amount of ten or fifteen millions of dollars, purchased by the produce of the southern states, are annually consumed by the northern and middle states, and then triumphantly ask if that is not a benefit derived from the union; and add, that those states are desirous of furnishing these articles themselves, but that southern states object, and insist upon their consuming that amount of British manufactures, for the benefit of British manufacturers. In reply to these serious allegations, I will say, in the first place, the south never has objected, and does not now object to the tariff states furnishing themselves with all the articles necessary for their convenience and comfort. They have never insisted that the tariff states should consume 12 or 15 millions annually of British manufactures, or any other amount. I will say, further, it is the first time in the world that a party, who has been obliged, at his own request, with an advance of 12 or 15 millions annually, should conceive that he had laid the party making the advances under any obligations, or that the party receiving was aggrieved by receiving voluntarily such advances. The true state of the question is this: the tariff states not only insist upon furnishing themselves with these articles, but also the southern states, and that the southern states should pay them, not only to enable them to supply themselves, but the southern states also. The southern states have never requested any thing to be done for them at the expense of a sister state; whereas the tariff states ask that the whole people of the United States should be enormously taxed for their especial benefit. But you deny that the tariff has operated to raise the price of manufactured articles; on the contrary, you allege the tariff has reduced the price of the protected articles. In other words, you have adopted the theory and opinions of the manufacturers. Actions speak louder than words; and when words and actions are contradictory, actions are to be believed in preference to words. During the last session of congress, Mr. Appleton, of Boston I believe, alleged that cottons under 16 cents the yard were not protected by the tariff of 1828, and needed no protection. The provision of the bill under consideration directed that all plain cottons costing less than 30 cents should be estimated, in calculating the duties, as having cost 30 cents. A motion was made to strike out all cottons costing less than 16 cents. This motion was resisted successfully by the friends of the tariff. I am informed that cottons are made in England as low as 6 cents.

A duty of 25 per cent. levied on such cottons, estimated as having cost 30 cents, would amount to one hundred and twenty-five per cent. ad valorem. This single fact proves conclusively that no reliance can be placed upon the representations of the manufacturers, and ought to discredit their evidence with all impartial men of common sense. For what would they desire to keep up an enormous duty upon an article that needed no protection? Was it merely to insult the people, or to shew them the absolute power that they wielded over them? If this was their object, they have certainly succeeded in it, and if protection, in order to vend their goods at an enormous profit, was their object, they have equally succeeded. I hope, after considering this fact the advocates of the protective system will cease to tell us, that the tariff reduces the price of manufactured articles. If this be true, the tariff is injurious to them and beneficial to us. We do not think so. We wish it repealed, and they ought so to wish it. Why, therefore, is it not repealed? Simply because it enables the manufactures to levy contribution upon the people. All their declarations of this kind are hypocritical and false.

I reject nullification. I equally reject Mr. McDuffie's doctrine, that the producer pays all the duty. I admit that this doctrine has aggravated the discontents of the south. I admit, also, that the oppressions of the tariff upon the south are exaggerated, and yet, I assert, that the south is oppressed beyond the eastern and middle states—that the tariff is unequal, unjust, and, as I hope I have proved to your satisfaction, unconstitutional, or at least an abuse of the constitution. It operates more oppressively on the southern than upon the people of the tariff states. 1st. Because there are no manufacturing establishments in those states, consequently no local market created. 2d. Because none of the laboring class are employed by means of the tariff. 3d. Because capitalists have invested no capital in them. And 4th, we are at a greater distance from the workshops which supply us with the necessary articles. The freight, insurance, commissions, and other necessary expenses, enhance the price of those articles to the consumer in the southern states, in a higher degree, than in the tariff states. In these four particulars, the tariff is more oppressive to the citizens of the southern states than of the tariff states. Even in Pennsylvania, I was informed by an intelligent gentleman of that state, the people are beginning to open their eyes to the oppressions of the tariff. He informed me that the member of congress elected from the district, was elected under a written pledge to reduce the tariff. There can be no doubt that the tariff is injurious to the interests of the great body of citizens in every part of the United States. It is a measure for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many. It is worse still: it is for the benefit of the few rich men at the expense of the great body of the people. It is calculated to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. Inequalities in wealth, in civilized communities, will necessarily arise. So far as the inequality is inherent in the nature of man, it must be submitted to; but any system of legislation which has a tendency to create or hasten that inequality, deserves the execration of the human race. Such is the tariff system. But this is not all the objection to it. If it were constitutional and exempt from the tendency to produce inequality between the citizens of the republic, it would still be injurious to the United States. The manufacturing state of society will arrive in all well regulated civil society. It is as natural for such a society eventually to become manufacturing, as a boy in due time to become a man. When the period arrives, it ought to be submitted to as all other dispensations of Providence, and then they are introduced without any other effort or sacrifice, and are productive of no other inconvenience than what results from sedentary instead of active laborious employment; and even this should not be considered an evil, for, on my supposition, it only employs those who, without the introduction of manufactures, would be idle, and any employment not absolutely mischievous, is little better than idleness. If this theory be correct, and it is believed to be so, is it not mischievous to hasten this state of things by legislation, to the great injury of the existing state of society? Conceding the constitutional power to pass such laws, is it not apparent, that the order of nature's laws is deranged by such legislation? That a state of society is prematurely forced upon the nation, to the injury of its national force, and to the destruction of the capital that would otherwise have been more profitably employed?

But you justify the tariff on the ground of retaliation upon England, because she refuses to receive the bread stuffs of the grain-growing states. Let us examine this proposition. Great Britain, in order to encourage agriculture, and to produce, if possible, bread stuffs enough to support the people, prohibits the introduction of bread stuffs generally, except when her crops fall short of supply. This prohibition extends to us in common with other nations. Every nation has a right to manage its own internal affairs in its own way, and other nations have no right to complain or interfere. But as Great Britain does not receive the grain of other nations, we have no right to say to Great Britain—take our grain, or you shall not have our cotton and rice, especially when she is almost our only customer, and certainly our best in those articles. The grain growing states have no right to jeopard those great interests, with a view to force Great Britain to abandon a policy which she had a perfect right to adopt, if she thought proper. Commerce between nations has been properly defined to be an exchange of those articles of which one nation has a redundancy, and the other a deficiency. When two nations have only redundancies or deficiencies of the same article, there can be no beneficial commerce between them in their indigenous products. In the present case, if the grain-growing states make a redundancy of grain, and Great Britain feels no deficiency of grain, there can be no beneficial commerce between them in grain. But there is no cause of complaint, no cause of retaliation, least of all a retaliation in which a mutually profitable commerce is carried on to a very great amount. The tariff cannot be justly supported as a measure of retaliation.

I think I have shown—first, that the protection of manufactures was not confided by the constitution to congress: second, that it has been confided to the states: third, that the tariff is unjust and oppressive to the great body of the people of the United States: fourth, that it is still more oppressive to the people of the southern states: fifth, that it tends directly to produce inequality of wealth in the republic, which is unfriendly to a republican government; and that it cannot be supported as a measure of retaliation. If all, or even one of these points are made out to your satisfaction, I hope you will concur with me in the result at which I have arrived. In discussing various questions presented by your very interesting letter, I have endeavored to avoid every thing calculated to irritate or offend your feelings, or the feelings of any person with whom I differ upon this all absorbing question. Before I conclude, I think it necessary to state, that by the term manufactures in the preceding pages, no allusion is made to the household manufactures. To them I am decidedly friendly. It is owing to those manufactures that we have been enabled to withstand so long the injurious effects of the tariff.

I had intended at one time to say something about nullification; but I will say only, be temperate, and resort to force only to repel force. It is in times of high excitement that the most violent stabs are given to liberty. God bless you, and direct your counsels at this alarming crisis. Contrary to my predictions of last spring, you are permitted once more to deliberate within the walls of the capitol, on the tariff. The question now presented to the manufacturers is, will you be content with the incidental protection afforded by the collection of duties for revenue, or will you dissolve the union? If the union is dissolved, the tariff will be worthless. It is true, your respective states can afford you protection within your states, except against smuggling. They can afford the same protection under the union. Why will you, therefore, insist upon dissolving the union, since its dissolution cannot benefit you? In this controversy the southern states have acted on the defensive. You have been, and now are, the aggressors. Will you cease to oppress? If you say no, I cannot say God speed! but I will say, on your heads fall all the evil which the dissolution of the union will inevitably cause.

I am, my dear sir, your friend and most obedient servant,
WM. H. CRAWFORD.

INTERESTING JUDICIAL DOCUMENT.

We are indebted to a friend who takes pleasure in re-developing the intellectual treasures of by-gone generations, for a copy of the "Charge of chief justice Jay, to the grand inquest of the county of Ulster, N. Y. on the 9th day of September, 1777."

This charge was delivered upon the opening of the first term of the supreme court, held under our present constitution. Kingston was then the seat of government; and the legislature was at that time assembling to put in motion the blessed system of government under which we have so long lived, happy and prosperous.

This charge will be admired as much for its beauty of style and purity of sentiment, as for its ardent and elevated piety and patriotism.

JUDGE JAY'S CHARGE TO THE GRAND JURY, &c.

Gentlemen—It affords me very sensible pleasure to congratulate you on the dawn of that free, mild and equal government, which now begins to rise and break from amidst those clouds of anarchy, confusion and licentiousness, which the arbitrary and violent domination of the king of Great Britain had spread, in greater or lesser degrees, throughout this and the other American states. And it gives me particular satisfaction to remark, that the first fruits of our excellent constitution appear in a part of this state, whose inhabitants have distinguished themselves by having unanimously endeavored to deserve them.

This is one of those signal instances in which divine Providence has made the tyranny of princes instrumental in breaking the chains of their subjects; and rendered the most inhuman designs, productive of the best consequences to those against whom they were intended.

The infatuated sovereign of Britain, forgetful that kings were the servants, not the proprietors, and ought to be the fathers, not the incendiaries, of their people; hith, by destroying our former constitutions, enabled us to erect more eligible systems of government on their ruins; and, by unwarrantable attempts, to bind us in all cases whatever, has reduced us to the happy necessity of being free from his control in any.

Whoever compares our present with our former constitution, will find abundant reason to rejoice in the exchange, and readily admit, that all the calamities incident to this war, will be amply compensated by the many blessings flowing from this glorious revolution. A revolution, which, in the whole course of its rise and progress, is distinguished by so many marks of the Divine favor and interposition, that no doubt can remain of its being finally accomplished.

It was begun and has been supported, in a manner so singular, and I may say, miraculous, that when future ages shall read its history, they will be tempted to consider a great part of it as fabulous. What, among other things, can appear more unworthy of credit, than that in an enlightened age, in a civilized and Christian country, in a nation so celebrated for humanity, as well as love of liberty and justice, as the English once justly were, a prince should arise, who, by the influence of corruption alone, should be able to seduce them into a combination, to reduce three millions of his most loyal and affectionate subjects, to absolute slavery, under pretence of a right, appertaining to God alone, of binding them in all cases whatever, not even excepting cases of conscience and religion?

What can appear more improbable, although true, than that this prince and this people, should obstinately steel their hearts, and shut their ears, against the most humble petitions and affectionate remonstrances; and unjustly determine, by violence and force, to execute designs which were reprobated by every principle of humanity, equity, gratitude and policy—designs which would have been execrable, if intended against savages and enemies, and yet formed against men, descended from the same common ancestors with themselves; men, who had liberally contributed to their support, and cheerfully fought their battles, even in remote and baleful climates? Will it not appear extraordinary, that thirteen colonies, the object of their wicked designs, divided by variety of governments and manners, should immediately become one people, and though without funds, without magazines, without disciplined troops, in the face of their enemies, unanimously determine to be free; and, undaunted by the power of Britain, refer their cause to the justice of the Almighty, and resolve to repel force by force, thereby presenting to the world an illustrious example of magnanimity and virtue scarcely to be paralleled? Will it not be matter of doubt and wonder, that, notwithstanding these difficulties, they should raise armies, establish funds, carry on commerce, grow rich by the spoils of their enemies, and bid defiance to the armies of Britain, the mercenaries of Germany, and the savages of the wilderness? But however incredible these things may in future appear, we know them to be true, and we should always remember, that the many remarkable and unexpected means and events, by which our wants have been supplied, and our enemies repelled or restrained, are such strong and striking proofs of the interposition of heaven, that our having been hitherto delivered from the threatened bondage of Britain, ought, like the emancipation of the Jews from Egyptian servitude, to be forever ascribed to its true cause; and instead of swelling our breasts with arrogant ideas of our prowess and importance, kindle in them a flame of gratitude and piety, which may consume all remains of vice and irreligion.

Blessed be God! the time will now never arrive, when the prince of a country, in another quarter of the globe, will command your obedience and hold you in vassalage. His consent has ceased to be necessary to enable you to enact laws essential to your welfare: nor will you, in future, be subject to the imperious sway of rulers, instructed to sacrifice your happiness, whenever it might be inconsistent with the ambitious views of their royal master.

The Americans are the first people whom heaven has favored with an opportunity of deliberating upon, and choosing the forms of government under which they should live; all other constitutions have derived their existence from violence or accidental circumstances, and are therefore probably more distant from their perfection, which though beyond our reach, may nevertheless be approached under the guidance of reason and experience.

How far the people of this state have improved the opportunity, we are at no loss to determine. Their constitution has given general satisfaction at home, and been not only approved, but applauded abroad. It would be a pleasing task to take a minute view of it, to investigate its principles, and remark the connection and use of its several parts—but that would be a work of too great length to be proper on this occasion. I must therefore confine myself to general observations; and among those which naturally arise from a consideration of this subject, none are more obvious, than that the highest respect has been paid to those great and equal rights of human nature, which should forever remain inviolate in every society; and that such care has been taken in the disposition of the legislative, executive and judicial powers of government, as to promise permanence to the constitution, and give energy and impartiality to the distribution of justice. So that while you possess wisdom to discern and virtue to appoint men of worth and abilities to fill the offices of the state, you will be happy at home and respectable abroad. Your lives, your liberties, your property, will be at the disposal only of your Creator or yourselves. You will know no power but such as you will create; no authority unless derived from your grant; no laws, but such as acquire all their obligation from your consent.

Adequate security is also given to the rights of conscience and private judgment. They are, by nature, subject to no control but that of the Deity and in that free situation they are now left. Every man is permitted to consider, to adore and to worship his Creator in the manner most agreeable to his conscience. No opinions are dictated; no rules of faith prescribed; no preference given to one sect to the prejudice of others. The constitution, however, has wisely declared, that the "liberty of conscience, thereby granted, shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state." In a word, the convention, by whom that constitution was formed, were of opinion, that the gospel of Christ, like the ark of God, would not fall, though unsupported, by the arm of flesh; and happy would it be for mankind, if that opinion prevailed more generally.

But let it be remembered, that whatever marks of wisdom, experience and patriotism there may be in your constitution, yet, like the beautiful symmetry, the just proportions and elegant forms of our first parents, before their maker breathed into them the breath of life, it is yet to be animated, and till then, may indeed excite admiration, but will be of no use; for the people it must receive its spirit, and by them be quickened. Let virtue, honor, the love of liberty and of science be, and remain, the soul of this constitution, and it will become the source of great and extensive happiness to this and future generations. Vice, ignorance, and want of vigilance, will be the only enemies able to destroy it. Against these, be forever jealous. Every member of the state, ought diligently to read and study the constitution of his country, and teach the rising generation to be free. By knowing their rights, they will sooner perceive when they are violated, and be the better prepared to defend and assert them.

This, gentlemen, is the first court held under the authority of our constitution, and I hope its proceedings will be such, as to merit the approbation of the friends, and avoid giving cause of censure to the enemies of the present establishment.

It is proper to observe, that no person in this state, however exalted or low his rank, however dignified or humble his station, but has a right to the protection of, and is amenable to, the laws of the land; and that if those laws be wisely made and duly executed, innocence will be defended, oppression punished and vice restrained. Hence it becomes the common duty, and indeed the common interest, of every subject of the state, and particularly of those concerned in the distribution of justice, to unite in repressing the licentious, in supporting the laws, and thereby diffusing the blessings of peace, security, order and good government, through all degrees and ranks of men among us.

I presume it will be unnecessary to remind you, that neither fear, favor, resentment, or other personal or partial considerations, should influence your conduct. Calm deliberate reason, candor, moderation, a dispassionate, and yet a determined resolution to do your duty, will, I am persuaded, be the principles by which you will be directed.

You will be pleased to observe, that all offences committed in this county against the peace of the people of this state, from treason to trespass, are proper objects of your attention and inquiry.

You will pay particular attention to the practice of counterfeiting the bills of credit, emitted by the general congress, or other of the American states, and of knowingly passing such counterfeits—practices no less criminal in themselves, than injurious to the interest of that great cause, on the success of which the happiness of America so essentially depends.

FRIGATE CONSTITUTION;

COMMONLY CALLED OLD IRONSIDES.

From the Boston Commercial Gazette.

As in the course of a few days the above noble ship will be hauled into the new and splendid dry dock, which has recently been completed at the navy yard, in the presence probably of the president of the United States, and many other distinguished officers of the government, as well as of an immense concourse of our fellow citizens, and as every circumstance relative to this favorite ship will now be rendered doubly interesting, we propose to offer a brief history of her splendid and glorious career, part of which is from memory, having been present when she was launched, part from official documents, and part we have gleaned from the old newspapers of the day. She was built at Hart's ship yard, at the north end, situated between the Winisimmit ferry ways and the marine rail yard, and was launched under the superintendence of col. CLAGHORN, the builder, on Saturday, the 21st of October, 1797; consequently she is now nearly thirty-six years old. In Russell's Boston Commercial Gazette of the next Monday, we find the following notice—

"THE LAUNCH—A magnificent spectacle! On Saturday last, at fifteen minutes past M. the frigate CONSTITUTION was launched into the adjacent element, on which she now rides an elegant and superb specimen of American naval architecture, combining the unity of wisdom, strength and beauty. The tide being amply full, she descended into the bosom of the ocean with an ease and dignity, which, while it afforded the most exalted and heart felt pleasure and satisfaction to the many thousand spectators, was the guarantee of her safety, and the pledge, that no occurrence should mar the joyous sensations that every one experienced; and which burst forth in reiterated shouts, which 'rent the welkin.' On a signal being given from on board, her ordnance, on shore, announced to the neighboring country, that the CONSTITUTION WAS SECURE. Too much praise cannot be given to col. CLAGHORN, for the coolness and regularity displayed in the whole business of the launch; and the universal congratulations he received, were evidences of the public testimony of his skill, intelligence and circumspection."

The severe labor that attended her birth, which was only effected at the third trial, was seized upon by the enemies of a navy, who at that time were numerous and powerful, as prophetic of ill-luck! With how little reason, her brilliant career has fully demonstrated. We may safely challenge the annals of naval history to name the ship that has done so much to fill the measure of her country's glory. She sailed on her first cruise, on Sunday, the 22d of July, 1798, and in the Commercial Gazette of the next morning, we find the following:

"Yesterday sailed on a cruise for the protection of our commerce, the frigate CONSTITUTION, commanded by captain Samuel Nicholson. This noble frigate reflects honor on all concerned in her construction—the agent for obtaining every material of the best kind for her equipment, and for having the same manufactured in a superior manner; on the builder for the execution of the hull, in a style demonstrating our capability for building ships of war, at least equal to any in Europe. The captain is a brave and experienced commander, in whom may be reposed perfect confidence. Her lieutenants young men, who have commanded merchant ships with approbation, and of whom fair expectations may be entertained. Her crew are, with very few exceptions, native sons of Massachusetts, many of them connected by the strongest of human ties wives and children. Upwards of one hundred seamen have given orders in favor of their families, to draw monthly, half of their pay, the public having made arrangements for this purpose, evincing of its paternal care and encouragement of our marines. It would seem that nothing is wanting, to render this ship and her crew perfect, but that experience, which can only result from actual exercise at sea."

She returned from this cruise in the middle of November. This was during the brief war with the French republic. We notice the appointment of Isaac Hull, as her 4th lieutenant, who, after the lapse of fourteen years, was fortunate enough to occupy a higher station on her quarter deck, when the charm of British invincibility was destined to be forever broken. On the 28th of December, of the same year, she again sailed from Boston harbor, on her second cruise, from which she returned a few months after, without having the good luck to fall in with any of the enemy's national ships. Less fortunate in this respect than the Constellation, under the gallant Truxton, who, about this time, succeeded in capturing the French frigate L'Insurgente, of 40 guns and 417 men. La Vengeance, a large French national ship 54 guns and 520 men, likewise struck her colors, but was fortunate enough to escape in a squall, and arrived at Curacao five days after, a complete wreck.

Shortly after this, our commerce in the Mediterranean having suffered severely from the depredations and insults of the Barbary cruisers, our government determined at once on chastising them. In May, 1803, commodore Edward Preble was appointed to the command of this favorite ship, and in June he sailed with the squadron destined to act against Tripoli. To all conversant with this scene of war, it is well known the Constitution acted a conspicuous part, in fact bore the brunt of the battle. After the destruction of the Philadelphia, of 44 guns she was for a long time the only frigate on the station, and being ably seconded by the gallant Decatur and the smaller vessels, did more in a single year to humble the pride of the Barbary states than all Christendom ever did before or since.

In short, such a variety of service, hair breadth escapes, hard knocks, and perilous adventures has never been achieved by any single vessel. Peace having been concluded with Tripoli, she soon after returned home, where she remained unemployed, or nearly so, till the commencement of the late war with Great Britain. This was on the 18th of June, 1812. On the 12th of July she left the Chesapeake for New York, preparatory to a long cruise, and on the 17th discovered and was chased by a British squadron, consisting of the Africa 64; Shannon and Guerriere 38; Belvidera 36; and Eolus 32; under the command of commodore Broke, of the Shannon. During the most critical period of the chase, when the nearest frigate, the Belvidera, had already commenced firing, and the Guerriere was training her guns for the same purpose, the possibility of keding the ship, although in nearly thirty fathoms of water, was suggested by lieutenant, now commodore Morris, and was eagerly adopted, with the most brilliant success. The enemy, who had before been gaining, was now almost imperceptibly fallen astern, without their being able to conceive of the mysterious manner in which it was effected. A lucky mile or thereabouts had been gained in this way, before the discovery was made, and then it was altogether too late to avail themselves of it, with any probability of success; a propitious breeze springing up at this moment, of which the Constitution felt the first effects, soon increased the distance, and rendered any further exertions in warping and towing unnecessary.

The Shannon had for some hours all her sails completely furl'd—with 13 boats towing ahead. The Constitution had three boats towing—the remainder being engaged in carrying out kedges, while the crew on board found sufficient employment in warping up to them; and to this most fortunate expedient is her miraculous escape to be attributed. She bid a final adieu to her kind friends on the 19th, after a chase of nearly three days and three nights, and arrived safe in Boston on the 26th of July. This has always been considered, and undoubtedly was, one of the most brilliant exploits that occurred during the war. The deep feeling—the intense anxiety that reigned throughout the ship during this long and arduous chase, and which was pictured in the countenances of all on board, in characters too strong to be mistaken—may be imagined, but cannot be described. Let us suppose for a moment, it had been the destiny of this fine ship to have fallen thus early in the war, into the hands of the enemy—a misfortune as has already been shown which was only escaped as it were, by a miracle—what a vast difference it would have made at the close of the war, not to speak of the great moral influence of a first victory, in the profit and loss of our naval glory; and although the balance would still have been greatly upon our side, yet the sum total would have been very sensibly or nearly one half diminished. In the first place the loss of so fine a frigate at this early period would have been irreparable, and in following up the consequences—three of the most splendid victories of the war, together with the same number of hair breadth escapes from a superior enemy, would now have to be deducted from the aggregate of our glory, making a difference, both ways, of more than 200 guns and almost 1,500 men.

After remaining a few days in port she sailed again, and on the 19th of August—precisely one month after her escape—was lucky enough to fall in with one of the same frigates cruising alone and with her name emblazoned in large characters in her fore-top-sail. Nothing daunted at this, however, the Constitution took the liberty of edging down for the purpose of ascertaining the object of such a close pursuit a few weeks before.

As soon as the two ships were within whispering distance, an explanation commenced which after a close conference of thirty minutes, ended to the complete satisfaction of capt. Hull. She proved to be H. B. M. frigate Guerriere, captain Dacres, of 49 guns and 302 men, and had been totally dismantled and in other respects was rendered such a complete wreck, that getting her into port was altogether out of the question. She was accordingly burned, and the Constitution returned again to Boston, where she arrived on the 30th August. Never shall we forget the enthusiasm with which she was received.

The news arrived in town during divine service on Sunday morning, and the crowds that flocked to State street to hear the particulars of such a glorious victory, and shouts that rent the air, fully evinced the deep interest that was felt by every class of the community.

The ship had anchored in President roads about 5 miles from town, and in the afternoon the harbor was alive with pleasure boats, anxious to take a closer view of Old Ironsides, and to exchange congratulations with her gallant crew. We among hundreds of others sailed round her several times, endeavoring in vain to trace the effects of an engagement with a British frigate of nearly equal force, that had occurred only eleven days before, and in which her antagonist was entirely demolished in the short space of half an hour. We could hardly believe our own eyes—no serious damage whatever was visible; now and then a place or two were pointed out where a splinter had been driven off, but on the whole she appeared in almost as perfect order as when she left the harbor only about three weeks before; indeed it seemed to us that like Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, she had passed the fiery ordeal entirely unscathed. This was indeed a new state of things, and served not a little to increase the hope and confidence of the friends of our gallant navy throughout the union.

Captain Hull, being now called upon, if we remember right, to attend to the affairs of a deceased brother, gave up the command of the ship to captain William Bainbridge, who, with the same crew, shortly after sailed on another cruise to South America—the sloop of war Hornet, captain Lawrence, also under his command, from whom however he was soon after separated. On the 29th of December of the same year, while cruising about 10 leagues from the coast of Brazil, she fell in with, and after a close engagement of nearly two hours captured, H. B. M. ship Java, of 49 guns and upwards of 400 men; captain Lambert being mortally wounded during the engagement. In addition to her full crew, the Java had upwards of one hundred supernumeraries on board—officers and seamen—to join the British ships of war on the East India station. Besides these there were a number of land officers; among the rest lieutenant general Hislop, major Walker and captain Wood.

This was one of the best contested battles that was fought during the war—the Java indeed only struck her flag, when every mast, bow-sprit and all had, one after another, gone by the board. “The great distance from our own coast, and the perfect wreck we made of the enemy’s frigate, forbade every idea of attempting to take her to the United States. I had therefore no alternative left but burning her, which I did on the 31st of December, after receiving all the prisoners and their baggage, which was very hard work, only having one boat left out of eight, and not one left on board the Java.” After blowing her up, the Constitution returned to Boston, where she arrived on the 18th of February, 1813.

Well do we remember being at the Federal street theatre, when the news of this victory was announced from the stage by the manager, Mr. Powell, and shortly after when the gallant commodore, together with some of his officers appeared in one of the boxes, the whole house resounded for many minutes with the cheering of the audience. The veteran Cooper, then in the prime of life, was in the second act of Macbeth, and although he stood a little behind the scenes, entirely forgetting the gracious Duncan he had murdered, we saw him swing his cap round with as much enthusiasm as any one.

In June, 1813, capt. Charles Stewart was appointed to her command; and on the 30th of December, she proceeded to sea, notwithstanding Boston was then blockaded by seven ships of war, and safely run the gauntlet through the whole of them. She returned on the 4th of April, 1814, and was chased into Marblehead by two of the enemy’s heavy frigates, La Nymphe and Junon.

About the middle of December, 1814, she proceeded on her second cruise under capt. Stewart, and on the 28th of February, off Madeira, fell in with, and after a severe action of 40 minutes, succeeded in capturing H. B. M. ships Cyane of 34, and Levant of 21 guns, and 325 men. A more perfect specimen of nautical skill was probably never witnessed, than was exhibited throughout the whole of this memorable battle. The advantages of a divided force, or as the boys call it, of two upon one, are well known to all, particularly to men of naval science. A raking fire is almost always very sure to be decisive of the fate of a battle; and to have avoided this from either of her opponents, and with a leading breeze too, is indeed miraculous, especially when we recollect that the Constitution succeeded in raking both of her antagonists more than once during the engagement.

After taking possession of her prizes the three ships made sail for the Cape de Verd Islands, and on the 10th of March came to anchor in the harbor of Port Praya in the island of St. Jago. Two days after, a squadron of the enemy hove in sight, consisting of the Nevers and Leander, of 50 guns each, and the Acasta frigate of 40, the whole under the command of Sir George Collier, and in seven minutes after the discovery was made, the Constitution with her two prizes had cut their cables and were under way, being at this time only about gun shot to windward of the enemy. The Levant was recaptured. The Cyane had the good fortune to escape, and now forms a part of our navy. The Constitution continued her cruise, and shortly after returned to Boston, where she was for the third time received with every possible demonstration of joy and exultation. The last news from her had been brought by the Cyane, arrived at New York, when the above squadron was left in chase, and she had heard a heavy cannonading shortly after losing sight of her, so that the most intense anxiety had for some time been entertained for her safety.

Peace had now been proclaimed, and to have lost this noble vessel and her gallant crew at this late hour, and after such a catalogue of glorious services too, would have cast a gloom over the whole country.

No wonder then that her safe arrival, after so many “moving accidents by flood and field;” and after having escaped so many perils of “the waters, winds and rocks”—should be greeted with such universal enthusiasm. Captain Stewart not only received the thanks of congress, but of almost every state legislature then in session, and from many quarters some more substantial marks of approbation.

After this, Old Ironsides was taken to the navy yard and immediately dismantled, where she remained unemployed, we believe with a single exception, till the spring of 1825, when she was again fitted out, and sailed under the command of captain Daniel T. Patterson, to join the squadron in the Mediterranean. She remained abroad about three years, after which she returned again to the United States, and as if to add one more to the many instances of good luck that have always attended her—she was so fortunate as to arrive and fire a federal salute in her native city—during the celebration of the 4th July, 1828, and contributed not a little, as well by her beautiful appearance as by the delightful associations that are ever uppermost in the presence of such a glorious vessel, to heighten the splendor and add a zest to the festivities of the day.

We have now, we believe, briefly touched upon most of the leading incidents in the eventful history of this favorite ship; doubtless there are many others well worth recording, but which can be only known to those who, at the time of their occurrence, were on board of her. We have never been able to find any but very unsatisfactory accounts of her operations before Tripoli, and the other Barbary states. A complete and impartial history of the movements of our several squadrons in those seas from 1803 to the present moment, would not only prove extremely interesting, but as a matter of record would be invaluable—we sincerely hope some competent person may be found who is willing to undertake it.

About twelve years since, the Constitution was hove out and completely examined at the navy yard in Charlestown, when her timbers, &c. were found to be in remarkable good order, a fact which, after twenty-five years wear and tear and hard service, redounds not a little to the credit of the old fashioned mechanics of Boston.

In her actions with the Guerriere and Java she mounted 54 guns, and 52 when engaged with the Cyane and Levant, her armament being 30 long 24 pounders on the main deck, and 24 32 pound carronades on the upper deck. Her loss in the action with the Guerriere was killed and wounded, 14; with the Java, 34, and with the Cyane and Levant, 14 more—total, 62. The Guerriere’s loss, killed, wounded and missing, was 103; the Java’s 161; Cyane’s 38; Levant’s 39—total, 341, or in the proportion of five and a half to one. The prisoners were nearly one thousand.

The dry dock into which Old Ironsides is now about to be taken, as well as the one which has recently been completed at Norfolk, is undoubtedly one of the most splendid specimens of stone masonry to be found in the world.

We have heard it spoken of by intelligent travellers, who have visited most of the naval depots in Great Britain, France and Russia, as by far surpassing any thing of the sort they had ever before witnessed. Indeed no expense has been spared by the government to render these magnificent public works as complete and perfect in every respect as possible. They were planned and have been constructed under the superintending care of colonel Loammi Baldwin, a gentleman who, for skill and science, has no superior in the country.
